Such was the laſt ſtruggle and untimely end of the renowned Warwick, who from his great power, influence, military capacity and fortune, had acquired the epithet of King maker. His naked body, and that of his brother Montacute, were expoſed in the cathedral of St. Paul, whence they were carried to Biſham in Berkſhire, and interred in the priory founded by their anceſtors. But this battle did not put an end to the civil war. The duke of Somerſet and earl of Oxford had rallied a large body, and retreated northward; but afterward turned aſide into Wales, where they joined the earl of Pembroke. Soon after the battle, Margaret of Anjou, that brand of the war, landed at Weymouth, attended by her ſon, the counteſs of Warwick, the lord Wenlock, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction. On her landing, being informed of the death of Warwick, and captivity of her huſband, ſhe fell into a ſwoon; and at laſt took ſanctuary with her ſon in the monaſtery of Boileau in Hampſhire. But ſhe ſoon recovered her ſpirits when joined by the duke of Somerſet, the earl of Devon, and many noblemen and gentlemen, with their vaſſals and dependents. Encouraged by their reinforcements ſhe took the field, and her followers continually increaſed as ſhe advanced to Tewkſbury in Glouceſterſhire, whence ſhe intended to proceed to Wales, and join the earl of Pembroke. But Edward had in the mean time proſcribed the queen and her adherents by proclamation, and advanced immediately towards the banks of the Severn, in order to attack her before this intended junction. Having happily executed this ſcheme, ſhe could not paſs the river without expoſing her rear to deſtruction; it was therefore reſolved in a council of war, to intrench themſelves in a park adjoining to the town of Tewkſbury, and remain in that ſituation till the arrival of Pembroke. Intrenchments were accordingly thrown up; and Edward, on his arrival, determined to attack them in their lines, before their camp ſhould be rendered impregnable. With this view he marſhalled his army in two lines, one of which was commanded by his brother the duke of Glouceſter, while he and Clarence took their ſtation in the other.

Somerſet arranged the queen's army in three lines within the intrenchments, he himſelf commanding the van, that he might withſtand the firſt aſſault of the enemy. The ſecond line was commanded by lord Wenlock, under the prince of Wales, who was conſidered as commander in chief; and the rear was conducted by the earl of Devonſhire. Edward, obſerving that Somerſet had left ſome openings in the front, through which he intended to ſally; and being well acquainted with the impetuous temper of that nobleman, ordered his brother Glouceſter, who began the attack, to draw Somerſet from his intrenchments by receding precipitately, until he ſhould obſerve the duke and his line in the open plain, and then to wheel and renew the charge; in which caſe he might rely on proper ſupport. Glouceſter having executed his inſtructions with punctuality and ſucceſs, inſtantly ordered his troops to halt, and recover their former ranks; which done he led them back to the charge, to the terror and amazement of the Lancaſtrians, who, confounded at this unexpected event, fled to their intrenchments. Somerſet obſerving that lord Wenlock had not advanced a ſtep to ſuſtain the firſt line, was ſo incenſed, that he rode up and cleft his head with a battle-axe; and the duke of Glouceſter entering the intrenchments of the enemy, made a dreadful carnage. Edward, following his brother with the ſecond line, completed the overthrow of the queen's army, which was routed with great ſlaughter, the ſecond and third lines having fled without ſtriking a blow. This deciſive battle was fought on the fourteenth of May. The earl of Devonſhire, and Sir John Beaufort, were found among the ſlain, which amounted to three thouſand. The duke of Somerſet, the prior of St. John, and about twenty other gentlemen, retired to the abbey church, thinking they would be ſafe in the ſanctuary; from which, however, they were dragged to execution. The prince of Wales being taken priſoner, was, at the command of Edward, brought into his preſence, and being aſked with a haughty and ſupercilious air, how he durſt preſume to invade his dominions? the young prince more mindful of his high birth, than his preſent fortune, replied, that he came to recover his father's crown, and his own inheritance. Regardleſs of the circumſtances which might juſtly inſtigate the young prince to ſuch a reply, Edward ſtruck him on the mouth with his gauntlet, which ſeems to have been a pre-concerted ſignal to Clarence, Glouceſter, Haſtings, and Thomas Gray, who dragged the gallant youth out of the royal tent, and buried their daggers in his heart. Margaret of Anjou was taken and committed to the Tower, where ſhe remained about four years, till ranſomed by the king of France for fifty thouſand crowns. In the ſame place of confinement expired the unfortunate Henry, a few days after the battle of Tewkſbury; but whether of a natural or violent death, cannot be aſcertained. His body was interred in the abbey of Chertſey, but afterwards removed to Windſor by Richard III.

A. D. 1472.

The earl of Oxford meeting with a cold reception in France, whither he retired after the battle of Tewkſbury, aſſembled about a hundred deſperadoes; and landed at St Michael's Mount, in Cornwall, took the place by ſurprize. Alarmed at this exploit, Edward detached a body of troops againſt him, which inveſting the place, he ſurrendered on promiſe of life; but he loſt both his liberty and eſtate, which the king confiſcated, without allowing the leaſt moiety for the ſubſiſtence of his counteſs, who was ſiſter to the earl of Warwick. John Holland, duke of Exeter, who had been left for dead on the field of Barnet, retired to the ſanctuary at Weſtminſter; but weary of confinement, and a life of dependence on the bounty of his friends, privately quitted his aſylum, and in about two years after his body was found on the ſea-ſide in the county of Kent.

This was the laſt of the houſe of Lancaſter from whom Edward had reaſon to expect any oppoſition, except the earl of Richmond, who reſided at the court of Brittany with his uncle Pembroke; and though theſe were deprived of power to excite any important inſurrection, yet he deſired to have the young earl in his power; and therefore diſpatched an embaſſy to the duke of Brittany, demanding that they ſhould be delivered up; but that prince refuſed to comply, though he aſſured Edward they ſhould never interrupt the tranquillity of his government; in conſideration of which promiſe the king paid a yearly penſion, under pretence of granting a maintenance for the two refugees.

A. D. 1474.

A league was concluded between Edward and the duke of Burgundy, in which they mutually agreed to attempt the conqueſt of France; but the ſubſidies granted by parliament being inſufficient for the expences of ſuch an expedition, the king ſolicited a benevolence from his ſubjects according to their reſpective abilities. This expedient ſucceeded, as many individuals choſe rather to part with their money than incur the king's diſpleaſure; and a war with France was a very popular pretence at this juncture.

A. D. 1475.

In the beginning of the year, Edward went over to Calais with an army of fifteen hundred lances, and as many thouſand archers, accompained by the principal nobility of England, who flattered themſelves with hopes of the ſame ſucceſs which had attended the attempts of their anceſtors. Edward ſent a herald to demand the crown of France, and in caſe of refuſal to denounce war; Lewis, without emotion, replied, that Edward had not taken this raſh ſtep without the inſtigation of the duke of Burgundy, and even made the herald a conſiderable preſent. He ſoon after took occaſion to ſend a herald to the Engliſh camp, with directions to ſolicit the good offices of the lords Stanley and Howard, towards effecting an accommodation. Accordingly a treaty of peace was concluded, on condition that Lewis ſhould pay ſeventy-five thouſand crowns to indemnify Edward for the expence of the armament, on the receipt of which he ſhould retire with his forces; that Lewis ſhould alſo pay him an annuity of fifty thouſand crowns; that the dauphin of France ſhould marry the princeſs Elizabeth, daughter of Edward, and ſettle on her a jointure of ſixty thouſand livres a year; and that neither party ſhould encourage civil wars in their reſpective dominions, but that both ſhould aſſiſt each other in ſuppreſſing the rebellions of their ſubjects. The Engliſh army having reached Amiens, Lewis ordered the gates to be thrown open, and the ſoldiers to be entertained by the inn-keepers at his expence; but this generoſity was the effect of fear, from which he was afterwards delivered by the departure of the Engliſh, who returned to their own country well ſatisfied with their treatment from Lewis.

A. D. 1476. After the ratification of this treaty, the duke of Burgundy marched againſt the duke of Lorrain, and reduced his whole country without any conſiderable reſiſtance. He then undertook an expedition for humbling the Swiſs, who had declared againſt him, while he was employed in the ſiege of Nuys. This he carried on at firſt with great ſucceſs; but at length he loſt two battles, with his whole baggage and great part of his army. Being afterwards conſiderably reinforced, he advanced to retake Nancy, which ſince his defeat had been ſurrendered to the duke of Lorrain, who encamped at St. Nicholas, in order to ſee the effect of a correſpondence he carried on with a Neapolitan officer called Campo Baſſo, a great favourite of the duke of Burgundy. The town was reduced already to extremity, when that prince drew up his army in order of battle; and then Baſſo deſerted to the enemy with two hundred men at arms, leaving fourteen accomplices whom he had inſtructed to terrify the Burgundians, and kill the duke during the engagement, if they found it practicable. The attack began early in the morning, and the duke of Burgundy was routed and ſlain. This event not only changed the appearance of things, but introduced a new ſyſtem of politics into Europe. He left behind him an only daughter, named Mary, who as ſhe was heireſs of his rich and extenſive dominions, was eagerly courted by all the potentates of Europe; but at length married to Maximilian of Auſtria, ſon of Frederic, emperor of Germany, from whom the Burgundians hoped relief in their preſent diſtreſſes.

A. D. 1477. During theſe tranſactions on the continent, the management of public affairs was engroſſed by the queen and her relations, who were now become very unpopular, as well for their unbounded ambition and inſolent behaviour, as the conſtant oppoſition they made to all the ſchemes of the king's brothers. The duke of Glouceſter, who was naturally reſerved, ſo artfully diſſembled his anger, as to prevent an open rupture between him and the miniſtry; but George, duke of Clarence, who was proud, ambitious, and impetuous, could not ſtifle his reſentment, which broke out with great vehemence on all occaſions. He hated the queen and the miniſtry, who had deprived him of the honour of Tutbury, and many other manors, which he enjoyed by virtue of the king's donation. His ducheſs dying a little before Charles, duke of Burgundy, he ſolicited the intereſt of his ſiſter Margaret, in procuring a match between him and her ſtep-daughter the princeſs Mary. This alliance would have greatly promoted the intereſt of England; and the ducheſs-dowager, who loved Clarence above all her brothers, ſo zealouſly eſpouſed his cauſe, that the ſcheme would probably have ſucceeded, had it not been defeated by the intrigues of Edward, who was either jealous of his brother's acceſſion to ſuch an unlimited power, or biaſſed by the queen, who wanted to ſecure this match for her brother, Anthony Woodville, earl of Rivers. This diſappointment ſo enraged Clarence, that he inveighed againſt the king with great acrimony; which being afterwards told to him with exaggerations by the duke of Glouceſter, who conſidered Clarence as an inſurmountable obſtacle to his deſign upon the crown, the king was ſo exaſperated that he committed him to the Tower, where he was ſoon after diſpatched; having, according to ſome hiſtorians, been drowned in a butt of Malmſey. This was the fate of George, duke of Clarence, who left behind him one ſon, named Edward, earl of Warwick, and a daughter, who was afterwards counteſs of Saliſbury. The duke's death excited ſuch a clamour among the populace, that the miniſtry thought proper to conceal the manner of his execution, and gave out that he died ſuddenly of grief and vexation; and as proof that no violence had been offered to his perſon, his body was expoſed in the cathedral of St. Paul; but this trick was ſo ſtale, that it ſerved only to confirm the ſuſpicions of the people who without ſcruple exclaimed againſt the cruelty of the adminiſtration. This was the laſt tranſaction of Edward's reign, which was one continued ſcene of blood, violence, and barbarity. His mind was either afterwards wholly devoted to ſenſual gratifications, or his ſchemes were defeated by his imprudence and want of circumſpection. Anxious for the conſummation of the marriage of his eldeſt daughter with the dauphin of France, Edward appointed ambaſſadors extraordinary to demand of Lewis the performance of his promiſe; and that prince, with all his ſubtilty, found it difficult to evade the preſſing inſtances of the envoys. Foreſeeing, therefore, that he could not amuſe Edward much longer, he determined to divert his attention in a different manner; and by a proper diſtribution of preſents in the court of Scotland, excited James to make war upon England. Theſe evaſions convinced Edward of the perfidy and diſſimulation of Lewis, againſt whom he vowed the bittereſt revenge; but in the mean time determined to retaliate on him his own weapons of cunning and fraud. He renewed and confirmed the treaty of alliance which had ſubſiſted between him and the late duke of Burgundy, and engaged to furniſh Maximilian with a reinforcement of ſix thouſand men; while on the other hand the archduke promiſed to pay fifty thouſand crowns annually to Edward, if the French king ſhould withdraw his penſion. Lewis, after many preſſing inſtances, continued to decline the performance of the contract. Edward therefore ordered a fleet to be fitted out, and ſent it under the command of John Middleton to the aſſiſtance of Maximilian, with whom he had lately concluded a treaty. His next ſtep was to guard his frontiers from the inroads of the Scots, and to conclude an alliance in his name with the lord of the Iſles, who engaged to make a diverſion in his favour, ſhould James attempt the invaſion of England. That weak prince, who was at variance with his nobility, and whoſe whole force was unequal to ſuch an enterprize, aſſembled an army, and entering England committed ſome ravages, but ſoon retired without attempting any thing of importance.

A. D. 1479.

A. D. 1480.

A. D. 1481. Having ſettled a correſpondence with the Scottiſh nobility, Edward was in no haſte to advance againſt the enemy, perſuaded that James would find it expedient to liſten to terms of accommodation; in order to effect which he renewed his alliance with the duke of Brittany, and ratified a contract of marriage between the prince of Wales, and Anne, eldeſt daughter of that duke. A. D. 1482. The duke of Glouceſter, attended by the duke of Albany, invaded Scotland with a powerful army, reduced Berwick, and forced the Scots to agree to an accommodation, by which they ceded that fortreſs to Edward. Elated with this ſucceſs, the king determined in good earneſt to proſecute the war againſt Lewis, and his people contributed towards the expence with great alacrity; but in the midſt of his preparations he was ſeized with a violent fever, of which he died on the ninth of April in the forty-ſecond year of his age, and twenty-third of his reign, being the XXXVth king of England from Egbert I.

By his queen Elizabeth he had three ſons and ſeven daughters, viz. Edward, Richard duke of York, and George, who died in his infancy. His daughters were, Elizabeth, afterwards married to Henry VII. king of England; Mary, betrothed to the king of Denmark, but who died before marriage; Cicely, firſt married to John, viſcount Willes, and afterwards to Sir John Kyme; Margaret, who died an infant; Anne, married to Thomas Howard, duke of Norfolk; Bridget, who took the veil; and Catherine, married to William Courtney, earl of Devonſhire. His natural children were, Arthur Plantagenet, viſcount Liſle, born of Elizabeth Lucy; and Elizabeth Plantagenet, married to Thomas, lord Lumley; another Elizabeth, by Catherine Clavenger; and Iſabel Mylbery, married to a brother of lord Audley.

In this reign flouriſhed thoſe two great lawyers, Thomas Littleton, and John Forteſcue; the former was, in 1454, called to the degree of ſerjeant at law, and afterwards appointed ſteward of the Marſhalſea of the king's houſhould; and, in 1466, was made one of the judges of the Common Pleas. He wrote on the tenures by which all the eſtates in England were antiently held. Sir Edward Coke's books of inſtitutes is a comment on this work. This great lawyer died on the twenty-third of Auguſt, in the twenty-firſt year of the reign of Edward IV.

Sir John Forteſcue ſtudied the municipal laws of England in Lincoln's Inn, and in 1442 was made lord chief juſtice of the King's Bench, in which poſt he continued till near the end of the reign of King Henry VI. who ſhewed him many particular marks of favour, and advanced him to the poſt of lord high chancellor. He wrote in Latin a learned commentary on the politic laws of England, for the uſe of prince Edward; and another work on the difference between an abſolute and limited monarchy, as it more particularly regards the Engliſh conſtitution.

In the fourth year of Edward IV. a pound weight of gold was ordered to make by tale twenty pounds, ſixteen ſhillings, and eight-pence; and a pound weight of ſilver, one pound, ſeventeen ſhillings, and ſix-pence; but it was afterwards ordered, that a pound weight of gold ſhould be divided into forty-five nobles, each to paſs for ten ſhillings.

Character of King Edward IV.

He was a prince of moſt elegant perſon, graceful mien, and inſinuating addreſs. His courage was greater than his prudence, and his good fortune greater than both. Theſe qualities gained him the eſteem of the people, and in many circumſtances of his life were of eſſential ſervice to him. His leading paſſion was the gratification of his ſenſual appetites; and his libertiniſm was unreſtrained. In times of proſperity he devoted himſelf entirely to his pleaſures; in adverſe circumſtances no man was capable of exerting greater ſpirit, vigour, and activity; in nine battles, where he fought in perſon, he was victorious in all. For ſome time he was exceeding liberal, but at laſt became covetous; leſs from his natural temper, than from the neceſſity of ſupplying the immoderate expences attending a gratification of irregular deſires. He had much wit, and ſolid judgment, yet committed ſeveral capital errors; particularly in a private marriage of lady Eleanor Butler, daughter of the earl of Shrewſbury, which rendered his marriage with the widow Gray bigamy; and his afterwards being governed by the relations of the laſt mentioned lady, on whom he laviſhed wealth and honours. So fond was he of power, that he ſacrificed the nobleſt blood in England to his jealouſy; whereby the laurels which he gained in the field, were ſtained and diſgraced by the lives he ſacrificed on the ſcaffold. Inſtead of following that example of moderation and mildneſs ſet him by his father, he was guilty of cruelty, perjury, and incontinence. The firſt appears in the great number of princes and lords whom he cauſed to be put to a violent death. He ſhewed his breach of faith by his unjuſt puniſhment of lord Willes and his brother-in-law, after drawing them out of ſanctuary by a ſafe conduct. As for his incontinency, he had many concubines; among whom were three; one of them, he ſaid, was the merrieſt, the other the wittieſt, and the third the holieſt in the world, ſhe being always in a church when he ſent for her. His good fortune ſeems to have been almoſt ſupernatural. He was raiſed to the throne after the loſs of two battles, and proclaimed king, while his father's head was upon the walls of York. In the beginning of his reign he was cruelly vindictive; in the latter part he was addicted to pleaſure; and left to his ſucceſſor a throne polluted with blood.

This was uſurped by Richard, duke of Glouceſter, againſt whom were brought the moſt horrid charges malevolence could invent; though there are no accounts of the greateſt crimes of which he is accuſed but from Lancaſtrian hiſtorians, and they are, moreover, invalidated by authentic records lately brought to light, which we have have had the favour of peruſing. During the latter part of the reign of Edward IV. the nation in a great meaſure forgot the dreadful animoſities which had ſubſiſted between the houſes of York and Lancaſter, and having acquieſced in the eſtabliſhed government, were only agitated by ſome court intrigues, which aroſe from the perpetual rivalſhip between the queen, her relations, and the ancient nobility, who complained of the ſudden elevation, and unbounded credit of that aſpiring family. The late king ſaw with regret the conſequences that might reſult from theſe alarming diviſions, during the minority of his ſon; and on his death-bed prevailed upon the contending parties to embrace each other, with all the marks of a cordial reconciliation; but his eyes were no ſooner cloſed, than they followed their ſeparate intereſts, and each endeavoured to get the duke of Glouceſter over to their ſide. Earl Rivers had been intruſted by the deceaſed monarch with the care and education of his ſon; and the queen was deſirous, that he ſhould levy a body of troops to conduct his young ſovereign to London, in order to his being crowned with the uſual ſolemnities; but the duke of Glouceſter writing to the queen, repreſented, that the appearance of an armed power might be dangerous, and was not neceſſary; upon which ſhe revoked her order to her brother, deſiring him to come with no greater retinue than was neceſſary to ſupport the young king's ſtate and dignity. In the mean time the duke of Glouceſter ſet out from York with a numerous train of northern nobility. On his reaching Northampton, he was joined by the duke of Buckingham, who had alſo a ſplendid retinue; and hearing that the king was every hour expected there, he determined to wait for him, and conduct him from thence to London. The earl Rivers, apprehending the town was too ſmall to accommodate ſo many people, ſent the king forward by another road to Stoney Stratford, and went to Northampton to apologize for this meaſure, and to pay his reſpect to the duke of Glouceſter. He was received with every mark of friendly eſteem, and ſpent the evening in an amicable manner with Glouceſter and Buckingham; but at the time of reſt, the gates of the inn were ſuddenly locked, and the earl made priſoner. Early in the morning, the two dukes proceeded to Stoney Stratford, where, in the king's preſence, they found occaſion to quarrel with his half-brother, lord Richard Gray, accuſing him, the marquis of Dorſet, and earl Rivers, of hoſtile and treaſonable deſigns; to which ends the marquis had entered the Tower, taken treaſure from thence, and ſent a force to ſea. Theſe nobles, together with Sir Thomas Vaughan, who poſſeſſed a conſiderable poſt in the houſhold, and Sir Thomas Hawte, were at the ſame time put under a guard, and conducted to Pontefract. Glouceſter approached the young king with all the marks of reſpect, and ſtrove to ſatisfy him, with regard to the violence committed on his uncle and brother; but Edward being fond of thoſe near relations by whom he had been tenderly educated, was unable to conceal his concern.

The queen was no ſooner apprized of theſe proceedings, than ſhe conceived the whole deſign of Glouceſter, and conſidering her two ſons and brother as loſt, fled for refuge into the ſanctuary at Weſtminſter, with the duke of York, who was about nine years of age, and the reſt of her children. The lord Haſtings having received intelligence of this, repaired to the palace of the archbiſhop of York, to whom he imparted the tidings, aſſuring him that no harm was intended to the king, to whom he was indeed moſt ſincerely attached, not having penetrated into the dark and bloody views of Glouceſter. The archbiſhop, conſiſtent with his known humanity, aroſe immediately from his bed, and though it was midnight, went to viſit the queen, whom he found ſitting on the floor, deploring, in the utmoſt anguiſh of mind, the fate of her children. He endeavoured to comfort her from the aſſurances of Haſtings; but ſhe could derive no conſolation from that quarter. He then proteſted, if her enemies ſhould be cruel enough to take away the king's life, he would inſtantly crown the duke of York; and, as a pledge of his ſincerity, left the great ſeal in her hands. Soon after this, the duke of Glouceſter, with the king, arrived in London, and were received by the citizens with loud acclamations. The duke, like a conſummate diſſembler, rode behind Edward, calling to the people, "Behold your prince and ſovereign!" A grand council was now ſummoned, when Richard, duke of Glouceſter, he being the neareſt male of the royal family, capable of exerciſing the powers of government, was declared Protector of the king and kingdom. Glouceſter, inveſted with this dignity, to which he was invited by the cuſtoms of the realm, took the great ſeal from the archbiſhop, and gave it to the biſhop of Lincoln. He alſo beſtowed on his own creatures, all the places which had been poſſeſſed by the queen's dependents. He then made a motion in council, that a deputation ſhould be ſent, to deſire the queen to permit the duke of York to attend his brother and aſſiſt at the coronation. He alledged, that the queen's concealment implied diſtruſt, which might excite jealouſies, and revive factions, to the great prejudice of the nation; that the circumſtance of York's continuing in the aſylum, while his brother was veſted with the crown, would derogate from the dignity of government; and that there was great reaſon to ſuſpect, that the queen's deſign was to eſcape from the ſanctuary, and raiſe commotions in the kingdom, under pretence of defending her ſecond ſon from violence. He therefore propoſed, that the primate ſhould endeavour to perſuade the queen to part with him, and ſhould ſhe refuſe to grant this deſire of the council, recourſe ought then to be had to force. The archbiſhop being a perſon of great humanity and integrity, and convinced of the duke's integrity, employed every forcible argument to carry his point; but the queen continued long obſtinate, inſiſting, that the duke of York not only lived in ſecurity, by reſiding in the ſanctuary, but gave ſecurity to the king, who was in no danger, while his ſucceſſor remained in a place of ſafety. At length ſhe was prevailed upon to conſent, and produced her ſon. She delivered him to the primate with the ſtrongeſt marks of maternal affection, accompanied with the moſt violent agitations of mind; and at parting ſhed a torrent of tears. The archbiſhop preſented the young prince to the protector, by whom he was embraced with all the external ſigns of paternal tenderneſs, deſiring he would conſider him as his guardian and father. At the firſt meeting of the two young princes, joy was viſible in their countenances; and they began to think their uncle had a real regard for their intereſt; but theſe pleaſing ſurmiſes ſoon vaniſhed; for in a few days they were conveyed from the biſhop's palace, where they had reſided, to the Tower, from whence the kings of England uſed to ride in proceſſion through the ſtreets of London, to their coronation at Weſtminſter, a cuſtom which now furniſhed Glouceſter with a pretence for committing his nephew to cloſe cuſtody.

About this time a proclamation was iſſued by the protector, charging Jane Shore with having plotted treaſon with the marquis of Dorſet, the queen's ſon, and ſummoned her to anſwer before the council for ſorcery and witchcraft; but no proof appearing againſt her, ſhe was tried in the ſpiritual court for adultery, and did public penance at St. Paul's in a white ſheet, with a wax taper in her hand. This lady was born in London, had received a good education, and was married to a ſubſtantial citizen; but in this match, views of intereſt had unhappily been more conſulted than her inclinations; and though her mind appeared formed for virtue, ſhe wanted the ſteadineſs and reſolution neceſſary to enable her to reſiſt the allurements of Edward, who had ſolicited her favours; but though this gay and amorous monarch ſeduced her from the path of duty, ſhe rendered herſelf reſpectable by her many virtues; and employed the aſcendency, which her charms and vivacity long maintained over him, in acts of humanity and beneficence. The king was as much in love with her temper as her beauty. He never heard her ſpeak ill of any one; but ſhe was forward to oppoſe calumny, to protect the oppreſſed, and to relieve the indigent. Her good offices were the genuine dictates of her heart, and ſhe ſcorned to take a reward, being unwilling to have it thought that ſhe acted from a motive of intereſt. Hence ſhe amaſſed but a ſmall degree of wealth, of which ſhe was now plundered. Mrs. Shore lived to experience, in old age and poverty, the ingratitude of thoſe courtiers, who had ſolicited her friendſhip, and been protected by her credit; and none among the multitude, whom ſhe had obliged, had the gratitude or humanity to relieve her. Hence ſhe languiſhed out her life in ſolitude and extreme indigence, and, living to a great age, begged of thoſe, ſays Sir Thomas More, that might then have begged, had it not been for her.

Richard now no longer made a ſecret of his intentions to aſcend the throne. He declared by his emiſſaries, the marriage of Edward invalid, and all his poſterity illegitimate, by his having been married to lady Eleanor Butler the earl of Shrewſbury's daughter, long before his marriage with Elizabeth Gray, by Stilton, biſhop of Bath, who afterwards divulged the ſecret. It was alſo reported, that the duke of Clarence's attainder had rendered his children incapable of ſucceeding to the throne; and theſe two families being ſet aſide, the protector remained the only true and legitimate heir of the houſe of York. It is pretended by ſome writers, that Richard made uſe of another plea, and maintained, that both Edward IV. and the duke of Clarence were illegitimate, the ducheſs of York having had ſeveral lovers, who were the fathers of thoſe children; but this appears highly improbable, ſince by baſtardizing his elder brothers, he would have rendered his own legitimacy juſtly ſuſpected, and there is not the leaſt degree of probability, that he would throw ſo foul an imputation on his own mother, who was then living, a princeſs of irreproachable virtue, and with whom he maintained a moſt cordial intimacy, an objection which is greatly ſtrengthened by his holding his firſt council at her houſe, and by a very affectionate letter to her, preſerved among the Harleian manuſcripts in the Britiſh Muſeum. Upon the ſame ground ſtands the ſtory of Dr. Shaw, being appointed to preach at St. Paul's, and chuſing for his text, “ Baſtard ſlips ſhall not thrive,” on which he is ſaid to have enlarged on all the topics, that could diſcredit the birth of Edward IV. and the duke of Clarence, with their children. Mr. Walpole who ſeems to be as fond of novelties in opinion, as others are of the marvellous, obſerves, that Richard's election appears to have been voluntary; and that the nobility, from their hatred and jealouſy of the queen's family, and many of them from the conviction of Edward's precontract, met his claim half way; which is nothing more than an ingenious conjecture of one very ingenious and learned man.

Richard, now his plot was near the cataſtrophe, thought proper to impart his deſign to Buckingham, and ſecure that nobleman, who was deſtitute of every virtuous principle, in his intereſt, by large grants and larger promiſes. He alſo engaged in his ſervice a ſet of wretches, without fear or conſcience, whoſe very villany had rendered them deſperate, and whoſe ſole principle of action was ſelf-intereſt. Yet, though thus provided with inſtruments, fit to execute the moſt horrid purpoſes, he nevertheleſs thought it expedient to ſound the diſpoſition of Haſtings, in order to aſſign him his employ, or if he found him wavering, to diſpatch him at once. One Cateſby therefore was properly inſtructed in this buſineſs; but the loyal Haſtings, ſhocked at the thought of Richard's aſſuming the regal diadem, declared he would ſupport the intereſt of the young princes, and not only at the expence of his fortune, but with the laſt drop of his blood. Richard had already been the cruel cauſe of the murder of earl Rivers, Sir Richard Gray, and Sir Thomas Vaughan, by an order diſpatched to Sir Thomas Radcliffe, governor of Pontefract caſtle, in which they were confined; and now, finding the integrity of Haſtings invincible, he devoted him alſo to immediate death; to accompliſh which purpoſe he repaired in the morning to the council, then held in the Tower, where he converſed with the members very affably, and after ſome time retired, deſiring they might continue their deliberations, and give the laſt direction for the coronation, which had been too long deferred. In about an hour after his departure, he returned with a frowning aſpect, knitting his brows, biting his lips, and exhibiting all the ſigns of the moſt violent indignation. After ſome pauſe, “ My lords, ſaid he, what puniſhment do thoſe deſerve, who have conſpired againſt my life?” The queſtion ſtruck the whole council with ſilent aſtoniſhment. Haſtings anſwered in the name of the reſt, “ That whoever was guilty of ſuch a crime, deſerved to ſuffer the death of a traitor.” Before the members had time to recover from their ſurprize, he made bare his left arm, which was withered, and preſenting it to the council, “ Behold, ſaid he, what that ſorcereſs, my brother's wife, and the accurſed Shore, have done by their inchantments! They have reduced this arm to the condition in which you ſee it; and the reſt of my body muſt have been conſumed in the ſame manner, if by the ſingular protection of heaven, their infamous practices had not been diſcovered.” Haſtings could not avoid expreſſing his doubts about the truth of the information, and obſerved, that “ if they were guilty, they deſerved puniſhment.” “ How!” cried the protector, in a furious rage, “ doſt thou anſwer me with thy ifs, as though I had forged the information? I tell thee, they have conſpired againſt my life, and thou thyſelf art one of the accomplices.” So ſaying he ſtruck upon the table with his hand, and immediately the council chamber was filled with armed men: then turning to Haſtings, he ſaid, “ I arreſt thee for high-treaſon.” “ Who, me? my lord!” replied that nobleman; “ Yes, thee, thou traitor!” exclaimed the protector, and immediately ordered him to be ſeized by the ſoldiers. At the ſame inſtant, lord Stanley, together with the archbiſhop of York, and the biſhop of Ely were arreſted; but as for Haſtings, Richard was ſo bent on his deſtruction, that he ſwore he would not dine until his head ſhould be brought him. He was therefore led immediately to the green, before the chapel of the Tower, where, after a haſty confeſſion to a prieſt, he was beheaded on a log of timber lying upon the green. The death of the priſoners at Pontefract, and that of Haſtings, exciting no inſurrection among the people, Glouceſter became more confident: he threw off the maſk of diſſimulation, openly aſpired to the crown, and perpetrated other acts of injuſtice and violence. He had indeed proceeded too far to think of receding. It was neceſſary for him to perſevere: he muſt either perſevere or periſh. It was therefore agreed in council, which now conſiſted wholly of Richard's creatures, that an attempt ſhould be made to obtain the voice of the people in his favour. Accordingly the lord mayor, aldermen, and livery of London, were aſſembled by ſummons at Guildhall; where the duke of Buckingham, in a ſtudied harangue, expatiated on the virtues of the duke of Glouceſter, and concluded with aſking, whether they would have that prince for their king? A profound ſilence prevailed throughout the whole aſſembly. The duke repeated the ſame queſtion: the ſame ſilence enſued. The mayor deſired the recorder might addreſs the people, he being conſidered as the mouth of the city. The experiment was tried, but without ſucceſs. "This is aſtoniſhing obſtinacy," cried the duke; "declare your ſentiments one way or other. I demand now, in plain terms, whether you will, or not, have the protector for your ſovereign?" Upon this ſome hired apprentices ſet up a feeble cry, of "Long live king Richard." This was conſidered as a ſufficient declaration of the ſentiments of the nation; and Buckingham haſtened to acquaint the protector, that he was called upon to aſſume the reins of government by the loyal citizens of London: adding, "That the people were ſo much determined to reject the poſterity of the late king, that if his highneſs would not accept of the crown, they muſt turn their eyes on ſome other perſon." However, with a genuine hypocritical reluctance, he conſented to comply with their requeſt, and yielding to the earneſt perſuaſions of Buckingham, accepted of the crown. From that moment he acted as legal poſſeſſor of the Engliſh throne, while young Edward was ſcarcely conſidered as a nominal king.

RICHARD III.

His coronation—Strictures on his perſon—Conjectures on the ſuppoſed murder of his two nephews—Rebellion and death of the duke of Buckingham—Earl of Richmond invited to England—makes a deſcent without oppoſition, and arrives on the ſixth of Auguſt in Milford Haven—The battle of Boſworth, in which Richard is ſlain—His character.

A. D. 1483. RICHARD having by diſſimulation, and murders almoſt innumerable, accompliſhed his main deſign, was proclaimed king of England and France, on the ſixth of July, with great pomp at Weſtminſter. All the peers of the realm were preſent, fearing leſt by their abſence they ſhould incur the ſuſpicion of the tyrant, who was now become the object of a general terror. But Mr. Walpole, from the great regularity with which the coronation was conducted, and the vaſt concourſe of nobility with which it was graced, infers, that the election of Richard to the throne could not be an unwelcome revolution, though accompliſhed merely by violence. It is here neceſſary to obſerve to our readers, that in this and ſucceeding reigns, we ſhall be obliged to produce the teſtimonies of various writers to the truth or falſehood of conteſted facts; ſeveral of theſe are known to have been hired partizans, ſuch as Smollet, Mortimer, Montague, and others; but where differences of opinion are laid before our readers; or in caſe we in our turn differ from other hiſtorians, they know their privilege: utrum horum mavis; "take which you pleaſe of them." We do not pretend to be wiſer than our predeceſſors, our only boaſt is impartiality and integrity.

One of the firſt acts of Richard's reign, after his coronation, was to remove out of the way of his ambition the two young princes*. Various have been the relations reſpecting the particulars of this horrid action. One hiſtorian tells us, "that Richard ſent orders to Sir Robert Brackenbury, conſtable of the Tower, to put the princes to death, but that gentleman refuſed to have any hand in the infamous office. Richard commanded him to reſign the government to Sir James Tyrrel, for one night only. This ruffian chuſing three aſſociates, Slater, Dighton, and Foreſt, came in the night time to the door of the chamber where the young princes lay, and ſending in the aſſaſſins, he bid them execute their commiſſion, while he himſelf ſtaid without. They found the young princes in bed, and in a ſound ſleep: when after ſuffocating them with the bolſter and pillows, they ſhewed their naked bodies to Tyrrel, who ordered them to be buried at the ſtair foot, deep in the ground, under a heap of ſtones. Theſe circumſtances were all confeſſed by the actors, in the reign of Henry VII. who were never puniſhed for the bloody deed. The bones of the princes were diſcovered in 1674, and were removed by order of Charles II. to Weſtminſter-abbey, where they were interred among the remains of the Engliſh monarchs. A monument was afterwards erected to their memory. Another writer, of whoſe integrity we have a very high opinion, obſerves, that Richard, to obviate all ſuſpicion of being acceſſary to this tragical ſcene, made a tour through ſeveral counties, under pretence of reforming abuſes which had crept into government. In the courſe of this excurſion, the two princes are ſaid to have been ſtifled in the Tower, by one Tyrrel, a notorious aſſaſſin in the reign of Edward IV. It is certainly true, that the two princes diſappeared about this time; and that, in the reign of Charles II. the workmen employed in repairing that part of the Tower, found the bones of two ſmall ſkeletons, which were interred in Weſtminſter-abbey, as the remains of thoſe princes who had ſuffered an untimely fate. To invalidate theſe accounts, though taken from authentic records, Mr. Walpole, in his Hiſtoric Doubts, obſerves, that Sir Thomas More, and lord Bacon, confeſs, that many queried, whether the two princes were murdered in Richard's days or not. On which he demands, "If they were not deſtroyed in Richard's days, in whoſe days were they murdered? Who will tell me, that Henry VII. did not find the eldeſt, at leaſt, priſoner in the Tower? And if he did, what was there in Henry's nature or character to prevent our ſurmiſes going farther? If they were put to death at the time fixed by More, Richard muſt have acted from the wantonneſs of cruelty: for his throne then appeared to be firmly eſtabliſhed, and the whole kingdom quiet. By the roll of parchment which baſtardized Edward V. it appears he was then alive, though it was ſeven months after the time aſſigned by More for his murder, and it ſeems more than probable, that it was one of thoſe princes, who afterwards endeavoured to obtain the crown, and was called Perkin Warbeck. The two ſkeletons found in the Tower, in the reign of Charles II. with no marks to aſcertain the time of their interment, can ſurely be no proof of the contrary." "It is probable," ſays another author, "that Edward V. walked at the coronation of Richard." Indeed, in the coronation roll is an entry of the robes prepared on this occaſion, which were extremely ſplendid, and appear to be the trappings of a cavalcade, and not for the uſe of a priſoner: and this prince, all agree, was at firſt treated by the tyrant with great indulgence and reſpect.

* We think ourſelves much obliged to a certain nobleman, who has favoured us with a curious manuſcript, relating to this tranſaction; but not having been able, after the moſt diligent ſearch, to authenticate the ſame by the leaſt corroborating evidence, even of a circumſtantial kind; we hope his Grace will excuſe our not having made uſe of it, in the body of this work.

We alſo embrace this opportunity, of paying the tribute of grateful acknowledgments, to another truly honourable perſonage, for that free acceſs, which we have at all times been allowed, to both his cabinet and library; nor muſt we omit our hearty thanks for ſeveral hints we have received from other perſons whoſe judgment we ſhall ever highly eſteem.

Not leſs various and jarring are the ſentiments of moderns relating to the perſon of Richard. He was formerly repreſented as a little, crooked, withered, hump-backed monſter, who remained two years in his mother's womb, and at laſt born with teeth, and hair on his ſhoulders, to intimate how careful Providence was when he formed a tyrant; to give due warning of what was to be expected. "Yet theſe portents," ſays Mr. Walpole, "were far from prognoſticating a tyrant; for this plain reaſon, that other tyrants have been born without them. Who was handſomer than Alexander, Auguſtus, or Lewis XIV. yet who ever commanded the ſpilling of more human blood?" The truth ſeems to be, that Richard who was ſlender, and not tall, had one ſhoulder higher than the other; a defect eaſily ſwelled by the magnifying glaſſes of party, the diſtance of time, and the amplification of tradition, into ſhocking deformity. The old counteſs of Deſmond, who had danced with Richard, declared, that he was the handſomeſt man in the room, except his brother Edward; and John Rous, the antiquary of Warwickſhire, who ſaw Richard at Warwick, deſcribing his perſon, mentions no other defect than the inequality of his ſhoulders; and indeed the vigour and activity with which he exerted himſelf in battle, are an evident proof of his being poſſeſſed of that bodily ſtrength, which is never the lot of perſons much deformed.

Richard in the courſe of his progreſs through the country, reſided ſome time at Glouceſter, which he affected to favour, as the place from whence he derived his title. He was attended by the duke of Buckingham, who thinking no reward adequate to his late ſervices, was become ſo inſolent, that the king determined to humble his pride, and he retired in diſguſt to his caſtle of Brecknock. During his journey, Richard adminiſtered juſtice with great impartiality; and by an aſſiduous application to the intereſt of his ſubjects, ſeemed deſirous of wiping off the ſtain his character had contracted, from the bloody meaſures by which he aſcended the throne. From Glouceſter he repaired to York, where he had the pleaſure of receiving Geoffrey de Saſiola, ambaſſador from Spain, whom Ferdinand and Iſabella had ſent on purpoſe to renew the alliance between Caſtile and England. He was ſo pleaſed to find himſelf acknowledged by that princeſs, that he knighted the ambaſſador, and ſent very reſpectful letters to their Catholic majeſties, and even to their miniſters. In this interval, the duke of Buckingham raiſed a rebellion againſt Richard, aſſiſted by Moreton, biſhop of Ely, a perſon of ſingular penetration and addreſs. They agreed to declare for Henry, earl of Richmond, who ſhould marry Elizabeth, daughter of Edward IV. and by this alliance unite the intereſts of both houſes in his favour. They communicated their ſcheme to the old counteſs of Richmond, and the queen dowager, who ſtill continued in the ſanctuary of Weſtminſter. Both theſe princeſſes approving the propoſal, a friendſhip was eſtabliſhed between them and the duke of Buckingham, and each began to engage their adherents. In the mean time, the counteſs dowager of Richmond diſpatched two meſſengers to her ſon in Brittany, to acquaint him with the meaſures that had been entered into in his favour, and the terms on which he was invited to England. In conſequence of this advice, he repaired to the court of Brittany, and related the particulars of the plan to the duke, who promiſed his concurrence and ſupport. He then ſent letters to his mother and the duke of Buckingham, informing them of the progreſs he had made, and deſiring they would prepare for his reception in the beginning of October. Theſe ſucceſſes animated the reſolution of the confederates, who reſpectively began to exert their power and influence in promoting the main deſign. Richard ſuſpecting that ſome plot was forming againſt him, advanced from York towards the centre of the kingdom, giving out orders for the troops to be in readineſs to march on the firſt notice. He then ſent a meſſenger to the duke of Buckingham, whom he imagined to be at the head of this conſpiracy, enjoining his attendance at court; but inſtead of obeying the order, he collected his forces, and retired to the weſtern provinces, where he expected to be joined by the reſt of the confederacy. The king, alarmed at the preparations which Buckingham had made in ſo ſhort a time, determined to go in queſt of the duke, and engage him before he ſhould be reinforced; but an unforeſeen accident kept them aſunder. Buckingham had advanced by haſty marches, to the ſide of the Severn, in order to join his friends in the counties of Devon and Dorſet, but the river had overflowed its banks to ſuch an extent, that, for ſix days, he could neither paſs the ſtream, nor find ſubſiſtence where he had encamped. His men, alarmed with ſuperſtitious terrors at this extraordinary event, and at the ſame time diſtreſſed for want of proviſions, abandoned their camp, and Buckingham in a few days was left with only one ſervant, who was faithful enough to attend his maſter in diſtreſs. He had now no other reſource than that of concealment, there expecting the arrival of the earl of Richmond, or ſome other accident might occaſion a revolution in the government. Thus forlorn he fled, diſguiſed in the habit of a peaſant, to the houſe of one Banniſter, a creature who had ſubſiſted on his bounty, and been raiſed by him to a moderate eſtate near Shrewſbury. But this ungrateful wretch betrayed him to the ſheriff of Shropſhire, who conducted him to Saliſbury, where he was beheaded without form of trial. His friends, alarmed at the news of this diſaſter, concealed themſelves in different retreats, and a great number of his adherents paſſed over to Brittany.

A. D. 1484.

Richard being thus unexpectedly ſucceſsful, he ſacrificed a great number of victims to his cruelty and ambition; but to attach lord Stanley, huſband to the counteſs of Richmond, more firmly to his intereſt, he created him lord high conſtable of England. During theſe tranſactions Richmond received ſecret aſſurances from ſeveral noblemen, that he might rely on their ſupport, whenever they ſhould find a proper opportunity to declare againſt Richard; and among theſe was the lord Stanley, who was ſo much ſuſpected by the king, that he could not obtain leave to retire into the country, without leaving his ſon at court as an hoſtage. As Richard knew that the earl of Richmond could be only formidable from his projected marriage with the princeſs Elizabeth, he reſolved to make her his own conſort. This could not be effected without the removal of his preſent wife, and prevailing on the pope to grant a diſpenſation for an inceſtuous marriage. He therefore began the execution of this ſtrange project, by making large offers to the queen-dowager, and confirming the ſame by a ſolemn oath, taken at an aſſembly of the lords ſpiritual and temporal. Allured by theſe offers, the queen left the ſanctuary and repaired to court with her five daughters, where they were graciouſly received. Having, as he imagined, accompliſhed the moſt arduous part of his plan, Richard concerted means for the removal of his wife, who had borne him only one ſon, who died about this time; and ſhe herſelf, being in a declining ſtate of health, ſoon followed him. He was now at liberty to wed his niece Elizabeth; but ſhe received his addreſſes with horror, and begged he would ever deſiſt from the diſagreeable ſubject: however, he did not deſpair of overcoming her antipathy, though he deferred his deſign, thinking it impolitic to force her inclinations. In the mean time all the exiles flocked to the earl of Richmond in Brittany, and ſolicited him to haſten his attempt for an invaſion, in order to prevent Richard's marriage with the princeſs Elizabeth, which would prove fatal to all their hopes. The earl, ſenſible of the urgent neceſſity of this attempt, without delay eſcaped into France, dreading the treachery of Peter Landais, the duke of Brittany's ſecretary, who had entered into a negociation with Richard for betraying him, where Charles VIII. who after the death of his father Lewis had ſucceeded to the throne, afforded him countenance and protection; and being, as uſual, deſirous of raiſing diſturbances in England, ſecretly encouraged the earl in collecting troops for his enterprize againſt that kingdom. The earl of Oxford, who on his being ſuſpected by Richard had been confined, now made his eſcape, and joining Henry, animated him to make the attempt with all poſſible expedition. They alſo informed him, that the character and conduct of Richard had brought upon him a general odium, and that he could not poſſibly land more opportunely, than at a time when the tyrant had made no preparations for oppoſing his deſcent.

Encouraged by this intelligence, Henry haſtened his departure; and embarking with his forces, conſiſting of about ſix thouſand men, at Harfleur, on the laſt day of July, he landed without oppoſition at Milford-Haven, in Wales, on the ſeventh of Auguſt. He had directed his courſe thither, in hopes that the Welch, who conſidered him as their countryman, and had already been prepoſſeſſed by the duke of Buckingham in favour of his cauſe, would join his ſtandard, and enable him to make head againſt the uſurper. From Milford-Haven the earl proceeded to Haverford, where he was received with great demonſtrations of joy, and ſet out for Shrewſbury, intending to paſs the Severn. Stanley, and his brother Sir William, had raiſed a body of five thouſand men, under pretence of ſerving Richard, and they advanced to Litchfield, as if they intended oppoſition to the invader; but Sir William had a private conference with Henry, whom he aſſured of his brother's aſſiſtance, as ſoon as he could act with any proſpect of ſafety to his ſon, whom the tyrant ſtill detained as an hoſtage. Richard, not knowing where his enemy would land, had aſſembled his forces, and fixed his poſt at Nottingham, in the center of the kingdom; and having received advice that the earl intended to march to London, determined to attack him in his rout; and with this view encamped between Leiceſter and Coventry. Having granted commiſſions, empowering perſons in the different counties to oppoſe the enemy, he propoſed, on the firſt alarm, to march to the place expoſed to danger. Sir Walter Herbert, and Sir Rice ap Thomas, were entruſted with this authority in Wales; but the former made a feeble oppoſition to the earl of Richmond, and the latter immediately deſerted to him. Henry, on his advancing, was joined by Sir Gilbert Talbot, with all the vaſſals of the family of Shrewſbury; by Sir Walter Hungerford, and Sir Thomas Bouchier, with their friends; and the perſons of diſtinction who appeared in his camp, afforded him a favourable omen of future ſucceſs. The earl now drew near to Litchfield, from whence the lord Stanley retired at his approach, and took poſt at Atherſtone; and Henry, having preconcerted affairs with the two brothers, proceeded to Leiceſter, where he propoſed to hazard a deciſive engagement; but hearing that Richard had advanced from that town with the ſame deſign, he determined to meet him in the midway.

A. D. 1485.

The two armies came in ſight of each other at Boſworth, on the twenty ſecond of Auguſt. The king's army conſiſted of twelve thouſand men. Henry was at the head of ſix thouſand. The duke of Norfolk commanded the van-guard; Richard took poſt in the center, with his crown on his head, either as a mark of diſtinction, or to remind his troops that he was fighting for a kingdom. The earl of Richmond likewiſe drew up his troops in two lines; the firſt commanded by the earl of Oxford, and the ſecond by himſelf in perſon. Stanley, who had quitted Atherſtone, took up his ſtation in a piece of ground fronting the ſpace between the two armies, with four thouſand men; while his brother, Sir William, with three thouſand, ſtood facing him. Richard had too much ſagacity not to diſcover their intentions by this poſition; but kept the ſecret from his own men, for fear of diſcouraging them: however, he ſent orders to lord Stanley, to join his army immediately; to which he only anſwered, that he would come when it was convenient. This ambiguous reply ſo enraged the king, that he would have ſtruck off the head of Stanley's ſon, had he not been diverted from his purpoſe by his eagerneſs to begin the battle, and the remonſtrances of his generals, who repreſented to him, that ſuch a cruel act could be attended with no advantage, and would certainly provoke the two Stanleys to join the enemy, whoſe intention at preſent might be to remain neuter, at leaſt till they ſhould perceive which ſide was moſt likely to prevail. The two leaders having harangued their troops, the earl of Richmond made a motion to the left, in order to avoid a moraſs that divided the two armies; by which movement he not only ſecured his right flank, but obtained the advantage of having the ſun in his back. The trumpets now ſounded a charge. The battle began with a general diſcharge of arrows, and the royal army advanced to cloſe combat. The lord Stanley perceiving that the duke of Norfolk extended his line in order to ſurround the enemy, did not give him time to execute his deſign, by ſuddenly poſting himſelf on the right of Richmond's line, in order to receive the front of the king's firſt line. This motion cauſing the duke of Norfolk to halt to cloſe his files, which had been too much opened by the extenſion of the lines, occaſioned a few ſolemn pauſes. But ſoon after, both ſides approaching nearer to an equality, the battle continued with equal ardour. Richard, in order to encourage his troops by perſonal valour, galloped to the front of the firſt line: there obſerving his brave competitor, who had quitted his ſtation with the ſame deſign, he couched his lance, and clapping ſpurs to his horſe, fought with great eagerneſs to engage with him, in hopes that either Henry's death or his own, would decide the victory. He killed with his own hands Sir William Brandon, the earl's ſtandard-bearer, and diſmounted Sir John Cheyney. As Richard was thus endeavouring to make an attempt on the life of his rival, Stanley fell upon the flank of Richard's line, driving the right wing back upon the center; while the earl of Northumberland, who commanded a ſeparate body, ſtood wholly inactive. Norfolk, however, charged his numerous aſſailants with more fury than ever, and a dreadful carnage enſued. But the battle was no longer fought upon equal terms; the royal forces were intimidated by the deſertion of Stanley and his brother, while it inſpired Henry's army with unuſual courage. Senſible of his deſperate ſituation, the furious tyrant threw his eyes around the field; and diſcovering his rival at no great diſtance, he ſoon opened himſelf a paſſage to the ſpot, where Henry coolly intrepid, fought in perſon. He called aloud to him to pay the forfeit of his treaſon, and rebellious invaſion of his kingdom. Henry declined not the combat; but the two champions for a crown were hardly engaged, when Sir William Stanley, breaking in with his troops, ſurrounded Richard, who after performing the moſt aſtoniſhing acts of valour, fell, covered with wounds, in the midſt of thoſe he had ſlain. In this battle about four thouſand of the king's army periſhed; among whom were the duke of Norfolk, lord Ferrers of Charltey, Sir Robert Brackenburg, Sir Robert Piercy, and Sir Richard Ratcliff; while the loſs on the ſide of the victors was about one hundred men, of whom Sir William Brandon was the moſt conſiderable. The earl of Northumberland ſurrendered himſelf a priſoner, and obtained a pardon; the earl of Surry was ſent to the Tower, whence he was afterwards releaſed; but Cateſby, the infamous tool of Richard, was beheaded the next day at Leiceſter. After the engagement, Richmond devoutly acknowledged the interpoſing hand of Providence; then repairing to an eminence, he applauded the ſoldiers for their gallant behaviour, and promiſed them ample rewards for their ſervices. Richard's crown being found among the ſpoils of the field, was by lord Stanley placed upon the head of Henry, upon which the whole army ſaluted him as king. The body of the tyrant was found among the dead, beſmeared with blood; and being thrown careleſsly on the back of a horſe, was thus carried to Leiceſter, where, after having been expoſed two days, and treated with great indignity, it was buried in the church of the Grey-Friars, in a private manner; but Henry, in reſpect to his former dignity, ordered a tomb to be placed over his grave.

Thus was England delivered from an ambitious, cruel, unrelenting tyrant, after a reign of two years and two months, who was ſlain in the battle of Boſworth, which was fought the twenty-ſecond of Auguſt. He was the laſt of the Anjouvin race, ſurnamed Plantagenet, who had ſat on the Engliſh throne for the ſpace of three hundred and thirty years; and with his death cloſed the civil wars between the houſes of York and Lancaſter, after raging near thirty years, and in which above one hundred thouſand Engliſhmen had periſhed, with a great number of princes of the two houſes. Some years ago there was an original painting of Richard III. in the royal palace of Kenſington. The fancy at top, in imitation of painting upon glaſs, alludes to a ſtory in this king's reign, of Mr. Collingborn, a gentleman, who was executed for a rhime (ſaid to be wrote by him)

The cat, the rat, and Lovel the dog,
Rule all England under a hog.

This king's device being a white boar, and Henry VII. a dragon: at the bottom is repreſented a dragon overcoming a boar: the dragon was the enſign of Cadwallader, the laſt king of Britain, ſaid to be the anceſtor of Henry VII.

Richard was married to Anne, ſecond daughter of Richard Nevil, the great earl of Warwick; ſhe died, as ſome hiſtorians have ſuppoſed, of poiſon, given her by her huſband. By this lady he had one ſon, whom he created prince of Wales, and who died a little before his mother. He had likewiſe two illegitimate children, John of Glouceſter, and Catherine, married to William, earl of Huntingdon.

Character of Richard III.

His ſtature was of the middle ſize; his aſpect cloudy, ſevere, and forbidding; one of his arms was withered, and one ſhoulder higher than the other; whence he acquired the nick-name of Crook-back Richard. It muſt be owned he had great perſonal courage; an uncommon degree of ſagacity; nor leſs of the moſt daring ambition; and, where his own intereſt was not concerned, he cauſed juſtice to be exactly adminiſtered. Yet, he was much more deformed in the qualities of his mind, than in the members of his body, being deſtitute of every ſocial quality, every generous ſentiment of humanity: no law of nature, no tie of conſanguinity, could reſtrain the violence of his boundleſs ambition, which ſeemed to engroſs his whole ſoul, and to ſtifle every emotion of conſcience. Some modern hiſtorians, from a deſire of appearing ſingular, have laboured to varniſh over the juſt characteriſtical diſplay of this reign. They may talk of his juſtice, piety, moderation, wiſe regulations, and ſalutary laws; but after the moſt candid allowances, conſiſtent with hiſtoric juſtice, which could reaſonably be granted, we leave every impartial reader to judge, whether any one of thoſe principles really influenced one action of his life, or, whether he ever practiſed a good deed, from the only motive intrinſically meritorious, the love of doing good. For the honour of human nature, we do not wiſh Richard to be a monſter; nor, for the honour of impartiality, equally eſteemed, can we proſtitute the pencil of heaven-born truth. Let us ſtrip Richard of the obloquy thrown upon him by the partizans of Henry VII. ſtill it will be too evident from this ſhort hiſtory of his reign, that he was one of the moſt cruel, treacherous, and bloodthirſty tyrants, that ever diſgraced the Engliſh throne.

A. D. 1485. HENRY, having given orders concerning the diſpoſal and march of his army, ſet out for London, which he entered on the twenty-ſeventh of Auguſt, amidſt the joyful acclamations of the people, who conſidered him as the auſpicious victor over a cruel tyrant, whoſe union with the fair Elizabeth would put a final period to all animoſity between the two roſes, which had ſo long manured the kingdom with the blood of its inhabitants. The root of Henry's family was John of Ghent, earl of Lancaſter, fourth ſon to Edward III. That prince was thrice married; firſt, to Blanche of Lancaſter, by whom he had two daughters; Philippa, married to John, king of Portugal; and Elizabeth, eſpouſed to John Holland, duke of Exeter; and a ſon, who afterwards aſcended the throne by the name of Henry IV. and whoſe male deſcendants became extinct in the perſon of Henry VI. ſecondly, to Conſtance, princeſs of Caſtile and Leon, who bore him one daughter, married to the king of Caſtile; and thirdly, to Catherine, widow of Sir Otter Swinford. This lady had for ſome years before her marriage lived with John of Ghent as his miſtreſs, and during that interval bore him four children; John Beaufort, duke of Somerſet; Henry Beaufort, cardinal of Wincheſter; Thomas Beaufort, duke of Exeter; and Joan Beaufort, counteſs of Weſtmoreland. Theſe children were afterward legitimated by the ſame parliament, which excluded them from the throne. John Beaufort left a ſon called by his own name, who enjoyed his title of duke of Somerſet. The latter had only one daughter, named Margaret, who married Edmund Tudor, duke of Richmond, whoſe eldeſt ſon was Henry VII. This prince was the ſole repreſentative of the houſe of Lancaſter; and by his marriage with the princeſs Elizabeth, eldeſt daughter of Edward IV. he united in his poſterity the titles of the two rival families. He had early imbibed an antipathy to the Yorkiſts, which neither experience nor time were ever able to efface; and his jealouſy induced him to commit to the Tower the earl of Warwick, then only ten years of age. When arrived at London, he proceeded directly to St. Paul's, in which church he offered up the ſtandard he had taken, and after divine ſervice, repaired to his lodgings at the biſhop's palace; where, in a few days, he aſſembled a council of all the nobility and gentry then in London, and ſolemnly renewed the oath he had formerly taken, to marry the princeſs Elizabeth. His coronation was now fixed for the thirtieth of October. In the interval, while neceſſary preparations were making, an epidemical diſtemper broke out in London. This dreadful diſeaſe, which ſwept away many thouſands, was, from the ſymptoms attending it, called the Sweating Sickneſs, and is thought to be the firſt time it ever appeared in the world. The patient commonly died, or recovered in twenty-four hours; but after it had for a few weeks exerted its fury, it began to abate, either from the alteration of the air, or from a proper antidote having been diſcovered. The confuſion this malignant fever occaſioned delayed the ceremony; and Henry employed the interval in rewarding the ſervices of his faithful adherents. John de Vere, earl of Oxford, was made conſtable of the Tower; Jaſper, earl of Pembroke, uncle to the king, alſo his tutor and guardian, was created duke of Bedford; the lord Stanley, earl of Derby, and Sir Edward Courtenay, earl of Devonſhire. The alarming diſtemper having entirely ceaſed, the crown was placed on Henry's head by cardinal Bouchier, archbiſhop of Canterbury; and to augment the ſplendor of this ceremony, he inſtituted a body guard, conſiſting of fifty archers, called yeomen, under the command of a captain, to be always in attendance on his perſon. But leſt the people ſhould conſtrue this a mark of jealouſy, which ſeemed to intimate a diffidence of his ſubjects, he declared the inſtitution perpetual.

Eight days after the coronation, the parliament met on the ſeventh of November at Weſtminſter, and the king found no difficulty in obtaining an act of ſettlement agreeable to himſelf. Yet he ſeemed to have entertained ſome doubt, on what claim it was beſt for him to found his pretenſions. In his firſt ſpeech, he mentioned his juſt title by hereditary right; but leſt that ſhould be inſufficient, he added his claim by the judgment of God, who had enabled him to triumph over his enemies; but as this might look like aſſuming a right by conqueſt, he enſured to the people the enjoyment of their former properties and poſſeſſions. The parliament having enacted, "that the inheritance of the crown ſhould reſt, remain, and abide in him, and the heirs of his body," they next reverſed the ſentence of attainder that had been denounced againſt Henry and his adherents, and paſſed the ſame againſt the late king, under the name of Richard, and his principal partizans. Theſe confiſcations produced ſuch large ſums, as to obviate the neceſſity of any application to this parliament for granting a ſubſidy. Henry was not perfectly ſatiſfied with the ſanction of his title by parliament; for in the following year he applied to papal authority for a confirmation of it; and as the the court of Rome readily laid hold of every opportunity of extending its influence, Innocent VIII made no ſcruple of granting a bull, in which all Henry's titles by ſucceſſion, marriage, conqueſt, and the choice of parliament, are enumerated: excommunication was pronounced alſo againſt all who ſhould oppoſe his preſent poſſeſſion, or his heirs in their future ſucceſſion to the crown. Having thus gratified his ambition and avarice, the king publiſhed a free pardon to all thoſe who had taken up arms, on condition of their ſubmitting to his government within a limited time; in conſequence of which great numbers quitted their ſanctuaries, and took the oaths of allegiance. This act of clemency tended greatly to quiet the minds of the people, and to introduce peace and harmony among all ranks and orders of men. On the prorogation of parliament, John Morton and Richard Fox were admitted members of the privy-council; the former of whom ſucceeded cardinal Bouchier in the ſee of Canterbury; the latter was made keeper of the privy ſeal: and theſe prelates, in conjunction with Uſewick, the king's chaplain, maintained a very powerful influence at the helm of ſtate. He likewiſe beſtowed favours and honours on ſome of his particular friends. Edward Stafford, the duke of Buckingham's eldeſt ſon, was reſtored both to the honours of his family, and to his fortune. This proceeded from Henry's gratitude to the memory of Buckingham, who had firſt formed the plan of his advancement, and had made way for that great event by his own ruin. Chandos of Brittany was made earl of Bath; Sir Robert Willoughby, lord Broke; and Sir Giles Daubeny, lord Daubeny.

A. D. 1486. Henry now found it neceſſary to fulfil his promiſe, by marrying the princeſs Elizabeth. His nuptials were celebrated at London with ſuch demonſtration of joy as diſguſted him, who conſidered thoſe expreſſions of popular ſatisfaction as ſo many marks of affection to the houſe of York. The ſuſpicions which aroſe on this occaſion, made him conceive the utmoſt averſion to the queen, and diſturbed his tranquillity during his whole reign. His conſort, though virtuous, amiable, and perfectly obſequious, was conſtantly treated by him with the utmoſt coldneſs, and ſeldom met with a proper turn of tenderneſs, or even of complaiſance; the malignant ideas of faction, in his ſullen mind, prevailing over every ſentiment of conjugal affection. Indeed, he always diſcovered a ſupercilious diſpoſition towards the friends of the houſe of York, many of whom felt the dire effects of his invincible antipathy. After the ceremony of his nuptials, the king made a progreſs into the northern counties, where Richard had many firm adherents, in order to remove their prejudices by his preſence and converſation. He paſſed his Eaſter at Lincoln; and during his reſidence in that place, information was ſent him, that viſcount Lovel, with Sir Humphry Stafford, and his brother Thomas, had privately left their ſanctuary at Colcheſter; but regardleſs of this intelligence, he proceeded to York, at which place he was informed, that the Staffords were approaching to inveſt the city of Worceſter, and that Lovel, at the head of three or four thouſand men, was advancing to ſurprize him in York. This information alarmed, but did not intimidate Henry, who having iſſued orders for levying troops in the county of York, ſuch was the ſucceſs of his officers, that in a ſhort time they raiſed a body of three thouſand men, the command of whom was conferred on the duke of Bedford. This nobleman was expreſsly commanded, not to approach too near the enemy; but to try every lenient method, in order to diſperſe them; particularly, to publiſh a pardon in the king's name, to all who ſhould lay down their arms and ſubmit. This expedient ſucceeded to Henry's wiſh, having had a greater effect on the commander, than on his followers; for Lovel, through fear of being deſerted by his troops, retired alone into Lancaſhire, where he lay ſome time concealed; and then croſſing the ſea, repaired to the court of the ducheſs of Burgundy. The two Staffords, when informed of this miſcarriage, raiſed the ſiege of Worceſter, and took ſanctuary in the church of Colnham; but it appearing that the privileges of that place did not extend to treaſonable offences, they were taken thence by force. Humphry was ſoon after executed at Tyburn, but the younger brother obtained a pardon, in conſideration of his youth, and his plea of having been miſled by his brother. The ſuppreſſion of this rebellion was followed by the birth of a prince, who was named Arthur, in memory of the renowned Britiſh hero, from whom the king affected to derive his origin. The nation cheriſhed ſome hopes, that this event would kindle the king's lukewarm affections into a glow of conjugal love; but when they perceived he was inflexibly obdurate; that he delayed the coronation of his queen; diſcovered an inveterate hatred on all occaſions to the houſe of York; and that his temper was moroſe and reſerved, they began to conceive an averſion to him. His enemies now took occaſion to inſinuate that they had made a bad exchange; they even hinted the king's intention of murdering the earl of Warwick, ſon to the duke of Clarence, whom he had committed to the Tower; and a report was propagated among the people, that Edward, duke of York, youngeſt ſon to Edward IV. had eluded his uncle's cruelty, by making his eſcape from the Tower. The univerſal joy expreſſed by the people at this report, induced Richard Simon, a prieſt of Oxford, to diſturb Henry's government, by raiſing a pretender to his crown; for which purpoſe he made choice of a pupil of his, one Lambert Simnel, the illegitimate ſon of a mechanic, a youth endowed with extraordinary abilities and perſonal accompliſhments. The ſeditious prieſt had firſt inſtructed his pupil to perſonate the duke of York; but another report prevailing about that time, that the earl of Warwick had found means to eſcape from the Tower, and obſerving that this report was alſo attended with equal ſatisfaction, he changed his plan, and made Simnel perſonate that unfortunate prince. Though nature had formed him for the part he was to act, yet he was thought to be better informed of ſuch circumſtances as related to the royal family, and particularly of the earl of Warwick's adventures, than he could have learned from Simon; whence it was conjectured, that the plan of this conſpiracy was laid by perſons of a higher rank, and that he had received proper inſtructions from the partizans of the houſe of York. It was even ſuſpected, that the queen dowager, diſcontented with the king, and offended at the ſtate of abſolute inſignificance to which he was reduced, favoured this ridiculous enterprize. Henry himſelf ſeems to have been of this opinion; for he ſoon after cauſed the queen dowager to be cloſely confined in the monaſtery of Bermondſey, and ſeized all her lands and revenues; nor did ſhe ever regain her liberty, but ended her life in poverty, ſolitude, and confinement. When Simon thought his pupil perfect in the part he was to act, he ſent him to Ireland, where the deception was not ſo likely to be diſcovered, and where the houſe of York had a number of friends among the people, Clarence having been their governor. Simnel on his arrival in Ireland, addreſſed himſelf to the earl of Kildare. That credulous nobleman received him as a true Plantagenet. The populace followed his example. Simnel was received with acclamations of joy, and crowned in Dublin, with a diadem taken from a ſtatue of the virgin, under the title of Edward VI. In order to ſtifle this revolt in its infancy, Henry ordered Warwick to be taken from the Tower, and led in proceſſion through the principal ſtreets of London. This expedient had its proper effect in England; but in Ireland it was thought a ſtate trick, and the king was reproached with having exhibited a counterfeit Warwick.

In the mean time John, earl of Lincoln, ſon of John de la Pole, openly eſpouſed Simnel's cauſe. This nobleman, who poſſeſſed capacity and courage, whom his uncle Richard had declared preſumptive heir to the crown, openly eſpouſed his cauſe, and embarked for Flanders, in order to concert with his aunt Margaret, ducheſs dowager of Burgundy, proper meaſures to enſure the ſucceſs of this enterprize. That princeſs by her virtuous conduct had acquired great authority among the Flemings, and lived with much dignity upon the ample dowry ſhe inherited from her late huſband, Charles the bold. Incenſed at Henry's behaviour to her niece, and the inveteracy he had diſcovered to the partizans of the houſe of York, ſhe readily engaged in the ſcheme of ſupporting Simnel, and after conſulting with Lincoln and Lovel, hired a body of two thouſand German veterans, commanded by Martin Schwart, and ſent them to join Simnel in Ireland.

A. D. 1487. Elated with this unexpected reinforcement, the Iriſh determined to fix the ſeat of war in England, where they flattered themſelves with being joined by all who favoured the houſe of York. Henry, informed of their intentions, was employed in making preparations, to defend his throne againſt the impending ſtorm; and having levied troops in different parts of the kingdom, he put them under the command of the duke of Bedford, and the earl of Oxford. The marquis of Dorſet he confined in the Tower, from a ſuſpicion that he would reſent the injuries ſuffered by the queen dowager, his mother, and to pleaſe the people, by an appearance of devotion, he made a pilgrimage to the ſhrine of our lady Walſingham, who was famous for working miracles. The inſurgents now landed near Foudrey, in Lancaſhire, directing their march towards York; but finding themſelves diſappointed in the hopes they had formed, of being joined by multitudes of the Engliſh, it was determined to give Henry battle the firſt opportunity. With this view, the earl of Lincoln marched towards Newark, and encamped with his army, which conſiſted of only eight thouſand men, on a riſing ground, at Stoke, a village near Newark. In the mean time Henry with twelve thouſand men had reached Nottingham, with the reſolution of engaging the rebels without delay. Shrewſbury ſuſpecting Lincoln's deſign upon Newark, poſted himſelf between the enemy and that town. The next day, being the ſixth of June, Henry drew up his army in order of battle, upon the plain, which being very narrow, he could not extend his front, and was therefore obliged to form his troops into three lines. The inſurgents marched down in good order, and attacked the royaliſts with great intrepidity, hoping that ſhould they be able to break the king's firſt line, it would fall back on the other two, whereby his whole army would be thrown into confuſion. The battle was begun with great fury, and maintained for three hours with equal valour on both ſides. The Iriſh deſtitute of defenſive armour, were terribly galled by the arrows of their aſſailants; but the Engliſh troops under the earl of Lincoln, and the Germans under Schwart, made ſo noble a reſiſtance, that the greater part of Henry's vanguard was cut to pieces. In this deſperate conteſt, Martin Schwart was ſlain. The earls of Lincoln and Kildare met with the ſame fate; but at length, after a bloody conflict, their army was entirely routed, with the loſs of four thouſand men, who fell in the field of battle. Simnel, and his tutor Simon, were taken priſoners; the latter being a prieſt was committed to cloſe confinement, and never heard of after; but the former, as too contemptible to excite any apprehenſions of danger in Henry, was made a ſcullion in his kitchen, from whence he was afterwards promoted to the place of falconer. The lord Lovel was no more heard of; but Sir Thomas Broughton eſcaped to his own eſtate, where he lived and died in obſcurity. Henry, immediately after the battle, marched to Lincoln, and from thence to York, puniſhing in his progreſs with rigour all thoſe who had encouraged the rebels. To obviate any popular complaints that might ariſe from this ſevere treatment, the king reſolved to gratify his people in a matter which for ſome time they had paſſionately deſired. Though near two years had elapſed ſince the queen's marriage, ſhe had not yet been crowned. Henry now cauſed the ceremony of her coronation to be performed on the twenty-fifth of November, with the uſual formalities; and upon this occaſion, reſtored to liberty the marquis of Dorſet, who had been able to clear himſelf of all ſuſpicions entertained againſt him.

A. D. 1488. All domeſtic diſturbances having at this period ceaſed, Henry turned his thoughts to the affairs of Europe; which renders it neceſſary to explain the ſtate of the neighbouring kingdoms, in order to give a juſt idea of his tranſactions with his foreign neighbours. The throne of Scotland was at this time filled by James III. who had a narrow genius, with little induſtry: and though it was neceſſary for him to commit the reins of government to his miniſters, he was never able in the choice of them to pleaſe either himſelf or his people. Henry knowing if he attempted to conquer that kingdom, he ſhould never be able to retain the Scots in obedience without a regular military force, which was then unknown in England, choſe rather to renew a treaty with Scotland, and to this end ſent an embaſſy to James. But as the Scots never deſired a durable peace, they would only agree to a ſeven years truce, which was concluded. Spain was now become formidable by the union of Caſtile and Arragon, in the perſons of Ferdinand and Iſabella. They had undertaken the conqueſt of Grenada from the Moors, and nearly brought it to a concluſion; and the king being no longer awed by domeſtic enemies, began to enter into all the tranſactions of Europe, and to be diſtinguiſhed in every war and negotiation. France had greatly increaſed in power and extent, having united to the crown Normandy, Dauphiny, Champaigne, Anjou, Burgundy, Provence and Guienne. The nobles of Brittany had revolted againſt their late duke, Francis II. on account of his being governed by a favourite of very mean extraction, who oppreſſed the people; and the king of France conſidered this rebellion as a favourable incident for annexing that duchy to his crown, eſpecially as he was invited by the ſtates, to aſſiſt them againſt the inrrigues of the duke of Orleans; who being diſguſted with the lady of Beaujeu, ſiſter of Charles VIII. had retired into Brittany, and greatly inflamed the diſcontented nobility. Charles therefore ſent an army into that duchy, under pretence of delivering the nobles from oppreſſion, but in reality to reduce that province. It was the intereſt of Charles to perſuade the king of England, that no hoſtile deſigns were entertained againſt Brittany, and ambaſſadors were ſent to England for that purpoſe; yet the Engliſh monarch clearly penetrated into the views of France; but either thinking that the attempt would prove abortive, or unwilling to incur the expences of a foreign war, he contented himſelf with obſerving a neutrality. The French met with very little oppoſition in their progreſs, and the nobles began to be alarmed for their ſafety. They were now convinced, that inſtead of aſſiſting them againſt the ambitious deſigns of the duke of Orleans, the very power they had called in for the preſervation of their liberty, was labouring to render them ſlaves. They therefore retired from the French forces, collected an army of ſixty thouſand men, and obliged the French to raiſe the ſiege of Nantz. Fluſhed with this ſucceſs, they raſhly engaged the French army at St. Aubin, and were totally defeated. The duke of Orleans himſelf fell into the hands of the victors, and the whole force of Brittany was diſſipated. Soon after this misfortune, Francis paid the debt of nature, and his death expoſed his dominions to a total revolution. The duke left an only daughter to ſucceed him; and it ſeemed evident the marriage of that princeſs would decide the fate of Brittany. But ſhe was in no condition to oppoſe the arms of France: for notwithſtanding the duke of Orleans was now a priſoner, and conſequently the pretence for invading Brittany no longer exiſted, the invaders continued their operations with the ſame avidity. Henry now thought proper to act as auxiliary to the princeſs Anne; but ſent over only ſix thouſand men; a force incapable of effecting any thing deciſive againſt the numerous armies of France. They acted entirely upon the defenſive; and inſtead of relieving, plunged the duchy into ſtill greater diſtreſs.

A. D. 1490. Yet that diſtreſs was not productive of unanimity among the Britons. The object of diſſention was the marriage of their ducheſs. At laſt the party of Maximilian prevailed; and the marriage of the ducheſs with that prince was celebrated by proxy, and Anne immediately aſſumed the title of queen of the Romans. But Maximilian was in no condition to give aſſiſtance to his diſtreſſed conſort; he was deſtitute both of troops and money, and embarraſſed by continual revolts of the Flemings. The court of France began now to perceive their error. It was found that it would be very difficult, perhaps impoſſible, to reduce the duchy of Brittany by arms, and that negotiation only could annex it firmly to the French crown. Charles, the young king of France, had formerly been affianced to the daughter of Maximilian; and that princeſs, though too young to conſummate her marriage, had been ſent to the court of France to be educated, and now actually bore the title of queen. But notwithſtanding theſe engagements, it was perceived that it would be more advantageous for Charles to marry the ducheſs of Brittany, by which that rich province would be for ever annexed to the crown of France. The whole art of perſuaſion was therefore employed by the court of France, to convince the Britons, that they could never enjoy a happy tranquillity, but by being united to the French monarchy. The Britons were influenced by their ſuggeſtions; but the young ducheſs herſelf had imbibed the ſtrongeſt prejudices againſt Charles, whom ſhe conſidered as the author of all the misfortunes of her family; yet notwithſtanding her repugnance, ſhe conſented to ſacrifice both her engagements and prejudices, to the intereſt of the people; and her marriage was celebrated at Langey in Touraine.

A. D. 1491.

The princeſs was then conducted to St. Dennis, where ſhe was crowned, and thence made a public entry into Paris. The daughter of Maximilian was ſent back to her father and the duchy of Brittany annexed to the crown of France; an acquiſition of the utmoſt importance to that kingdom. Maximilian tranſported with rage, threatened the moſt dreadful vengeance againſt Charles. Henry had alſo reaſon to reproach himſelf for his inaction: he ought to have ſupported the Britons with a force proportional to the importance of the union of Brittany with France. His chagrin ſtimulated him the more to revenge, as he piqued himſelf upon the depth of his policy. A war with France was always flattering and agreeable to the Engliſh, and Henry immediately ſummoned a parliament to obtain ſupplies. In this ſpeech, which he pronounced himſelf, after mentioning the affairs of Brittany, he told them, that Charles, elated with his ſucceſs, had even ſhewn a contempt of England, and refuſed to pay the tribute which Lewis XI. had ſtipulated to Edward IV. That ſo warlike a nation as the Engliſh ought to reſent this indignity: that for his part he was reſolved to lay claim to the crown of France itſelf; and by force of arms, to maintain ſo juſt a title, tranſmitted to him by his anceſtors: that Creſſy, Poictiers, and Agincourt, were ſufficient to ſhew their ſuperiority over the enemy, and that he did not deſpair of adding new names to the glorious catalogue: that a king of France had been priſoner in London, and a king of England crowned at Paris: events that ſhould animate them to emulate the glory of their forefathers: that the domeſtic diſſentions of this kingdom had been the ſole cauſe of its loſing foreign dominions, and its preſent internal union would be the effectual means of recovering them: that if they had ſuch honours, and ſuch an acquiſition in view, brave men ought not to repine at advancing a little treaſure; and he hoped, by an invaſion of ſo opulent a kingdom, to increaſe rather than diminiſh the wealth of the nation. Theſe were oſtentatious boaſtings; but people of penetration, from Henry's known perſonal character, and the ſtate of political affairs, concluded that he did not intend to carry on the war with vigour. France was not in the ſame ſituation, as when former kings of England made ſucceſsful inroads into that country. The great fiefs were united to the crown; the nation had many able captains and veteran ſoldiers, and ſeemed rather in a condition to threaten her neighbours, than to afford them hopes of acquiring any conſiderable advantages againſt them. Maximilian wanted the revenue and military power neceſſary to ſupport his pompous title; and Ferdinand, while he made a ſhew of war, was actually negotiating for peace. England herſelf was not free from domeſtic diſcontents; and in Scotland James III. Henry's friend and ally, having been murdered by his rebellious ſubjects, was ſucceeded by James IV. who was devoted to the intereſt of France. But the Engliſh parliament, inſtead of being influenced by theſe conſiderations, were inflamed with a deſire of conqueſt, and of enriching themſelves with ſpoils: they therefore granted the king two fifteenths; and the better to enable the nobility to attend him in this expedition, paſſed an act, by which they were empowered to ſell their eſtates, without paying any fines for alienation.

A. D. 1492. The love of military glory having now animated the Engliſh, they prepared with the greateſt alacrity to follow their prince; and many of the nobility ſold their eſtates, that they might appear in the field with the greater ſplendor, or borrowed large ſums, that they might head their followers in a manner becoming their rank. Having obtained ſupplies, and levied an army conſiſting of twenty-five thouſand foot, and ſixteen thouſand horſe, Henry embarked, and landed at Calais on the ſixth of October. The lateneſs of the ſeaſon being conſidered as an indication, that this campaign would ſoon be terminated, the king obſerved, "It is of little conſequence at what ſeaſon the invaſion is begun, as one ſummer will not be ſufficient for the reduction of France;" and yet perhaps, at that very time, he had begun a negotiation for peace: for before the expiration of the year a peace was concluded; by the articles of which it was agreed, that the king of France ſhould diſcharge the debt contracted by his queen for the defence of Brittany, which was ſet down at ſeven hundred and forty thouſand crowns; and ſhould alſo pay the arrears of the penſion granted to Edward IV. by an annual tribute of twenty-five thouſand crowns, to Henry and his heirs. Thus lord Bacon obſerves, peace and war equally contributed to fill the coffers of Henry; the former giving him the money of his people, and the latter that of his enemies. The above-mentioned treaty excited much clamour among Henry's ſubjects, who loudly complained, that he had fleeced his people for the maintenance of the war, which he had undertaken merely to enrich himſelf. This year the queen was delivered of a ſecond ſon, called Henry, who ſucceeded to the crown of England.

A. D. 1493. A new pretender was raiſed up on the continent by the ducheſs of Burgundy, more dangerous than Simnel, whom ſhe reported to be her nephew, Richard Plantagenet, duke of York, ſecond ſon to Edward IV. ſuppoſed to have eſcaped from the Tower, after the death of his elder brother. This impoſtor was a youth of engaging addreſs, and is ſaid to have been the ſon of one Warbeck a Jew, of Tournay, who had been converted to Chriſtianity, and whoſe buſineſs having called him to London in the reign of Edward IV. his wife was there delivered of a ſon. He was called Perkin, or Peter; and Edward, who was ſuſpected of having criminal converſation with Warbeck's wife, was his godfather. The comelineſs of his mien, and the verſatility of his genius, rendered him extremely well adapted to the part he was to act. After having reſided ſome years in England, he was conveyed to Flanders, where he frequented the company of the Engliſh to retain his native tongue; and, as he grew up, exhibited ſuch mental and perſonal accompliſhments, as attracted the notice of the ducheſs of Burgundy, who reſolved to impoſe him on the Engliſh as a better claimant to the crown than Henry. With this view ſhe gave him private inſtructions, till he was perfectly acquainted with the character he was to aſſume. He was fully tutored in the particulars relative to the duke of York, whom he was to perſonate, together with the moſt minute tranſactions of Edward's court, which a child of eleven years old might be ſuppoſed to underſtand, and remember. He likewiſe received a circumſtantial detail of all the occurrences during his ſuppoſed reſidence in the ſanctuary, the manner of his brother's death, and his own eſcape. When he was perfectly verſed in theſe preparatory lectures, the ducheſs reſolved he ſhould avow his right to the crown of England; but in the mean time, to diſguiſe her deſign, ſhe ſent him to Portugal with lady Brompton, where he continued until Henry declared war againſt France; then ſhe directed him to embark for Ireland, and make his appearance in that country, which was firmly attached to the houſe of York. Purſuant to her inſtructions, he landed at Cork, and perſonated Richard Plantagenet, ſecond ſon to Edward IV. Being immediately joined by a ſtrong party, he wrote to the earls of Deſmond and Kildare, exhorting them to vindicate his claim, and ſtrengthen his intereſt by the addition of their vaſſals and dependents. Chares VIII. imagined that this pretender might be of advantage to him during his war with Henry, and Perkin was accordingly invited to the court of France. He was honourably received at Paris, acknowledged agreeable to his pretenſions, and accommodated ſuitable to the dignity of the character he ſuſtained, till the concluſion of the late peace, when Henry, without effect applied to Charles for the ſurrender of this impoſtor. The French king, though he refuſed to violate the laws of hoſpitality, promiſed he ſhould have no ſuccours and diſmiſſed him from his court.

Thus deprived of all hopes from that quarter, he retired to Flanders, and artfully addreſſed himſelf as a ſtranger to the ducheſs dowager. Margaret affected to doubt of the reality of his claim, and examined him in public touching that point, when he replied ſo pertinently, and deported himſelf with ſuch dignity, that ſhe and all the audience ſeemed convinced of his veracity. The ducheſs upon this acknowledged his relationſhip, diſtinguiſhed him by the title of the white roſe of England, appointed him a guard de corps, and ſhewed him every mark of honour due to the heir of a crowned head. When theſe tranſactions were divulged in England, the people ſeemed diſpoſed to favour the plot, partly through averſion to the king; and from an aſſurance, that this pretender was identically what he aſſumed. Sir William Stanley, chamberlain of the houſhold, the lord Fitzwalter, Sir Simon Montford, with ſome others, entered into a confederacy, to promote the claim of this youth, and ſent over emiſſaries to learn the particulars of the tranſactions at the Burgundian court. They had ſeveral interviews with the ducheſs and Perkin; after which they wrote to their employers, aſſuring them of their full conviction of the veracity of his aſſertions. Henry ſaw his danger, and that the utmoſt prudence was neceſſary to divert the force of the impending ſtorm. Could the king have aſcertained the death of the real duke of York, the conſpiracy muſt have fallen immediately to the ground; but of the five perſons who had been employed in the baſe aſſaſſination, two only remained alive; ſo that their teſtimony, though they agreed in the ſame ſtory, was not thought ſufficient to put the fact beyond all doubt and controverſy. However, he found a clue, by means of his ſpies, which guided him through the labyrinth of this myſtery. He diſcovered the pedigree and adventures of Perkin, and traced the whole conſpiracy from its firſt formation. The ſtory was immediately publiſhed for the ſatisfaction of the nation. He even gained over Clifford, one of the chief perſons in the court of the pretended prince to diſcover the ſecrets of his party. Henry had no ſooner procured neceſſary intelligence, together with the names of the principal conſpirators in England, than they were arreſted, John Ratcliffe, lord Fitzwalter, Sir Simon Montford, Sir Thomas Thwaites, William Daubeny, Robert Ratcliffe, Thomas Creſſenor, and Thomas Aſhwood, whom he cauſed to be apprehended at the ſame time, were convicted of holding treaſonable correſpondence with Perkin, and condemned to ſuffer death as traitors. The lord Fitzwalter was conveyed to Calais, where he might have obtained his pardon, had not his impatience of confinement prompted him to attempt his eſcape; and, on diſcovery, he ſuffered the rigour of the law, but the reſt obtained a free pardon.

A. D. 1494. Having thus ſuppreſſed the conſpiracy in England, Henry turned his attention to the concerns of Ireland, where he was informed, the pretender had many powerful friends. He appointed his ſecond ſon, Henry, an infant of two years of age, viceroy of that kingdom, and Sir Edward Poynings, his deputy, with a very extenſive power over the civil, as well as military adminiſtration.

At his arrival in Ireland, he made diligent enquiry about thoſe whoſe loyalty was in the leaſt ſuſpected, and in a particular manner attacked the earls of Deſmond and Kildare, who had carried on an epiſtolary correſpondence with the pretender. The firſt ſtood on the defenſive, and eluded the power of the deputy, but the latter was ſent priſoner to England, whence he was ſoon diſmiſſed to his own country, with marks of eſteem. Henry wiſely preferring at ſuch a time, acts of clemency and indulgence, to thoſe of rigour and ſeverity. He then ſent a meſſenger to Ireland, with a formal amneſty in ſavour of the earl of Deſmond, and all the rebels in that kingdom; hoping by that means to quench the embers of rebellion, in a country, where the houſe of York had ſo many zealous adherents. During his reſidence in Ireland, he convened a parliament, which is famous on record for the acts it paſſed in favour of England. But the prevalence of Henry's darling paſſion, ſubdued that honour, which his clemency had acquired; though he poſſeſſed more perſonal property than any prince that had ever ſat on the throne of England, his redundance ſerved but to ſtimulate his covetous deſires. To gratify his inordinate avarice, he had recourſe to the penal laws. The firſt perſon of eminence who was aggrieved in this manner, was Sir William Capel, alderman of London, who was condemned in the ſum of two thouſand ſeven hundred pounds, ſixteen hundred of which he paid by way of compoſition; but his moſt flagrant act of extortion and ingratitude, was his proſecution of the lord chamberlain Stanley, to whom he in a great meaſure owed his crown and dignity. Sir Robert Clifford, who was juſt arrived in England, repaired privately to Henry in the Tower, where he ſtill kept his court. Being ſummoned to appear before the council, he fell at the king's feet, and after imploring and receiving full aſſurance of pardon, declared, that Sir William Stanley was one of the confederates in the cauſe of the pretender. The king affected aſtoniſhment at this declaration, charging the informer to be very cautious of his allegations on pain of death, if the object of his charge ſhould be found innocent. Clifford perſiſted, and the chamberlain was put under an arreſt; and on examination owned to the charge, though it amounted to no more than a declaration, that he would never bear arms againſt Perkin, were he certain that he was the ſon of Edward IV. from this frank confeſſion, we may conjecture, that he confided in the ſervices he had done the king, and the influence of his brother, the earl of Derby, who had married Henry's mother. But his wealth proved his deſtruction, and all the favour he could obtain, was the reſpite of a few days, that he might prepare himſelf for death, which he did not ſuffer till the beginning of the following year, when he was ſucceeded in his office by lord Daubeny, a nobleman of great abilities. The king found in Stanley's caſtle of Holt, forty thouſand marks in money and plate, beſides jewels, furniture, cattle and effects to an immenſe value, and an eſtate of three thouſand pounds a year. Theſe inſtances of avarice and ingratitude incurred the general deteſtation of the people, who vented their ſpleen in ſevere libels and ſatires againſt the judges, the council, and the king himſelf; who was ſo incenſed, that he ordered five obſcure perſons, detected in diſperſing the papers, to be executed for treaſon.

A. D. 1495. By this conduct of Henry, the ſpirit of rebellion was rouſed, and the pretender's party began to put themſelves in motion. Theſe alarms determined Henry to make a progreſs into Lancaſhire, under pretence of paying a viſit to his mother, and his father-in-law, the earl of Derby, to ſatisfy them concerning the equity of the ſentence, paſſed upon their brother, Sir William Stanley. During Henry's reſidence in the north, Perkin determined to try his fortune in England. Accordingly, having been ſupplied with ſome troops and veſſels by the ducheſs of Burgundy, he embarked in July, and arrived on the coaſt of Kent. landed ſome of his people, to ſound the inclinations of the inhabitants. Theſe endeavoured to inveigle the Kentiſh men, by aſſuring them there was a ſtrong armament fitted out in Flanders, for ſupporting the claim of the duke of York; but the Engliſh, inſtead of acquieſcing with their deſire, conſulted the gentlemen of the country, who adviſed them to allure the pretender on ſhore, by pompous aſſurances, and then ſecure his perſon; but he was diſſuaded by his ſecretary from venturing his perſon on ſhore, and the Engliſh, finding that he ſuſpected their deſign, put to the ſword all that he had ſent on ſhore, except an hundred and fifty, who were carried priſoners to London, and afterwards executed on gibbets along the coaſt, by the king's orders; and Perkin, ſeeing the fate of his people retired to Flanders.

Henry ſoon after received advice, that the pretender had landed in Ireland, where he had large expectations from the friends of the houſe of York, by whom he had heretofore been greatly careſſed. But by this time the king had taken every meaſure, preventive of commotions in that kingdom; ſo that his deſigns were entirely fruſtrated. Being deprived therefore of all hopes of ſucceſs in Ireland, he repaired to Edinburgh, and demanded audience of James, in quality of duke of York. He was accordingly admitted, and by his ſkill and addreſs, wrought on that weak prince, that he not only received him with great hoſpitality, but gave him in marriage, his own kinſwoman Catherine Gordon, a lady eminent for her accompliſhments, both mental and perſonal.

A. D. 1496. James now undertook to eſpouſe the claim of Perkin to the Engliſh crown, and accordingly aſſembled a numerous army, which he led in perſon to Northumberland, accompanied by the pretender. There a manifeſto was publiſhed, inveighing againſt Henry as an uſurper, tyrant, and murderer, and promiſing honour and profits, to thoſe who ſhould join their lawful prince, and aſſiſt him in the depoſition of a robber, who had deprived him of his crown. This manifeſto had very little effect on the Engliſh, who were ſo intimidated by the ſucceſs and rigour of the reigning king, that they refuſed to hazard their lives and fortunes in behalf of a ſtranger, though they believed him to be the ſon of Edward. James deſpairing of aſſiſtance from the Engliſh, and willing to indemnify himſelf for the expences of the expedition, ravaged the country with fire and ſword.

A. D. 1497. Henry ſummoned a parliament to meet in January, from whom he demanded a ſubſidy for the maintenance of the Scottiſh war, though he knew a peace might be eaſily effected. As he was aſſured of the ſucceſs of his negotiation with Scotland, he determined to levy the ſubſidy granted with the utmoſt expedition, that he might amaſs the money before the concluſion of the peace. His collectors however met with a conſiderable oppoſition in the county of Cornwall, where the inhabitants loudly complained of their ſubjection to ſo grievous an impoſition. This diſcontent was increaſed by the inſinuations of one Michael Joſeph, a factious blackſmith at Bodmin, and Thomas Flammock, a turbulent lawyer, who aſſured the people, that the fiefs depending on the crown, were the funds aſſigned for the maintenance of ſuch wars; and that the king ought to apply them in caſe of an invaſion from Scotland, and not pillage his ſubjects under the ſanction of parliament. The populace being inflamed by this declaration, the lawyer and blackſmith offered to conduct them, till they ſhould be headed by ſome perſon of quality; and they immediately armed themſelves with ſuch weapons as they could procure. Under the lead of theſe two incendiaries, they marched through the counties of Devon and Somerſet, their numbers continually increaſing in their rout. At Taunton they murdered a collector, who had been very rigorous in the execution of his office; at Wells they were joined by the lord Audley, an ambitious nobleman, who being choſen their leader, conducted them through Saliſbury and Wincheſter, without ſuffering them to do the leaſt injury to the inhabitants. But inſtead of proceeding directly to London, according to their original deſign, they turned off towards Kent, hoping to be joined by a conſiderable party in that country, the inhabitants of which had been eminent for their zeal and for the liberty of the ſubject. But the noblemen and freeholders had taken ſuch wiſe precautions, that they could not obtain the addition of a ſingle man; which circumſtance diſcouraged a great number of the inſurgents, who returned to their own habitations. Thoſe who continued their march, boaſted, that they would either give the king battle, or make themſelves maſters of the metropolis, and accordingly proceeded to Blackheath, where they encamped between Eltham and Greenwich. Henry, who had already equipped an armament for the expulſion of any Scottiſh invaders, determined, on advice of this inſurrection, to keep the greater part of the troops in the ſouthern parts of the kingdom, ſending the earl of Surry with a detachment to guard the northern frontiers. As the rebels committed no outrages in their rout, he remained inactive, in order to ſound the principles of thoſe counties through which they paſſed, by the numbers which ſhould join them, hoping at the ſame time, that fatigued with the length of their march they would diſperſe. The citizens of London were terrified at their approach, till they beheld the king vigorouſly exerting himſelf in their defence, and even placing himſelf between them and the rebels; for he no ſooner received advice of their encampment on Blackheath, than he divided his army into three bodies; one of which, commanded by the earl of Oxford, marched round the hill, in order to cut off their retreat, and, if neceſſary, attack them in the rear. The ſecond, under the command of lord Daubeny, was deſigned to charge them in the front; and Henry himſelf, with the third diviſion, encamped in St. George's Fields, that he might be at hand to reinforce the others occaſionally, or in caſe of misfortune throw himſelf into London. Theſe precautions being taken, he declared his intention of engaging the rebels on Monday, though his real deſign was to give them battle on Saturday. This feint obtained the deſired ſucceſs. In the evening of the twenty-ſecond of June, the lord Daubeny marched towards them in order of battle. Having repulſed an advanced guard on Deptford-bridge, he aſcended the hill, and found them on the heath drawing up their forces; but in apparent diſorder, not thinking of coming to action before Monday. Yet, notwithſtanding theſe diſadvantageous circumſtances, they fought with great intrepidity, and killed above three hundred of the royaliſts with their arrows. The lord Daubeny advanced to the charge with ſuch ardour of precipitation, that he was taken priſoner in the beginning of the action, but immediately reſcued by the valour of his men, who bore down on the rebels with ſuch impetuoſity that they were routed with great ſlaughter; and on their attempt of flight, found themſelves intercepted by Oxford's diviſion. The lord Audley, Flammock, and the blackſmith were taken, two thouſand were ſlain in the field, and the remainder, amounting to about fourteen thouſand, ſubmitted to the king's mercy. Audley was beheaded on Tower hill; Flammock and the blackſmith executed at Tyburn, and the reſt obtained his majeſty's pardon. James of Scotland availing himſelf of this inſurrection, aſſembled his army and inveſted the caſtle of Norham; but the earl of Surry marching to its relief, he retreated, and was purſued to his own country by the earl, who reduced the caſtle of Ayton, ſituated between Berwick and Edinburgh. But at the deſire of both ſovereigns conferences were ſoon after opened at Ayton, under the mediation of Don Pedro d'Ayala, the Spaniſh ambaſſador. The principal obſtacle to a treaty, was the objection of James to Henry's demand of delivering up Perkin; but it was, however, at length agreed, that James ſhould honourably diſmiſs the pretended duke of York, and afterwards proceed with the negotiations as if he had never been in Scotland. In conſequence of this agreement, James told Warbeck, that he had ſupported his claim to the utmoſt of his power; that he had twice entered England at the head of an army; but as the Engliſh had refuſed to eſpouſe his cauſe, he could not imagine the Scots would, without their concurrence, be able to eſtabliſh him on the throne of that kingdom. He therefore exhorted him to concert ſome more probable plan, and chuſe ſome other country for his reſidence; at the ſame time aſſuring him, that he ſhould be honourably accommodated with ſhips and money, on his departure for another place. Perkin bore his misfortunes with magnanimity, gratefully acknowledged the favour and protection of James, and ſolicited conveyance for himſelf and his wife into Ireland. His requeſt was readily granted, and he arrived at Cork, where he ſtill found friends and adherents. On his departure from Scotland, the ambaſſadors at Ayton ſigned a truce for ſeven years; importing, that the two kings ſhould not make war on each other, by themſelves, their ſubjects, or any other perſon whatever; that certain points, as yet undecided, ſhould be referred to the arbitration of Ferdinand and Iſabella of Spain; and that the truce ſhould be prolonged till one year after the demiſe of that party who ſhould die firſt. Though the marriage between James and the king's daughter was omitted in the treaty, it afterwards took place, and produced an union between the two crowns.

A. D. 1498.

The Corniſh rebels, after their repulſe and return to their own country, proclaimed that the king's clemency was not the effect of principle, but apprehenſion of his own ſubjects, the greater part of whom entertained the ſame ſentiments with themſelves. This declaration prevailed on their friends and neighbours to join them in making another attempt againſt the government. Some of the moſt zealous amongſt them underſtanding that Perkin was in Ireland, propoſed that he ſhould be invited over, and appointed general of the expedition. A deputation was accordingly ſent to inform him, that if he would repair to Cornwall, he would find many attached firmly to his intereſt; who, with the aſſiſtance of his friends in other parts, might be able to place him on the throne of his anceſtors. Perkin accepted the invitation: and immediately embarking with about ſeventy men in four ſmall veſſels, landed at Whitſand-bay in the month of September. He was joined at Bodmin by a body of about three thouſand men, and iſſued a proclamation, in which he aſſumed the title of Richard IV. king of England; inveighed bitterly againſt Henry Tudor; and exhorted the people to take up arms and depoſe the uſurper; promiſing at the ſame time ample reward for their ſervice. He then advanced to Exeter, intending to eſtabliſh a magazine in that place, and keep it as a retreat in caſe of misfortune. Finding on his arrival that the inhabitants were well affected to the government, he reſolved to take the city by ſtorm. The neceſſary preparations were accordingly made; but his attempt miſcarrying, he was repulſed with the loſs of two hundred men, and his followers were ſo greatly diſpirited, that many of them returned to Cornwall. Several noblemen in the county of Devon aſſembled troops at their own expence to repel the inſurgents; and the king ordered the lord Daubeny to march towards Exeter, declaring he would follow him at the head of a numerous army. Perkin, alarmed at the news of theſe preparations, raiſed the ſiege, and retired to Taunton, where he declared he would hazard an engagement; but in the night withdrew, with ſome of his confidants to Beaulieu, in the New Foreſt. Lord Daubeny being informed of his retreat, detached three hundred horſe to beſet the ſanctuary, till they ſhould receive further orders. The rebels now finding themſelves deſerted by their leader, ſubmitted to the king, who pardoned them all, except a few ringleaders. He afterwards ſent a detachment of cavalry to St. Michael's Mount, to ſecure the lady Catharine Gordon, the wife of Perkin, foreſeeing that if ſhe was pregnant, the rebellion would be continued to another generation. When ſhe was brought into the king's preſence, he was ſo ſtruck with her beauty and modeſty of deportment, that he conſoled her with promiſe of protection; ſent her under a ſtrong guard to attend upon the queen; and beſtowed on her a conſiderable penſion, which ſhe enjoyed during his life and ſeveral years after his deceaſe. Henry then proceeded to Exeter; and on his entrance, preſented his own ſword to the mayor, as a token of his favour and good-will to the citizens, who had ſo ſignalized themſelves in the defence of his government. Having thus ſuppreſſed the rebellion, he here called a council of war to deliberate on the fate of Perkin, who ſtill continued in the ſanctuary. After much debate, it was determined that the king ſhould pardon him, on condition of his explaining every circumſtance of the impoſture he had ſo long carried on. The deſperate ſtate of his affairs induced him to embrace the king's offer without heſitation, and quit the ſanctuary. Henry being deſirous of ſeeing him, he was brought to court, where the king obſerved him from a window, but would never admit him into his preſence. Afterwards he was conducted to London, and by the king's order rode in public through the ſtreets from Weſtminſter to the Tower, where one of his chief abettors was executed; and he himſelf ſigned a confeſſion, which was diſperſed through the nation; but it was ſo defective and contradictory, that it ſerved rather to perplex than explain the pretended impoſture.

A. D. 1499. Perkin, even in his captive ſtate, tampered ſo effectually with four ſervants belonging to Sir John Digby, lieutenant of the Tower, as by their means to procure his eſcape. They had for ſome time permitted him to converſe with the earl of Warwick, who had agreed with him to take the firſt opportunity to eſcape, which they perceived could not be done without murdering the lieutenant; a deſign which, if it had been ſucceſsful, would doubtleſs have ſhaken the pillars of Henry's throne; but the plot was diſcovered, and Edmund, earl of Warwick, wss beheaded on Tower-hill, while Perkin made an inglorious exit at Tyburn with John Walter, mayor of Cork, one of his moſt faithful adherents. Tranquillity having now fixed her ſeat in England, the avarice of its monarch became more flagrant; who, as all pretence for the demand of parliamentary ſupplies was entirely obviated, determined to exhauſt the coffers of the rebel party. With this view, on pretence that they were ſubject to the rigour of the law, he inſiſted on their being indulged with ſeparate pardons, for which he extorted large ſums. He alſo appointed commiſſioners minutely to explore all, that had either directly or indirectly aſſiſted and favoured the revolt of Perkin Warbeck. Theſe inquiſitors were empowered to amerce at diſcretion, every individual who ſhould have the benefit of a pardon; and even ſeize the effects of the deceaſed, ſhould their heirs refuſe to make a compoſition. Such monſtrous oppreſſions augmented the popular clamour againſt Henry, and were in a great meaſure attributed to the council of cardinal Morton, archbiſhop of Canterbury, who died at this period to the general joy of the nation. He was ſucceeded in the metropolitan ſee by Henry Dean, biſhop of Saliſbury; and the public was ſoon convinced that Henry's extortions on his ſubjects was the effect of his own avarice, and not the counſel of Morton.

A. D. 1501. The earl of Saliſbury, nephew to king Edward IV. and brother to the earl of Lincoln who had fallen in the battle of Stoke, happened in his paſſion to kill a man; and though he was a branch of the houſe of York, the king would not indulge him with a pardon, but on condition of his appearing and pleading it in public. The haughty earl ſo deeply reſented this indignity, that he retired in diſguſt to his aunt Margaret, ducheſs of Burgundy. Henry, in order to prevent any deſigns he might form to his prejudice, ſent over emiſſaries, who, by large offers and promiſes, prevailed on him to be reconciled to the government. At this period, Catharine, daughter of Ferdinand, king of Arragon, arrived in England, and was married to Arthur, prince of Wales, with great ſolemnity, on the fourteenth of November, the prince being turned of fifteeen, and the princeſs of eighteen years of age. Her dower amounted to two hundred thouſand ducats in money, jewels, and plate; and a third part of the principality of Wales, dukedom of Cornwall, and earldom of Cheſter, was aſſigned the princeſs, as a jointure in caſe of the demiſe of her huſband before his acceſſion to the throne. A treaty ot marriage between the king of Scotland and Henry's daughter Margaret ſucceeded this match, which was ratified by the Scottiſh ambaſſadors at London on the twenty-fourth of January, and the nuptials ſolemnized by proxy amidſt the acclamations of the people, who hoped that this alliance would terminate the enmity which had ſo long ſubſiſted between the two nations. But the general joy which this marriage diffuſed through the kingdom, was ſoon damped by the death of the young prince Arthur, who departed this life at Ludlow about five months after his nuptials, univerſally regretted by the Engliſh, who from his extraordinary talents had conceived happy omens of his future adminiſtration. His brother Henry ſucceeded to his title and dignities.

A. D. 1503. Henry's queen, in the beginning of this year, paid the debt of nature to the joy of her huſband, who eſteemed it a fortunate event, as it freed him from a deteſted rival in his title to the throne. Public peace and domeſtic tranquillity now prevailed, and England might have been the ſeat of uninterrupted felicity, had not the inſatiable avarice of its king ſought out new methods of preying on the properties of his ſubjects. With theſe mercenary views he patronized two infamous miniſters called Empſom and Dudley, who followed the practice of the law, and had recourſe to all its chicaneries, in preferring indictments and falſe accuſations againſt the ſubjects, in order to extort money, by way of what thoſe robbers of the public called a mitigation. Nay, ſo egregiouſly inſolent were they, that they even tried pretended delinquents in private, without fair appeal, or verdict of jury; and this violation of the law of equity was countenanced by the king, who ſhared in the fruits of ſo ſcandalous an oppreſſion; nor could he be diverted from this diſgraceful conduct, by the remonſtrances of the honeſt, or groans of the oppreſſed; and even practiſed himſelf, what he enjoined on his infamous miniſters; a glaring inſtance of which we have in the iniquitous treatment of the earl of Oxford, who was eminently dignified at this time in conſideration of his ſervices in the field and the cabinet, in both which reſpects he had acquitted himſelf to the general approbation of his country. Henry took an opportunity of paying him a formal viſit at his caſtle at Henningham, and was received by Oxford with a magnificence becoming the dignity of his viſitor. On the king's departure, the earl's ſervants formed a long rank on each ſide through which his majeſty paſſed: ſurprized at ſo numerous a train, he turned to the earl and ſaid, "My lord, the report I heard of your hoſpitality is great, but I perceive it falls ſhort of the truth. Pray, are theſe handſome gentlemen and yoemen on both ſides of me, your menial ſervants?" The earl, with great modeſty replied, that he only entertained them on that occaſion, to do the more honour to his majeſty. Henry affected ſurprize at that anſwer, and replied, "By my faith, my lord, I thank you for my good cheer, but I cannot endure to have my laws broken in my ſight: my attorney muſt ſpeak with you." Nor did he fail in verifying his declaration; for the earl was afterwards obliged to compound for this miſdemeanour, by the payment of fifteen thouſand marks. Such ungenerous behaviour excited a general clamour; and the ſpirit of diſcontent was encouraged by the earl of Suffolk, whoſe profuſion had ruined his fortunes, which he hoped to repair by the formation of new projects againſt the king's perſon and government. Having acquired a degree of popularity as the ſurviving branch of the houſe of York, he privately engaged ſome perſons in his intereſt; and then retired to Flanders, in hopes of receiving ſuccour from the ducheſs of Burgundy. The king, on advice of theſe proceedings, employed Sir Robert Curſon, governor of the caſtle of Hammes, to practiſe the very expedient by which all the deſigns of Perkin had been formerly defeated. Sir Robert, on pretence of having been injured by Henry, retiring to Flanders, offered his ſervice to the earl of Suffolk, and acted his part with ſuch dexterity, that he ſoon diſcovered that nobleman's ſchemes, and the particulars of his connections. Intelligence was immediately conveyed to Henry, who iſſued writs for apprehending his brother in law, William Courtney, earl of Devonſhire, huſband to the princeſs Catharine, daughter of Edward IV. William de la Pole, brother to the earl of Suffolk, Sir James Tyrrel, and Sir John Wyndham; George, lord Abergavenny, and Sir Thomas Green, were arreſted at the ſame time upon ſlight ſuſpicion, but ſoon diſcharged. The earl of Devon, and de la Pole, though nothing material appeared againſt them, were detained priſoners during the king's life. Tyrrel, ſuppoſed to have been concerned in the death of Edward V. with Wyndham, and ſeveral others of leſs note were hanged as traitors. Suffolk repaired to Flanders, where the archduke took him under his protection, after the demiſe of the ducheſs-dowager. The prince of Wales was now about thirteen years of age, of eminent talents, and a robuſt conſtitution; and his father having deſigned him for the church, he had received a more liberal education than his brother. The king, unwilling to refund one moiety of Catharine's dowry he had already received, and equally deſirous of obtaining the other, propoſed to Ferdinand that the young widow ſhould be married to Henry, prince of Wales, brother to her late huſband; the Spaniſh monarch readily conſented, provided the pope's diſpenſation could be obtained. The archbiſhop of Canterbury, a very great divine and able politician, honeſtly remonſtrated againſt this marriage; but Fox, biſhop of Durham, whoſe conſcience was ſtifled by intereſt, warmly oppoſed him, averring that the pope's diſpenſation would obviate all impediments civil or ſacred. Henry's darling paſſion bore down all before it; and though he was convinced of the propriety of Warham's reaſoning, and alſo, that the action was in itſelf unjuſtifiable on principles of moral rectitude; yet rather than refund, he determined to riſk all dangers and inconveniencies, and therefore directed his agents at Rome, moſt importunately to ſolicit the diſpenſation.

The parliament aſſembled in the beginning of January, and Henry A. D. 1504. obtained a ſubſidy for the portion of his eldeſt daughter, by which he received much more than the ſum he had paid to the king of Scotland. He now indeed ruled with deſpotic ſway; a flagrant proof of which was the choice the houſe of commons made, of the venal and wicked Dudley for their ſpeaker. This parliament even condeſcended to grant a mercenary ſovereign whatever his avarice could crave, to the ſcandalous impeachment of their own honour, and monſtrous oppreſſion of thoſe whoſe cauſe they had undertaken to plead. In the mean time the king ordered the body of Henry VI. to be removed from Windſor to Weſtminſter, where it was interred with great pomp. He alſo applied to the pope for a bull to canonize that monarch; but the miracles attributed to him after his death were ſo defective, in point of atteſtation, that his holineſs would not admit him to a place among the ſaints, without ſuch a conſideration as Henry's avarice would not permit him to afford; the deſign was therefore, by that means, entirely fruſtrated.

In this year, Henry concluded a treaty of commerce and intercourſe A. D. 1505. with the king of Spain, and conceived a deſign of marrying the widow of Ferdinand, king of Naples, that he might by that means obtain the large dower which had been aſſigned her in that kingdom. He therefore directed by private commiſſion, Francis Pearſon, and other emiſſaries, to inform themſelves circumſtantially of every thing relative to the lady's perſon and fortune. But theſe agents, diſcovering that the queen's large jointure in land had been converted into an annuity for life, they ſet out for Spain, without diſcloſing the intention of their journey to Naples.

Philip and Joan had for ſome time been proclaimed king and queen at Bruſſels; but were prevented from taking poſſeſſion of that kingdom by the war in Guelderland; and the pregnancy of the queen, who was in a ſhort time delivered of a princeſs, called Mary, afterwards queen of Hungary; but the war being terminated, and the queen in a condition for travelling, Philip equipped a powerful armament, and with his queen, embarked on the tenth of January. But the fleet was diſperſed by a violent A. D. 1506. ſtorm in the Channel, and the veſſel in which the king and queen embarked, driven into the harbour of Weymouth in Dorſetſhire. The peaſants, alarmed at the appearance of ſuch a numerous fleet, took to their arms; and Sir Thomas Trenchard, a knight of that county, being informed that the king and queen of Caſtile were landed, waited on them in perſon, and begged they would do him the honour to lodge in his houſe, till the king ſhould have notice of their arrival. Philip, perceiving that the weather would not admit of their immediate embarkation, complied with his requeſt. Henry having been informed of their landing, he diſpatched the earl of Arundel to compliment them in his name, and aſſure them that he would, with all convenient ſpeed, have the pleaſure of embracing them; and that, in the mean time, they might command his dominions. In order to haſten the interview, Philip ſet out for the court at Windſor, where he and his conſort were honourably received; though Henry was determined to avail himſelf of the accident that drove them into England. He propoſed, that as Philip had changed his condition in becoming king of Caſtile, the treaty of commerce between England and the Low Countries ſhould be renewed, with ſome alterations in favour of the Engliſh; and Philip readily aſſented to the propoſal. This affair being adjuſted, Henry propoſed a marriage between himſelf and Philip's ſiſter Margaret, widow of the duke of Savoy; and the king of Caſtile being allured by the proſpect of ſuch an alliance, the contract was immediately ſettled, Philip engaging to pay three hundred thouſand crowns in lieu of a dower to his ſiſter, together with a very conſiderable annuity. Not content with theſe advantages, Henry ſeemed reſolved to detain his gueſt till he ſhould deliver up the earl of Suffolk, from whoſe ſchemes and influence he ſtill apprehended ſome commotions. He therefore took occaſion in a private conference with Philip, to ſay with ſome emotion, "Sir, you have been ſaved on my coaſt, I hope you will not ſuffer me to be wrecked on your's." When the king of Caſtile deſired to know the drift of that addreſs, Henry replied, "I mean that wild extravagant fellow, my ſubject, the earl of Suffolk, who is protected in your country, and begins to play the fool when others are tired of the game." To this Philip anſwered, "I thought your preſent circumſtances had raiſed you above all ſuch apprehenſions; but ſince his reſidence in Flanders gives you diſquiet, I will baniſh him from my dominions." The Engliſh monarch hinting a deſire of having him in his power, Philip told him, in ſome confuſion, that he could not deliver him up conſiſtently with his honour; and that ſuch a ſtep would ſtill more detract from the character of Henry, as the world would thence conjecture he had treated his gueſt as a priſoner. "I will venture to incur the diſgrace," ſaid Henry, "and ſo your honour will remain inviolate." Philip, finding him ſo ſolicitous, anſwered, "Sir, you give law to me, and I will dictate to you in my turn: Suffolk ſhall be delivered up to you, but on condition of your paſſing your honour that his life ſhall be ſafe." The propoſal being agreed to, Philip wrote to the earl of Suffolk, aſſuring him that he had obtained his pardon; which aſſurance being alſo confirmed by an expreſs meſſage from Henry, that nobleman returned to England, and was committed priſoner to the Tower. On the earl's arrival, Philip was permitted to purſue his voyage, after a reſidence of three months in England, during wich he was inſtalled a knight of the garter, and conferred the honour of the golden fleece on the prince of Wales.

A. D. 1507. Empſon and Dudley ſtill continued their extortions, and in the courſe of this year commenced a ſevere proſecution againſt Sir William Capel, on pretence of miſconduct during his mayoralty, and fined him in the ſum of two thouſand pounds; but being exaſperated by former extortions he refuſed payment, and was committed to the Tower, where he remained till the death of the king. In the midſt of theſe vile oppreſſions, Henry was ſeized with the gout, which gradually affected his lungs, and produced a ſevere aſthma; notwithſtanding which he continued to tranſact the affairs of government, till his ſtate of health threatening approaching diſſolution, he began to make preparations for futurity. This viſitation of heaven, prevented the ſolemnization of the nuptials between him and Margaret of Auſtria, though the contract had paſſed the conſent of all parties. Henry finding himſelf in a gradual decay, affected concern at the extortions of Empſon and Dudley, diſcharging all priſoners that were confined for debt under forty ſhillings; and among other religious foundations, finiſhed and endowed the hoſpital of the Savoy, and built a beautiful chapel in Weſtminſter abbey, called after his name to this day.

A. D. 1509. Henry's diſorder now returning in a moſt violent degree, it ſoon carried him off this ſcene of exiſtence, on the twenty-ſecond of April, in the fifty-third year of his age, and the twenty-fourth of his reign. He bequeathed to his ſon Henry the crown of England, together with eighteen hundred thouſand pounds in money, jewels, and plate, depoſited in the vaults of his palace at Richmond. He was born at Pembroke caſtle, and, as lord Bacon juſtly obſerves, "lieth buried at Weſtminſter, in one of the ſtatelieſt and daintieſt monuments of Europe, both for the chapel, and for the ſepulchre; ſo that he dwelleth more richly dead in the monument of his tomb, than he did alive at Richmond, or in any of his palaces."

By his queen Elizabeth, of the houſe of York, eldeſt daughter of Edward IV. he had three ſons and four daughters; Arthur, who died before him, in the ſeventeenth year of his age; Henry, who ſucceeded him on the throne; and Edmund, who did not live to the years of diſcretion. Of his daughters, Elizabeth and Catharine died in their childhood; Margaret eſpouſed James IV. king of Scotland; and Mary, who had been betrothed to Charles, archduke of Auſtria, was married to Lewis XII. king of France; and after his death to Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk.

Many ſalutary ſtatutes were made during this reign; but the moſt important one was that, by which the nobility and gentry were allowed to break the antient entails, and alienate their eſtates; by which means the great fortunes of the barons were diminiſhed, and the property of the commons conſiderably increaſed.

In this reign laws were made againſt the exportation of money, bullion, and plate. Foreign merchants, who imported commodities, were obliged to expend all the money they acquired, by their ſales in Engliſh commodities, to prevent the ſpecie being carried in a clandeſtine manner out of the kingdom. The exportation of horſes was prohibited; and in order to promote archery, no bows were to be ſold at a higher price than ſix ſhillings and fourpence of our preſent money.

Beſides the chapel in Weſtminſter-abbey, Henry rebuilt, in 1498, the royal palace of Shene, which had been conſumed by fire, and gave it the name of Richmond, which it ſtill retains. He likewiſe founded a chapel in Windſor, and ſeveral monaſteries of Dominicans and Franciſcans. He turned into an hoſpital the palace of, the Savoy, built under Henry III. by Peter, earl of Savoy: and he expended fourteen thouſand pounds in building a large veſſel, called the Great Harry, which was, properly ſpeaking, the firſt ſhip in the Engliſh navy.

During the laſt period, arts and ſciences began to emerge from that obſcurity under which they had been ſo long concealed. The city of Conſtantinople having been taken by the Turks, the Greeks, among whom ſome remains of learning were ſtill preſerved, being ſcattered by thoſe enthuſiaſtic barbarians, took ſhelter in Italy, and imported, together with their admirable language, a tincture of their ſcience, and their refined taſte in poetry and literature. The purity of the Latin tongue was alſo revived; the ſtudy of antiquity became faſhionable; and the love of learning gradually ſpread over the nation. But what ſtill more contributed to diſſeminate the ſciences, was the diſcovery of the art of printing. William Caxton, citizen and mercer of London, being ſent ambaſſador by Edward IV. to the duke of Burgundy, learned that uſeful art, during his abode in the Low Countries, and introduced it into England about the year 1474. He tranſlated ſeveral books from the French, and printed them himſelf in one of the chapels in Weſtminſter-abbey, by permiſſion of John Iſlip, the abbot. The book on "The Game of Cheſs," dated 1474, but without Caxton's name, is generally reckoned the firſt production of the Engliſh preſs. The invention was ſoon purchaſed by the monaſteries, and preſſes were ſet up at Oxford, Cambridge, St. Albans, and other places.

During the reign of Henry VII. Chriſtopher Columbus, a Genoeſe, in 1492, ſailed from Cadiz, on the voyage, by which he diſcovered America; and a few years after, Vaſquez de Gama, a Portugueſe, doubled the cape of Good Hope, and opened a new paſſage to the Eaſt Indies: events that were attended with the moſt important conſequences, with reſpect to all the nations of Europe. Commerce and navigation being thus enlarged, induſtry and the arts were rapidly propagated; the nobles ſpent their fortunes in expenſive pleaſures; and men of inferior rank not only acquired a ſhare in landed property, but created a property of a new ſpecies in ſtocks, commodities and credit.

It was only by accident, that Henry VII. had not a ſhare in the great naval diſcoveries, by which that age was diſtinguiſhed. Chriſtopher Columbus, after he had been ſeveral times repulſed by the court of Portugal and Spain, ſent his brother Bartholomew to London, in order to explain to Henry his great deſign, and to obtain his aſſiſtance in its execution. The king invited Chriſtopher to come to England; but his brother being taken by pyrates, was detained in his voyage; and in the mean while, Chriſtopher having obtained the countenance of Iſabella, was ſupplied with a ſmall ſquadron, and happily executed his enterprize. Henry, thus diſappointed, fitted out Sebaſtian Cabot, a Venetian, ſettled in Briſtol, and in the year 1498, that mariner ſailed to the weſtward in ſearch of new diſcoveries. Cabot reached the continent of America in about the ſixteenth degree of north latitude; and ſailing ſouthward along the coaſt, diſcovered Newfoundland and other countries, but returned to England without making any ſettlement. A like attempt was made by Elliot, and other merchants of Briſtol, in the year 1502. Thus, in the courſe of a few reigns, a general revolution took place in human affairs, and people gradually attained that ſituation, with reſpect to arts, ſciences, commerce, and other great improvements of different kinds, in which they have ever ſince perſevered.

Character of Henry VII.

Henry was tall, ſtrait, and well-ſhaped, though ſlender; of a grave aſpect, and ſaturnine complection; auſtere, and reſerved in his addreſs and converſation, except when he had a favourite point to gain, and then no man was more eloquent or perſuaſive. He poſſeſſed a genius happily adapted to government; particularly ſo to the factious times in which he lived. He loved peace without fearing war. Though filled with continual ſuſpicions of his ſervants and miniſters, he diſcovered no timidity, either in the conduct of his affairs, or in the day of battle; and though often ſevere in his puniſhments, he was commonly leſs actuated by revenge, than by the maxims of policy. He inherited a fund of good ſenſe, greatly improved by ſtudy: his prudence and valour maintained order and regularity in the ſtate; and by theſe royal qualities, he humanized the ferocious manners of the nobility. His judgment was ſound; his ſagacity deeply political; and he poſſeſſed in a peculiar manner, the art of turning all his domeſtic troubles, and all foreign diſputes, to his own advantage: hence he acquired the appellation of the Engliſh Solomon, and was univerſally allowed to be the wiſeſt crowned head at that time in Europe. His laws were prudently enacted, punctually executed; and he was a warm patron of arts and commerce, thoſe inexhauſtible ſources of wealth. Yet it muſt be acknowledged, that notwithſtanding all his good qualities, the reign of this great monarch was more advantageous to his people, than honourable to himſelf, on account of two leading paſſions, by which his ſoul was continually agitated, and his conduct ever influenced: theſe were, a fear of loſing his crown, and a deſire of amaſſing riches. His ruling paſſion was inſatiable avarice, which he gratified at the expence of other people's happineſs, and ſometimes to the endangering his own inward tranquillity; whereby a ſtain is left upon his memory, which his activity, firmneſs, wiſdom, policy, and courage, cannot obliterate. Hence no king of England was ever more hated by his ſubjects, though this abhorrence was blended with a mixture of fear, excited by his uninterrupted ſucceſs and his extraordinary abilities; however, ſome national advantages were derived even from his jealouſy and avarice; ſince by the firſt he was led to aboliſh feudal tenures, which depreſſed the nobility; and by the laſt he was prompted to encourage induſtry and trade; becauſe it improved his cuſtoms, and enriched his ſubjects, whom he could afterwards pillage at diſcretion.

A. D. 1509. HENRY VIII. ſucceeded his father in the eighteenth year of his age, with every advantage nature and fortune could beſtow. An unfeigned ſatisfaction appeared univerſally on his acceſſion and coronation. Amiable in perſon and addreſs, and poſſeſſed of immenſe wealth, this young prince ſaw himſelf at the head of a flouriſhing kingdom, where the arts and ſciences wanted only a liberal benefactor to promote their progreſs. The people had formed the higheſt expectation from his diſtinguiſhed abilities. His father, with a view to detach him from the conſideration of ſtate affairs, had hitherto engaged him in the purſuits of literature; he had made conſiderable advances in the languages, theology, and Ariſtotle's philoſophy; and he was no ſooner ſeated on the throne, than his diſpoſition appeared to be of a generous caſt; his liberality even bordered on profuſion. The paſſionate vehemence and impatience, which afterwards degenerated into tyranny, were now only conſidered as the faults of youth, that would be corrected by time; and the houſes of York and Lancaſter being fully united in his perſon, people expected from being obnoxious to no party, that impartial adminiſtration which had been long unknown. The beginning of his reign encouraged theſe favourable prepoſſeſſions. His grandmother, the counteſs of Richmond, was ſtill alive, and as ſhe was greatly eſteemed for her prudence and virtue, Henry liſtened to her advice, in the eſtabliſhment of his miniſtry, and new council. This was compoſed of Warham, archbiſhop of Canterbury, and lord chancellor; Fox, biſhop of Wincheſter, ſecretary, and lord privy ſeal; Howard, earl of Surry, lord treaſurer; Talbot, earl of Shrewſbury, lord ſteward of the houſhold; lord Herbert, chamberlain; Sir Thomas Lovel, maſter of the wards, and conſtable of the Tower; Sir Edward Poynings, comptroller; Sir Henry Manny, afterwards lord Manny; Sir Thomas Darcy, afterwards lord Darcy: Thomas Ruthal, doctor of laws; and Sir Henry Wyat. Theſe were thoroughly experienced in buſineſs, and were leſs unpopular than any other miniſters under the late king. By Henry's expences, the treaſures amaſſed by his father were gradually diſſipated: parties of pleaſure ſucceeded each other: carouſals, tilts, and tournaments, were exhibited with the utmoſt magnificence; and as the court was permitted, by the preſent tranquillity of the public, to ſeek gratification in every amuſement, little attention was paid to ſerious buſineſs. In the intervals between theſe diverſions, the king applied himſelf chiefly to muſic and literature, his favourite purſuits; and made ſuch proficiency in the former, as to compoſe ſome pieces of church-muſic, which were ſung in his chapel. However, the complaints of his people were not forgot; nor would he protect the inſtruments of his father's extortion. The ſpies and informers, who had long exerciſed an unbounded tyranny over the kingdom, now felt the iron-hand of juſtice; and fell victims to public reſentment. Empſon and Dudley, who had been ſo often loaded with execrations, were cited before the council to anſwer for their conduct. Empſon, in apologizing for himſelf and his aſſociate, told the council, that they were ſo far from deſerving cenſure, that the clamours of their enemies were levelled againſt actions, which ſeemed rather to merit a reward: that they were accuſed of having ſtrictly executed the laws, eſtabliſhed by general conſent; in doing which they had acted only in obedience to their ſovereign, to whom the conſtitution had entruſted the adminiſtration of juſtice: that it was not for them, who were inſtruments in the king's hands, to determine what laws were recent or obſolete, expedient, or pernicious, ſince they were all equally valid, while the legiſlature permitted them to remain unrepealed; that a licentious populace would naturally murmur againſt the reſtraints of authority; but the glory of all wiſe ſtates ever conſiſted in the juſt diſtribution of rewards and puniſhments; and that nothing could be expected but the ſubverſion of all government, when the judges were conſigned over to the mercy of the criminals, and the rulers to that of their ſubjects. The council perceived Empſom's arguments were unanſwerable, and therefore committed thoſe obnoxious miniſters to the Tower, till a new accuſation could be formed againſt them. After ſome deliberation it was determined to accuſe them of high-treaſon. To gratify the people, they were charged with the improbable crime, of having entered into a conſpiracy againſt the late king, whom they were to put to death, and then to ſeize by force the adminiſtration of government. Of this ridiculous and abſurd accuſation they were found guilty by the jury, who were entirely influenced by popular prejudices; and their verdict being afterwards confirmed by a bill of attainder in parliament, they were accordingly executed.

This buſineſs being finiſhed, the council renewed their deliberations on the expedience of the king's conſummating his marriage with Catharine of Arragon. The chief objections urged againſt his eſpouſing her, were her former marriage with his brother, and the inequality of their years: on the other hand, the affection ſhe bore to the king, with her virtue, modeſty, and ſweetneſs of temper, were inſiſted on; as well as the advantage of cementing a cloſe alliance with Spain; the neceſſity of finding ſome confederate to counter-ballance the power of France; the large dowry to which ſhe was entitled as princeſs of Wales, and the expediency of fulfilling the late king's engagements; and theſe conſiderations determined the council, contrary to the primate's opinion, to adviſe Henry to celebrate the marriage. This was accordingly done, after which the coronation was performed on the twenty-fourth of June, immediately after the death of Margaret, counteſs of Richmond and Derby, the king's grandmother. But though the biſhop of Wincheſter had been ſucceſsful with regard to the conſummation of Henry's marriage, he ſoon perceived that his power began to decline. He had acquired ſuch habits of caution and frugality, during the preceding reign, that he could not now wholly lay them aſide. He remonſtrated againſt the ſchemes of diſſipation and expence, purſued by the young monarch, and by that means loſt his favour: while Surry, who made his own intereſt the ſole motive of his conduct, was very officious in promoting the liberality, pleaſure, and magnificence of the times. Wincheſter remonſtrated with him on his remarkable change of conduct, but without effect. Surry derived great advantages from the diſſipation of his maſter, and engaged him in ſuch a courſe of pleaſure that he became negligent of ſtate affairs, and willing to entruſt the government to the care of his miniſters. Fox was highly exaſperated againſt Surry, and determined to introduce a perſon who might be a ſpy upon his actions. He caſt his eyes upon Dr. Thomas Wolſey, as a perſon well qualified to anſwer his purpoſe. Wolſey was the ſon of a butcher at Ipſwich, but diſtinguiſhed by his prudence, his talents and his learning. He had recommended himſelf by his addreſs to Henry VII. who had employed him, with advantage, in ſome difficult commiſſions; and his inſinuating addreſs, his taſte for pleaſure, and his love of letters, could not fail of rendering him very acceptable to Henry.

A. D. 1510. The domeſtic adminiſtration of Henry was rendered eaſy by the tranquillity of his ſubjects; but the wars in Italy ſtill raged with the utmoſt violence, and attracted the attention of all the princes of Europe; yet all parties courted Henry's alliance, while he was engaged by no immediate intereſt to join with any. Several great monarchies were eſtabliſhed, and none ſo far ſurpaſſed the reſt, as to give any pretence of jealouſy; and their internal force, by balancing each other, might long have maintained a general tranquillity, had not the active and enterprizing ſpirit of that ambitious pontiff, Julius II. excited among them the flames of war. By his intrigues a league had been formed at Cambray, between Lewis, Maximilian, Ferdinand, and himſelf, in order to overwhelm the commonwealth of Venice by their united arms; and Henry, though he had not the leaſt motive for it, allowed his name to be inſerted in the confederacy. Julius had no ſooner humbled the republic of Venice, than he was ambitious of expelling all foreigners, whom he termed barbarians, from Italy. He reſolved to make the tempeſt fall firſt upon Lewis, and ſeeking for a cauſe of quarrel with that monarch, ſought the alliance of other princes. He courted Henry's favour by ſending him a ſacred roſe, perfumed with muſk, and anointed with chryſm: he engaged in his intereſt Bambridge, archbiſhop of York, Henry's ambaſſador at Rome, whom he raiſed to the rank of cardinal; drew over Ferdinand to his ſide; and formed a treaty with the Swiſs cantons. Lewis exerted himſelf to repel the attacks of his enemies. To this end he endeavoured to deſpoil the pope of that ſacred character, by which he was rendered formidable; and in conjunction with Maximilian, determined to call a general council, that might give a check to the deſigns of the Roman pontiff. Henry was inclined to protect his holineſs from the enterprizes of Lewis; for Julius had given him hopes, that his ſervices ſhould be rewarded with the title, of the moſt Chriſtian King, which had hitherto been annexed to the crown of France. He therefore joined in an alliance formed by the pope, Spain and Venice, againſt the French king.

A. D. 1512.

The glory of ſerving the pope, and of conquering provinces, excited the ambition of Henry; and the parliament readily granted ſupplies for an enterprize that was agreeable to the people. Ferdinand, always attentive to his own intereſt, when he ſeemed to be acting for that of others, perſuaded Henry, that it would be more for his advantage, not to land his troops at Calais, but at Fonterabria, where he might eaſily make a conqueſt of Guienne, and where he promiſed to aſſiſt him with a Spaniſh army. But the real intention of Ferdinand was to turn his force to the acquiſition of Navarre. Henry, not ſuſpecting the views of Ferdinand, agreed to the propoſal. The marquis of Dorſet was appointed general of the land forces, which were landed in the province of Guipiſcoa, about the middle of June. The Engliſh admiral, in his return, made ſeveral ſucceſsful attempts on the coaſt of Brittany, and being joined by a ſquadron of ſhips commanded by Sir Thomas Knivet, their depredations were continued with advantages. Alarmed at the attempts of the Engliſh, the French fleet of thirty-nine ſhips, was ordered to ſail from Breſt, under the command of Primauget, an admiral of great courage and conduct. The two fleets ſoon after met, and a furious engagement enſued. At length Primauget's ſhip was ſet on fire, and determining not to periſh alone, he bore down upon the Engliſh admiral, when grappling with her, both ſhips ſoon became involved in the ſame inevitable deſtruction. This dreadful ſcene ſuſpended the action between the other ſhips: they were ſtruck with aſtoniſhment at ſo terrible an appearance of horror and confuſion. After ſome time the French ſhip blew up, and in its exploſion deſtroyed the Engliſh. This alarming cataſtrophe, in which above ſixteen hundred men periſhed, ſo affected both parties, that the engagement was not renewed. The French retired to Breſt, and the Engliſh continued cruiſing in the channel. The duke of Alva, who commanded the Spaniſh forces, having joined the Engliſh, preparations were made for opening the campaign. But Dorſet, who was a ſtranger to Ferdinand's intentions, was ſurprized to find, that inſtead of purſuing the conqueſt of Guienne, his army moved towards the frontiers of Navarre. The Engliſh general complained of this ſtep. Ferdinand, in reply, obſerved, that as the king of Navarre was connected with France, he thought it would not be adviſeable to form the ſiege of Bayonne, till meaſures were taken for preventing that prince from cutting off their proviſions. Dorſet ſuſpecting, that little regard was paid to the intereſt of his maſter in this affair, and having no orders to invade Navarre, refuſed to comply, and remained in his quarters at Fonterabria, where his army kept that of the French in awe, and prevented its advancing to ſuccour Navarre; which enabled Alva to make himſelf maſter of Pampeluna, and obliged John to ſhelter himſelf in France. Alva again applied to Dorſet; but as he ſtill declined forming the ſiege of Bayonne, and inſiſted on invading another part of the king of Navarre's dominions, Dorſet perceiving now his ſiniſter intentions, obſerved, that he could not comply without new orders from his maſter. Upon this Ferdinand diſpatched Martin de Ampios, to London, to perſuade Henry, that the moſt favourable opportunities were loſt, by the refractory and ſcrupulous humour of the Engliſh general, it being neceſſary for him to act on all occaſions in concert with the duke of Alva, who was beſt acquainted with the ſituation of the country, and the reaſons of every operation. Meanwhile Dorſet obſerving that his farther ſtay was of no uſe to the main deſign, and that his ſoldiers periſhed daily by want and ſickneſs, demanded of Ferdinand ſhips to convey him back to England. Ferdinand, who was bound by treaty to furniſh him whenever demanded with this ſupply, at laſt, after many delays, yielded to his importunity: but when Dorſet was embarking his troops, and preparing for the voyage, a meſſenger from Henry arrived with orders for them to continue in Spain; notwithſtanding which, the ſoldiers, diſcontented with the treatment they had received, mutinied, and obliged their officers to ſet ſail. The ill ſucceſs of this expedition diſpleaſed Henry; and the marquis of Dorſet found great difficulty in appeaſing him, by explaining Ferdinand's conduct.

A. D. 1513.

Diſgraceful as this enterprize was, it ſerved to weaken France. Lewis was obliged to recall his forces to the defence of his own dominions, and by that means loſt all his Italian conqueſts. Julius triumphed in the diſgrace of the French monarch; but he did not long enjoy his good fortune, dying on the twenty-firſt of February, and was ſucceeded in the papal chair by the famous John de Medici, being Leo X. He was the patron of arts, and the friend of learning. Deſirous of attaching Henry firmly to his intereſt, he ſent him a veſſel laden with hams and wine. The arrival of this veſſel, which carried the papal banner, filled the Engliſh with exultation, and excited their natural antipathy againſt France. Thomas Wolſey, dean of Lincoln, and the king's almoner, was now at the head of affairs, having ſo far gained the king's favour that he ſupplanted both Surry and Fox. His being near forty years of age, and a clergyman, were no reſtraints on the gaiety with which Henry paſſed his careleſs hours. He introduced buſineſs and ſtate affairs during the intervals of amuſement; and then inſinuated thoſe maxims which he wiſhed him to adopt: he told him that while he truſted his father's councellors with the conduct of his affairs, he had the advantage of employing perſons of wiſdom and experience; but as they did not owe their promotion to his favour, they ſcarcely thought themſelves accountable to him for the exerciſe of their authority; and by their cabals obſtructed buſineſs more than they promoted it by their age and experience; that while he choſe to paſs his time in the pleaſures to which he was invited by his youth and princely fortune, and in the ſtudies that would in time enable him to ſway the ſcepter alone, it would be beſt to entruſt his authority to one who was the creature of his will, and could entertain no view but that of promoting his ſervice; and if this miniſter had the ſame reliſh for pleaſure with himſelf, and the ſame taſte for learning, he might with the greateſt eaſe, at proper intervals, account to him for the whole of his conduct, introduce him gradually into the knowledge of public buſineſs, and thus, without a tedious conſtraint, initiate him into the art of government. The king entered into all Wolſey's views; and finding none ſo fit to execute this plan of adminiſtration as the man who propoſed it, he ſoon raiſed him to be a member of his council; and from thence to be his ſole and abſolute miniſter.

Wolſey, perceiving the ardour of Henry for war, exerted his abilities to provide an army, that might retrieve the martial glory of his countrymen. Hoſtilities were firſt commenced at ſea, but without any advantage to either of the contending parties. It was on the continent that the deciſive blows were intended to be ſtruck. The van of the army, conſiſting of eight thouſand men, was led by the earl of Shrewſbury, aſſiſted by the earl of Derby, the lords Fitzwalter, Haſtings and Cobham, and Sir Thomas ap Rice, captain of the light horſe. This diviſion being landed at Calais, was ſoon followed by another body of ſix thouſand men, under the command of lord Herbert, chamberlain, attended by the earls of Northumberland and Kent, the lords Audley and Delawar, together with Carew, Curzon, and other gentlemen. Henry now prepared to follow his forces; but before his departure, he cauſed the unfortunate earl of Suffolk to be beheaded. What reaſons induced Henry to commit this cruel action, is not known. The French hiſtorians tell us, that it was in obedience to the dying commands of his father; while others think, that Henry poured his vengeance on this nobleman, for the conduct of his brother Edward de la Pole, who had accepted a command in the French ſervice. About the thirteenth of June, Henry landed at Calais with the third diviſion of his army, conſiſting of twelve thouſand men. He was attended by the duke of Buckingham, and many others of the principal nobility, but he ſoon perceived the little reliance to be placed on the engagements of princes; for among all his allies, the Swiſs only performed the conditions of the treaty. The emperor Maximilian had promiſed to join them with a body of eight thouſand men, but though he had received from Henry one hundred and twenty thouſand crowns for that purpoſe, he failed in his engagements. He made ſome atonement however to the Engliſh monarch, by joining him in the Low Countries, with ſome German and Flemiſh ſoldiers, who were of great ſervice in giving an example of diſcipline to Henry's new raiſed army. The emperor himſelf enliſted as a volunteer in the Engliſh army, and bluſhed not to receive an hundred crowns a day for his ſervice. Before the landing of Henry, the earl of Shrewſbury and lord Herbert, had laid ſiege to Terouane, on the frontiers of Picardy, and began the attack with vigour. Teligni and Crequi commanded in the town, which had a garriſon that did not exceed a thouſand men, but defended the place with great intrepidity, and were at laſt in danger, from the want of proviſions and ammunition, of being obliged to ſurrender; but having ſent notice of their ſituation to Lewis, who had advanced with his army to Amiens, he gave orders to throw relief into the place. Upon this Fontrailles ſet out at the head of eight hundred horſemen, each of whom carried behind him two quarters of bacon, and a ſack of gunpowder. This ſmall body unexpectedly ruſhed through the Engliſh camp; and overcoming all oppoſition, advanced to the foſſee of the town, where each man threw down his burden, and immediately galloping back, were again ſo happy as to break through the Engliſh, and to ſuffer little loſs. But the Engliſh ſoon after fully revenged this inſult. Henry having received intelligence of the approach of the French horſe, who had advanced to protect Fontrailles, ordered ſome troops to paſs the Lis, and oppoſe them. This body of French cavalry, notwithſtanding they chiefly conſiſted of gentlemen, who had behaved in Italy with great gallantry, on ſeeing the enemy, were ſeized with ſuch an unaccountable panic, that they inſtantly fled. The duke of Longueville, who commanded the French, Clermont, Buſſi, d'Amboiſe, Imbercourt, the chevalier Bayard, and other officers of diſtinction, were made priſoners. This rout is ſometimes termed the battle of Guienegate, from the place where it was fought, but more generally the battle of the Spurs, becauſe that day the French made more uſe of their ſpurs than of their weapons.

Henry, who was now at the head of an army of fifty thouſand men, inſtead of profiting by this victory, and marching into the heart of France, as he might eaſily have done, returned to the ſiege of Terouane, which was ſoon after obliged to capitulate. The terrors of the French again revived; they were indeed ſcarcely ever in greater danger, and leſs able to defend themſelves againſt the powerful armies, with which they were on every ſide threatened, or aſſailed. Even many of the inhabitants of Paris, not thinking themſelves ſafe there, began to remove, without knowing where they ſhould find a greater place of ſafety. However the many blunders committed by the enemies of Lewis, extricated him from his difficulties. The Swiſs ſuffered themſelves to be ſeduced into a negociation by Tremoille, governor of Burgundy, and they accepted of the conditions he offered them. Maximilian adviſed Henry to lay ſiege to Tournay, a great and rich city on the frontiers of Flanders, with the hopes of freeing his grandſon from ſo troubleſome a neighbour as the French; and Henry, not conſidering, that this acquiſition would no way promote his conqueſts in France, was ſo imprudent as to follow his intereſted advice. Tournay being by its ancient charters exempted from the burden of a garriſon, the burghers engaged, contrary to the remonſtrance of their ſovereign, to defend the city; but when they came to a trial their courage failed, and after ſuffering a few days ſiege, ſurrendered to the Engliſh. The biſhop of Tournay being lately dead, the chapter had elected a new biſhop, who was not inſtalled in his office; the king of England therefore beſtowed that ſee on Wolſey, his favourite, and put him in immediate poſſeſſion of the revenues. Henry, hearing of the retreat of the Swiſs, and finding the ſeaſon far advanced, returned to England, about the middle of October, with the greateſt part of his army. His youthful mind was highly ſatisfied with the ſucceſs of his firſt campaign; but people of judgment comparing his advantages with his progreſs, and the expence with his acquiſitions, were convinced, that this boaſted expedition was both ruinous and inglorious.

While Henry was thus employed, James IV. king of Scotland, who had declared for Lewis, ravaged the northern parts of Northumberland, at the head of fifty thouſand men. He made himſelf maſter of Norham, Etal, Werke, Ford, and other places of ſmall importance. Lady Ford was taken priſoner in her caſtle; and being preſented to James, ſo gained on his affections that he ſpent in pleaſure the critical time, which, during the abſence of his enemies, he ought to have employed to better purpoſe. In the mean time, the earl of Surry, who commanded the Engliſh forces, marched into the North, to ſtop the ravages of the invaders. His army conſiſted of about twenty-ſix thouſand men; five thouſand of which had been ſent from the army in France. The Scots were encamped on the high grounds near the hills of Chiviot, in a very advantageous ſituation. The river Till ran in their front; nor could their camp be approached but by one narrow paſs, which was defended by artillery. Surry, perceiving that it would be madneſs to attack the enemy, diſpatched an herald to the Scottiſh monarch, offering to meet him in the plain of Milfield, to try the valour of their forces on equal ground. But the anſwer he received was far from being ſatisfactory, and he determined to have recourſe to a ſtratagem, in order if poſſible, to draw the Scotch from their advantageous ſituation. He made a feint, as if he intended to march to Berwick, in order to enter Scotland, lay waſte the borders, and cut off his enemies proviſions: upon which the Scots, ſetting fire to their huts, marched down from the hills. Surry had obſerved their precipitate decampment, and the ſmoke concealing his motions, he paſſed the Till with his vanguard and train of artillery, at the bridge of Twiſel, while the reſt of his army croſſed the ſtream at a ford higher up the river. A battle being now inevitable, both ſides prepared for it with the greateſt tranquillity. The Engliſh army was divided into two lines. In the firſt, lord Howard led the main body, Sir Edmund Howard the right wing, and Sir Marmaduke Conſtable the left. In the ſecond, the earl of Surry commanded the main body, lord Dacres the right wing, and Sir Edward Stanley the left. The king of Scotland drew up his army on a riſing ground, and the front appeared in three diviſions: the right commanded by the earl of Huntley, aſſiſted by lord Hume: the center by the king himſelf, and the left by the earls of Lenox and Argyle. There was alſo a fourth diviſion, as a body of reſerve, under the command of the earl of Bothwel. In this poſition the armies approached each other, and met in Flouden field. The battle was begun by the earl of Huntley, who charged with ſuch fury, that he broke the wing of the Engliſh, and drove them off the field. But the ſame ſucceſs did not attend the other commanders. They could not ſupport the attack of the Engliſh, and Huntley, at his return, found the Scottiſh army in great diſorder. The diviſion commanded by Lenox and Argyle, were ſo elated with the ſucceſs of the other wing, that they broke their ranks; and notwithſtanding the remonſtrances of La Motte, the French ambaſſador, ruſhed in the utmoſt confuſion upon the enemy, imagining themſelves ſure of victory. But they ſoon found the effects of their raſhneſs. Sir Edmund Howard, with his diviſion ſtood firm, and received them with great bravery; while Dacres, wheeling about during the action, fell upon the rear, and attacked them ſo furiouſly, that they could not ſuſtain the ſhock. The greater part of them were cut to pieces, and the reſt eſcaped by a diſorderly flight. This diſorder did not however intimidate the diviſion under the king and Bothwel. Animated by the valour of their leaders, they ſtill made head againſt the Engliſh; and forming themſelves into a circle, continued the engagement till night put an end to the ſlaughter. The darkneſs favoured the retreat of the Scots; nor were the Engliſh ſenſible of their having obtained the victory, till the morning diſcovered where the advantage lay. Ten thouſand Scots are ſaid to have periſhed on this occaſion, and the victors to have loſt about half that number. Others repreſent the numbers that fell on each ſide nearly equal: but it is certain the Engliſh loſt only perſons of ſmall note, while the flower of the Scottiſh nobility, with the king himſelf was ſlain. In ſearching the field, the Engliſh found a dead body, dreſſed in a habit like his, which reſembled him; and it being put into a leaden coffin, was ſent to London, where it was kept unburied for ſome time; James having died under the ſentence of excommunication, on account of his confederacy with France, and his oppoſing the holy ſee. Henry however obtained his abſolution from the pontiff, and the body was interred. The Scots aſſerted, that the body of their king was not found, but that of a younger gentleman, named Elphinſton, who, with ſeveral other volunteers, were dreſſed like the king. It was even affirmed, that James was ſeen to croſs the Tweed at Kelſo, and that he was aſſaſſinated by the vaſſals of lord Hume, who had been inſtigated to commit ſo enormous a crime by that nobleman. The populace were however perſuaded, that he was ſtill alive; and having ſecretly gone on pilgrimage to the Holy Land, would at length return, and again take poſſeſſion of the throne. The Scots long entertained this conceit. Such was the event of the battle of Flouden, fought on the ninth of September; and this victory afforded Henry a fair opportunity of inſiſting upon his own terms with Scotland, perhaps of conquering that kingdom; but on this occaſion he behaved with great generoſity. He liſtened to the requeſt of his ſiſter, the queen of Scotland, who had been appointed regent during her ſon's minority, and in compaſſion to her helpleſs condition, readily concluded a peace. At the ſame time he created the earl of Surry duke of Norfolk; Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk; lord Herbert, earl of Worceſter; Sir Edward Stanley, lord Monteagle, and Wolſey was created biſhop of Lincoln. Margaret of York, daughter to the duke of Clarence, obtained the title of counteſs of Saliſbury, as heireſs to her brother the earl of Warwick, beheaded by Henry VII.

A. D. 1514.

Lewis, perfectly ſenſible of the danger to which his kingdom was expoſed in the laſt campaign, appeaſed Leo X. by renouncing the council of Piſa, which had been transferred to Lyons; and the pontiff, in return, took off the excommunication that had been denounced againſt him and his kingdom. Ferdinand, who was advanced in years, and had no other ambition than to keep poſſeſſion of Navarre, which he had ſubdued, readily liſtened to the propoſals of Lewis, for prolonging the truce to another year, and of forming a more intimate connection between them, by marrying his ſecond daughter Renée, to Charles prince of Spain, grandſon to the Spaniſh monarch; with whom he was to have Lewis's claim to the duchy of Milan. The emperor Maximilian alſo acceded to the treaty. When Henry was informed of this tranſaction, he flew into a violent rage, loudly complaining, that his father-in-law, by his promiſes and profeſſions, had engaged him to be at enmity with France; and yet, without the leaſt warning ſacrificed his intereſt to his own ſelfiſh views, leaving him expoſed to all the dangers and expence of the war. But he loſt all patience, on hearing that Maximilian was alſo ſeduced from his alliance, and that propoſals had been agreed to for the marriage of Charles, prince of Spain, with the daughter of France. At this time, the duke of Longueville, who had been taken priſoner at the battle of Spurs, took advantage of Henry's vexation to procure a peace, which he knew to be eagerly deſired by his maſter; and therefore repreſented to Henry, that Anne, queen of France, being lately dead, an affinity might be formed, which would prove of advantage to both nations, and at once put a period to all differences; and that no marriage ſeemed more ſuitable than that of Lewis to the princeſs of England, whoſe youth and beauty afforded the moſt flattering hopes: that though it might appear ſomewhat unſuitable for a king of fifty-three years of age, to be married to a princeſs of ſixteen, yet the alliance would be attended with other advantages, more than ſufficient to compenſate for this inequality. Henry ſeemed to pay attention to this diſcourſe. Longueville therefore informed Lewis of the probability of bringing the affair to a happy concluſion, and received full powers for negotiating the treaty. Hence the articles were eaſily adjuſted. Lewis agreed that Tournay ſhould continue in the hands of the Engliſh; that Richard de la Pole ſhould retire to Metz, and have a penſion aſſigned him by Lewis; and that Henry ſhould receive a million of crowns, as the arrears due by treaty to his father and himſelf; and that the princeſs Mary ſhould have four hundred thouſand crowns for her portion; and poſſeſs as large a jointure as any other queen of France had done. Agreeable to this treaty Mary was ſent with a ſplendid retinue to France, and was met by Lewis at Abbeville, where the marriage was celebrated. He was charmed with the beauty and accompliſhments of the young princeſs: but being ſeduced into a courſe of gaiety and pleaſure, unſuitable to his declining ſtate of health, he died in leſs than three months after his marriage, to the great concern of the French, who unanimouſly gave him the honourable title of the father of his people. His young queen ſoon after married Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk.

A. D. 1515. The archbiſhop of York was poiſoned at Rome by his chaplain, in revenge for a blow the prelate had given him. Information was immediately ſent to Henry of this cataſtrophe; and the pope determined to keep the ſee of York vacant, till the king's pleaſure ſhould be known. He did not wait long; Henry immediately conferred it upon Wolſey, and the pontiff confirmed his election. Wolſey by his ambition, raiſed himſelf many enemies, which only ſerved to rivet him the faſter in the confidence of Henry, who was fond of ſupporting the choice he had made againſt all oppoſition. That prelate, knowing the king's imperious temper, had the art to conceal from him the aſcendant he had obtained, and while all public councils were under his ſecret direction, he conſtantly pretended a blind ſubmiſſion to his maſter's will. He preſerved the king's affection by entering into his pleaſures; he gratified his indolence by conducting his buſineſs; and in both caſes prevented the jealouſy which would naturally have ariſen from his exorbitant acquiſitions, and oſtentatious courſe of life. Beſides enjoying the adminiſtration of Tournay, he, on eaſy leaſes, obtained the poſſeſſion of the revenues of Bath, Worceſter, and Hereford; biſhopricks filled by Italians, who, being permitted to reſide abroad, were willing to compound for this indulgence by yielding to him a conſiderable ſhare of their incomes. He held the abbey of St. Albans, and many other church preferments in commendam. He was even permitted to unite to the ſee of York, firſt that of Durham, and then that of Wincheſter; and there appeared to be no end of his acquiſitions. The pope, obſerving his great influence over Henry, endeavoured to engage him to his intereſt, by creating him a cardinal. Under colour of exacting a regard to religion, he carried the ſtate and dignity of a churchman to a moſt exorbitant height. He had a train conſiſting of eight hundred ſervants, many of whom were knights and gentlemen: even ſome of the nobility put their children into his family, as a place of education; and that they might gain their patron's favour, allowed them to bear offices as his ſervants. All who were diſtinguiſhed by their ſkill in any art or ſcience, paid their court to him, and none paid it in vain. He was a generous patron of literature, and gave encouragement to every branch of erudition, both by his private bounty and public inſtructions. This generous munificence procured him the approbation of the wiſe; but not ſatisfied with this, he ſtrove to dazzle the eyes of the populace, by the ſplendor of his equipage and furniture, the embroidery of his liveries, and the richneſs of his own apparel. He was the firſt clergyman in England who wore ſilk and gold on his habit, his ſaddles and the trappings of his horſes. His cardinal's hat was bore aloft by a perſon of rank; and when entering the king's chapel, he would permit its being laid on no place but the altar. The talleſt and moſt comely prieſt that could be found carried before him a ſilver pillar, with a croſs on the top; and another prieſt of equal ſtature and beauty, bore the croſs of York, even in the dioceſe of Canterbury. Warham, chancellor and archbiſhop of Canterbury, being averſe to all diſputes, choſe to retire from public employment, and reſigned his office of chancellor; on which the great ſeal was delivered to Wolſey. Fox, biſhop of Wincheſter, who had long directed the affairs of government, and even introduced Wolſey to the king's favour, could not bear to find himſelf neglected. He obtained permiſſion to retire to his biſhoprick, and when leaving the council board, he told the king, that "he hoped he would not ſuffer the ſervant to be greater than the maſter." "Fear not my good lord biſhop," replied Henry, "it ſhall be my care that ſubjects ſhall obey, and not command." The duke of Norfolk, alſo, finding the king's money almoſt exhauſted, reſigned his office of treaſurer; and Suffolk, offended at the king's having refuſed to pay a debt, which he had contracted while in France, lived in privacy. Thus Wolſey was left to enjoy the power and favour of the king without a rival. And though his dignity encreaſed the number of his enemies, it exalted his perſonal character; for no chancellor ever excelled this able ſtateſman, nor ever ſhewed greater impartiality in his deciſions, or more enlarged knowledge of law and equity, or deeper penetration.

Francis I. who aſcended the throne, on the death of Lewis XII. was a prince of great courage, and wanted only the additional quality of diſcretion, to render him ſuperior to all the princes of Europe. He renewed the treaty made by his predeceſſor with Henry, and induced by the ardour of conqueſt, he paſſed into Italy. His deſign was to conquer the duchy of Milan, and wreſt it once more from the unhappy family of Sforza. The Venetians ſupported him, who wanted at leaſt to recover the Veroneſe, of which they had been ſtripped by the emperor Maximilian. His oppoſers were pope Leo X. an intriguing, politic prince, and Maximilian, worn out with age and infirmities: but his moſt dangerous enemies were the Swiſs, irritated againſt France, by the refuſal of Lewis XII. to fulfil the treaty concluded before Dijon, and inflamed with the harangues of Matthew Schaner, cardinal of Sion. They had aſſumed the title of "Defenders of the popes, and protectors of princes;" and indeed for the laſt ten years this appellation was not merely imaginary. Francis, on his march to Milan, continued to negotiate with that nation. Practiſed in the art of diſſimulation, they amuſed the king with empty promiſes, till they had received advice, that the military cheſt of France was arrived, when they deſcended from the mountains into the plain, though deſtitute of cavalry, and oppoſed the progreſs of the French arms. A dreadful battle enſued, at Marignan, near Milan. The victory was conteſted with a perſeverance hitherto unknown: and it required all the heroic valour of Francis to inſpire his troops with courage, to ſupport themſelves againſt the deſperate aſſaults of theſe mountaineers. After a bloody action in the evening, night intervened with her gloomy darkneſs between the combatants. The king ſlept on the carriage of a cannon, within fifty paces of a Swiſs battalion. As ſoon as dawn appeared, the action was renewed with redoubled fury; and it was not till the Swiſs had loſt their braveſt troops, that they could be prevailed upon to retire. The field was ſtrewed with twenty thouſand ſlain on both ſides; and the old marſhal Trivulzio, who had been preſent at eighteen pitched battles, uſed to call this "the battle of the giants." This victory was followed by the reduction of the Milaneſe. Both the pope and the Swiſs became allies to Francis. He compelled Maximilian to reſtore the Veroneſe to the Venetians; and procured for Leo X. the duchy of Urbino, which ſtill belongs to the church of Rome. Sforza himſelf tired with the viciſſitudes of fortune, diſguſted with the tyranny of the Swiſs, and deſirous of privacy and repoſe, put himſelf into the hands of Francis; and after ſtipulating for an annual penſion of thirty thouſand ducats, reſigned his pretenſions to the duchy of Milan, and retired into France. Shortly after the Germans were driven out of Italy; and both Henry and his miniſter were diſappointed in their deſigns of leſſening the power of France.

A. D. 1516. In the following year Henry comcluded a truce with the regent of Scotland for one year, that he might have an opportunity of deſtroying the influence of that nobleman, by means of the Humes, who were devoted to his intereſt. In order to this he inſiſted, that the Scottiſh parliament ſhould ſend the duke of Albany to France, as it was dangerous to truſt the young king in the hand of his preſumptive heir, and threatened on their non-compliance, to take other meaſures for the ſafety of his nephew. This remonſtrance proving ineffectual, the Humes perſuaded the earl of Arran to claim the regency; but the duke of Albany, being informed of the conſpiracy, decoyed them to the court, and cauſed them to be executed as traitors.

The death of Ferdinand, the Catholic, and the ſucceſſion of his grandſon Charles to his extenſive dominions, made Francis ſenſible of the neceſſity of gaining the confidence and friendſhip of Henry; and for that purpoſe, he paid his court by flattery and preſents to Wolſey. He diſpatched Bonnivet, admiral of France, to London, with orders to employ all that inſinuation and addreſs, in which he excelled, to procure the cardinal's good graces. The ambaſſador took an opportunity to expreſs his maſter's concern, that by miſtakes and miſapprehenſions, he had been ſo unfortunate as to loſe a friendſhip which he ſo highly valued as that of his eminence. Wolſey liſtened to theſe honourable advances, and from thenceforward expreſſed himſelf in favour of the French alliance. Francis even entered into ſuch confidence with him, as to aſk his advice in his moſt ſecret affairs, and in every difficult emergency had recourſe to him, as to an oracle of wiſdom. The cardinal made no ſecret to Henry of this private correſpondence; and the king had ſuch an opinion of his miniſter's capacity, that he ſaid, he verily believed, he would govern Francis as well as himſelf. At length Bonnivet informed the cardinal of his maſter's deſire to recover Tournay; on which Wolſey took an opportunity to repreſent to the king and council, that the diſtance between Tournay and Calais was ſo great, that, in caſe of a war, it would be very difficult, if not impoſſible, to keep open the communication between them: that as it was ſeated on the frontiers both of France and the Low Countries, it might be attacked on either ſide, and that it could not be preſerved even in time of peace, without a garriſon, to be a check upon the mutinous inhabitants, who were diſcontented with the Engliſh government; and that its poſſeſſion, though precarious and expenſive, was entirely uſeleſs, with reſpect to annoying the dominions of either Charles or Francis. Theſe reaſons meeting with no oppoſition, a treaty was entered into for ceding Tournay; and it was agreed, that the dauphin ſhould be contracted to the princeſs Mary, though both of them were infants, and that city be conſidered as the princeſs's dowry. But Henry having been at great expence in building a citadel there, Francis agreed to pay him ſix hundred thouſand crowns, at twelve annual payments, and to allow a yearly penſion of twelve thouſand livres to the cardinal, as an equivalent for the revenue of the biſhopric of Tournay.

A. D. 1517. While theſe negotiations were carrying on between the courts of England and France, Germany was agitated with thoſe theological diſputes, which produced the reformation. Martin Luther, an Auguſtine monk, and profeſſor of divinity in the univerſity of Wirtemberg, in Germany, undertook to refute divers doctrines of the church of Rome. Leo X. at firſt diſregarded his writings, as the weak efforts of an obſcure monk. His whole attention was indeed bent to filling his treaſury by the traffic of indulgencies. In this ſale he chiefly employed the Dominicans. The Auguſtine friars were highly affronted, becauſe this lucrative occupation was not as uſual entruſted to them; eſpecially, as they had ſome time ſince been employed in Saxony, and had acquired both reputation and profit. Martin Luther, ſtimulated to revenge, was loud in his declamations againſt the church of Rome. He was a perſon of great learning, genius, and ſpirit, inflexible and opiniative; and there was no want of abuſes whereon to ground his invectives. Religion, often proſtituted, had become a cloak for the moſt ſordid rapacity, and the moſt unpardonable ambition. An inceſſant cry of reformation reſounded from all quarters, and Luther knew how to take advantage of it. He, however, confined himſelf, in his firſt writings, to expoſe the doctrine of indulgencies, and, perhaps, had then no other deſign. But he went farther than he at firſt intended, as is the caſe with all religious diſputants; and it has been ſaid, with ſeeming probability, that the beſt method of inducing this zealous reformer to change his opinion, would have been, by a preſent of a cardinal's hat; but the contempt in which he was held by the church of Rome, proved fatal to her power.

Luther now ſounded openly a defiance to the holy ſee. He exhorted all princes to throw off the papal authority: he railed againſt private maſſes; and met with the greater applauſe, by inveighing againſt the ſale of them. His writings, full of zeal and fury, ſpread over Europe. The doctrines he inculcated were flattering to its princes, becauſe they furniſhed them with a pretence for throwing off the pope's dominion, and for enriching themſelves with the wealth of eccleſiaſtics. The Dominicans, ſupported by the pope's nuncios, cauſed his books to be burnt. His holineſs thundered out a new bull againſt him; but Luther, now protected by the princes of Germany, was not to be intimidated; he even ordered the pope's bull and decretals to be burnt in the public market place of Wirtemberg.

A. D. 1518. During theſe diſputes, the pope inveſted Wolſey with a legantine power, together with a right of ſuſpending all the laws of the church for one year. On obtaining this new dignity, he diſplayed his grandeur with great parade. On ſolemn feaſt-days, he ſaid maſs after the manner of the pope; was ſerved by biſhops and abbots; and even engaged the firſt nobility to give him water and the towel. Wolſey now erected an office, which he termed a legantine court; and as he was thus, by means of the pope's commiſſion, and the favour of the king, inveſted with all eccleſiaſtical and civil power, none knew what bounds he would ſet to the authority of his new tribunal. He directed the members of this court to enquire into all matters of conſcience; and into all thoſe actions which, though not cognizable by law, were contrary to good morals.

People were offended on ſeeing a man ſo fond of pomp and pleaſure, ſevere in repreſſing the leaſt appearance of licentiouſneſs in others; and this court was rendered the more obnoxious, from Wolſey's making one John Allen judge in it, whom he himſelf, as chancellor, had condemned for perjury; and as he extorted fines from all whom he was pleaſed to find guilty, or received bribes to drop proſecutions, it was concluded, that the cardinal had a ſhare in thoſe wages of iniquity. To the tyranny of this court, the clergy and monks were particularly expoſed; and as their lives frequently gave a juſt handle againſt them, they were obliged to pay large ſums to purchaſe an indemnity. Wolſey, not ſatisfied with this authority, pretended to aſſume, by virtue of his commiſſion, the juriſdiction of all the biſhops courts, particularly that of judging all matters reſpecting wills and teſtaments. None dared to complain, till archbiſhop Warham ventured to lay before the king the diſcontents of the people. Henry pretended ignorance, ſaying, "A man is no where ſo blind as in his own houſe. But do you, father, go to Wolſey, and tell him, if any thing be amiſs, that he amend it." This only ſerved to ſtrengthen the cardinal's enmity to Warham; but Allen, his judge, being proſecuted by one London in a court of law, and being convicted, the clamour at laſt reached the king's ears, and he expreſſed ſuch diſpleaſure, that Wolſey ever after was more cautious in exerting his authority. It muſt be confeſſed, in favour of this noble perſonage, that, conſidering the whole of his adminiſtration impartially, he made uſe of his power for the good of his country. His poſt of chancellor placed him at the fountain of juſtice, and never was it better adminiſtered. He was a firm ſupporter of the poor; and enforced ſeveral laws for the protection of the mercantile and induſtrious part of the people. We have already obſerved, that he was a great friend to literature. At this time the arts, under his patronage, found encouragement; trade was improved; and manufactures were carried on with ſucceſs. Wolſey ſpared no pains to diſcover perſons of literary accompliſhments, nor thought any rewards too great to beſtow upon them. He employed no miniſters but ſuch who were ſcholars; and under his adminiſtration, the dignified offices of the law, the church, and the ſtate, were filled with men whoſe literary merit was their only recommendation.

A. D. 1519. The attention of Henry was now excited by the death of Maximilian the emperor, which left vacant the firſt ſtation among the Chriſtian powers, and, of courſe, affected the general ſyſtem of Europe. Inſtantly the kings of France and Spain became candidates for that crown; and, by money and intrigues, endeavoured to obtain the great point of their ambition. Henry likewiſe put in his claim; but Pace, his miniſter, who was ſent to the electors, found that he was too late, all thoſe princes having engaged their votes. Francis and Charles profeſſed to carry on their rival pretenſions without enmity. Francis declared, that his brother Charles and he were fair and open ſuitors to the ſame miſtreſs; and that, as the moſt fortunate would obtain her, the other muſt reſt ſatisfied. But every one apprehended this extraordinary moderation would be of ſhort duration, and that the minds of two ſuch candidates would ſoon be imbittered againſt each other. Charles at laſt prevailed; though the king of France had continued to the laſt to believe, that the majority of the electoral college was engaged in his favour. He was now filled with indignation, at being publicly diſappointed in an affair of ſuch importance. From hence, joined to the oppoſition of intereſt, aroſe that emulation between them which kept that age in motion, and formed a remarkable contraſt between theſe two princes. Both of them were endowed with extraordinary abilities: they were brave, aſpiring, and active; beloved by their ſubjects, feared by their enemies, and reſpected by all Europe. Francis, who was open, frank, and liberal, carried theſe virtues to an exceſs which was prejudicial to his affairs. Charles, who was politic, artful, and frugal, was better qualified to obtain ſucceſs in negotiations and wars: the one was by far the moſt amiable man, and the other the greateſt prince. Fortune, without the aſſiſtance of prudence or valour, never raiſed on a ſudden ſuch power as centered in the emperor Charles V. He had ſucceeded to the poſſeſſion of Caſtile, Arragon, Granada, Auſtria, the Netherlands, and Naples; was elected emperor; and a little before his time, the bounds of the earth ſeemed to be enlarged, that he might poſſeſs the unrifled treaſure of the new world. His dominions in Europe were richer, and more extenſive, than any that had been known ſince the time of the Romans: France only, by being a compact, rich, and populous country, placed between the provinces of the emperor's dominions, was able to oppoſe his progreſs. However, Henry, by the ſituation and ſtrength of his kingdom, was able to hold the balance between thoſe powers; and had he known how to improve, by his prudence and policy, this extraordinary advantage, it would have made him a greater prince than either of thoſe monarchs, who ſeemed to ſtrive for the dominion of Europe. But Henry was vain, capricious, imperious, and impolitic, guided by his paſſions, and under the direction of a favourite. Indeed he was ſometimes actuated by friendſhip for foreign powers, but oftener by his reſentment; ſeldom by his true intereſt.

A. D. 1520. This character of Henry, Francis was well acquainted with, and therefore ſolicited an interview with him near Calais, in hopes of obtaining his friendſhip and confidence by familiar coverſation. The king of France had promiſed Wolſey fourteen votes in the conclave on the demiſe of Leo; but the cardinal thought the aid of the emperor would more effectually conduce to raiſe him to this ſummit of power; and therefore began to detach his maſter from the intereſt of France, and engage him in that of the houſe of Auſtria. However, he would not ſo far declare himſelf as to prevent his aſſiſting at the propoſed interview, which would afford him an opportunity of diſplaying his magnificence before the court of France; but was at the ſame time determined, that Francis ſhould gain no advantage by it to the prejudice of the emperor. He therefore ſeconded the requeſt of the French monarch; and Henry, who was equally fond of empty pageantry, conſented to the propoſal. Charles, being informed of this intended interview, reſolved to pay the king of England a higher compliment, by viſiting him in his own dominions; and while Henry was preparing to depart for Calais, the emperor, on the twenty-fifth of May, landed at Dover, whither the court immediately haſted to receive their royal gueſt. The next day he was met by Henry in perſon, who conducted him to Canterbury, where he was entertained with the utmoſt ſplendour. Charles paid his court to Wolſey in the moſt artful manner, promiſing his aſſiſtance in procuring for him the papacy, whenever there ſhould happen a vacancy. There was, however, little appearance, that this promiſe would be claimed. Leo X. was a young man, and likely to fill the papal chair when the name of Wolſey would only exiſt: yet the promiſe from Charles ſoothed the ambition of the powerful prelate, who, in conſequence, devoted himſelf ſolely to the intereſt of the emperor. Charles, after ſtaying five days, took leave, and embarked at Sandwich for Flanders, well ſatisfied with the ſucceſs of his viſit.

The ſame day that Charles left England, Henry ſet ſail for Calais, with his queen and the whole court; and thence proceeding to Guiſnes, a ſmall town near the frontiers, took up his reſidence in a ſuperb wooden edifice, erected near the place appointed for the interview. It was furniſhed in a moſt oſtentatious manner; and from the chapel was a private gallery that reached to the caſtle of Guiſnes. Francis, attended with a ſplendid retinue, repaired to Guiſnes, a few miles diſtant from Calais. On the ſeventh of June, the two monarchs met on horſeback in the valley of Ardres, within the Engliſh pale; for Francis agreed to pay this compliment to Henry, in conſideration of his having croſſed the ſea to viſit him. Wolſey, to whom the regulation of the ceremonial had been entruſted by both kings, contrived this circumſtance in honour of his maſter. The nobility, both of England and France, here diſplayed their magnificence with ſuch profuſion, that the place of interview was ſtiled, The Field of Cloth of Gold. The two monarchs having alighted, ſaluted each other in the moſt cordial manner, and retired arm in arm to a rich tent pitched for their reception, where they held a private conference. Here Henry propoſed an amendment of ſome of the articles of their former alliance, and began with reading the preamble to the treaty, "I, Henry king;" and pauſing a moment, added only, "of England," without mentioning "France;" on which Francis, obſerving this delicacy, expreſſed his approbation by a ſmile, and ſoon after paid Henry a compliment of a more flattering nature. He obſerved the diſtruſtful precautions uſed whenever he had an interview with Henry; the number of their attendants and guards were counted on both ſides; every ſtep was ſcrupulouſly meaſured; and when the two kings propoſed to pay a viſit to the queens, they left their reſpective quarters at the ſame inſtant on the diſcharge of a culverin, and paſſed by each other in the middle point of diſtance between the places they were each of them going to.

Francis, who was himſelf a man of honour, incapable of diſtruſting others, in order to put an end to this tedious ceremony, one day took with him only two gentlemen and a page, with whom he rode into Guiſnes. The guards were ſurprized at the preſence of the French king, who called aloud to them, "You are all my priſoners; conduct me to your maſter." Henry was equally aſtoniſhed; and taking him in his arms, ſaid, "Brother, you have paid me a moſt agreeable compliment, and hereby ſhewed what full confidence I may place in you: from this moment I ſurrender myſelf your priſoner." Then taking from his neck a collar of pearls, worth fifteen thouſand angels, and putting it about that of Francis, deſired him to wear it for his ſake. Francis agreed, on condition of Henry's wearing a bracelet which he preſented to him, worth double the value of the collar. From that moment they viſited each other without the leaſt precaution; a generous diſdain of ſuſpicion produced a perfect confidence; and the reſt of their time was ſpent in feſtivals and tournaments. The two kings entertained each other with theſe kinds of amuſements, without paying much attention to ſerious buſineſs. Nothing of importance paſſed during the interview, but an agreement, that after Francis ſhould have diſcharged the million of crowns ſtipulated in the laſt treaty, he ſhould continue to pay to the king of England an annual ſum of one hundred thouſand livres; that in caſe the dauphin ſhould become king of England by his marriage with the princeſs Mary, this penſion ſhould be enjoyed by her and her heirs for ever; and that the diſputes between England and Scotland ſhould be referred to the arbitration of the French king's mother, and cardinal Wolſey. On the twenty-fourth of June the two monarchs parted, and Henry, with his retinue, returned to Calais. The emperor, uneaſy with regard to the event of this interview, came to Gravelines, where he was met by Henry, and the moſt cordial aſſurances of mutual eſteem paſſed between them. At the ſame time the emperor renewed his promiſes of aſſiſting Wolſey in obtaining the triple crown, and put him immediately in poſſeſſion of the revenues belonging to Bajadox and Palencia in Caſtile; an acquiſition which rendered the revenues of Wolſey nearly equal to thoſe of the crown itſelf. Charles here completed the favourable impreſſion he had begun to make on Henry and Wolſey, and effaced all the friendſhip which the frank and generous temper of Francis had kindled in their minds. Henry, on the eleventh of July returned to Calais, and embarking for England with the firſt fair wind, arrived there, with his retinue, in ſafety.

A.D. 1521.

Charles V. ſoon after his coronation, aſſembled a diet at Worms, where he ſummoned Luther to appear, granting him a ſafe conduct for his perſon. He accordingly appeared; but refuſing to retract his tenets, was, with his diſciples, proſcribed by public edict. Every zealous votary of the church now entered the liſts againſt this reformer; among the reſt, Henry declared himſelf a champion for his holineſs. He was particularly incenſed againſt Luther, for the ſeverity with which he had treated Thomas Aquinas, an author highly eſteemed by him and Wolſey; and therefore wrote a treatiſe, de ſeptem Sacramentis, in which he vehemently oppoſed Luther with reſpect to the article of indulgencies, the number of ſacraments, and the papal authority. This work was preſented to his holineſs in full conſiſtory, who received it with marks of the higheſt reſpect; and with the unanimous conſent of the college of cardinals iſſued a bull, in which he conferred upon Henry the honourable title of "Fidei Defenſor," Defender of the Faith; a title ſtill retained by the kings of England.

The emulation and political jealouſy that ſubſiſted between Charles and Francis, ſoon produced hoſtilities between them. The French ſent an army into Navarre, to replace the family of d'Albert on the throne of that kingdom. Had the French general confined himſelf to the reduction of Navarre, his conduct could not have been conſidered as a breach of the peace between Charles and Francis; but he had no ſooner ſubdued that country, than, finding the kingdom of Spain itſelf was in the utmoſt diſorder from an inſurrection of the people, he thought the opportunity too favourable to be rejected, and immediately laid ſiege to Logrogno in Caſtile. The Caſtilians were now convinced of their folly; the appearance of a foreign enemy put an end to their domeſtic diſſentions; they attacked the French with ſo much fury, that they drove them from their intrenchments, and even expelled them out of Navarre. Robert de la Marck, duke of Bouillon, had the aſſurance to attack the emperor's dominions in the Low Countries; and Charles, not doubting but that Robert was inſtigated by Francis, raiſed a powerful army, and openly commenced hoſtilities againſt the French monarch. But while theſe ambitious princes were at war with each other in different parts of their dominions, they ſtill profeſſed the ſtrongeſt deſire of peace, and continually carried their complaints to Henry, as to their common umpire. Henry, pretending to be neutral, adviſed them to ſend their ambaſſadors to Calais, in order to negotiate a peace under the mediation of the pope's nuncio.

The emperor, knowing the partiality of theſe mediators in his favour, demanded the reſtitution of Burgundy, though it had been ceded to France many years by treaty; and though its being in his poſſeſſion would give him an entrance into the heart of that kingdom: he alſo inſiſted on being freed from the homage conſtantly paid by his anceſtors for Flanders and Artois, though he himſelf had engaged to renew it by the treaty of Noyon. Theſe terms being rejected by Francis, the congreſs broke up, and ſoon after Wolſey went to the emperor at Bruges, where he was received with the ſame ſtate and magnificence as if he had been a crowned head; and there, in his maſter's name, concluded an offenſive alliance againſt France with the emperor and the pope. It was ſtipulated, that England ſhould invade that kingdom with forty thouſand men.

Wolſey was no ſooner returned to England, than he commenced a proſecution againſt the duke of Buckingham, conſtable of England, the firſt nobleman both for family and fortune in the kingdom, who had unfortunately given the cardinal ſome cauſe of diſguſt. He was deſcended by a female line from the duke of Glouceſter, ſon of Edward III. and being infatuated with the whims of judicial aſtrology, and the vain predictions of a viſionary monk, he flattered himſelf with the hopes of one day ſucceeding to the crown; and even meditated ſome project againſt the life of the king. For this he was brought to his trial; and the duke of Norfolk, whoſe ſon, the earl of Surry, had married Buckingham's daughter, was created lord ſteward on this ſolemn occaſion. He was tried by one duke, a marquis, ſeven earls, and twelve barons, by whom he was condemned; but as his crime appeared to have proceeded from indiſcretion, rather than deliberate malice, the people, by whom he was beloved, expected he would be pardoned; and imputed that diſappointment to the influence of the cardinal. However, the king's jealouſy of all who were allied to the crown, was alone ſufficient to render him implacable againſt this nobleman. The office of conſtable was now forfeited, and never after revived in England. After his trial he was remanded back to the Tower, where he received a meſſage from the king, intimating that his puniſhment was mitigated to decapitation. Accordingly he ſuffered death, to the univerſal regret of the people. A little after this melancholy event, Leo X. died in the flower of his age, and in the ninth year of his pontificate. He was ſucceeded in the papal throne by Adrian VI. who had been tutor to the emperor Charles. This pontiff was a perſon of great integrity, candour, and ſimplicity of manners; but the prejudices of the reformers againſt the church were ſo violent, that he rather hurt the cauſe by his ſteady attachment to thoſe virtues.

A. D. 1522.

The emperor dreaded the reſentment of Wolſey, which he expected would reſult from his diſappointment by the election of Adrian; and therefore, to prevent the breach this might make in their friendſhip, Charles paid another viſit to England on the twenty-ſixth of May, when he not only flattered the vanity of the king and the cardinal, but renewed his promiſes of ſeconding Wolſey's pretenſions to the papal chair. Whereupon the cardinal, being ſenſible that the great age and infirmities of Adrian promiſed a ſpeedy vacancy, concealed his mortification, and flattered himſelf with the hopes of being ſucceſsful at the next general election. Charles alſo renewed the treaty concluded at Bruges, and agreed to indemnify both the king and Wolſey, for the revenue they ſhould loſe by a breach with France. Still farther to ingratiate himſelf with Henry and the Engliſh in general, he gave to Surry, admiral of England, a commiſſion, conſtituting him high admiral of his dominions, and he himſelf was inſtalled knight of the garter. After ſtaying ſix weeks in England he embarked at Southampton, and in ten days returned to Spain.

Henry now avowed the league he had made with the emperor, and alledged that Francis was the aggreſſor; but the truth ſeems to have been, that he was incenſed againſt the French monarch for ſuffering the duke of Albany to return from France to Scotland, where he had been detained at his requeſt, in order to procure an aſcendency in the Engliſh council during the abſence of the regent. Beſides, he was afraid the duke would marry his ſiſter, the queen dowager of Scotland, as ſhe had applied to the pope for a divorce from her huſband, the earl of Angus; and the duke of Albany had ſupported her ſuit at the court of Rome. Notwithſtanding the regent's declaring that he had no ſuch intention, his own wife being ſtill living, Henry wrote to the Scottiſh parliament, accuſing the duke of having formed a deſign upon the crown, to the prejudice of the lawful heir, and requiring them to baniſh him the realm. To this they replied, that he had been miſinformed concerning Albany's deſign; that he himſelf encountered the intereſt of his nephew, by fomenting broils in his kingdom; and that if he did not renew the truce, the regent would endeavour to defend their country from his attacks. Henry had no ſooner received this anſwer, with a letter from his ſiſter, upbraiding him with baſe and diſingenuous conduct, than he ſent lord Dacres, with five hundred men to the borders, with a commiſſion to proclaim, that the Scottiſh parliament were to make peace with him at their peril by a certain time. His deſign in this was to afford a pretence to his own party for refuſing to ſerve the regent, ſhould he attempt to make a diverſion in favour of Francis. The duke of Albany having raiſed an army to make a deſcent upon England, many noblemen of diſtinction refuſed to involve their country in an unneceſſary war with that kingdom; the regent, therefore, finding his deſign of ſerving his French ally defeated, propoſed a truce, to which Henry aſſented; and the regent returned to Paris, to concert new meaſures with Francis: This monarch being apprized of what had paſſed between Henry and the emperor, ſent letters patent to Henry, in which he inſerted the articles of the treaty of London, whereby they were bound to mutual aſſiſtance; and then demanded the execution of that treaty, to which he had ſolemnly ſworn. Henry again affirmed, that Francis was the aggreſſor; and as he had violated his promiſe with reſpect to the duke of Albany, declared war againſt him as a diſturber of the peace of Europe. For the ſupport of this war, the king, with the advice of the cardinal, iſſued warrants to all ſheriffs and conſtables, to number the people from the age of ſixteen and upwards, and to ſpecify the effects of each individual, that he might borrow a tenth from the laity, and a fourth from the clergy, beſides a loan of twenty thouſand pounds, which he expected from the city of London. This expedient produced great clamours againſt the cardinal, as author of the impoſition; and the merchants of London flatly refuſed to aſcertain the value of their effects, which being diſtributed in various channels of commerce, could not be ſpecified; ſo that Henry was obliged to have recourſe to more lenient methods.

A. D. 1523.

The bloody ſtandard of war was now diſplayed; ambaſſadors on both ſides were recalled: the effects of merchants in both countries were ſeized; and Henry fitted out a ſtrong fleet for making prizes, and protecting the Engliſh commerce. But as the plan of operations for the approaching war was likely to be extenſive, there was a neceſſity for calling a parliament, and demanding a ſubſidy for the enſuing year. The ſeſſions was opened with a ſpeech from the cardinal; who after enhancing the great advantages that would accrue to the nation from the alliances lately concluded with the powers on the continent, required one fifth of all lay effects, payable in four years. This demand produced very ſtrong debates; though the members were at length wrought into compliance.

In the middle of Auguſt, the Engliſh army, under command of the duke of Suffolk, paſſed over to Calais. On his arrival at St. Omers, he was joined by three thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe, in the Imperial ſervice. It was now determined to march along the banks of the Somme, and, if poſſible, to provoke the enemy to a deciſive engagement: but the French had learned wiſdom from paſt miſfortunes; they contented themſelves with harraſſing the van of the Engliſh army with flying parties; and depended on the ſtrength of their frontier garriſons, and the advanced ſeaſon of the year, to prevent the Engliſh from taking up their winter quarters in their country. This prudent meaſure anſwered their expectations; for though the duke of Suffolk made himſelf maſter of Bray, Montdidier, Roye, and ſeveral other conſiderable places, and even advanced within eleven leagues of Paris, he found it would be impoſſible for him to canton his troops in the places he had taken, as the duke of Vendome lay in Paris with a large body of forces, and the marſhal Tremouille was forming another, by draughts from the garriſons of Picardy. He was therefore obliged to return to Calais, in order to put his army into winter quarters; but before he reached that fortreſs, many of his ſoldiers periſhed by the inclemency of the weather. In conſequence of this retreat, moſt of the places he had taken during the campaign, fell again into the hands of the French. Nor had Charles any better ſucceſs in the attempt he made, at the ſame time, upon Gaſcony. His forces inveſted Bayonne; but the French general, Leutrec, made ſuch a noble defence, that the Spaniards, after ravaging the adjacent country, were obliged to abandon the enterprize. By theſe untoward events, the French were animated to exert themſelves againſt the powerful alliance formed againſt their country; and, in all probability, Francis would have been able to have ſupported himſelf, notwithſtanding all the efforts of his enemies, had not the conſtable of Bourbon, the moſt able of all his generals, perſecuted by the hatred of the ducheſs of Angouleme, the king's mother, ſacrificed the love of his country to his reſentment, and entered into the ſervice of the emperor. He was immediately created generaliſſimo of his armies, and marched into the duchy of Milan, which the French had again invaded under admiral Bonnivet, his greateſt enemy. Bonnivet was but an indifferent ſoldier, and a worſe ſtateſman. He croſſed the Alps at the head of thirty-three thouſand men, and made himſelf maſter of Navaro, and ſome other places of leſs importance in Italy; and had he marched directly to Milan, he might, perhaps, have recovered that city for his maſter; but he loſt ſo much time in treating with the inhabitants, that the conſtable of Bourbon had an opportunity of putting the place in a poſture of defence. The remainder of the campaign was conſumed in ſeveral fruitleſs attempts upon Cremona, and other places, none of which he was able to reduce. The Italian generals ſaw his inabilities, and took care to cut off his proviſions; ſo that Bonnivet was obliged to retire into Piedmont, where he put his army into winter quarters. During theſe tranſactions pope Adrian VI. died; and by the concurrence of the Imperial party, Clement VII. of the family of the Medicis, was elected in his room.

It was impoſſible for Wolſey to avoid being convinced of the emperor's inſincerity; and he had now full conviction that Charles would never ſecond his pretenſions to the papal dignity. This new diſappointment to his aſpiring hopes, he highly reſented, and inſtantly began to prepare for an union between Henry and the French king. In the mean time, concealing his diſguſt, he congratulated the new pope on his promotion, and applied to him for the continuance of the legantine powers, conferred upon him by the two former popes. Clement, ſenſible of the importance of his friendſhip, granted him theſe powers for life, and thus, in a manner, inveſted him with the whole papal authority in England; of which in ſeveral inſtances, the cardinal made a good uſe.

Europe was by this time ſo intimately connected by intereſts and alliances, that war could hardly be kindled in one part, without diffuſing itſelf through the whole: but the cloſeſt of all the leagues was that between France and Scotland. In order therefore to diſſolve this connection, ſo prejudicial to the intereſts of England, Henry ſent an army into Scotland under the command of the earl of Surry, who had reduced the twn of Jedburgh to aſhes. The Scotch had neither king nor regent to conduct them, and the Engliſh monarch, who knew their diſtreſſed ſituation, was determined to puſh them to extremity, in hopes of compelling them to renounce their French alliance, and embrace the friendſhip of England. He even endeavoured to allure them with the proſpect of contracting a marriage between the lady Mary, heireſs of England, and their young monarch; and the queen dowager, with the whole party enforced the advantages of this alliance. But the propoſal was warmly objected to by the oppoſite party, who alledged, that ſuch a meaſure would deſtroy the liberty of that kingdom, and render it dependent on England. The number and influence of theſe two parties were ſo nearly poiſed, that the leaſt addition on either ſide, would have been ſufficient to preponderate. This was at length effected in favour of Scotland, by the arrival of the duke of Albany, who, by the advice of the eſtates, had aſſembled an army, to retaliate on the Engliſh the ravages they had lately committed. With this view he advanced towards the borders; but when his army was paſſing the Tweed, at the bridge of Mulcroſs, they were ſo warmly oppoſed by the Engliſh, that Albany was obliged to retreat. He then encamped his army oppoſite to Werk caſtle, the fortifications of which had been lately repaired, and detached a body of troops to beſiege that fortreſs, which made a gallant defence. Though the Scotch and French auxiliaries carried the outworks, the garriſon charged them ſo cloſely that they were repulſed with conſiderable loſs. In a few days after this miſcarriage, the duke of Albany departed for France, and never more returned to Scotland; which, diſtracted by inteſtine commotions, left Henry at full liberty to proſecute his other deſigns, in conjunction with his continental alliance.

A. D. 1524.

The different ſtates of Italy having expelled the French, reſolved to puſh their ſucceſſes no farther. They had all entertained a jealouſy of the emperor; which was increaſed by his refuſing the inveſtiture of Milan, a fief of the empire, to Francis Sforza, whoſe title he had acknowledged, and in whoſe defence he had engaged; whence it was concluded, that he himſelf intended to obtain that important duchy, and afterwards to reduce Italy to ſubjection. This induced Clement to ſend orders to his nuncio in England, to mediate a reconciliation between her and France. But Wolſey, though diſguſted with the emperor, reſolved to have the glory of producing this great change, and therefore prevailed on the king to reject the pope's mediation; and even a new treaty for the invaſion of France was concluded between Charles and the king of England. Charles agreed to ſupply the duke of Bourbon with a powerful army, to enable him to conquer Dauphiny and Provence; and Henry conſented to pay him a hundred thouſand crowns for the firſt month, and either to continue the ſame monthly, or to enter Picardy with a powerful army. Bourbon was to enjoy the provinces, with the title of king; but to hold them in fee of Henry as king of France. Henry was to have the reſt of that kingdom, and Charles the duchy of Burgundy.

Bonnivet, the French general in Italy, having given offence to the Swiſs by his haughty carriage, theſe hardy mountaineers abandoned the French army, and returned to their own country. Deſerted by theſe forces, Bonnivet ſaw the neceſſity of a retreat. He left his camp, and was followed by the combined army. A ſharp action enſued, in which the greater part of Bonnivet's rear was cut to pieces. The chevalier Bayard was mortally wounded: he was conſidered as the model of ſoldiers and men of honour; and obtained the title of the "Knight without fear, and without reproach." When this brave gentleman could no longer ſupport himſelf on horſeback, he ordered his attendants to ſet him under a tree, and turn his face towards his enemies, that he might die in that poſture. Every perſon ſeemed to ſhare in his misfortune. The ſoldiers as they paſſed dropped a tear. The allied generals, and among the reſt the conſtable of Bourbon, came round him, expreſſing their concern for his preſent condition. "Pity not me," cried he to Bourbon, "I die in the diſcharge of my duty; they alone are objects of pity, who fight againſt their prince and their country."

The pope now began to be alarmed for Italy. The conſtable of Bourbon had paſſed the Alps, and entered Provence at the head of ten thouſand foot, two thouſand horſe, and eighteen pieces of cannon. The defenceleſs towns of Antibes, Frejus, Vignolles, and Aix, fell an eaſy conqueſt; and the conſtable ſat down on the nineteenth of Auguſt before Marſeilles, which was defended by a garriſon of three thouſand foot, and two hundred men at arms, beſides nine thouſand inhabitants who fought on this occaſion. About the ſame time the Spaniſh admiral, who had been ſent with a ſtrong fleet from Genoa to aſſiſt the land forces, made himſelf maſter of Toulon. The ſiege was carried on with the utmoſt vigour for about a month; when the approach of Francis, at the head of forty thouſand men, obliged the conſtable to abandon the enterprize, and retreat with ſome precipitation, into Italy. Had Charles been ſatisfied with defending his own dominions, in all probability he might have rendered all the deſigns of his enemies abortive; eſpecially as the Engliſh were by no means ſanguine for carrying on the war with vigour. But he was deſirous of recovering the Milaneſe, and accordingly croſſed the Alps at mount Cenis; and the conſtable being in no condition to oppoſe him, he marched immediately to the capital of that duchy, and entered the city without oppoſition. Advice was now received, that Francis had undertaken the ſiege of Pavia, one of the ſtrongeſt fortreſſes in Italy, and well provided for making a ſtout defence. Francis puſhed the ſiege with the utmoſt fury, and made ſeveral breaches in the walls; but the vigilance of Leyva, the governor, rendered all his attempts fruitleſs, for he threw up new intrenchments behind the breaches; he made an attempt to turn the courſe of the Teſin, which defended one ſide of the city; but in one night, an inundation of the river deſtroyed all the mounds, which his ſoldiers had for a long time been raiſing.

A. D. 1525.

In the mean while Peſcara and Lannoy, viceroy of Naples, aſſembled forces from every quarter; and Bourbon, having pawned his jewels, went into Germany, raiſed twelve thouſand Landſquenets, and joining the Imperialiſts, the combined army, amounting to twenty thouſand men, advanced to raiſe the ſiege of Pavia; while the emperor was ſo deſtitute of money for the payment of his army, that they were kept to their ſtandards by the hopes of plunder; and had Francis raiſed the ſiege before their approach, and retired to Milan, they muſt have in a ſhort time diſbanded; but having once ſaid, that he would either take Pavia, or periſh in the attempt, he was determined to ſuffer the utmoſt extremities, rather than change his purpoſe. The French camp being ſurrounded with intrenchments, the Imperial generals contented themſelves for ſome days with cannonading the enemy; when the Swiſs having deſerted their poſt, they attacked the intrenchments of the beſiegers about midnight, on the twenty-fiſth of April. Upon the firſt alarm, Francis put himſelf at the head of two thouſand cavalry, and fell with ſuch impetuoſity upon a body of troops commanded by Peſcara, that the general was unhorſed, and dangerouſly wounded; and the whole corps would have been totally ruined, had not the duke of Bourbon, who had already made dreadful havoc in another part of the camp, haſtened to his aſſiſtance. The conteſt was now unequal; but the French, to defend the perſon of their king, gathered round him, and fought with all the fury of men driven to deſpair. La Pleſſe, la Tremouille, Galcas de San Severino, and admiral Bonnivet, were ſlain by his ſide. The king defended himſelf with aſtoniſhing vigour; his horſe was killed under him, and he received a deſperate wound in his leg; but he ſtarted up, and ſtill fought on foot with amazing valour. Pomerant, an officer of ſome diſtinction, who had followed the duke of Bourbon in his revolt, came up at that inſtant; and ſeeing the king in ſuch a dangerous ſituation, aſſiſted him in keeping off the ſoldiers, who preſſed forward to take him alive. At the ſame time he deſired that the duke of Bourbon might be called, to receive the king as a priſoner. But Francis, tranſported with rage, declared, that he would ſooner periſh, than deliver his ſword to a traitor. "Send for Lannoy, viceroy of Naples," continued he, "to him I will ſurrender." That officer accordingly came; and the king ſaid to him, "M. de Lannoy, take this ſword; it is that of a king, who is not a priſoner from cowardice, but the accidents of fortune." Lannoy received the ſword upon his knee; kiſſed his hand with the profoundeſt reſpect; and preſented him his own ſword, ſaying, "I beg your majeſty will be ſo good as to receive mine, which has this day ſpared the lives of many Frenchmen. It does not become an officer of the emperor to leave a king diſarmed, though a priſoner." Lannoy, however, did not think Francis ſafe in the army. He feared the German forces might ſeize his perſon as a ſecurity for their pay; and therefore conducted him immediately to the ſtrong caſtle of Pizzeghitone, where he remained for ſome time under the care of Alvazon, the Spaniſh governor, who ſerved him with the greateſt reſpect.

Charles, on receiving this news, behaved with the appearance of great moderation. He diſplayed a concern for Francis's ill fortune, and a ſenſe of the calamities to which the greateſt monarchs are liable. He forbad any public rejoicings at Madrid, and ſaid, that every expreſſion of triumph ſhould be deferred, till he obtained a victory over the infidels; he diſpatched orders to the garriſons on the frontiers, to commit no hoſtilities againſt the French, and talked of inſtantly concluding a peace upon honourable terms. But this appearance of moderation was only hypocritical, and he inſtantly formed ſchemes of gratifying his ambition, by improving this fortunate event to the utmoſt advantage. Pennaloſa, the meſſenger of this extraordinary news, in paſſing through France, delivered a letter from Francis to his mother, who reſided at Lyons, which contained only theſe few words: "Madam, All is loſt, except our honour." The princeſs, whom he had left regent, was ſtruck with the greatneſs of the calamity. Every thing ſeemed to foretell inevitable ruin. The kingdom was without an army; without generals; without money; on every ſide encompaſſed by implacable and victorious enemies. But the over-ruling power of Providence, who can bring good out of evil, cauſed this misfortune to produce a ſudden change of politics in England, which was to be the means of ſalvation to France. The king determined to lend her his aſſiſtance, and thus to obtain the glory of raiſing a fallen enemy. Henry had been for ſome time jealous of the emperor's power, and diſſatisfied with his conduct; his pride now completed the diſguſt of the Engliſh monarch. Charles had hitherto always written to him with his own hand, and ſubſcribed himſelf, "Your affectionate ſon and couſin;" but now he dictated his letters to his ſecretary, and only ſubſcribed himſelf, "Charles." An incident of this kind could not fail of wounding the pride of Henry; and the reſentment of Wolſey, twice deceived by him, now exerted its whole force. Thus prompted by his own inclination, and the advice of the cardinal, the Engliſh monarch imparted his ſentiments to the ducheſs-regent of France, who ſending her ambaſſadors to the court of London, a treaty of peace and alliance was actually ſigned by the two parties on the thirtieth of Auguſt. The chief articles of this treaty were, that all tranſactions of the late war ſhould lay dormant for ever; that the two powers ſhould ſuccour each other, in caſe of an aſſault from a third; that the commercial intercourſe ſhould be revived, and neither nation harbour the rebellious ſubjects of each other; that the priſoners on both ſides ſhould be releaſed, and their ſeveral allies comprehended in the treaty; but that neither ſhould maintain or protect thoſe allies in any uſurpations, made ſince the treaty of London in the year 1518; that Francis ſhould, in three months after his releaſe, ratify the treaty; for the fulfilment of which the conſtable of Bourbon, the dukes of Vendome and Longueville, the count of St Poll, with ſeveral other noblemen, and nine of the chief cities of France, ſhould engage. In a previous convention it was alſo agreed, that the court of France ſhould pay Henry two millions of crowns, as a compenſation for all the arrears and demands which the Engliſh monarch had on the French king; and that the queen-dowager of France, wife to the earl of Suffolk, ſhould be paid all the arrears of her jointure.

Henry expected the natural conſequence of this alliance would be an expenſive war; he therefore committed the recruiting of his almoſt exhauſted treaſury to Wolſey, at whoſe inſtigation commiſſions were iſſued in the king's name, for levying throughout the realm one-ſixth of all lay revenues, and a fourth of the effects of the clergy. This was conſidered as ſuch an incroachment on the liberty of the ſubject, and violation of Magna Charta, that it produced a general clamour throughout the kingdom, and had almoſt occaſioned a rebellion. The complaints of the people were ſo loud, that the king was obliged to diſavow his miniſter's proceedings; and declared by writs, circulated through all the counties of England, that he would exact nothing, and that he required only what they ſhould contribute by way of benevolence. The people were far from being ſatisfied with this mode of raiſing ſupplies. Some diſapproved it on account of their inability, and others becauſe of its illegality. The magiſtrates of London refuſed to ſubmit to the impoſition, alledging, that the practice of raiſing money by benevolence had been aboliſhed by Richard III. The cardinal, awed as it were by this noble ſtand of the citizens, declared he would receive privately whatever they ſhould think proper to advance. This ſubmiſſion of the cardinal prevented any farther oppoſition from the city, but had no effect on the country. The people of Eſſex and Suffolk flew to their arms, pouring forth bitter execrations againſt the cardinal; inſomuch that Henry, perceiving his government was in danger of becoming unpopular, thought proper to ſummon his council, and demanded to know, by whoſe advice the late loan and benevolence had been undertaken, diſclaiming, at the ſame time, all unlawful methods of raiſing money. Wolſey took the meaſure upon himſelf; adding, that he acted in conformity to the opinion of the judges, who affirmed, that the king might demand any ſum by commiſſion, and that the council had confirmed this decree. Henry appeared to be ſomewhat ſatisfied with this evaſive behaviour of the artful cardinal, and the fault was imputed to the judges, who had given them wrong information; upon which a general pardon was iſſued to all delinquents, either on account of the loan or benevolence. Still more to ſatisfy his ſubjects, the king was induced to ſcrutinize the conduct of his favourite; and he found ſo many inſtances of tyrannical oppreſſion, that he burſt forth into a violent paſſion, and ſeverely checked his preſumption; but the ſubtle cardinal ſoon found means to appeaſe his maſter, by inſinuating, that his intereſt was the fundamental motive of his actions, and that all the wealth he had amaſſed would revert to the crown; as a confirmation of which declaration, he preſented to Henry his ſtately palace at Hampton-court. Towards the cloſe of this year, Henry Fitzroy, the king's natural ſon, was created duke of Somerſet, earl of Nottingham, and lord high-admiral of England; and cardinal Campeius was made biſhop of Saliſbury.

A. D. 1526.

The emperor's diſſembled moderation was of ſhort continuance; and every one was ſoon convinced, that inſtead of being ſatisfied with his vaſt dominions, they only ſerved to prompt his ambition to acquire a ſtill more extenſive empire. He even demanded ſuch terms of his priſoner, as would for ever have deſtroyed the balance of Europe. Francis declared, that he was reſolved to ſuffer any extremity, rather than conſent to ſuch unreaſonable demands; and accordingly ſent into France a public act, ſigned by his own hand, conſenting that his ſon, the dauphin, ſhould be placed on the throne, and he himſelf ſpend the remainder of his days in captivity. But finding how little he had to expect from the emperor, his gloomy reflections, added to want of exerciſe, threw him into a languiſhing illneſs. Charles was now alarmed, leſt the death of his captive ſhould deprive him of all the advantages he propoſed to extort from him; and therefore paid him a viſit in the caſtle of Madrid. On his approaching the bed in which Francis lay, the ſick monarch ſaid, "You come, Sir, to viſit your priſoner." "No," anſwered Charles, "I come to viſit my brother and my friend, who ſhall ſoon be reſtored to liberty." He then uttered many ſoothing ſpeeches, which had ſo good an effect, that Francis, from that time, began to recover; and employed himſelf in concerting the terms of the treaty with the emperor's miniſters.

A. D. 1527. Moſt of the powers of Europe now intereſted themſelves in procuring the liberty of the French monarch; and Charles was at length induced to abate ſomewhat of his rigour, by the apprehenſion of a general combination being formed againſt him. He therefore ſigned a treaty on the fourteenth of January, at Madrid, whereby it was ſtipulated, that Francis ſhould relinquiſh to the emperor the duchy of Burgundy, with its ſovereignty, and dependencies, within ſix weeks after his return to France: that Francis ſhould be ſet at liberty in his own kingdom by the tenth of March, when the dauphin and the duke of Orleans, his two eldeſt ſons, ſhould be put into the emperor's hands, as hoſtages; that if any difficulty ſhould occur with regard to the reſtitution of Burgundy, Francis ſhould return to Madrid, and remain there till the full performance of the treaty; that he ſhould reſign all pretenſions to the kingdom of Naples, the duchy of Milan, the lordſhip of Genoa, the counties of Aſti, Arras, Tournay, Montaigne, St. Amand, Liſle, Douay, Orchies, Heſdin; and alſo all ſovereignty which he could claim over the counties of Flanders and Artois: that the emperor ſhould reſign all his rights and pretenſions to the cities and lordſhips of Peronne, Montdidier, Rouen, Guiſnes, and Ponthieu; together with all the cities and territories on the river Somme: that the duke of Bourbon ſhould be reſtored to all the eſtates and poſſeſſions he formerly enjoyed. Theſe articles Francis engaged to ratify at the firſt town he ſhould enter upon his arrival in his own dominions. But though he was remarkable delicate in regard to the principle of honour, he did not think himſelf bound by a promiſe which force had extorted from him, and which was ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by the ſtates of Burgundy. However, Francis offered the emperor two millions of crowns as an equivalent for Burgundy: but Charles would not conſent to the leaſt alteration in the treaty. The French monarch therefore concluded an alliance againſt the emperor, with Clement VII. the Venetians, and the principalities of Italy; a confederacy, of which the king of England was declared the protector. Charles, incenſed at this league, determined to take ample vengeance on thoſe allies who had deſerted him in time of danger; particularly the Roman pontiff, who, though he had chiefly owed his election to the good offices of the emperor, had ſo ungratefully abandoned the intereſt of his benefactor. He ordered the duke of Bourbon to advance towards Rome, and attack the pope in his capital. Bourbon executed the emperor's commands with the greateſt bravery and conduct, but was killed as he mounted a ladder to ſcale the walls. His death inſpired his followers with fury and revenge. Rome, taken by aſſault, was pillaged, and became a ſcene of the moſt ſhocking barbarities. That renowned city never ſuffered more even from barbarians, than now from the hands of Chriſtians, whatever was reſpectable in modeſty, whatever ſacred in religion ſeemed only to increaſe the brutality of the ſoldiers. The pope himſelf was taken priſoner, and treated with every indignity.

When intelligence was brought the emperor of the ſucceſs of his arms againſt the Roman capital, he affected the utmoſt ſorrow, put himſelf and his whole court into mourning, and ordered prayers to be offered up for the deliverance of the pope. But the artifice was too groſs to impoſe even upon the ignorant and ſuperſtitious multitude. It was remarked even by the vulgar, that a letter under his own hand, to his generals in Italy, would be more effectual than all his prayers. It was very different with Francis and Henry; they were extremely concerned for the misfortunes of the pontiff, and agreed to carry their arms into Italy. Wolſey himſelf croſſed the ſeas to have an interview with Francis, who met him at Amiens; where it was ſtipulated, that the duke of Orleans ſhould marry the princeſs Mary: and as it was apprehended Charles would immediately ſummon a general council, both monarchs conſented not to acknowledge it, but to govern the churches in their reſpective dominions by their own authority, during the pope's impriſonment. Soon a new treaty was negociated between the two monarchs, by which Henry renounced his antient pretenſions to the crown of France; and Francis in return, bound himſelf and his ſucceſſors, to pay annually the ſum of twenty thouſand crowns. Spain was now become the terror of the Engliſh; and the animoſity ſo long entertained againſt the French entirely ſubſided. Though Charles was alarmed at this alliance between France and England, yet he refuſed to ſubmit to the conditions inſiſted upon by the allies. He receded indeed from his demand of Burgundy, as the ranſom for the two princes; but inſiſted that Francis ſhould evacuate all his Italian conqueſts before they ſhould recover their liberty. The conditions being rejected, the Engliſh and French heralds, purſuant to their inſtructions, declared war againſt the emperor, and ſet him at defiance. Charles anſwered the herald with great moderation; but reproached the Frenchman with his maſter's breach of faith, and returned his inſults. The French monarch retaliated this charge by giving the emperor the lie; and challenges were formally ſent to each other by theſe great princes. But though they were both undoubtedly brave, no duel took place. His holineſs ſoon after this altercation, eſcaped in diſguiſe to Orivetto.

A. D. 1528. During the confinement of the pope, Henry firſt declared his intention of being divorced from his queen Catharine. This memorable part of Engliſh hiſtory has ever been liable to various conjectures, as principle or intereſt have ſuggeſted. Now to aſcertain motives of action, an exemption from the bias of either, and an adherence to the eternal, invariable maxims of equity, are indiſpenſibly neceſſary. Proceeding therefore on thoſe principles with which we at firſt ſet out, it ſhall be our buſineſs to trace this part of our hiſtory, regardleſs of preceding affirmations, or the conjectural opinions of other writers, any further than they correſpond with truth and reaſon. The king now profeſſed ſcruples of conſcience relative to his marriage with Catharine, as that princeſs had before been eſpouſed to his elder brother Arthur, and deſired that archbiſhop Warham might conſult the Engliſh prelates on that ſubject. The primate complied with his requeſt, and in a few days preſented him with a writing, condemning the marriage, as contrary to all laws both human and divine. This declaration was ſubſcribed by all the prelates, except Fiſher biſhop of Rocheſter, whoſe name is ſaid to have been counterfeited by cardinal Wolſey. The next point neceſſary for the furtherance of Henry's deſign, was the conſent and approbation of the Roman pontiff, and with this view, doctor Knight was diſpatched to the court of Rome, with four papers for the ſignature of his holineſs. The firſt was a commiſſion to cardinal Wolſey, to judge and determine the affair, in conjunction with ſome Engliſh prelates. The ſecond was a decretal bull, annulling the marriage between the king and Catharine, as that princeſs had been previouſly eſpouſed to his brother Arthur. The third contained a diſpenſation for Henry's marrying another wife; and the fourth, an engagement never to revoke the other three. After much importunity, the pope ſigned the commiſſion, and the bull of diſpenſation for the king, promiſing to ſend the other decretal bull for annulling the marriage, when he ſhould have conſidered the ſubject more maturely. Henry not ſatisfied with this reply, ſent other ambaſſadors, deſiring his holineſs to grant his requeſt without limitation. Clement thus harraſſed with repeated importunities appointed Wolſey and Campegio, his legates a latere conſtituting them his vicegerents in the cauſe of the divorce, and inveſting them with his whole authority. Theſe conceſſions were made at different periods, in order to protract the time, and before the decretal paſſed, Lautrec the French general died of the plague, and the army was ruined; ſo that Clement had nothing to fear from the confederates. He therefore directed Campegio to dally as long as poſſible, and forbear giving ſentence of the divorce, till he ſhould receive freſh orders under his own hand. Campegio on his arrival in England began his legation, with exhorting the king to live in harmony with Catharine, and deſiſt from the proſecution of the divorce. This advice proving ineffectual, he endeavoured to perſuade the queen to agree to the ſeparation; but Catharine rejected his counſel, alledging that ſhe was the king's lawful wife, and would remain ſuch till declared otherwiſe by the pope's ſentence. Incenſed at theſe tedious proceedings, Henry ſent Sir Francis Bryan, and Peter Vannes to Rome, to diſcover the cauſes of delay. They were alſo directed to ſearch the pope's chancery for a pretended brief, which the Spaniards aſſerted, confirmed the diſpenſation of Catharine's marriage, granted by pope Julius; to propoſe ſeveral expedients to facilitate the ſentence; and to offer a guard of two thouſand men to aſſiſt his holineſs, in caſe of neceſſity; but if this propoſal ſhould be rejected, to counterballance the threats of Charles with thoſe of Henry. Theſe agents finding the pope ſtill undetermined, plainly told him, that ſhould he refuſe the ſatisfaction their maſter expected from him, England would renounce him and all his ſucceſſors. They obſerved, that the ſubjects of England, wanted only their king's permiſſion to ſhake off all obedience to the papal power. Theſe remonſtrances had no effect on Clement, who anſwered in general terms, and pretended to think himſelf in ſo dangerous a ſituation, that nothing but ſome unforeſeen and extraordinary event could give him relief. But though the pope refuſed, or at leaſt evaded compliance with Henry's full deſire, he continued to heap favours on Wolſey; granted him two bulls to ſuppreſs ſeveral ſmall monaſteries, and made divers other grants to gratify that prelate. This year Henry ſent ambaſſadors to his nephew, James of Scotland, with propoſals of peace; which on account of the diſtractions of that kingdom could not be effected; a truce was however concluded at Berwick for five years.

A. D. 1529. Wolſey, informed that Clement had been ſeized with a dangerous malady, hoped now to be exalted to the papal chair without much difficulty. But his hopes were ſoon blaſted, by the recovery of that pontiff; who being acquainted with what had paſſed during his illneſs, looked on Wolſey as a dangerous competitor, who might one day ſupplant him on pretence of his illegitimacy, on account of which he had been already threatened with depoſition, by the emperor. However he thought it prudent to conceal his reſentment, and as a mark of his regard for Henry and his favourite, expedited the neceſſary bulls for confirming Wolſey in the biſhopric of Worceſter, which he had juſt received on the death of Richard Fox, the late incumbent. In the mean time, Henry importuned the legates to proceed on their commiſſion, and they met for that purpoſe, on the thirty-firſt of May, when they appointed adjuncts to aſſiſt them in examining the papers and evidences, and then ſummoned the king and queen to appear before them on the eighteenth of June. When aſſembled, the queen's agents objected to the authority of the legates, but their refuſal being overruled, the king and queen appeared perſonally, on the twenty-firſt day of the month. Henry anſwered to his citation, but the queen being called on, roſe up, and falling on her knees before Henry, addreſſed him in the following manner; "I am a poor helpleſs woman, and a ſtranger in your dominions, where I can neither expect impartial judges, nor diſintereſted council. I have been your wife about twenty years, have borne you ſeveral children, and ever ſtudied to pleaſe you. I proteſt you found me a virgin, for the truth of which aſſertion, I appeal to your conſcience. If I have been guilty of any crime, let me be put away with ſhame. Our parents were eſteemed wiſe princes, and had doubtleſs good counſellors, when they concluded on our marriage. I will not therefore ſubmit to the authority of this court. My lawyers are your ſubjects, and dare not ſpeak freely on my behalf, for which reaſon I deſire to be excuſed till I hear from Spain." Having thus ſpoke, ſhe aroſe, and making a low reverence to the king, retired from the court.

After her departure, Henry declared, that ſhe had ever been a dutiful and affectionate wife, and that the whole tenor of her conduct, had been agreeable to the ſtricteſt rules of probity and honour; but that his conſcience being diſquieted, he had reſolved to try the lawfulneſs of his marriage, for the eaſe of his mind, and the benefit of his ſucceſſion. The queen being again ſummoned to appear, appealed to the pope, and was declared contumacious. Twelve articles were now drawn up, to be diſcuſſed by the examination of evidence. They declared, that prince Arthur and the king were brothers; that prince Arthur had eſpouſed Catharine, and conſummated the marriage; that on the death of Arthur, Henry, by virtue of a diſpenſation, had married the widow; that this marriage with his brother's wife, was forbidden by laws both human and divine; and, that upon complaints, which the pope had received, his holineſs had deputed them to try and decide the affair. Impatient of delay, the king ſent for Wolſey, and reproached him in the moſt outrageous manner; and a few hours after, diſpatched the earl of Wincheſter, father to Anne Boleyn, miſtreſs of his paſſions, to the cardinal, ordering him to repair with Campegio, to the queen's court in Bridewell, and endeavour to perſuade, or terrify her into compliance, for withdrawing the appeal, which both ſhe and the emperor had entered againſt the court's proceedings. The cardinal obeyed, but the queen inſiſted as ſhe could hope for no juſtice in England, on waiting the opinion of the Spaniſh court, before ſhe proceeded any further. Her deportment to the prelates, was ſuch as became conſcious integrity, blended with virtuous reſolution. While the legates were proceeding very ſlowly in the proceſs, the emperor's envoys deſired the pope to refer the cauſe to Rome, and the Engliſh miniſters exerted all their influence to prevent it. Both ſides threatened to depoſe him on account of his illegitimacy, which furniſhed the pontiff with a reaſon for poſtponing a declaration, till he had concluded a treaty with Charles, which was no ſooner ratified, than he told the Engliſh agents, he was determined to have the cauſe of the divorce tried at Rome; and for that purpoſe ſigned a bull of avocation, on the fifteenth day of July, which he immediately diſpatched to England. But his miniſters aſſured his holineſs, that the avocation of the divorce, would certainly deprive the holy ſee of the ſpiritual dominion of England. Clement, nevertheleſs, refuſed to retract his reſolution any further, than by prolonging the citation till Chriſtmas. From this period we may date the commencement of Wolſey's fall, who had behaved during the whole proceſs, with ſuch indifference as ſeemed highly inconſiſtent with that zealous concern, which on all other occaſions he affected to manifeſt for the intereſt of his maſter.

The emperor neglected no means, that had a probable tendency to ruin that prelate in the opinion of Henry; he invented defamatory reports of him, and by means of his emiſſaries, the king received copies of letters, ſaid to be written by the cardinal to his holineſs, to diſapprove the divorce; while Anne Boleyn imputed the miſcarriage entirely to Wolſey's neglect, and her reſentment was proportioned to the greatneſs of her diſappointment.

Her father, now promoted to the title of lord viſcount Rochfort, had removed her from court, in order to prevent ſcandal; but when the commiſſion was annulled, ſhe returned at the king's deſire. The king, to diſpel his chagrin, made a progreſs through the kingdom; and on his return, lay in the houſe of Mr. Creſſy, at Waltham-croſs. This gentleman had committed the education of his two ſons, to Thomas Cranmer, a doctor in theology, eminent for his piety and learning, and a ſecret favourer of the doctrine of Luther. At ſupper he was deſired to give his ſentiments of the divorce, and being preſſed on the ſubject, he propoſed, that the king ſhould conſult all the univerſities of Europe, as the moſt effectual method of deciding the controverted point. When the king exclaimed, with a tranſport of joy, "That Cranmer had got the right ſow by the ear;" and he conceived ſo favourable an opinion of him, that he ordered him to follow the court, and ever after conſulted him in all caſes of importance. On his return from this progreſs, he ſent a meſſenger to the cardinal, demanding the great ſeal, which he at firſt refuſed to deliver; but on the king's writing to him the next day, he reſigned it to the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, and it was given to Sir Thomas Moore, a man of eminent learning and integrity. Campegio, foreſeeing the final ruin of his colleague, took his leave of the king, and in a few days ſet ſail for Italy. On the ninth of October, Hales the attorney general, preferred an impeachment againſt Wolſey, accuſing him of having violated the ſtatute of premunire. He owned the charge, pleaded ignorance of the ſtatute, and ſubmitted himſelf to the king's mercy. But being out of the king's protection, his goods and chattels were forfeited to the king; and his palace of York-houſe, afterwards known by the name of Whitehall, was ſeized for his majeſty's uſe, together with all the rich furniture, and treaſure he had accumulated. Humbled by this reverſe of fortune, he petitioned the king for a protection for his perſon, which he immediately obtained, with a free pardon. He was reſtored to the ſees of York and Wincheſter, and recovered of his own effects the amount of ſix thouſand pounds in plate, money, and furniture: and received ſeveral kind meſſages from the king and Anne Boleyn, from whence it appears, that Henry's intention at this juncture, was to humble the pride, not to ruin the fortune of his old miniſter. Theſe favourable ſentiments were however of ſhort continuance; his enemies ſoon gained the aſcendant at court, and brought into the houſe of lords, an impeachment of high treaſon againſt him: but when it was ſent down to the houſe of commons, Thomas Cromwell, one of the members, who had been Wolſey's ſervant, defended him with ſuch ſtrength of argument, that the bill was rejected, and the proſecution dropped. The cardinal diſcovered as much puſillanimity in adverſity, as he had arrogance and preſumption in proſperity; and at length ſickened in conſequence of ſo many repeated mortifications. His indiſpoſition ſeemed to rekindle the king's affection. He had formerly ſent him a valuable ring as a teſtimony of his protection, which the cardinal received on the road to Wincheſter, and was ſo affected with the kindneſs of his ſovereign, that he alighted, and fell on his knees in a tranſport of joy. Henry now ſent him another preſent of a ruby, by his phyſician, doctor Butts, who aſſured him that he ſhould ſoon have a more convincing proof of his majeſty's affection. Theſe inſtances of the royal favour, contributed to the recovery of the cardinal, who obtained the king's permiſſion to reſide at Richmond-palace for the benefit of the air.

A. D. 1530.

In the beginning of the year, Henry's agents returned from the continent, with the opinion of the foreign univerſities concerning the legality of his marriage; thoſe of Paris, Angiers, Bourges, Orleans, Thoulouſe, Bologna, Ferrara, and Padua, unanimouſly agreed that the king's marriage with Catharine, being contrary to all laws, human and divine, could never be rendered valid by the diſpenſation of pope Julius II. The Engliſh univerſities ſubſcribed to the ſame opinion, though not without great oppoſition from the maſters of arts, eſpecially at Oxford, and a ſharp conteſt at Cambridge. Henry having obtained theſe declarations in his favour, and finding his application to the pope ineffectual, prevailed on his chief prelates and nobility, to ſend a remonſtrance, by way of letter, to the pontiff; in which, having mentioned the obligations his holineſs owed to the king, and the deciſion of the univerſities, they gave him to underſtand, that ſhould he refuſe to do juſtice in the affair of the divorce, they would renounce their connection with the ſee of Rome, and ſeek for other remedies. To this letter, which was ſigned by cardinal Wolſey, four prelates, two dukes, two marquiſſes, thirteen earls, two viſcounts, twenty-two abbots, and eleven commoners, the pope wrote an anſwer to juſtify his conduct. But this apology was ſo far from being admitted, that Henry, in order to anticipate any ſtep that might be taken in favour of Catharine or the cardinal, iſſued a proclamation, forbidding all perſons whatever to publiſh any thing from Rome or elſewhere, that ſhould be contrary to his royal prerogative; or to divulge any thing of that nature on pain of incurring his indignation, and the penalties ſpecified in the ſtatute of proviſos and premunire. He alſo appointed ſeveral learned men, to collect, compare, and publiſh, all that had been, or could be advanced in favour of the divorce, together with the opinions of the univerſities, and a particular anſwer to Fiſher, biſhop of Rocheſter, in defence of the marriage. In the mean time, the mind of Wolſey was alternately poſſeſſed by hope and deſpair. In the beginning of his diſgrace, he had been reduced to great neceſſity, from which he was relieved by the biſhop of Carliſle; but afterwards his affairs ſeemed to take a more favourable turn. He received a full pardon, conſiderable appointments, kind meſſages from the king, and was permitted to ſit among the peers in parliament; but at length his enemies prevailed on Henry, to ſend him an order for retiring to his archbiſhopric of York. He obeyed, but with much reluctance; and proceeded by ſhort ſtages to Cawood, attended by a train of an hundred and twenty horſemen, diſtributing alms and benedictions with great liberality. In ſhort, in adverſity, he affected a reformation from thoſe practices by which he had incurred the popular odium, when he was deprived of the power of putting them in exerciſe. Upon his arrival at York, the earl of Northumberland was ordered, without paying any regard to his eccleſiaſtical character, to arreſt him for high treaſon, and conduct him to London, in order to ſtand his trial. The haughty ſpirit of the arrogant Wolſey was much dejected by this event, and being ſeized with the flux in the beginning of his journey, it was with much difficulty that he reached Leiceſter-abbey. When the abbot and monks advanced to pay their formal compliments, he told them, that he was come to lay his bones among them; and ſoon after, finding the arreſt of the king of terrors at hand, he addreſſed himſelf to Sir William Kingſton, conſtable of the Tower, to whoſe charge he was committed in the following terms: "Had I ſerved my God with the ſame fidelity as I have ſerved my king, he would not have abandoned me in my old age; but this is my juſt reward. I pray you commend me to the king, deſiring him to remember all that paſſed between us, touching the affair of queen Catharine; and then his majeſty may determine whether or not I have given juſt cauſe of offence. He is a prince of royal courage, but rather than be thwarted in his pleaſure, would riſque the loſs of one half of his realm. I have kneeled before him three hours ſucceſſively, to diſſuade him from compliance with his will and appetite, and could not prevail; therefore, maſter Kingſton, if ever you be of his council, deliberate ſeriouſly upon what you intend to adviſe, for if once he ſets his heart upon any thing, he is not to be diverted from the purſuit." During this ſpeech, his voice faultered, and in a few minutes after he expired. Thus fell the famous cardinal Wolſey, a churchman of great abilities, intolerable pride, and unmeaſurable ambition. He exhibits a ſtriking inſtance of the folly of thoſe, who imagine the paths of worldly greatneſs the paths of happineſs. His character has been loaded with the moſt violent cenſures; but great allowances ſhould be made for the obſtinacy and violence of Henry's temper; and the king's obſtinacy often obliged him to purſue meaſures his better judgment condemned; and as the remaining part of Henry's reign was more criminal than that in which his councils were directed by Wolſey, there may be reaſon to ſuſpect the partiality of thoſe hiſtorians who have endeavoured to throw ſuch a load of reproaches on this great miniſter.

A. D. 1531. The proteſtant religion at this time had a great number of favourers. The king reſolved to renounce all papal juriſdiction, and in the affair of the divorce, abode by the determination of his own parliament and clergy.

For this purpoſe both the parliament and clergy met in convocation, on the ſixth of January. The chancellor opened the ſeſſions with declaring, That the king did not deſire the diſſolution of the marriage from carnal motives, but from conſcientious ſcruples, and his zeal for the welfare of the kingdom, that the ſucceſſion might not be diſputed after his deceaſe. Then he produced a great number of treatiſes, penned by the ableſt divines and caſuiſts, on the ſubject of divorce, and the deciſions of the univerſities of France, Italy, and England. The king then imparted his deſign to the convocation of the clergy, who, without heſitation, declared againſt the marriage. Notwithſtanding this inſtance of complaiſance, Henry proceeded gradually to diminiſh the eccleſiaſtical power, and by means of the influence of archbiſhop Warham, Thomas Cromwell, and ſome others of the council, obtained the title of "Supreme head of the church," with this ſaving clauſe, "as far as conſiſtent with the laws of Chriſt." The convocation of York reſolved alſo to preſent his majeſty with eighteen thouſand eight hundred pounds; but as they had not owned the king's ſupremacy in the act, they were informed it would not be accepted; they were therefore obliged to follow the example of the other convocation. Henry ſatisfied with this acquiſition of power, indulged them with a pardon. He now cauſed the controverſial writings on the ſubject of the divorce to be publiſhed, that all his ſubjects might underſtand the caſe before the next ſeſſion. As he was very deſirous of obtaining Catharine's conſent to a ſeparation, he ſent ſeveral peers to perſuade her to wave her appeal; and when they preſſed her to refer the cauſe to four eccleſiaſtics, and as many ſeculars, ſhe replied, ſhe would pray to God to ſend the king a quiet conſcience; but as ſhe was his lawful wife, was determined to abide by her right, till the court of Rome ſhould declare the contrary. Finding her inflexible, Henry ſent her word, that ſhe was at liberty to chuſe her place of reſidence at any of his manors; and ſhe replied, "to whatever place ſhe might be removed, ſhe could not be removed from the ſtation of his wife." She firſt repaired to Moore, and then to Eaſthamſtead, and afterwards to Ampthill.

The humiliation of the prelates was highly pleaſing to the Engliſh in general; they now began openly to diſcuſs abſtruſe points of religion, and were by their intemperate zeal hurried into dangerous extremes. Henry, alarmed at their commotions, reſolved to convince the people, that though he had renounced the papal juriſdiction, he had no intention to violate the fundamental laws of Chriſtianity; and therefore iſſued orders for the rigorous puniſhment of heretics; in conſequence of which, two eccleſiaſtics and a lawyer were condemned to the flames in Smithfield.

A. D. 1532. In the month of January, the commons, who were privately inſtructed by the court, preſented an addreſs, intreating his majeſty to conſent to the reformation of abuſe, which had crept into the immunities enjoyed by the clergy. The king anſwered, that before he could aſſent to ſuch a propoſal, he muſt hear what the clergy had to alledge in their own defence; by which he meant to inſinuate, how much they ſtood in need of the royal protection. Several acts were paſſed which ſlightly affected ſome of the privileges of that body, though theſe were fully compenſated by a decree, abſolving them from paying annates to the pope, which had always been a heavy burthen. The parliament alſo declared, that the king ſhould be at liberty, to annul, or confirm this act, within a limited time; and if in that interval, he ſhould compromiſe his difference with the court of Rome, it ſhould be deemed inviolable; but ſhould the pope, on account of this act, pretend to harraſs the kingdom with ſentences of excommunication and interdict, theſe ſentences ſhould be wholly diſregarded; and all the clergy were ordered to celebrate divine ſervice, as if they had never been iſſued. About this time the king received a letter from the pope; importing, that he had heard of his putting away his queen, and maintaining an illicit commerce with another perſon, to the diſgrace of his character, and contempt of the holy ſee, before which the ſuit was ſtill depending. He therefore exhorted him to diſcard his miſtreſs, and take back his lawful wife, by which means he would avoid a rupture with the emperor, and preſerve the peace of Chriſtendom, which was the only ſecurity againſt the progreſs of the Turks. In anſwer to this letter, Henry reproached his holineſs with ignorance, partiality, and deceit; declaring he had no intention of making any further attempts on his authority, unleſs provoked; deſiring he would conform to the opinion of ſo many learned caſuiſts, and do juſtice according to the dictates of his conſcience. Clement, inſtead of gratifying the king in his deſire, by a citation, ſummoned him to appear in perſon, or by proxy, at Rome, to anſwer to the queen's appeal, and he accordingly ſent Sir Edward Karne, as his excuſator. The plea of defence was argued in the conſiſtory, and after much debate, was neither allowed nor rejected. While theſe points were debating at Rome, the parliament met again in April, and in the courſe of the ſeſſion, one Temſe moved, that an addreſs might be preſented to the king, deſiring his majeſty to recall the queen, and prevent all the inconveniencies that might attend the illegitimation of the princeſs. Henry, incenſed at this freedom, chid the ſpeaker of the houſe, and appealed to the teſtimony of his own conſcience, for the juſtification of his conduct. At this period the plague broke out in London, and the parliament was therefore prorogued till the enſuing February. After this prorogation, Sir Thomas Moore, dreading the conſequences that might attend a total rupture with the court of Rome, and diſapproving the proceedings of Anne Boleyn, reſigned the office of chancellor, which was conferred on Sir Thomas Audley.

A. D. 1533. Henry was privately married to Anne Boleyn, by Rowland Lee, afterwards biſhop of Litchfield and Coventry, in the preſence of Cranmer, who now had ſucceeded Warham, in the metropolitan ſee, the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, and Anne's father, mother, and brothers. The parliament meeting in the month of February, the convocation of Canterbury was aſſembled at the ſame time, and required to give their opinions of the following queſtions: Whether or not the diſpenſation granted by pope Julius, was ſufficient to render the marriage of Henry and Catharine binding and valid? and whether or not the conſummation of Arthur's nuptials with that princeſs had been fully demonſtrated? The convocation declared, that the pope had no power to grant diſpenſations contrary to the law of God; and that the conſummation of the firſt marriage had been as fully proved as the nature of the caſe would admit. This anſwer from both the convocations of Canterbury and York, determined the king to proceed upon the cauſe of the divorce, before the judicature of his own clergy. This courſe he was the rather inclined to purſue, as he was no longer able to conceal his marriage with Anne Boleyn, who was now become pregnant; and it was therefore neceſſary to make it public, in order to ſave her reputation. The archbiſhop, being privately inſtructed, demanded permiſſion of his majeſty to determine the affair of his former marriage with Catharine, whoſe conſent to the divorce, the king had endeavoured to procure by fair means; but all proving ineffectual, the queen was ſummoned to appear at Dunſtable. This citation ſhe abſolutely refuſed; upon which Cranmer pronounced ſentence, declaring her marriage null, as being contrary to the law of God; and confirmed at the ſame time the king's marriage with Anne Boleyn, who was crowned on the firſt day of June. The lord Montjoy was ſent by Henry with this ſentence to Catharine, who ſtill refuſed to ſubmit; and the king ordered, that for the future, ſhe ſhould have no other title, than that of princeſs dowager of Wales. The pope incenſed at theſe proceedings, aggravated by a book which Henry had written againſt the papal juriſdiction, reverſed the ſentence, declaring that the king himſelf ſhould be excommunicated, unleſs he renounced all that had been committed againſt the holy ſee, before the end of September. But Henry had gone too far to recede; however, at the interceſſion of Francis, he ſent Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, Sir Francis Bryan, and Sir John Wallop, accompanied by Edward Bonner, an arrogant meddling prieſt, to attend at the interview between Francis and Clement, at Marſeilles. Bonner, ſoon after the marriage was performed, demanded an audience of his holineſs, and told him, that the king of England had appealed to a future council, from any papal ſentence, that either was or might be given againſt him. This preſumption ſo much incenſed his holineſs, that he threatened to have Bonner thrown into a caldron of melted lead; Francis alſo expreſſed his indignation at the arrogance of the Engliſh prieſt, and engaged to aſſiſt the pope in chaſtiſing him for ſuch an affront, but ſuffered the delinquent however to eſcape. This intervention of Bonner ſeemed to deſtroy all hopes of an accommodation, yet Francis did not deſpair of ſeeing the matter brought to a happy concluſion. On his return to Paris, he diſpatched John de Bellay, biſhop of that ſee, with new propoſals to Henry, who agreed to the diſputes being decided at Cambray, by judges that could not be ſuſpected of partiality. The biſhop having gained this point, ſet out in the middle of winter for Rome, and found Clement diſpoſed to embrace this expedient, in caſe Henry would ſign a writing, by which he ſhould bind himſelf to abide by the determination; and in order to avoid delay, fixed a day for the return of the courier, with the inſtrument from England. No ſooner were the emperor's miniſters apprized of theſe proceedings, than they preſſed the pope to revoke his engagement, and obtained a promiſe from his holineſs, that if the courier did not arrive by the time appointed, he would pronounce ſentence againſt Henry. The meſſenger not arriving within the limited time, the biſhop of Paris applied for a reſpite of ſix days alone; but the pope intimidated by the menaces of the Imperialiſts, refuſed to comply with this requeſt. He publiſhed a bull, declaring the validity and legality of Henry's marriage with Catharine, and commanding that prince, on pain of eccleſiaſtical cenſure, to recall his wife. The courier arrived in two days after this deciſion, from England, with full power for the biſhop of Paris to grant what the pope had demanded; and ſeveral cardinals adviſed the pontiff to revoke the ſentence; but the emperor's partizans prevailed upon him to reject the propoſal. Thus England was wholly diſmembered from the ſee of Rome.

A. D. 1534. The parliament meeting in the month of January, began the ſeſſion with an act, repealing the ſtatute of Henry IV. againſt heretics; not that they intended to exempt them from the penalty of the laws, but in order to hinder the clergy from being ſole judges in ſuch caſes; it was decreed, that for the future, heretics ſhould be tried by the laws of the land, without any regard to the canon law. By another ſtatute it was enacted, that no ſynod ſhould be held by the clergy, without the king's licence; that his majeſty ſhould nominate ſixteen perſons from the parliament, and as many from the clergy, to examine the canons and conſtitutions of the church, with power to aboliſh ſuch as were uſeleſs, and confirm thoſe that were neceſſary. This parliament alſo paſſed an act of attainder, againſt Elizabeth Barton, the holy Maid of Kent, a native of the pariſh of Aldington, who was employed by certain eccleſiaſtics, to raiſe diſturbances in the kingdom. This girl being ſubject to hyſterical fits, was perſuaded by Richard Maſter, the pariſh prieſt, that ſhe was inſpired from above; and like other fanatics, exhibited various ſymptoms of phrenzy, by diſtorting her face, vehement exclamations, and even affirming, that the Virgin Mary had appeared to her, and told her ſhe ſhould never recover, till ſhe had viſited her image, which was erected in a neighbouring church; with many other abſurdities ſhocking to common ſenſe. As ignorance is the mother of ſuperſtition and credulity, the device gained in a ſhort time many partizans, who gloried in the abuſe of their reaſon, and degradation of thoſe ſublime faculties, with which the common parent of nature had endowed them, and were eaſily induced to broach the moſt palpable nonſenſe: they held private meetings, and debauched from their allegiance numbers of people, among whom were many of the inhabitants of Richmond, Greenwich, and Canterbury. At length the king, apprehenſive of the conſequences of this impoſture, ordered the maid and her accomplices to be examined in the Star-chamber, where ſhe confeſſed the device, and publicly read on a ſcaffold, in St. Paul's church, the articles of their confeſſion. From thence they were conveyed to the Tower, and being tried and found guilty of a moſt pernicious impoſture, were executed at Tyburn, the twentieth day of April.

The parliament alſo paſſed an act, declaring the king's marriage with Catharine void, and ſetting the ſucceſſion upon the iſſue of his lawful wife Anne, whether male or female; after which, the members having ſworn to maintain the ſucceſſion, the two houſes were prorogued to the third day of November. The parliament had no ſooner broke up, than Henry ſent commiſſioners throughout the kingdom, to adminiſter the oath to all his eccleſiaſtical ſubjects; importing, that they would be faithful to the king, queen, their heirs and ſucceſſors; that they held the king to be "the ſupreme head of the Engliſh church," and the pope no more than another biſhop. This oath was voluntarily taken by the majority of the clergy; but Fiſher, biſhop of Rocheſter, with Sir Thomas Moore, abſolutely refuſed. Sir Thomas declared, he was willing to ſwear to the ſucceſſion, provided they would allow him to draw up the oath himſelf. Cranmer and Cromwell expreſſed much concern for him, and endeavoured to convince him by arguments; and Cranmer propoſed, that his expedient ſhould be accepted; but the king being incenſed againſt them, they were ſent to the Tower, debarred the uſe of pen and paper; and Fiſher, to the eternal diſgrace of his ſovereign, was ſtripped of every thing in his old age, but a few rags which hardly covered his nakedneſs.

Having in vain endeavoured to perſuade to ſubmiſſion, Henry began to apprehend a ſtorm from his nephew Charles, who had undertaken to execute the pope's ſentence, and propoſed to render his union with Francis ſtill more firm, for their common ſafety. But before his deſign could be carried into execution, pope Clement died, and was ſucceeded by cardinal Farnere, who aſſumed the title of Paul III. On the twenty-third of November, the Engliſh parliament enacted ſeveral important laws, to deſtroy all future connection between the kingdom and the pope. They confirmed the title of ſupreme head of the church, which the clergy had already beſtowed on the king. They declared all thoſe who ſhould ſpeak, write, or imagine any thing to the prejudice of the king or queen, guilty of high treaſon. When they had broke up, the king iſſued a proclamation, to ſuppreſs the name of the pope, and eraze it from all books and writings. By this time the reformation had made a conſiderable progreſs in England; the writings of Luther were well known to the ſubjects of Henry, and the bible was tranſlated into the Engliſh language by Tindal, who had retired into the Low Countries. The biſhop of London ordered ſome copies of this tranſlation to be burned by the hands of the common hangman, and ſeveral perſons ſuffered martyrdom with amazing reſolution. Theſe ſeverities, however, inſtead of ſuppreſſing, ſerved only to ſtrengthen the ſpirit of religious oppoſition, which was ſtill farther inflamed by the quarrel of the Roman pontiff. The reformation was favoured by Anne Boleyn, archbiſhop Cranmer, and ſecretary Cromwell; but at the ſame time it was ſtrongly oppoſed by the duke of Norfolk, biſhop Gardiner, and many other eccleſiaſtics, who frequented the court. Henry himſelf adhered firmly to the Roman faith, and had written more than once againſt Luther, who treated him in a very ſcurrilous manner; and though that reformer afterwards humbled himſelf by letter to the king, he could never forgive the inſolence of his firſt attack. Though Henry had aboliſhed the papal juriſdiction, and concluded a treaty of peace with his nephew the king of Scotland, he did not enjoy that tranquillity which he might have expected to reap from his ſucceſs. He gave a looſe to his paſſions, and became boiſterous, cruel, and arbitrary. The monks having incenſed him by perſonal reflections, he reſolved to execute his vengeance on them without mercy. He was particularly exaſperated againſt the new pope, Paul III. who created the biſhop of Rocheſter a cardinal, as a recompence for his having denied the king's ſupremacy; and to ſhew his reſentment, ordered the oath to be once more tendered to that prelate, who refuſing it as before, was condemned and executed as a traitor. Sir Thomas Moore was alſo inveigled into a conference about the ſupremacy; and ſome hints, joined to his former conviction, ſerved as a pretext for taking away his life. He was accordingly condemned and beheaded; but Henry incurred much reproach from the death of a man revered for his honeſty, and admired for his learning, and facetious humour, which he exerted to the very cloſe of life. In conſequence of theſe proceedings, the pope denounced ſentence of excommunication againſt Henry, abſolving all his ſubjects from their oath of allegiance; he ordered all eccleſiaſtics to retire from his dominions; commanded the nobility to riſe up in arms againſt him; laid the kingdom under an interdict; forbade all Chriſtians to communicate with the Engliſh; annulled all treaties which other powers had concluded with Anne Boleyn; and declared all the children, which ſhould be produced by that marriage, illegitimate, and incapable of ſucceſſion. The king, informed of this attack, ſent ambaſſadors to the proteſtant princes, who had entered into a league at Smalcade in Germany, to propoſe an union of intereſt; but theſe powers, whoſe main deſire was to enjoy liberty of conſcience, wiſely avoided any connection with a prince who condemned their doctrines, and even perſecuted thoſe of his ſubjects, by whom theſe doctrines were profeſſed.

Henry now determined a general viſitation of the monaſteries, in order to enquire ſtrictly into the titles, revenues, and morals of the friars and nuns, and the regulations obſerved in each order. By this expedient, he propoſed to wreak his vengeance on the monks, who had oppoſed his deſigns, and augment his own revenue with their ſpoils. Thomas Cromwell being appointed viſitor general, nominated ſubſtitutes to examine the monaſteries, and theſe deputies were no friends to monaſtic inſtitutions, did not fail to exaggerate the particulars in their reports. They firſt menaced the delinquent friars and nuns, with the utmoſt rigour of the law, and then hinted, that in order to conceal the faults of which they had been guilty, they ſhould reſign their houſes to the king, who would take care to provide for the ſubſiſtence of every individual. The reports of theſe viſitors, according to ſome hiſtorians, are of ſo enormous a nature, that they cannot be related without offending decency and ſhocking moderation; which, added to the motives of the viſitation, and the prejudice of the deputies, we think ſufficient to juſtify an omiſſion of the particulars. During theſe tranſactions, the king deprived cardinal Campegio, and an Italian, called Ghinacer, of their biſhopricks of Saliſbury and Worceſter; and beſtowed them upon Nicholas Shaxton, and Hugh Latimer, who favoured the reformation.

A. D. 1536.

This year was uſhered in with the death of the unhappy and much injured queen Catharine, which happened at Kimbolten in Somerſetſhire, on the twenty-ninth of January, in the fifty-third year of her age, after having ſuſtained a long ſeries of afflictions. She lived on the penſion aſſigned her, as princeſs dowager of Wales, and notwithſtanding her ill treatment in this kingdom, diſcovered not the leaſt inclination of leaving it, being ſuppoſed to be detained by her paternal care of the princeſs Mary. A little before her death, ſhe wrote a letter to the king, in which ſhe addreſſed him as her moſt dear lord, king, and huſband, and aſſured him of her ſincere forgiveneſs, for all the calamities, in which his ungovernable paſſion had involved her, and concluded with theſe remarkable words; "I make this vow, that mine eyes deſire you above all things." This pathetic letter greatly affected Henry, who is ſaid to have dropped ſome tears at the remembrance of a woman whoſe virtues deſerved a better fate. She was buried in the abbey church of Peterborough, which Henry afterwards converted into a cathedral. Though good effects have ariſen from the divorce of this princeſs, an impartial view of Henry's character, and that of the unhappy Catharine, together with the whole progreſs of his conduct reſpecting it, and the circumſtances antecedent to it, muſt ſurely convince every honeſt, unprejudiced mind, that it was a flagrant injury done to the perſon and character of an honourable and virtuous woman. They being joined in a ſtate of wedlock, by a compulſive act of their parents during their minority, if Henry had effected the divorce immediately on his arrival at maturity of judgment, the candid might have been induced to think, that he acted from conſcientious motives; but as it was deferred to a remote period, and his queen, even by his own confeſſion, had evinced the moſt virtuous and amiable qualities, we refer it to the ingenious reader, whether his conduct in this reſpect was intrinſically good or bad, according to thoſe eternal maxims of truth, on which all religion is founded.

The parliament meeting for diſpatch of buſineſs, an act was paſſed, ſuppreſſing all monaſteries, whoſe revenues did not exceed two hundred pounds a year, and appropriating their income to his majeſty's uſe. By which ſtatute the crown acquired a yearly revenue of thirty thouſand pounds, beſides a capital of above one hundred thouſand pounds, ariſing from the plate, ornaments, and effects of churches and convents. The king then erected a new court of juſtice, called the court of augmentation of the crown revenues, for taking cognizance of all ſuch ſequeſtrations. At this period the king was petitioned to employ ſome able perſons to tranſlate the ſcriptures, and the queen ſeconded the petition, with which Henry complied; and, though the tranſlators are not known, the work was in three years printed at Paris. The king, having thus obtained all his deſires, diſſolved that parliament, after it had continued ſitting ſix years. During theſe tranſactions, the queen was delivered of a dead male child, to the unſpeakable chagrin of the king, who looked on this accident as a judgment from heaven. His love for Anne Boleyn now began to cool, while the beauty of Jane Seymour, one of the queen's ladies, raiſed a new flame in his breaſt, and his paſſions were ſo ſtrong and impetuous, that he ſacrificed every thing to their gratification. Theſe concurring motives for his alienation from the queen, were ſtrengthened by her own deportment, which was too frank and unguarded to ſcreen her from the imputation of levity and indiſcretion. Her enemies, particularly the duke of Norfolk, and thoſe who adhered to the old religion, took advantage of this diſpoſition to inflame the king's jealouſy, the principal fomenter of which was lady Rochford, who hinted to the king, that his queen carried on a criminal correſpondence with her own brother, the lord Rochford; and this inſinuation, through the diſguſt he had taken to Anne, and his new paſſion for Jane Seymour had vaſt effect. As ſhe favoured the reformation, the partizans of the pope conſpired her ruin; and ſhe was not only accuſed of inceſt with Rochford, but alſo of criminal converſe with Henry Norris, groom of the ſtole, Weſton and Brereton, gentlemen of the king's privy chamber, and Smeton, a muſician. Theſe charges were very defective in point of evidence, yet they were ſufficient to ruffle the mind of Henry, who is ſaid to have ſeen the queen, at a tournament at Greenwich, to drop her handkerchief to one of her minions, that he might wipe his face, having overheated himſelf in the exerciſe. Whatever might be the cauſe, he commanded the queen to be confined to her chamber, and the ſuſpected delinquents to be committed to the Tower. The queen imagined at firſt that the king was in jeſt, but when ſhe found it was a ſerious affair, ſhe retired to her cloſet, and prepared for death. This reverſe of fortune affected her ſo ſenſibly, that ſhe was ſeized with hyſteric fits, during which ſhe exhibited ſigns of a moſt violent agitation. When ſhe was conveyed to the Tower, ſhe fell on her knees, and appealed to heaven for her innocence. Cranmer alone, of all her adherents, preſerved his friendſhip inviolate; and as far as the king's impetuoſity would allow him, endeavoured to remove the violent and unjuſt prejudices which he had conceived to her detriment; but all his attempts proved ineffectual. On the fifteenth of May, the queen and her brother Rochford, were brought to their trial before the duke of Norfolk, as lord high ſteward for the occaſion, the duke of Suffolk, the marquis of Exeter, the earl of Arundel, and twenty-five other peers. The unfortunate queen was charged with criminal converſation with her brother, and four others; and alſo with having conſpired the king's death. She pleaded, Not guilty, and diſtinctly anſwered all the evidence that was brought againſt her. She was, however, convicted, and condemned to be burnt, or beheaded, at the pleaſure of the king. Her brother alſo was condemned to be beheaded and quartered; nor did this ſatisfy the vengeance of Henry, who cauſed her marriage to be proclaimed null and inſufficient, on account of a pre-contract between her and the earl of Northumberland, and her daughter illegitimate. When brought to the ſcaffold, ſhe ſaid ſhe was come to die, as ſhe had been adjudged by the law; ſhe prayed heartily for the king; and deſired the people would judge of him with charity; ſhe took leave of all the ſpectators, deſiring they would pray for her, and having ſpent ſome time in devotion, ſubmitted to the fatal ſtroke, which was given by an executioner, ſent over from Calais. Thus came to an untimely end the unhappy Anne Boleyn, a ſacrifice to the impetuous paſſions of Henry, inflamed by the malicious ſuggeſtions of her enemies. The king, eager to gratify his brutal appetite, and wholly regardleſs of decency and decorum, eſpouſed lady Jane Seymour, on the very day that ſucceeded her execution. In the month of June, a ſtatute was enacted by a new parliament, repealing the former act of ſucceſſion; declaring the children of the two firſt marriages illegitimate, excluding them from the inheritance of the crown, and adjudging it after the king's death, to his iſſue by lady Jane, or any other wife he might afterwards eſpouſe. This parliament alſo paſſed an act, whereby all thoſe, who in any manner attempted to re-eſtabliſh in England, the authority of the biſhop of Rome, ſhould incur the penalty of premunire.

Cromwell and Cranmer ſtill maintained their influence at court; and the latter was appointed the king's vicegerent in all eccleſiaſtical affairs. In this character he informed the convocation, at the king's deſire, that the rites and ceremonies of the church ſhould be reformed by ſcripture, and in a few days produced a ſet of articles drawn up by Henry himſelf, concerning the doctrines of religion; that the clergy might examine them, and make a faithful report of their deliberations.

In this debate, the friends and enemies of the reformation declared themſelves openly. Cranmer was joined by Goodrick, biſhop of Ely; Shaxton, of Saliſbury; Latimer, of Worceſter; Barlow, of St. David's; Fox, of Hereford; and Hilſey, of Rocheſter. The other party were headed by Lee, archbiſhop of York; Stokeſly, biſhop of London; Tonſtan, of Durham; Gardiner, of Wincheſter; Longford, of Lincoln; Sherburn, of Chicheſter; Nix, of Norwich; and Kite, of Carliſle. But Cranmer and Cromwell had the king's ear, and perſuaded him, that the abuſes of which they demanded an abolition, tended directly to the ſupport of papal uſurpation. After very warm debates, the convocation agreed to certain articles, digeſted in the form of conſtitutions, and importing, that the Holy Scripture was the foundation of faith, together with the creeds of the apoſtles, the council of Nice, and Athanaſius; that baptiſm was abſolutely neceſſary, as well as penitence, comprehended in the three acts of contrition, auricular confeſſion, and amendment of life; that the real body of Chriſt was preſent in the euchariſt; that juſtification was attained by regeneration, compoſed of contrition, faith, and charity; that images ſhould be retained in churches, though worſhip ſhould not be paid to the image, but to God alone; that ſaints ought to be honoured, though without believing that they could grant what was in the gift of God alone; that they might, nevertheleſs, be invoked without ſuperſtition, and their feſtivals obſerved; that the number of theſe might be abridged by the king's authority; that the uſual ceremonies of the church ſhould be retained, ſuch as the prieſt's veſtments, holy-water, conſecrated-bread, tapers on Candlemas-day, aſhes on Aſh-Wedneſday, palms on Palm-Sunday, proſtration before the croſs on Good-Friday, hallowing of the font, exorciſms, and benedictions; that prayers ſhould be put up for departed ſouls, and alms given for maſſes and obſequies; but as the place they were in, and the pains they ſuffered, were not aſcertained by ſcripture, they ſhould be referred to the mercy of God; that purgatory, and the pope's power of delivering ſouls from thence, ſhould be exploded.

The act for the ſuppreſſing ſmall monaſteries, which took place in the month of Auguſt, occaſioned great clamours among the people; who, inflamed by the ſuggeſtions of the monks, inſinuating, that the king meant to deſtroy all the monaſteries, without exception, aſſembled in Lincolnſhire, to the number of twenty thouſand, under the conduct of doctor Mackrel, prior of Barlins, diſguiſed like a cobler. Theſe ſent a petition to court, requeſting the king to conſider and redreſs the grievances to which they were expoſed; but his majeſty, inſtead of granting their requeſt, publiſhed a very ſevere anſwer, and ſent the duke of Suffolk againſt them, at the head of ſome forces levied for that purpoſe. This conduct ſerved only to inflame the inſurgents, and gave the clergy an opportunity of repreſenting the ſtate of the people to be as really enſlaved as that of the Turks; and that they were now to expect an extermination, not only of popery, but Chriſtianity itſelf. Several perſons of diſtinction among them privately correſponded with the duke of Suffolk, and aſſured him, that their ſole view was to bring by degrees the common people to a ſenſe of their duty; and that if the king would indulge them with an amneſty, they would diſperſe without bloodſhed. The duke acquainted his majeſty with this information; who, in conſideration of a commotion excited in Yorkſhire, publiſhed an amneſty in favour of the Lincoln revolters, who immediately diſperſed, though ſome of them joined the inſurgents of York. Theſe were preceded by prieſts with crucifixes, and the paſſion of Chriſt was painted on their banners. They compelled all the freeholders either to join them or fly the country; and re-eſtabliſhed the monks who had been diſpoſſeſſed. The earl of Shrewſbury having armed his vaſſals to oppoſe their progreſs, was created king's lieutenant againſt the conſpirators; the duke of Suffolk being ordered to remain in Lincolnſhire, to prevent any freſh commotions in that county. Several noblemen alſo were commiſſioned to inliſt men; and the king himſelf began to aſſemble an army under the command of the duke of Norfolk. Theſe proceedings gave riſe to a freſh rebellion. Two gentlemen, called Muſgrave and Tilby, putting themſelves at the head of eight thouſand peaſants, made an attempt upon Carliſle, from which, however, they were repulſed, and afterwards entirely defeated by the duke of Norfolk. Muſgrave eſcaped; but Tilby, with ſeventy of his followers were taken, and hanged upon the walls of Carliſle.

A. D. 1537.

An event now happened of a more joyous and important nature. This was, the birth of a young prince at Hampton-court, on the twelfth day of Auguſt, who was baptized by the name of Edward; and though the mother died in a few days after her delivery, it afforded Henry infinite ſatisfaction, as it gratified his pride, and removed all doubts with reſpect to the ſucceſſion. Six days after his birth, the infant was created prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, and earl of Cheſter. At the ſame time the queen's brother, Sir Edward Seymour, lately made lord Beauchamp, was created earl of Hertford; Sir William Fitzwilliams, earl of Southampton; Sir William Paulet, lord St. John; and Sir John Ruſſel was dignified with the title of lord Ruſſel.

A. D. 1538.

The late commotions had ſo incenſed the king againſt the whole monaſtic ſect, that he determined on its total abolition. His reſolution, in this particular, appears to have been actuated by intereſt, as well as reſentment; for he appropriated the rents and riches of the convents and monaſteries, which at his inſtigation were raiſed, to his own private uſe. He therefore again ordered a general and minute viſitation of the monaſteries, in conſequence of which, as before, the deputies made the moſt indecent and horrid reports. This ſoftened all oppoſition to Henry, who attacked the ſhrine of St. Thomas à Becket at Canterbury, which excelled all others in magnificence and pretended ſanctity. We have obſerved, vaſt numbers of pilgrims reſorted to this famous ſhrine, and even preferred it to thoſe of Chriſt, and the Virgin Mary; for in one year, the offerings made at the altar of Chriſt, and the Virgin, did not exceed four pounds, while thoſe at the ſhrine of Becket, amounted to between eight and nine hundred. Lewis VII. of France had viſited this tomb, and preſented it with a jewel, which was deemed the richeſt in Europe. The ſhrine was now broken and taken down, together with the gold that adorned it, to an immenſe value. The king ordered his bones to be burned, his name to be eraſed from the calendar, and the office for his feſtival expunged from the breviary. Theſe proceedings were no ſooner known at Rome, than that city was filled with ſatires and libels againſt the perſon and conduct of Henry. He was branded with the moſt notorious infamy and ſacrilege, and compared to the moſt cruel and lawleſs tyrants that ever ſoiled the pages of hiſtory. His emiſſaries at Rome informed him, that the intelligence from England was generally directed to cardinal Pole; in conſequence of which he wreaked his revenge on that eccleſiaſtic, by cauſing ſeveral of his relations to be apprehended and executed as traitors. The pope now publiſhed his bull of excommunication, and endeavoured to excite the neighbouring princes againſt him; and even offered his kingdom to James of Scotland, provided he was able and willing to ſubdue it. Henry, informed of the publication of this bull, exacted from the biſhops and abbots a new oath, by which they renounced the pope's authority; and a new tranſlation of the Bible, printed at London, being preſented to him by Cromwell, he permitted copies of it to be diſtributed throughout the kingdom. At the ſame time he ordered the clergy to read the Lord's prayer, the creed, and the ten commandments in the Engliſh tongue. They were directed to inſiſt on practical religion, and expoſe the futility of pompous rites and ceremonies. The biſhop of Wincheſter was, by this time, returned from France; and though averſe to the reformation, diſguiſed his ſentiments ſo artfully, that the king beſtowed on him ſome degree of confidence, on account of his complaiſance and ſubmiſſion. This prelate raiſed a perſecution againſt thoſe who denied the real preſence in the eucharīſt; and one John Nicholſon was burned in Smithfield, with circumſtances of horrid barbarity. In the mean time cardinal Pole maintained a private correſpondence in England, and is even ſaid to have aſpired at the crown through a marriage with the princeſs Mary; but the king diſcovering his intrigues, ordered his correſpondents to be executed as traitors. On the twenty-eighth of April, the law of the ſix articles, commonly called the bloody ſtatute, was enacted, denouncing death againſt all thoſe who ſhould deny tranſubſtantiation; maintain the neceſſity of communicating both ſpecies; affirm that it was lawful for prieſts to marry; that the vows of chaſtity might be violated; that private maſſes were uſeleſs; and that auricular confeſſion was not neceſſary to ſalvation. This ſtatute was ſuggeſted by biſhop Gardiner, who aſſured the king, that nothing would more effectually prevent the formation of a league againſt him, than thus to convince the world that he had not varied the eſſentials of religion; and that no perſon could accuſe him of hereſy while he maintained theſe ſix articles, which ſo eminently diſtinguiſhed the true catholics from ſectaries and innovators. Cranmer vehemently oppoſed this ſtatute; but as ſoon as the bill paſſed he ſent his wife to Germany, of which ſhe was a native. This parliament, which was wholly at the king's devotion, confirmed him in the poſſeſſion of the religious houſes which he had ſuppreſſed, and empowered him to erect ſome new biſhoprics. Six hundred and forty-five monaſteries were ſuppreſſed in England and Wales, of which twenty-eight had abbots, who enjoyed a ſeat in parliament; ninety colleges were demoliſhed, together with two thouſand three hundred and ſeventy-four chantries and free chapels, the annual revenue of the whole being equal to one hundred and ſixty-one thouſand and one hundred pounds. From this fund, Henry is ſaid to have increaſed the number of colleges and profeſſors in the univerſities, and founded the biſhoprics of Weſtminſter, Oxford, Peterborough, Briſtol, Cheſter, and Glouceſter: that of Weſtminſter was diſſolved by queen Mary, and Benedictines placed in the abbey; but queen Elizabeth converted it into a collegiate church, and a ſeminary for young ſcholars.

From his conſcientious behaviour, Cranmer ſtill retained the king's eſteem, though he oppoſed the ſix articles; and therefore inſinuated to him, as he could not be ſatisfied in his mind till the people ſhould be fully convinced of his right to the ſupremacy, that nothing would more contribute to that end than a free uſe of the ſcriptures; by which they would be aſſured that the pope's authority was not founded on the word of God. Henry no ſooner ſignified his approbation to this propoſal, than Gardiner vehemently oppoſed it; and the two prelates diſputed on the ſubject in the preſence of the king, who decided in favour of Cranmer, telling the other he was but a novice, in compariſon with his learned and experienced antagoniſt. Letters patent were therefore granted to the ſecretary, importing, that the ſubjects of England ſhould have the free uſe of the Bible tranſlated into their mother tongue, and that for five years there ſhould be no impreſſions of the Bible, or any part of it, but ſuch as he ſhould appoint.

At this period Anne of Cleves, who had been ſome time contracted to Henry by means of Cromwell, arrived in England. When the king heard of her landing at Rocheſter, he went thither incognito to ſee his future conſort, and found her ſo different from her picture, which had been drawn by Sir Hans Holbein, that in the violence of his paſſion he ſwore they had brought him a Flanders mare. Reflecting, however, that her brother the duke of Cleves, was one of the moſt conſiderable potentates in Germany; that her brother-in-law, the duke of Saxony, was the chief of the league of Smalcade; and that the emperor was then at Paris, endeavouring to detach Francis from the intereſt of England; he thought it moſt prudent to eſpouſe the princeſs, and the nuptials were ſolemnized on the ſixth day of January.

A. D. 1539.

The parliament having aſſembled on the twelfth of April, Cromwell opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he informed both houſes, that the king, in order to end all religious diſputes, had appointed commiſſioners to examine the controverted articles, that a rule of faith might be eſtabliſhed upon the word of God alone; and that after ſuch a ſtandard ſhould be fixed, he was determined to inflict the ſevereſt puniſhment on thoſe who ſhould dare to diſſent from the public creed; a determination nearly reſembling the decrees of that church, which Henry pretended to aboliſh. Theſe commiſſioners being approved by parliament, were ordered to begin their examination without delay; and in the mean time the king created Cromwell earl of Eſſex. During this ſeſſion, the order of the knights of St. John of Jeruſalem was diſſolved, on pretence of their attachment to the pope and emperor, and all their effects in England and Ireland confiſcated for the uſe of the king, who allotted three thouſand pounds yearly for their ſubſiſtence. Shortly after the prorogation of this parliament, the fall of Cromwell was reſolved on, and the means of effecting it concerted and executed. The duke of Norfolk, and biſhop Gardiner, did not fail to add to the diſcontent of the king, who had expreſſed great diſſatisfaction on account of the marriage. They repreſented, that the kingdom was filled with mal-contents on account of religion; that they looked upon Cromwell as the author of thoſe meaſures, which they diſapproved; that he had acquired an immenſe fortune by oppreſſion; and that the ſacrificing him to the reſentment of the public, would conciliate the favour of his ſubjects. The king, wrought on by theſe inſinuations, gave up his favourite to the vengeance of the people, hoping by that means to recover their affection. But this deſign was kept ſo ſecret, that he attended the council about the middle of June, when he was arreſted for high treaſon by the duke of Norfolk, and ſent priſoner to the Tower. The fall of this miniſter gave great ſatisfaction to the people, who now remembered the meanneſs of his extraction, the inſolence of his manners, and the ſelf-intereſted views of his whole conduct. His power was envied even by the reformers; whom, though he favoured, he could not protect; and therefore they attributed that to apoſtacy, which probably was only the effect of inability. The Romans hated him as the grand cauſe of all their calamities; and indeed he never favoured either party, but as it ſuited his intereſt. Cranmer alone, of all his friends, adhered to him in his diſtreſs, and went farther in eſpouſing his cauſe with the king, than any other man would dare to do; but all his interpoſition was ineffectual; for Cromwell, without being heard in his own defence, was, by a bill of attainder, found guilty of divers hereſies and treaſons, and condemned to ſuffer death, in whatever manner the king ſhould think proper to direct. This was ſucceeded by the diſſolution of the marriage between Henry and his new wife; a diſſolution on which he was determined, not only on account of his averſion to Anne of Cleves, but principally becauſe he was enamoured of Catharine Howard, daughter of lord Edmund, and brother to the duke of Norfolk. The king was highly pleaſed with Catharine, and Gardiner made frequent entertainments at his own houſe for the royal lover and his miſtreſs; the ſtratagem ſucceeded; the king was ſo pleaſed with his miſtreſs, that he offered to make her his partner in the throne; and in conſequence of this new connection, Cromwell, his miniſter, was executed without delay, all his ſervices being diſregarded or forgotten.

A. D. 1540. To procure a divorce from Anne of Cleves, now wholly engroſſed Henry's attention; and he found no difficulty in obtaining a deciſion from the convocation in his favour. The houſe of lords, with a committee of the commons, waited on the king with an addreſs, deſiring he would give orders for trying the validity of his marriage. A commiſſion was accordingly granted. They immediately proceeded to the examination of witneſſes, and the ſubſtance of their evidences amounted to theſe particulars; that there had been a pre-contract between the queen and the marquis of Lorrain; that the king having married againſt his will, had not given a pure, inward, and complete conſent; and that he had not conſummated the marriage. Theſe objections were certainly very frivolous; but as the queen made no oppoſition, they were thought ſufficient; ſentence was pronounced for a diſſolution of the marriage, and the deciſion of the clergy was ratified by the parliament. The queen expreſſed no diſſatiſfaction. She was ſatisfied on being informed, that the king would, by letters patent, declare her his adopted ſiſter, and give her precedence before all the ladies in England, except his own wife and daughters; that an eſtate of three thouſand pounds a year ſhould be allotted for her maintenance; and that ſhe might either live in England, or return to her own country. She choſe the former; and was even prevailed upon to write a letter to her brother, the duke of Cleves, informing him that ſhe had been treated in the moſt tender, generous manner by the king, though ſhe could not have him for her huſband; and conjuring him not to break the harmony that ſubſiſted between the two courts, on account of any thing that had happened to her in England. Thus was her marriage diſſolved on the moſt frivolous pretences that ever were urged before a court of juſtice. Soon after this divorce from Anne of Cleves, Henry married Catharine; the ceremony being performed on the eighth of Auguſt following. But this marriage had no effect on the cruelty of Henry, which ſeemed to have taken poſſeſſion of his ſoul. His councils being directed by Norfolk and Gardiner, the reformers underwent a ſevere perſecution, and the ſix bloody articles, as they were called, were rigorouſly executed. Dr. Barnes, Thomas Gerard, and William Jerome, vicar of Stepney, were condemned to the ſtake for hereſy; but they did not ſuffer alone: three bigotted catholics ſhared the ſame fate, and periſhed in the ſame flames, for denying the king's ſupremacy. Barnes diſcuſſed theological queſtions even at the ſtake; and as the debate between him and the ſheriff turned upon the invocation of ſaints, he ſaid, that he doubted whether the ſaints could pray for us; but if they could, he hoped, in half an hour, to be praying for the ſheriff and all the ſpectators. This promiſcuous puniſhment of proteſtants and catholics, gave occaſion to a foreigner then in England to ſay, that it was of no conſequence whether they were for or againſt the pope, ſince both loſt their lives for their opinions.

An inconſiderable rebellion broke out at this time in Yorkſhire, headed by Sir John Nevill; but being ſoon ſuppreſſed, Nevill and the other officers were executed. The king's ſuſpicion fell upon cardinal Pole, to whoſe intrigues he ſuppoſed this rebellion was owing; and this to him was a ſufficient reaſon for making the counteſs of Saliſbury, who then lay under ſentence of death, ſuffer for her ſon's offences. On the twenty-ſeventh of May, ſhe was led to the place of execution; and in theſe diſtreſſful circumſtances, this venerable matron ſtill maintained the ſpirit of that long race of monarchs from whom ſhe was deſcended. She abſolutely refuſed to lay her head on the block, alledging, that ſhe would not ſubmit to an unjuſt ſentence, when ſhe had received no trial; telling the executioner that if he would have her head, he muſt win it in what manner he could; and ſhaking her venerable locks, ran about the ſcaffold, while he followed her with his axe, aiming many ineffectual ſtrokes at her neck, before he could give her the fatal blow. Thus periſhed the daughter of the duke of Clarence, the laſt of the Plantagenet line, which had governed England during the ſpace of three hundred years. Soon after the counteſs of Saliſbury's death, lord Leonard Grey, who had formerly rendered ſervice to the crown, was alſo beheaded for treaſon.

A. D. 1541. The above inſurrection in the north, induced Henry to make a progreſs thither, in order to quiet the minds of the people, at the ſame time that he hoped to terminate thoſe diſorders, by puniſhing with the utmoſt ſeverity all who dared to diſturb the tranquillity of his kingdom. The inhabitants, who were no ſtrangers to the cruelty of his diſpoſition, endeavoured to deprecate his vengeance, by offering him a conſiderable ſum of money. Henry accepted the commutation, and deſiſted from carrying his inhuman deſigns into execution. Before he left London, he had diſpatched Sir Ralph Sadler into Scotland, to propoſe an interview with James V. Scotland had for ſome time felt the fury of the catholics, the reformation having reached that kingdom; while the torch of civil diſcord ſtill blazed both in the northern and ſouthern parts of the Britiſh iſles. Patrick Hamilton, a young man of noble family, deſigned for the church, having, about the year 1527, been ſent abroad for his education, imbibed the opinion of the reformers; and, on his return to Scotland, diſſembled not his religious ſentiments. A Dominican, who had inſinuated himſelf into his friendſhip, accuſed him before the archbiſhop of St. Andrews. He was tried; condemned to be burnt for his errors; and ſuffered with the reſolution of a hero. At the ſtake, he cited his accuſer to the tribunal of Jeſus Chriſt: and the Dominican, aſtoniſhed at his conſtancy, and touched, perhaps, with remorſe for his ungrateful conduct, ſoon after loſt his ſenſes, and expired. The death of Hamilton, who was now conſidered both as a prophet and a martyr, brought over a great number of proſelytes to the reformation. Among others, was friar Foreſt, who became a zealous preacher, extremely attached to the holy ſcriptures; which, in thoſe times, was conſidered as a ſure characteriſtic of hereſy. Foreſt was therefore brought to his trial, and condemned to the flames. While the prieſts were deliberating on the moſt proper place for his execution, one adviſed them to burn him in a cellar: for (ſaid he) the ſmoke of Mr. Patrick Hamilton affected all thoſe on whom it blew. Such was the ſtate of the reformation in Scotland, when James received the invitation from Henry to meet him at York. The nobility perſuaded him to accept the offer, hoping that if an union was formed between the two princes, they ſhould be enabled to enrich themſelves with the ſpoils of the church. The clergy were alarmed; they dreaded the conſequences of ſuch an interview; and determined, if poſſible, to prevent it. They repreſented the danger of making any innovations in the eſtabliſhed religion; the pernicious conſequences of aggrandizing the nobility, already too powerful; the hazard of putting himſelf in the hands of the Engliſh; and the dreadful ſituation of his country, ſhould he, by purſuing ſuch impolitic meaſures, loſe the friendſhip of France. At the ſame time they offered him a preſent gratuity of fifty thouſand pounds, Scots, and promiſed, that the church ſhould be always ready to contribute liberally to the neceſſities of the ſtate. Theſe repreſentations, aſſiſted by the influence of the queen, induced James to change his reſolution. He delayed his journey for ſome days, and then ſent excuſes to the Engliſh monarch, who waited for him at York. Henry was not of a temper to bear tamely this affront; he vowed the moſt ſevere revenge; but an event happened which rendered it neceſſary for him to return to his capital.

The agreeable perſon and diſpoſition of Catharine, had entirely captivated the king's affections, who thought himſelf very happy in his new marriage; but the queen's conduct was far from meriting his tenderneſs. One Laſcelles, while Henry continued at York, informed Cranmer of her diſſolute life, who had been little better than a common ſtrumpet. He offered to confirm his information by the evidence of his ſiſter, who had lived a ſervant in the family of the old ducheſs of Norfolk, at whoſe houſe the queen had been educated, and where ſhe had carried on a criminal intrigue with Derham and Mannock, two menial ſervants, whom ſhe had admitted to her bed. This intelligence, which it was as dangerous to conceal as to diſcover, Cranmer communicated to the earl of Hertford and the chancellor; and they agreeing that it ought not to be buried in ſilence, the prelate wrote a narrative of the whole, and conveyed it to Henry, who having peruſed it, was ſeized with inexpreſſible confuſion and aſtoniſhment; inſomuch, that at firſt he gave no credit to the information. However, the king's jealouſy and impatience, happily for Cranmer, who was in a very dangerous ſituation, would not ſuffer him to reſt till he knew the certainty of the matter. The privy-ſeal was therefore ordered to examine Laſcelles, but with ſuch precautions, as might preſerve the queen from ſcandal, ſhould ſhe be found innocent. Laſcelles perſiſted in what he had ſaid; and appealing to his ſiſter's teſtimony, that nobleman went to Suſſex, where the woman reſided, and found ſhe was extremely particular as to facts. Mannock and Derham were both arreſted, who had not the leaſt ſuſpicion of their danger. They both confeſſed repeated acts of impurity with the queen before her marriage. It was alſo proved, that ſhe had ſince entertained one Culpepper a whole night in her chamber. Three maids of the family were admitted into her ſecrets, and one of them had even paſſed the night with her and her lovers. When Henry received the report of theſe examinations, his grief and diſtraction deprived him of ſpeech; he could only vent his diſtreſs in a torrent of tears. He appointed the primate, the chancellor, the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Suffolk, and the biſhop of Wincheſter, to interrogate the queen. She at firſt denied the charge; but finding her illicit amours were fully diſcovered, ſhe confeſſed the whole to the archbiſhop, who wrote the narrative from her mouth, which ſhe ſigned with her own hand. Henry, now fully convinced of the infidelity of his queen, was determined to take a ſevere revenge on her and all her accomplices.

A. D. 1542.

In order to ſatiate his vengeance, a parliament, the uſual inſtrument of Henry's tyranny, was immediately ſummoned. The two houſes having received the queen's confeſſion, preſented an addreſs to the king, in which they entreated him not to be vexed with this untoward accident, to which all men were ſubject, but deſired leave to paſs a bill of attainder againſt the queen and her accomplices; and begged him not to give his aſſent to the bill in perſon, which, by renewing his grief, might endanger his health; but by commiſſioners appointed for that purpoſe; and there being a law in force, by which it was treaſon to ſpeak ill of the queen, they craved his royal pardon, if any of them ſhould tranſgreſs that ſtatute. On receiving a gracious anſwer, they voted a bill of attainder againſt the queen for high treaſon, and the viſcounteſs of Rochford, who had conducted her ſecret amours; and in this bill were alſo comprehended Culpepper and Derham. They paſſed at the ſame time a bill of attainder for miſpriſion of treaſon againſt the old ducheſs of Norfolk, the queen's grandmother; her uncle, lord Howard and his lady, the counteſs of Bridgewater, and nine other perſons, for knowing the queen's vicious courſe of life before her marriage, and concealing the ſame; as if Henry could expect that near relations would be ſo far inſenſible of natural affection and ſhame, as to reveal the ſecret criminal actions of their families. The king, however, pardoned the ducheſs of Norfolk, and moſt of the others condemned for miſpriſion of treaſon, though ſome of them were long detained in confinement. The parliament, among other curious matters, enacted, that any perſon who knew, or vehemently ſuſpected any guilt in the queen, and did not, within twenty days, reveal it to the king, or his council, ſhould be guilty of treaſon; and that if the king married any woman who had been incontinent, taking her for a true maid, ſhe ſhould be guilty of treaſon, unleſs ſhe previouſly revealed her guilt to him. The people made themſelves extremely merry with this clauſe. It was pleaſantly remarked, that the king muſt, for the future, look out for a widow, as no reputed maid would ever venture to incur the penalty of the ſtatute. Theſe acts being paſſed, the queen and lady Rochford were beheaded, the twelfth of February upon Tower-hill. Catharine Howard confeſſed her miſconduct in the former part of her life; but endeavoured to perſuade the world, that ſhe had never tranſgreſſed the rules of virtue ſince her marriage. Lady Rochford experienced very little pity from the ſpectators; her execution was conſidered as a judgment from heaven, for her having been the principal cauſe of the death of Anne Boleyn, and that of her own huſband. And this notorious inſtance of her profligate life, tended greatly to clear their characters in the opinion of the world.

Some time ſince Henry had appointed a commiſſion, conſiſting of two archbiſhops, ſeveral biſhops, and a conſiderable number of doctors of divinity, and by virtue of his eccleſiaſtical ſupremacy, had ordered him to aſcertain proper articles of belief, and to eſtabliſh uniformity of ſentiment in matters of faith and practice. Before the commiſſioners had made any conſiderable progreſs, the parliament had, in the laſt year, paſſed a law, by which they ratified all the tenets which theſe divines ſhould afterwards eſtabliſh with the king's conſent; and thus were not aſhamed of expreſsly declaring, that they took their religion upon truſt, and had no other rule, in ſpiritual concerns, than the arbitrary will of Henry. The produce of the labours of theſe commiſſioners, was a ſmall work, entitled, "The Inſtitutions of a Chriſtian Man; which was received by the convocation, and voted to be the ſtandard of orthodoxy. In this work the ſacraments, which a few years before were allowed to be three, were again augmented to ſeven, agreeable to the ſentiments of the Romiſh church. Soon after, the people had an opportunity of ſeeing another inſtance of the king's inconſtancy; for not being long ſatisfied with his inſtitutions, he ordered another book to be compoſed, called "The Erudition of a Chriſtian Man," and publiſhed this new model of orthodoxy by his own authority and that of his parliament. It differs from the former work; but Henry was no leſs poſitive in his new, than he had been in his old creed, and required the faith of the nation to veer about at his ſignals. In both theſe works the king took particular care to inculcate the doctrine of paſſive obedience. He now retracted the permiſſion he had ſo lately given his ſubjects in general to read the ſcriptures, reſtraining that conceſſion only to gentlemen, and even theſe were commanded to read in ſuch a manner, "that it be done quietly and in good order." He likewiſe made alterations in the miſſal, and ordained, that the name of the pope ſhould be eraſed, or blotted out of every book wherein it was mentioned. Thus by endeavouring to ſet bounds to the opinions of his ſubjects, and by entering himſelf into eccleſiaſtical diſputes, he induced them to apply to the ſtudy of divinity; and it was in vain for him, notwithſtanding his arguments, creed, and penal ſtatutes, to expect to bring his ſubjects to a cordial agreement with his religious ſentiments.

At this time Henry was determined to reſent the affront he had received from the king of Scotland. He complained of James having afforded an aſylum to ſeveral Engliſh rebels, and reproached him with breach of promiſe, with reſpect to the intended interview. He alſo, to give a more ſpecious colour to his hoſtile proceedings, obſerved, that his nephew had detained territories belonging to England. He likewiſe revived the old claim to the vaſſalage of Scotland, and ſummoned James to do homage to him for that kingdom, as his liege lord. James, on being apprized of his uncle's intention, began to put himſelf into a poſture of defence, but ſent two ambaſſadors to London, with terms of accommodation. Theſe, under various pretenſions, were detained, till Henry was ready to take the field; and were even then obliged to attend the army ſent into their country, under the command of the duke of Norfolk, whom Henry called the ſcourge of the Scots. The earl of Southampton was appointed to command the van; but he died at Newcaſtle, univerſally regretted for his abilities as a ſtateſman, and his approved courage and prudence as a general. On the twentieth of October, the Engliſh forces entered Scotland, and were met by a herald from James, who expoſtulated with the duke of Norfolk, on the injuſtice of invading the kingdom before any declaration of war had been publiſhed. But his remonſtrances were in vain: the Engliſh general ravaged all the country bordering on the Tweed, and retired to Berwick on account of the ſeverity of the weather. The earl of Huntley had indeed been ſent to James, with ten thouſand men; but his forces were ſo inferior to the Engliſh, that he was obliged to act wholly on the defenſive. Mean while the Scottiſh monarch levied an army of fifteen thouſand men; and being joined by the earl of Huntley with a train of artillery, he determined to invade England on the weſtern ſide of Solway Frith. James repaired thither in perſon, but when ready to take the field, he left the army under the command of Oliver Sinclair, his favourite, who was hated by the Scottiſh nobility. The conſequences of ſuch an imprudent action were ſoon apparent. The officers choſe to ſacrifice their king, their country, and their own honour, rather than ſerve under a perſon they deteſted; ſo that when Sinclair read his commiſſion, at the head of the army, the nobility retired from their poſts, and the ſoldiers following their example, threw down their arms, by which mutiny, uproar and confuſion univerſally prevailed. A body of five hundred Engliſh, under the command of Sir Thomas Warton, who hovered round the Scottiſh camp, to obſerve the motions of the enemy, perceiving the diſorder in their ranks, attacked them with ſo much fury, that they ſought their ſafety in a precipitate flight. The earls of Caſſils and Glencairn, the lords Maxwell, Fleming, Somerville, and Gray, the general Sinclair, with about two hundred gentlemen, and eight hundred common ſoldiers, were taken priſoners, and all their artillery and baggage fell into the hands of the Engliſh. This rout happened on the twenty-fourth of November, at Solway Moſs, in the neighbourhood of Carliſle. James was then at Caerlaveroc, where he received the alarming intelligence of the defeat and diſperſion of his army by an handful of Engliſh forces. Being of a high ſpirit, and the ſame time of a melancholy diſpoſition, he loſt all command of his temper. His rage againſt the nobility, by whom he imagined he had been betrayed; his ſhame at his army having been defeated by a handful of men, with his dread of the conſequences, had ſuch an effect upon him, that he would admit of no conſolation, but entirely abandoned himſelf to deſpair. His body waſted, his death evidently approached, and he had no iſſue living; when hearing that his queen was ſafely delivered, he aſked, with ſome emotion, whether ſhe had brought him a ſon or a daughter? Being told the latter, he turned himſelf in his bed, and exclaimed, ſaying, "The crown came with a woman, and it will go with one. How many miſeries await this poor kingdom! Henry will make it his own, either by arms or by marriage." A few days after he expired, on the fourteenth of December, in the flower of his age. James V. was a prince of conſiderable abilities and virtues; whoſe perſonal courage and vigilance, fitted him for repreſſing thoſe diſorders to which Scotland, during that age, was ſo much expoſed. He took care that juſtice was adminiſtered with impartiality and rigour; but as he ſupported the church, and the common people, againſt the rapine of the nobility, he did not eſcape the hatred of that order.

Henry was no ſooner informed of his nephew's death, than, as James had foreſeen, he projected the ſcheme of uniting Scotland to his own dominions, by marrying his ſon Edward to the infant heireſs of that kingdom. Having called together the Scotch noblemen, who were his priſoners, he ſeverely reproached them for their pretended breach of treaty; and then, ſoftening his tone, propoſed this marriage as a means of preventing for the future thoſe diſorders ſo prejudicial to both kingdoms; offering to reſtore them to liberty, without ranſom, on condition of their favouring the marriage. They readily aſſented to this propoſal; and being conducted to Newcaſtle, delivered hoſtages to the duke of Norfolk for their return, if the intended nuptials ſhould not be completed; and thence proceeded to Scotland, where affairs were in much confuſion.

A. D. 1543.

The primate, cardinal Beaton, had long been conſidered as principal miniſter of ſtate to James, and was at the head of the party which defended the privileges of the eccleſiaſtics.

cleſiaſtics. He had now put himſelf in poſſeſſion of the government, and with the aſſiſtance of the queen dowager, obtained the conſent of the convention of the ſtates; while James Hamilton, earl of Arran, who claimed that honour, was excluded. This nobleman was next heir to the crown by his grandmother, the daughter of James III. and therefore ſeemed beſt entitled to poſſeſs the high office into which the cardinal had intruded himſelf. The proſpect of his ſucceeding the infant princeſs, in caſe of her death, procured him many partizans. He was of a moderate genius, of a quiet diſpoſition, and favoured the reformation; whence thoſe who zealouſly promoted it were attached to him. By means of theſe adherents, joined to the vaſſals of his own family, and the noblemen who had been priſoners in England, he ſo effectually oppoſed the cardinal's adminiſtration, that he was declared governor; at the ſame time the cardinal was committed to cuſtody, under the care of lord Seton; and a negociation was ſet on foot for the marriage of the infant queen with the prince of Wales. But the cardinal primate having prevailed on Seton to reſtore him to liberty, he aſſembled the moſt conſiderable eccleſiaſtics: and repreſenting the imminent danger to which they were expoſed, perſuaded them to collect privately a large ſum of money; by means of which he engaged to overturn the ſchemes of his enemies. The partizans he acquired by pecuniary favours, repreſented the union of England as a certain forerunner of ruin to the church; and Sadler, the Engliſh ambaſſador, received many inſults from perſons whom the cardinal, in hopes of bringing on a rupture, inſtigated to commit theſe acts of violence. Sadler, however, prudently diſſembled the matter, till the day appointed for the delivery of the hoſtages, and then ſummoned thoſe who had been reſtored to liberty, to fulfil their promiſe of returning into captivity; but all of them refuſed to obey, except Gilbert Kennedy, earl of Caſſils, who preferred his honour to his liberty. Henry was ſo charmed with his noble behaviour, that he received him with great marks of eſteem, loaded him with preſents, and gave him his liberty without ranſom. Beaton was not diſpleaſed at this refuſal of the priſoners, though it reflected diſgrace on their country. He well knew that they muſt now depend wholly on the government for ſupport, and oppoſe the Engliſh with all their power. A war was now expected between the two kingdoms, and Francis engaged to ſupport the intereſt of Scotland. But however deſirous the French monarch might be of aſſiſting his Scottiſh allies, the war he was already engaged in with the emperor, rendered it very difficult to ſend forces ſufficient to ſupport them againſt the power of the Engliſh monarch. Matthew Stuart, earl of Lenox, was then at the French court; and Francis being informed, that he was engaged in an antient, hereditary enmity with the family of Hamilton, by whom his father had been murdered, propoſed that he ſhould viſit his native country, and join in ſupporting the cardinal and the queen-mother; promiſing that a ſupply of money, and, if neceſſary, even military ſuccours ſhould be ſent after him. He was alſo flattered with the hopes of eſpouſing the queen-dowager; and in caſe of the death of Mary, the infant princeſs, of aſcending the Scottiſh throne in preference to the earl of Arran, whoſe legitimacy was liable to ſome objections. Tempted by theſe alluring proſpects, Lenox returned to Scotland, and on his arrival, exerted all his intereſt for breaking off the marriage treaty. He aſſembled a conſiderable number of forces, in order to wreſt the young queen from the hands of the regent; who being unwilling, or unable to contend with his enemies, agreed to an accommodation. This important point being gained, the queen and the cardinal, who had now no farther occaſion for the aſſiſtance of Lenox, deſired Francis to recal him: but the earl, informed of their deſign, withdrew to his caſtle of Dumbarton, and the following year threw himſelf into the arms of the Engliſh.

This oppoſition in Scotland to Henry's views, confirmed him in the reſolution he had before taken, of uniting his arms to thoſe of the emperor, who earneſtly courted his alliance. A league was therefore formed in which the two monarchs agreed to enter France, each with an army of twenty-five thouſand men, and to require of Francis to pay Henry all the ſums he owed him, and to depoſit Andres, Terouene, Montreuil, and Bologne, as a ſecurity for the regular payment of his penſion for the future. Should theſe conditions be rejected, they agreed to challenge for Henry the crown of France, or at leaſt the duchies of Normandy, Aquitaine, Guienne; and for Charles the duchy of Burgundy, with ſome other territories. A meſſage was now ſent to the French king, requiring him to renounce his alliance with the Turks, and to make reparation for the damage the infidels had done in Chriſtendom. Francis refuſed a compliance with the haughty demand, and a declaration of war was the conſequence. In the mean time an event happened, which gave the reformers ſome hopes of enjoying their religion unmoleſted. On the twelfth of January, the king had married Catharine Parr, the widow of Nevil, lord Latimer; a woman of great virtue, and well affected to the reformed religion. By this marriage Henry fulfilled the prophecy uttered in jeſt, that he would be obliged to marry a widow. But this event did not put an end to the perſecutions carried on againſt the reformers; for a few days after the king's marriage, Anthony Perſonne, a prieſt; Robert Teſtwood, a ſinging man; and Henry Fulmer, a taylor; were, at the inſtigation of Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, burnt at Wincheſter for reading the writings of the reformed. At the ſame time the biſhop's own ſecretary was executed for denying the king's ſupremacy.

In France the campaign was opened by the duke of Cleves, an ally of Francis, who gained a victory over the emperor's forces. Francis in perſon made himſelf maſter of the whole duchy of Luxemburgh, without reſiſtance; and afterwards taking Landrecy, added ſome fortifications to it. Charles at length aſſembled a powerful army in the Netherlands, and having taken almoſt every fortreſs in the duchy of Cleves, reduced the duke to ſubmit to ſuch terms as he was pleaſed to preſcribe. Being then joined by ſix thouſand Engliſh, he inveſted Landrecy, and covered the ſiege with an army of upwards of forty thouſand men. Francis advanced at the head of an army which was little inferior, as if he intended to give battle to the emperor, or to force him to raiſe the ſiege; but while the two armies were facing each other, the French king found an opportunity of throwing ſuccours into Landrecy, and then made a ſkilful retreat; on which Charles, finding the ſeaſon far advanced, went into winter quarters.

A. D. 1544.

A period being put to military operations, Henry ſummoned a parliament, which met on the 14th of January; and after declaring the prince of Wales, or any of the king's male iſſue, firſt and immediate heir to the crown, reſtored the princeſſes Mary and Elizabeth to the right of ſucceſſion; yet Henry would not allow the act to be reverſed, which had declared them illegitimate; but prevailed on the parliament to confer on him the power of ſtill excluding them, if they refuſed to ſubmit to any conditions he ſhould be pleaſed to impoſe on them. In this parliament the law of the ſix articles was mitigated; and it was enacted, that no perſon ſhould be tried upon any accuſation for offences comprized in that ſanguinary ſtatute, except on the oath of twelve perſons: that no perſon ſhould be arreſted for any ſuch offence before he was indicted; and that any preacher, charged with ſpeaking in his ſermon contrary to theſe articles, muſt be indicted within forty days. In the ſame ſeſſion, Henry made no mention of a ſupply; but as his wars both in France and Scotland, together with his uſual prodigality, had involved him in great expence, he filled his coffers by other methods. Though he had a little before cauſed all his debts to be aboliſhed, he required new loans from his ſubjects, and raiſed the price of gold from forty-five ſhillings, to forty-eight ſhillings an ounce; and ſilver from three ſhillings and ninepence, to four ſhillings an ounce. He even coined ſome baſe money, and ordered it by proclamation to paſs current. He appointed commiſſioners for levying a benevolence, by which he extorted above ſeventy thouſand pounds from the people. Read, alderman of London, refuſing to contribute his ſhare, or not coming up to the expectation of the commiſſioners, was enrolled as a foot ſoldier, and ſent with the army into Scotland, where he was taken priſoner. Roach, who had been equally refractory, was caſt into priſon, and obliged to pay a large compoſition, before he could recover his liberty. Thus all the valuable privileges of Engliſhmen were ſacrificed to the lawleſs will of a tyrant.

A. D. 1545. The whole winter was employed by Francis in fitting out a fleet to invade the coaſts of England. They ſailed early in the month of July; and on the eighteenth advanced towards the Engliſh fleet, then riding at St. Helens. Here a cannonade began, which laſted ſeveral hours, but with very little effect, the art of gunnery being then in its infancy. Finding their attempt to deſtroy the Engliſh ſhips abortive, they landed on the Iſle of Wight, where they committed the moſt dreadful ravages, till the militia of the country advanced againſt them, and drove them to their ſhips. The king now found it impoſſible for him to ſupport this expenſive war, without having recourſe to his parliament, who granted him a ſmall ſubſidy. The clergy were more liberal, and it is remarkable, that during the eſtabliſhment of the catholic religion, greater ſums were always contributed by the church than the laity. Hence the emperor, when he was informed of the ſuppreſſion of the Engliſh monaſteries, and of Henry's profuſe donations of their revenues among his courtiers, is reported to have ſaid, not knowing that trade and commerce are the true ſources of riches, "That Henry had killed the hen which brought him the golden eggs." But though the parliament were ſo remarkably tenacious of their own money, they were amazingly profuſe with regard to the ſubſtance of others. They now beſtowed on Henry all the revenues of the univerſities, chapels, and hoſpitals. The king, however, took care to inform the univerſities, that he meant not to incroach upon their endowments. Some idea may be formed of the proſtitution of this parliament by one of their ſtatutes, in which they acknowledge, that the king had always been by the word of God, ſupreme head of the church of England: that the biſhops and other eccleſiaſtics had no manner of juriſdiction, but by his royal mandate; and that he alone was inveſted with full authority, to correct all manner of hereſies, errors, vices and ſins. Henry made a long and elaborate ſpeech to his parliament, in which he complained of the diſſentions that prevailed among his ſubjects with regard to religion. He told them, that the ſeveral pulpits were become a kind of batteries againſt each other; where one preacher called another heretic and anabaptiſt, which were retaliated by the opprobrious terms of papiſt and hypocrite: that he had permitted his people the uſe of the ſcriptures, not in order to furniſh them with matter for diſpute and railing, but that he might enable them to reform their conſciences, and inſtruct their families: that he was grieved to the heart to find how that precious jewel was proſtituted, by being introduced into converſation at every alehouſe, and employed as a pretence for decrying the ſpiritual and legal paſtors: he was ſorry to obſerve, that the word of God, while it was the object of their enquiries, had very little influence on their practice; and though an imaginary knowledge ſo much abounded, charity was daily going to decay. Theſe obſervations were certainly juſt; but the example of the king, who encouraged diſputes, was ill adapted to promote that charity and peaceable diſpoſition to the eſtabliſhed opinion he ſo ſtrongly recommended.

The war between England and France was diſtinguiſhed by no great events. While Charles was employed in the ſiege of St. Diſier on the Marne, which made a brave defence, the Engliſh forces aſſembled in Picardy; on which Henry, inſtead of marching forward to Paris, laid ſiege to Bologne; and the duke of Norfolk to Montreuil. During the courſe of the ſiege, Charles had taken St. Diſier, when finding the ſeaſon much advanced, and that all his ſchemes for ſubduing France were likely to prove abortive, he liſtened to terms of accommodation with Francis; and to obtain a pretence for deſerting his ally, ſent a meſſenger to require Henry to meet him before Paris with his army. Henry anſwered that he could not raiſe the ſiege of Bologne with honour, and that Charles had firſt broken the agreement, by beſieging St. Diſier. The emperor, upon receiving this anſwer, concluded a peace with Francis at Creſſy, in which no mention was made of England. After which he ordered his troops to depart from Picardy. Henry, who had taken Bologne, was now obliged to raiſe the ſiege of Montreuil, and returned to England. Mean while the war with Scotland was conducted feebly, and with various ſucceſs; and principally conſiſted in inroads made by the Engliſh into that country. At length the Scottiſh leaders, in order to induce their troops to make a ſteady defence, ordered all their cavalry to diſmount, and reſolved to wait the aſſault of the Engliſh, on ſome high grounds near Ancram. The Engliſh, whoſe paſt ſucceſſes had made them deſpiſe the enemy, on ſeeing the Scotch horſe led off the field, thought the whole army was retiring, and haſtened to the attack. The Scots received them in good order; and being favoured by the ſurprize of the Engliſh, who expected no reſiſtance, and alſo by the advantage of the ground, ſoon put them to flight, and purſued them with great ſlaughter. Evers and Latoun, the two Engliſh commanders, were both ſlain, and above a thouſand men made priſoners. The victory was obtained by the Scots on the ſeventeenth of February. Some time after Francis ſent them three thouſand five hundred auxiliaries; on which the governor aſſembled an army of fifteen thouſand, at Haddington; then marching to the eaſtern borders of England, laid waſte the country wherever he came with little reſiſtance; after which he returned into Scotland, and diſbanded his army. The earl of Hertford revenged this inſult by ravaging the middle and weſt marches.

A. D. 1546. Theſe misfortunes induced Henry, whoſe animoſity againſt Francis was neither violent nor perſonal, to think of liſtening to the terms which had been offered for a peace. He had ſufficiently gratified his capricious humour, by the ſhort war he had carried on againſt his former ally; and having reaſon to apprehend from his great increaſe in corpulency, and viſible decay of ſtrength, that his end was approaching, he was deſirous of finiſhing a quarrel, which might prove dangerous to the kingdom during the minority of his ſon. Francis being equally with Henry deſirous of a peace, it was concluded on the following conditions: "That the king of France ſhould pay regularly the penſion ſettled by former treaties: that Francis ſhould pay in eight years the ſum of two millions of golden crowns, in conſideration of the penſion, and the expence Henry had been at in reducing Bologne: that the king of England ſhould keep poſſeſſion of Bologne, together with its territories, till the whole debt was diſcharged: that when the ſums ſhould be paid to Henry, Bologne ſhould be reſtored to France, in the ſame condition as when taken by the Engliſh." In this peace the emperor was included; and with regard to Scotland, Henry agreed that it ſhould enjoy the ſame benefit, provided the Scots gave him no cauſe to make war upon them. Thus Henry terminated a war which had coſt him above one million, three hundred, and forty-three thouſand pounds ſterling; and all he had acquired in return, was only a bad ſecurity for a debt which did not amount to one-third of the value. All Henry's expeditions were much of the ſame kind.

However, this ceſſation of hoſtilities afforded the Engliſh monarch leiſure to attend to domeſtic affairs; and he ſoon found returning upon him his madneſs of introducing new ſyſtems of faith, and endeavouring to eſtabliſh uniformity of opinion among all ranks of people. He had hitherto ſtrictly ordered divine ſervice to be performed in no other language than the Latin; but he now permitted the litany, a conſiderable part thereof, to be celebrated in the vulgar tongue. He added to it one petition, "to be ſaved from the tyranny of the biſhop of Rome, and from all his deteſtable enormities." Cranmer endeavoured to induce Henry to make farther innovations, and had probably ſucceeded; but Gardiner, who was ſent on an embaſſy to Charles, writing to the king that the emperor threatened to break off all intercourſe with him, if he carried his oppoſition to the Romiſh religion to greater extremities, the ſucceſs of Cranmer's deſigns was for ſome time diſappointed. This year Cranmer loſt his moſt ſincere and powerful friend, Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk, brother-in-law to Henry. The queen-dowager of France, Suffolk's conſort, had died ſome years before. This nobleman was well affected to the reformation; took every opportunity to ſupport its profeſſors; and had always maintained a cordial and ſteady friendſhip with the king. Henry was informed of Suffolk's death, when ſitting in council; and immediately expreſſed his own ſorrow for the loſs, and extolled the merits of the deceaſed. He declared, that during the whole courſe of their friendſhip, his brother-in-law had never once attempted to injure an adverſary; and had never even whiſpered a word to the diſadvantage of any man. He then added, "Is there any of you, my lords, who can ſay as much of yourſelves?" Then looking round in all their faces, ſaw plainly the conſciouſneſs of guilt in their confuſion. Deprived of this ſupport, Cranmer became expoſed to the cabals of the courtiers. The catholics repreſented to Henry, that the ill ſucceſs of his laudable zeal for enforcing the truth, was entirely owing to the primate, whoſe encouragement and example were the ſecret ſupport of hereſy. Henry, ſeeming to yield, deſired the council to enquire into Cranmer's conduct. The primate being now conſidered as loſt, his old friends, as well as his enemies, began to treat him with contempt. He was obliged to ſtand among the ſervants ſeveral hours at the door of the council chamber, before he was admitted; and was then told, that they had determined to ſend him to the Tower. Cranmer inſtantly appealed to the king himſelf; but finding his appeal diſregarded, he produced a ring which he had received from Henry, as a pledge of his favour and protection. The council were now confounded, and on coming before the king, he ſeverely reproved them; obſerving, that he was well acquainted with the primate's merit, as well as with their malignity and envy, but was determined to curb all cabals; and ſince gentle methods were ineffectual, he would teach them by the ſevereſt diſcipline, a more dutiful concurrence in promoting his ſervice. The duke of Norfolk, Cranmer's principal enemy, apologized for their conduct; and declared, that their only intention was to ſet the primate's innocence in a full light, by bringing him to an open trial. Henry, however, was highly diſpleaſed with their conduct, and obliged them all to embrace Cranmer, as a proof of their cordial reconciliation.

But though Henry thus extended his favour to the primate, his pride and peeviſhneſs, which was increaſed by his declining ſtate of health, prompted him to puniſh, with freſh ſeverity, all who preſumed to differ from him in opinion, eſpecially in his favourite articles of faith. Anne Aſcue, a young woman of beauty and great merit, who had entered into a ſtrict connection with the queen, was accuſed of having denied the real preſence in the ſacrament; and the king, inſtead of paying the leaſt regard to her ſex and age, was the more provoked, that a woman ſhould dare to oppoſe his ſentiments. Bonner, by his menaces, prevailed on her to make a ſeeming recantation; but ſhe qualified it with ſuch reſerves, that it did not ſatisfy that furious prelate. She was therefore thrown into priſon, where ſhe compoſed prayers and diſcourſes to ſtrengthen her reſolution to ſuffer. Anne now wrote to the king, declaring, that with regard to the myſtery of the euchariſt, ſhe believed as much as Chriſt had revealed of it, and as much as the catholic church required; but as ſhe could not be brought to acknowledge her aſſent to the king's explications, this declaration was conſidered as a freſh inſult. Wriotheſley, then chancellor, who was ſtrongly attached to the catholic party, being ſent to examine her with reſpect to her patrons at court, ſhe refuſed to diſcover any of her friends; and though put to the torture in the moſt cruel manner, ſhe ſtill continued reſolute in preſerving an inviolable ſecrecy. Her conſtancy exceeded the barbarity of her perſecutors, and baffled all their efforts. She was then condemned to be burnt alive; but her limbs being ſo diſlocated by the rack that ſhe could not ſtand, ſhe was carried in a chair to the ſtake. With her were conducted John Laſſels, one of the king's houſhold, Nicholas Belenian, a prieſt, and John Adams, a taylor, who had been ſentenced to ſuffer the ſame puniſhment, for a ſimilar crime. When they were tied to the ſtake, the chancellor ſent to inform them, that their pardon was ready drawn and ſigned, if they would recant their errors. They, however, only conſidered this offer, as a new ornament to their crown of martyrdom; and beheld with tranquillity the executioner kindling the flames by which they were to be conſumed. Even in the midſt of theſe, they ſeemed to glory in their ſufferings. The fidelity of Anne Aſcue ſaved the queen on this occaſion; yet ſhe ſoon after found herſelf in the utmoſt danger of falling a victim to the dogmatical zeal of her huſband. Henry, who was now of a bad habit of body, was afflicted with an ulcer in his leg, which threatened his life, and at the ſame time increaſed that peeviſh paſſionate temper to which he was ſubject. The tenderneſs of Catharine was remarkable on this occaſion; ſhe attended him with the utmoſt aſſiduity, and uſed every method in her power to ſooth his pains, and prevent thoſe dreadful guſts of humour ſo frequent and fatal in their conſequences. The king's favourite topic in converſation was polemical divinity; nity; and Catharine was frequently obliged to diſcuſs the more abſtruſe tenets of religion with him. Whether her arguments were too ſtrong for the king to anſwer, or whether ſhe inadvertently dropt ſome expreſſions that ſhewed ſhe was attached to the Lutheran principles, is not abſolutely known; but it is certain, Henry, provoked at her preſuming to differ from him, complained of her obſtinacy to Gardiner, who, glad of an opportunity to inflame the quarrel, praiſed the king's anxious concern for preſerving the orthodoxy of his ſubjects; and ſhrewdly obſerved, that the more elevated, and the nearer to him the perſon chaſtized, the greater terror would be ſtruck by the example, and the more glorious would the ſacrifice appear to poſterity. The chancellor, on being conſulted, corroborated Gardiner's opinion; and Henry, hurried on by his impetuous temper, and encouraged by his counſellors, ordered articles of impeachment to be drawn up againſt the queen. The articles were ſoon after brought to be ſigned. Fortunately for Catharine, the chancellor dropped the fatal paper, which being found by one of the queen's friends, was immediately put into her hands. She was ſenſible of her extreme danger, but did not deſpair of eluding the efforts of her enemies; and paying her uſual viſit to the king, found him in a more placid temper than ſhe expected. He began to diſcourſe on his favourite ſubject, and ſeemed to challenge her to enter upon it; but ſhe gently declined the converſation, obſerving, that ſuch profound ſpeculations were ill ſuited to the natural weakneſs of her ſex. Women, by their firſt creation, ſhe ſaid, were made ſubject to men: the male being created after the image of God, the female after the image of the male: it was the huſband to chuſe principles for his wife, and the duty of the wife to adopt implicitly the ſentiments of her huſband; and as to herſelf, it was doubly her duty, from her being bleſſed with a huſband, who by his rare judgment and learning, was not only qualified to chuſe principles for his own family, but for the moſt wiſe and knowing part of the nation. "Not ſo, by St. Mary," replied the king. "You are now become a doctor, Kate, and better fitted to give, than receive inſtruction." To this ſhe meekly replied, that ſhe was ſenſible how little ſhe was entitled to theſe praiſes; that though ſhe did not uſually decline any converſation, however ſublime, when propoſed by his majeſty, ſhe was ſenſible that her thoughts could be of no ſervice, but to give him a little momentary amuſement; that ſhe found converſation was apt to languiſh, when it was not revived by ſome oppoſition; and ſhe ſometimes ventured to pretend to be of contrary ſentiments, in order to give him the pleaſure of refuting her; and by this innocent artifice ſhe alſo propoſed to engage him to diſcourſe on topics, whence ſhe had obſerved, by frequent experience, that ſhe reaped much profit and inſtruction. "And is it ſo, ſweet-heart?" replied the king; "We are now perfect friends again." He then embraced the queen with great affection, and ſent her away with aſſurances of his kindneſs and affection. On the day following, her enemies, to whom this ſudden change was unknown, prepared to convey her to the Tower, agreeable to the king's warrant. Henry and Catharine were converſing amicably in the garden, when the chancellor appeared with forty of the purſuivants. The king went to him as he ſtood at ſome diſtance, and reproached him in the ſevereſt terms; frequently calling him, which Catharine overheard, knave, fool, beaſt; and at length ordered him to depart his preſence. She afterwards interpoſed to mitigate the king's anger; on which he cried, "Poor ſoul, you little know how ill entitled that man is to your good offices." The queen, from thenceforward, took great care not to offend Henry by the leaſt contradiction: and Gardiner, who had maliciouſly endeavoured to widen the breach, could never after again regain his favour.

A. D. 1547.

Soon after Henry's tyrannical diſpoſition broke out againſt the duke of Norfolk, who was by his birth allied to the throne, and had diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his ſervices to the ſtate. He was uncle to two of Henry's queens, and conſidered as the greateſt ſubject in the kingdom. He was an implacable enemy to the reformers, and had taken every opportunity to enforce the laws againſt them. The earl of Surrey, his ſon, was a young nobleman of great merit, but of very little diſcretion. Hurried away by his ambition, and exaſperated by ſome affronts he had lately received, he very imprudently irritated the peeviſh humour of Henry by certain menacing expreſſions; and the king, perſuaded that he entertained views of marrying the princeſs Mary, determined to prevent the great power of his family from becoming formidable to the government during his ſon's minority. Both Norfolk and Surrey were arreſted, and ſent priſoners to the Tower. The accuſation of the earl of Surrey conſiſted of his having entertained in his family ſome Italians, who were ſuſpected to be ſpies from his holineſs; he was accuſed alſo of a correſpondence with cardinal Pole, one of his domeſtics having paid a viſit to that prelate in Italy; and becauſe the earl quartered the arms of Edward the Confeſſor upon his eſcutcheon, he was ſuſpected of aſpiring to the crown; though it was well known this had been done, with the approbation of the heralds, during many years. However frivolous theſe charges may now appear, they were then thought ſufficient to find him guilty of high treaſon. He is ſaid to have made at his trial a moſt eloquent and ſpirited defence; yet he was condemned by the lord chancellor, and, on the twelfth of December, beheaded on Tower-hill. This noble earl was diſtinguiſhed by every accompliſhment that became a ſcholar. He had made ſome ſucceſsful attempts in poetry; and being ſeized with the romantic gallantry of that age, had in every maſque and tournament celebrated the praiſes of his miſtreſs, by his pen and his lance. He encouraged the fine arts by his patronage and example; he excelled in all military exerciſes; his ſpirit and ambition were equal to his talents and his quality. The innocence of the duke of Norfolk was ſtill more apparent than that of his ſon; though his ducheſs, with whom he lived on bad terms, had been ſo baſe as to inform his enemies of all ſhe knew againſt him, as did alſo Elizabeth Holland his miſtreſs; yet his accuſers could diſcover no greater crime than his having ſaid that the king was ſickly, and could not hold out long, and that the kingdom, from the diverſity of religious opinions, was likely to fall into diſorders. Henry well knew that all the accuſations he could alledge againſt him, would not be ſufficient to find him guilty in a trial before his peers. He therefore ordered a bill of attainder to be preferred againſt him, and he was declared guilty of high treaſon, without evidence, or being heard in his own defence. Cranmer had for many years been of the oppoſite party, and received many injuries from the duke; yet he refuſed to have any ſhare in a tranſaction, which reflected diſgrace on all who were concerned in it. When therefore he was informed, that the commons had paſſed the bill, he retired to his ſeat at Croydon, appearing no more at court, till he was ſent for to aſſiſt the king in his laſt moments.

Theſe now approached with haſty ſteps. The hour of his diſſolution was at hand; but Henry was become ſo froward, that no perſon had courage to inform him of his dangerous ſituation; and as ſome, during this reign, had ſuffered the puniſhment of traitors for foretelling his death, all were afraid, leſt, in the tranſports of his rage, he ſhould, on this pretence, inflict death on the author of ſuch friendly intelligence. At length, Sir Anthony Denny ventured to inform him of the fatal ſecret, and to exhort him to prepare for his diſſolution. The king heard him with patience; expreſſed his reſignation; and deſired that Cranmer might be ſent for; but before the archbiſhop arrived he was ſpeechleſs, though he retained his ſenſes. The prelate deſired him to give a ſign of his dying in the faith of Chriſt; on which he ſqueezed his hand with great fervency, and immediately expired, on the twenty-eighth of January, in the fifty-ſixth year of his age, and the thirty-eighth of his reign. When he was taken ill, fearing leſt Norfolk ſhould eſcape him, he ſent to deſire the commons to haſten the bill: they obeyed; and the king having affixed the royal aſſent to it by commiſſion, iſſued his mandate for execution on the morning of the twenty-ninth of January; but news arriving at the Tower that Henry had expired that night, the lieutenant deferred obeying the warrant; and the council thought it not adviſeable to begin a new reign with the death of the greateſt nobleman in the kingdom, eſpecially as his ſentence was conſidered both as tyrannical and unjuſt.

Near a month before his deceaſe, Henry had made his will, in which, purſuant to an act of parliament, he ſettled the ſucceſſion upon prince Edward and his iſſue; then to the lady Mary; and next to the lady Elizabeth; but with this condition, that the two princeſſes ſhould not marry without conſent of the council he had appointed for the government of his minor ſon, under the penalty of forfeiting their title to the crown. After his own children, he ſettled the ſucceſſion on Frances Brandon, daughter to his ſiſter the queen of France, by the duke of Suffolk; and then on Eleanor Brandon, the younger ſiſter of Frances; thus paſſing over the poſterity of his eldeſt ſiſter the queen of Scotland. By another clauſe, he named the following ſixteen executors; the archbiſhop of Canterbury; the lord chancellor; the earl of Hertford, uncle to young Edward; the lord St. John; the lord Ruſſel; the lord viſcount Liſle; Cuthbert Tunſtal, biſhop of Durham; Sir Anthony Brown; Sir Edward Montague; the chief juſtice Bromley; Sir William Paget; Sir Anthony Denny; Sir William Herbert; Sir Edward Watton, and his brother Dr. Watton. To the lords, appointed his executors, he left five hundred marks, and to the commoners three hundred; and enjoined them to diſcharge all his debts. He made the prince of Wales heir to all his moveables; but ſtrictly charged him to be ſubject to the advice and control of his council, till he ſhould be eighteen years of age. He left three thouſand pounds per annum to each of his daughters, with ten thouſand pounds addition, as their whole fortune, if his executors thought proper. To the queen he left three thouſand pounds in plate and jewels, and a thouſand pounds in money. Another clauſe of his will ſuggeſted, that he was far from being ſettled with regard to his notions in religion; ſeeing he left a ſum for maſſes to be ſaid for delivering his ſoul from purgatory, though he had deſtroyed every inſtitution his anceſtors and others had eſtabliſhed for the ſuppoſed benefit of their ſouls; and though in all the articles of faith he had publiſhed during his latter years, he had left the doctrine of there being ſuch a place as purgatory doubtful. By his firſt wife, Catharine of Spain, he had two ſons, and one daughter; namely, Henry, born January the firſt, 1511, and who died on the twenty-ſeventh of February following; and another ſon, who died ſoon after his birth. His daughter was Mary, who aſcended the throne on the death of her brother Edward. By his ſecond wife, Anne Boleyn, he had the famous queen Elizabeth, and a male child ſtill born. By his third wife, Jane Seymour, he had a ſon, named Edward, who ſucceeded him immediately in the throne. By his three wives, Anne of Cleves, Catharine Howard, and Catharine Parr, he had no iſſue. By Elizabeth, widow of Gilbert Taillebois, he had a natural ſon, named Henry Fitzroy, created duke of Richmond and Somerſet, and afterwards made lord lieutenant of Ireland, who died in the eighteenth year of his age.

During this reign, the only expedient employed to ſupport the military ſpirit, was the revival and extenſion of ſome old laws for the encouragement of archery; but the countenance given to letters by Henry and his miniſters, contributed to render learning faſhionable in England; and Eraſmus mentions, with great ſatisfaction, the regard paid by the nobility and gentry to men of knowledge. The king himſelf having a taſte for letters, he encouraged the ſame in others, and founded Trinity-college in Cambridge. Wolſey founded Chriſt-church in Oxford, which he intended to call Cardinal-college: but upon his fall, before he had entirely finiſhed his ſcheme, all the revenues were ſeized by the king; and this violence is ſaid to have given that miniſter greater concern than all his other misfortunes. Henry, however, afterwards reſtored its revenues, and only changed its name.

In this reign, attempts were made to fix the wages of artificers: luxury in apparel was prohibited by repeated ſtatutes; and ſome of the king's miniſters were empowered to fix the prices of poultry, cheeſe, and butter; as alſo thoſe of beef, veal, pork, and mutton. Beef and pork were ordered to be ſold at a half-penny a pound, and veal at near three farthings, the money of that age. In 1544, an acre of good land in Cambridgeſhire let at a ſhilling, which is about eighteen-pence of our preſent money.

It was not till the end of this reign, that either ſallads, turnips, carrots, or other edible roots, were produced in England, all theſe vegetables being formerly imported from Flanders and Holland. When queen Catharine wanted a ſallad, ſhe was obliged to ſend a meſſenger thither on purpoſe. The planting of hops, and the uſe of them, were introduced from Flanders about the beginning of this reign.

In 1546 a law was made for fixing the intereſt of money at ten per cent. which was the firſt legal intereſt known in England. All loans of that nature were formerly conſidered as uſurious. The intereſt of money was, in the preamble of this act, treated as illegal and criminal; and the prejudices againſt it were ſo ſtrong, that in the following reign the law allowing intereſt was repealed.

At this time, the Engliſh artificers in general were much ſurpaſſed in dexterity, induſtry, and frugality, by foreigners: hence aroſe violent animoſities; the former complaining, that all their cuſtomers left them, and went to foreign tradeſmen. In 1517, the Engliſh artificers being moved by the ſeditious ſermons of one Dr. Bele; and the artifices of Lincoln, a broker, raiſed an inſurrection in London, in which the apprentices and others began by breaking open the priſons, where ſome perſons were confined for inſulting foreigners. They then proceeded to the houſe of Meutas, a Frenchman, where they killed ſome of his ſervants, and plundered his goods. Neither the mayor, nor Sir Thomas More, ſo greatly reſpected in the city, were able to appeaſe them: they even threatened cardinal Wolſey, who was obliged to fortify his houſe. Tired at laſt with theſe diſorders, they diſperſed, when ſome of them were ſeized by the earls of Shrewſbury and Surrey. A proclamation was then iſſued, that women ſhould not meet together to babble and talk; and that all men ſhould keep their wives in their houſes. The next day the duke of Norfolk entered the city at the head of thirteen hundred armed men, and enquired into the tumult; on which Bele, Lincoln, and ſeveral others, were ſent to the Tower, and condemned for treaſon. Lincoln, and thirteen others, were executed; and the other criminals, amounting to four hundred, were brought before the king with ropes about their necks; when falling on their knees, they cried for mercy, whereupon Henry diſmiſſed them without farther puniſhment.

READERS,

As we are now treating of miſcellaneous articles, we take this opportunity to return you our hearty thanks for the attention and encouragement you have obligingly afforded us hitherto. Through the whole of this work, the writer has endeavoured without intentionally offending either the members of his own, or any other communion, ſtate partizans, and ſectaries of different denominations, to relate every fact with juſtice, clearneſs, and preciſion. It has been his earneſt deſire, that in every page, truth ſhould guide his pen, and impartiality dictate to his heart. His abilities may not be ſo ſplendid as ſome of his predeceſſors, who have travelled the ſame road before him, but for integrity, combined with indefatigable induſtry, he will not give place to any one. He has aſſiduouſly endeavoured to merit your approbation, and it is natural for him to flatter himſelf, that he has not wholly laboured in vain. If a love of fame is a univerſal paſſion, de does not wiſh to be ſingular; but he deſires only an honourable reputation, which is the main ſpring of human action. In the courſe of reading, you have doubtleſs met with ſeveral particulars, not to be found in any other performance of the like kind; and to render this hiſtory agreeable to his public profeſſions, a New and Complete Work, as alſo ſtill more to gain your good opinion, he propoſes at the cloſe of this and ſome ſucceeding reigns, to preſent you with the lives of our moſt eminent reformers; or memoirs of thoſe great characters who were the chief inſtruments of delivering the church of England from its dependence on the church of Rome. We ſhall begin with the life of Thomas Cromwell.

Memoirs of the life of Thomas Cromwell, earl of Eſſex, and knight of the garter.

THOMAS, Lord CROMWELL, was an eminent friend and ſupporter of archbiſhop Cranmer; a principal inſtrument in the reformation, and a lively example of the inſtability of all worldly grandeur, which flouriſhes to day like a blooming flower, to morrow is cut down and deſtroyed, and all its fair beauty is known no more.

His father was a blackſmith at Putney; and of conſequence cannot be ſuppoſed to have been capable of beſtowing any extraordinary education upon him. He improved however what he had; and having attained to the ſkill of writing and reading, and to ſome ſmall knowledge of the Latin tongue, (which indeed was the ſtandard learning of thoſe times) he determined when he grew up, to travel; and accordingly went abroad, though in what capacity, or at whoſe expence, we know not; he received great advantage in his travels, gaining a knowledge not only of ſeveral modern languages, but alſo of mankind; and at length was retained at Antwerp, by the Engliſh merchants there, as the clerk or ſecretary to their factory.

But an opportunity preſenting itſelf of viſiting Rome, he relinquiſhed his office and readily embraced it. The church of St. Botolph, at Boſton in Lincolnſhire, had at that time a famous gild of the Virgin, to which ſeveral popes had granted large indulgences, which were then highly valued, and very beneficial to the holy ſociety. Deſirous of having them renewed by the then pope Julius II. they diſpatched two perſons, with a conſiderable ſum of money to Rome, to procure this renewal. Theſe men met with Cromwell at Antwerp; and finding him well fitted to ſolicit the cauſe, to which they conceived themſelves unequal, they perſuaded him to go along with them. Accordingly he went and was of ſingular ſervice to them. For finding, that the readieſt way to the pope's favour was by courting his appetite, he preſented him with ſome fine diſhes of Engliſh jelly, which was then unknown at Rome; which ſo delighted the taſte of his holineſs, that, commanding them to teach his cooks the method of making this jelly, he readily granted Cromwell and his Lincolnſhire friends the pardons and indulgencies they came to requeſt.

Cromwell had, at this time, very little regard for religion, as he uſed frequently to confeſs in his future days, with regret, to his worthy friend Cranmer. His life was buſy and wild; he ſerved as a ſoldier under the duke of Bourbon, and was at the ſacking of Rome; and at Bologne he aſſiſted John Ruſſel, afterwards earl of Bedford, in making his eſcape, when he had like to have been betrayed into the hands of the French. The writings of Eraſmus, however, then made ſo much noiſe in the world, that they drew the attention of Cromwell; and it is a remarkable inſtance of his memory and induſtry, that in his journey to and from Rome, he learned by heart the whole New Teſtament of that writer's tranſlation; which probably laid the foundation of that proteſtant and reforming ſpirit, whereby he ſo much diſtinguiſhed himſelf afterwards.

Upon his return to England from his travels, he was taken into the family and ſervice of cardinal Wolſey, who at that time ruled deſpotic in the favour of king Henry. Cromwell's fidelity recommended him to the cardinal's high eſteem; he made him his ſolicitor, and aſſigned him the chief care of thoſe buildings at Oxford and Ipſwich, which he was erecting for the ſervice of knowledge.

Wolſey falling ſoon after into diſgrace with the king, Cromwell ſhewed the integrity and gratitude of his ſoul, by uſing every effort to procure his reſtoration; and when articles of high treaſon were ſent down to the houſe of commons, of which Cromwell was then a member, he defended the cardinal with ſo much eloquence and underſtanding, that no treaſon could be laid to his charge. Thus he procured great reputation, and his honeſty and abilities were equally commended.

The cardinal's houſhold being diſſolved, Cromwell, recommended by Sir Chriſtopher Hales, maſter of the rolls, and Ruſſel, earl of Bedford, was admitted into the king's ſervice; though the king, from ſome wrong repreſentations, reſpecting the demolition of the ſmall monaſteries for Wolſey's colleges, had conceived prejudices againſt him, which ſeveral about the court were very willing to inflame. However, upon converſing with the king, reſpecting the diſputes he then had with the pope, he ſo much approved himſelf to his majeſty, that he took him into the higheſt degree of favour. The firſt remarkable ſervice he did the king, was his preparing the way for an abolition of the pope's ſupremacy in his realms. Cromwell told him, that while the clergy took the oath, they then were uſed to take, to the pope, he was but an half king; convinced of which, the king gave him his ring, ſent him to the convocation then ſitting; where he proved to the biſhops, that they were all under a premunire; in that they had not only conſented to the power legatine of the cardinal, but becauſe they had all ſworn to the pope, contrary to the fealty of their ſovereign lord the king, and therefore had forfeited to the king all their preferments and poſſeſſions. The biſhops were confounded; but upon his producing the oath, they could not deny it; and were content to buy their peace by a preſent to the king of one hundred eighteen thouſand eight hundred and forty pounds.

Honours now began to fall thick upon him. In the year 1531, he was knighted; and ſucceſſively promoted from one great place to another, till at length, in the year 1539, he was conſtituted earl of Eſſex, and lord high chamberlain of England. He was made in ſucceſſion maſter of the king's jewel-houſe, and a privy counſellor, clerk of the hanaper, chancellor of the exchequer, principal ſecretary of ſtate, and maſter of the rolls, chancellor of the univerſity of Cambridge, lord keeper of the privy ſeal, knight of the garter, a baron of the realm under the title of lord Cromwell of Okeham in Rutlandſhire; where a privilege, in memory of him, remains to this day; the people claim a ſhoe (or a gratuity in its ſtead) from the foot of every baron's horſe which enters that town; and in the caſtle, (of which he had a grant from king Henry) and upon the caſtle gate, there are now many ſuperb gilt horſe ſhoes, which have been given by different noblemen, who have paſſed through Okeham.

But the offices in which he laboured moſt effectually for the ſuppreſſion of popiſh ſuperſtition, were thoſe of viſitor general of the monaſteries throughout England, and vicar general and vicegerent over all the ſpirituality under the king, who was now declared ſupreme head of the church, the pope's ſupremacy being aboliſhed in England. And under this high character Cromwell ſat above the archbiſhop, as the king's repreſentative.

Not elevated by his power, he proceeded with indefatigable induſtry and zeal to promote the reformed religion. Towards which nothing conduced more than the abominable ſcenes which were diſcovered in the abbies and monaſteries, as well as the ridiculous impoſtures which were carried on in many of them. "Had nothing, ſays an hiſtorian, appeared againſt thoſe religious foundations, but the vice and profligacy of the abbots, abbeſſes, nuns, and friars, the people would have naturally thought that the inſtitution, which was good in itſelf, ought not to have been aboliſhed for the corruption of the members, who might have been changed and reformed. But a more effectual method was choſen, for opening the eyes of the people, with reſpect to the pretended ſanctity of relics, images, and all the other trumpery of ſuperſtition. The viſitors were inſtructed to examine, and, if poſſible, diſcover the arts by which the minds of the vulgar were infatuated; and then the whole machinery of monkiſh impoſture was detected: not but that the ſcandalous vices practiſed in convents were likewiſe publiſhed, in order to undeceive the nation. The impurities of Sodom and Gomorrah are ſaid to have been exceeded at Battle-abbey, Chriſt-church in Canterbury, and ſeveral other convents. They found innumerable inſtances of whoredom, adultery, onaniſm, and other unnatural luſts and beaſtly practices; with arts to prevent conception, and procure abortion, among the nuns who were debauched. With reſpect to monkiſh idolatry and deceit, Reading ſeems to have been the repoſitory of the nation: there the viſitors found an angel with one wing, who brought over the head of the ſpear which pierced the ſide of Jeſus Chriſt, with ſuch an inventory of other relics, as filled up four ſheets of paper. At St. Edmundſbury they ſeized ſome of the coals that roaſted St. Lawrence, the parings of St. Edmund's toes, the penknife and boots of Thomas à Becket, a great quantity of the real croſs, and certain relics to prevent rain, and the generation of weeds among corn. The houſe of Weſt-acre had pawned a finger of St. Andrew for forty pounds, but this the viſitors did not think proper to redeem. There was a crucifix at Bexley in Kent, diſtinguiſhed by the appellation of the Rood of Grace, which had been long in reputation, becauſe it had been ſeen to bend and raiſe itſelf, to ſhake the head, hands and feet, to roll the eyes, and move the lips. This puppet being brought to London, (by the order of lord Cromwell) was broke in pieces, in ſight of the people, at St. Paul's-croſs, where, with their own eyes, they ſaw the ſprings by which it had been actuated."—Theſe, and a thouſand other inſtances of monkiſh deluſion, were diſcovered, which ſerved greatly to ſupport the friends of the reformation, and to diſparage the popiſh cauſe.

Cromwell however did not think it ſufficient to reſt in a demolition of popery; he uſed every proper endeavour to ſpread real knowledge, and to diffuſe the ſacred light of pure inſtruction through the nation. Favoured by Anne Boleyn, and aſſiſted by Cranmer, this great man procured an explanation of the principal branches of true religion to be printed and diſperſed; enjoined reſidence upon the clergy; gave them orders to preach no more upon the abſurdities of popiſh ſuperſtition, but upon the ſubſtantial duties of chriſtianity; he adviſed them to exhort the people to teach their children the great eſſentials of the Chriſtian faith, the creed, the Lord's prayer, the commandments, &c. in their mother tongue: and, as the moſt important work of all, he not only procured a tranſlation to be made of the ſcriptures into the Engliſh language, but alſo enjoined every pariſh to purchaſe one copy of the largeſt ſort, that it might be conſtantly read in the churches. This was the death-blow of popery, as reformation owes its life and continuance to the peruſal of the holy ſcriptures in the vulgar tougue.

While he was thus active in promoting true and ſound religion, free from the foppery of image-worſhip, and unpolluted with the falſe dependencies of pardons, bulls, maſſes, &c. he carried his faculties ſo meekly, ſhewed at once ſo great and ſo humble a mind, and ſet ſo great an example of Chriſtian virtue, that the buſineſs of reformation flouriſhed happily under his hands. Two hundred poor people were every day ſerved at the door of his houſe in Throgmorton-ſtreet, with bread, meat, and drink, ſufficient for them. And his grateful remembrance, and remuneration of ſome old friends, who had ſerved him in his low eſtate, gained him a general eſteem.

Amongſt the reſt, his kindneſs to Freſcobald, a Florentine merchant, muſt not be omitted, who had relieved Cromwell in Italy, when he was reduced to the utmoſt diſtreſs. Freſcobald himſelf being afterwards brought low, came to England to recover ſome debts, where the lord Cromwell finding him out, not only aſſiſted him in recovering his dues, not only paid him back what he lent him in Italy, but alſo made him a preſent of ſixteen hundred ducats more. And now that we are upon this ſubject, we cannot paſs by his gratitude to a poor woman that kept a victualling-houſe at Hounſlow, with whom Cromwell, in the days of his low eſtate, contracted a debt (mighty to her) of forty ſhillings, which he remembered, and repayed as ſoon as he was able, and ſettled a penſion of four pounds a year, (a conſiderable ſum in thoſe times) with the allowance of clothing, as long as ſhe lived. Many other inſtances of the ſame kind are related. "Infinite almoſt, ſays a writer of his life, were the private benefits which he did, in helping poor pious men and women out of trouble and great diſtreſſes.

Yea, his whole life was full of ſuch examples; being a man ordained of God to do good to many, eſpecially to deliver ſuch as were in danger of perſecution for the ſake of religion."

But his virtues were no ſecurity againſt the malice and envy of his enemies. His low birth rendered him offenſive to the nobility: his zeal for the reformation, to Stephen Gardiner, and the Roman catholics; ſome unpopular ſteps had irritated the nation; and the wife he had procured for king Henry from Germany, Anne of Cleves, not pleaſing the king, he began to loſe ground: add to this, that the monarch's amorous eye was caſt upon another lady, whoſe family were no friends to Cromwell. In ſhort, the virulence of his enemies prevailed; and though he was ſatisfied that he was too great to ſtand long, yet he was arreſted at the council-table, in conſequence of ſeveral high accuſations by the duke of Norfolk, when he leaſt ſuſpected it, and was ſent to the Tower.

He had the common fate of all diſgraced favourites; his ſummer friends forſook, his enemies inſulted him. Archbiſhop Cranmer only retained ſtill ſo much of his former ſimplicity, that he could not learn theſe court arts; and therefore the next day he wrote earneſtly to the king concerning him; in his letter he ſays—" Who cannot be ſorrowful and amazed, that he ſhould be a traitor againſt your majeſty? he who was ſo advanced by your majeſty? he whoſe ſurety was only by your majeſty? he who ſtudied always to ſet forward whatſoever was your majeſty's will and pleaſure? he that cared for no man's diſpleaſure to ſerve your majeſty? he that was ſuch a ſervant, in my judgment, in wiſdom, diligence, faithfulneſs, and experience, that no prince in this realm ever had? he that was ſo vigilant to preſerve your majeſty from all treaſons, that few could be ſo ſecretly conceived, but he detected the ſame in the beginning? If the noble princes of happy memory, king John, Henry II. and Richard II. had had ſuch a counſellor about them, I ſuppoſe they would never have been ſo traiterouſly abandoned and overthrown, as theſe good princes were."

But all this availed not; his enemies were determined to deſtroy him, and fearing his eloquence and abilities, they would not allow him a fair trial by his peers, but convicted him of hereſy and treaſon, he was condemned unheard, and upon the authority of a bill which he had unhappily promoted himſelf. He wrote to the king in the moſt pathetic terms:—" Wher' I have bene accuſyd, ſays he in his letter, to your Mageſtye of treaſon. To that I ſay, I never in alle my lyfe thought wyllingly to do that thyng that myght or ſholde diſpleaſe your mageſtye; and much leſs to do or ſay that thyng which of itſelf is ſo high and abominable offence; as God knowyth, who I doubt not ſhall reveal the trewthe to your highneſs. Myne accuſers your grace knowyth, God forgive them: for, as I ever had love to your honour, perſon, lyfe, proſperitye, helthe, welthe, joy, and comfort; and alſo to your moſt dere and moſt entyerly belovyd ſone, the prynce his grace, and your proceedyngs: God ſo helpe me in this myne adverſitie, and conffound me yf ever I thought the contrary. What labours, paynes, and travailes I have taken, according to my moſt bounden dutye, God alſo knowyth: for, yf it were in my power, (as it is in God's) to make your mageſtye to live ever young and proſperous, God knowyth I wolde; if it hadde bene, or were in my power to make yow ſo ryche, as ye myght enrych all men, God helpe me, as I wolde do hit. If it hadde bene, or were in my power to make your mageſtye ſo puyſſant, as alle the world ſholde be compellyd to obey yow, Chriſt he knowyth I wolde; for ſo am I of all othyr moſt bounde; for your mageſtye hath bene the moſt bountiful prynce to me, that ever was kyng to his ſubjects: ye, and more like a dere father (your majeſtye not offendyed) than a maſter. Such hath bene your moſt grave and godly counſayle towards me, at ſundry tymes. In that I offendid I ax yowr mercy. Should I now, for ſuch exceeding goodneſs, benygnyte, liberalitie, and bounty, be your traytor, nay then the greateſt paynes were too little for me. Should any faccyon, or any affeccyon to any point make me a traytor to your majeſtye, then all the devyls in hell confound me, and the vengeance of God light upon me; yf I ſholde once have thought yt, moſt gracious ſovereign lord.

——" Sir, as to your common welthe, I have aftyr my wytte, power and knowledge, travayled therein, havyng had no reſpect to perſons (your mageſtye only except) and my dewtye to the ſame; but that I have don any injuſtice, or wrong wylfully I truſt God ſhall bere my withes, and the world not able juſtly to accuſe me.——

——" Nevertheleſs, Sir, I have medelyd in ſo many matyers, under your highnes, that I am not able to anſwer them all. But one thyng I am well aſſured of; that wyllingly and wyttingly I have not had wille to offend your highnes: but hard it is for me, or any other, medelyng, as I have done, to live under your grace, and your laws, but we muſt daylie offend."—After which he proceeds to clear himſelf of ſome particular matters laid to his charge. And concludes the whole in theſe words.

" Wryten with the quaking hand, and moſt ſorrowful heart of your ſorrowful ſubject, and moſt humble ſervant and pryſoner, this Saturday, at your Tower of London."

In another letter to the king he concludes with theſe words: ——" beſeeching moſt humbly your grace to pardon this my rude writing, and to conſider that I a moſt woeful priſoner, ready to take the death, when it ſhall pleaſe God and your majeſty; and yet the frail fleſh inciteth me continually to call to your grace for mercy and grace for mine offences, and thus Chriſt ſave, preſerve, and keep you.

" Written at the Tower this Wedneſday, the laſt of June, with the heavy heart and trembling hand, of your highneſs's moſt heavy and moſt miſerable priſoner, and poor ſlave,

T. C.

" Moſt gracious prince, I cry for mercy, mercy, mercy."

The king was ſo much moved with this letter, that he cauſed it to be read three times. But the charms of Catharine Howard, the malice of the duke of Norfolk, and Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, the ſworn enemy of all the reformed, prevailed! and after ſix weeks impriſonment in the Tower, a warrant was ſent for his execution on Tower-hill.

When he came upon the ſcaffold, his affection for his ſon made him cautious in what he delivered, and leſs careful to aſſert his own innocence. "I am come hither to die, ſaid he, and not to purge myſelf, as maie happen ſome thynke, that I will, for if I ſhould do ſo, I wer a very wretch and miſer; I am by the lawe condemned to dye, and thanke my Lord God that hath appointed me thys deth for myne offence: for ſithence the time, that I had yeres of diſcretion, I have lived a ſinner, and offended my Lord God, for the which I aſke him hartely forgeveneſs. And it is not unknoune to many of you, that I have bene a great traveler in this worlde, and beyng but of a baſe degree, was called to high eſtate; and now I have offended my prince, for the which I aſke him hartely forgiveneſs, and beſeche you all to praie to God with me, that he will forgeve me. O Father forgeve me, O Son forgeve me, O Holy Ghoſt forgeve me, O three perſons in one God forgeve me, &c. After this kneeling down he went on with a prayer, which we will give at length, as it fully ſhews his religious ſentiments.—" O Lord Jeſus, which art the only health of all men living, and the everlaſting life of them which die in thee: I, wretched ſinner, to ſubmit myſelf wholly to thy bleſſed will, and being ſure that that thing cannot periſh which is committed to thy mercy: willingly now I leave this frail and wicked fleſh, in ſure hope, that thou wilt in better wiſe reſtore it unto me again at the laſt day, in the reſurrection of the juſt: I beſeech thee, moſt merciful Lord Jeſus Chriſt, that thou wilt, by thy grace, make ſtrong my ſoul againſt all temptations, and defend me with the buckler of thy mercy, againſt all the aſſaults of the devil. I ſee and know, that there is in myſelf no hope of ſalvation, but all my confidence, hope, and truſt is in thy moſt merciful goodneſs; I have no merits, nor good works that I may alledge before thee; of ſins and evil works, alas, I ſee a great heap; but yet, through thy mercy, I truſt to be in the number of them, to whom thou wilt not impute their ſins, but will take and accept me for righteous and juſt, and make me an inheritor of thine everlaſting kingdom. Thou, merciful Lord, was born for my ſake; didſt ſuffer hunger and thirſt for my ſake; didſt teach, pray, and faſt for my ſake; all thy holy actions and works, thou wroughteſt for my ſake; thou ſuffered ſt moſt grievous pains and torments for my ſake; finally, thou gaveſt thy moſt precious blood to be ſhed upon the croſs for my ſake; now, moſt merciful Saviour, let all theſe things profit me, that thou haſt freely done for me, which haſt alſo given thyſelf for me. Let thy blood cleanſe and waſh away the ſpots and foulneſs of my ſins: let thy righteouſneſs hide and cover my unrighteouſneſs; let the merits of thy paſſion and blood-ſhedding, be ſatisfactory for my ſins: give me, Lord, thy grace, that my faith waver not, but be firm and conſtant to the end; that my hope in thy mercy, and life everlaſting, may not decay; that love wax not cold in me. Finally, that the weakneſs of my fleſh be not overcome by the fear of death! Grant, O moſt merciful Father, that when death ſhall ſhut up the eyes of my body, that the eyes of my ſoul may ſtill behold and look upon thee, and when death hath taken away the life of my tongue, that my heart may cry and ſay unto thee, Lord, into thy hands I commend my ſoul; Lord Jeſus, receive my ſpirit. Amen."

Having finiſhed this prayer, he addreſſed himſelf to the people, deſiring them "to praie for the kynges grace, that he may long live with you in healthe and proſperitie. And after him, that his ſonne prince Edward (that goodly ympe) maie long reign over you. And once again, I deſire you to praie for me, that ſo long as life remaineth in this fleſhe, I waver nothyng in my faithe." After which he ſubmitted his neck to the executioner, who mangled him in a barbarous and terrible manner.

"Thus (ſays an able writer) fell Thomas lord Cromwell, under the weight of his fickle and cruel maſter's diſpleaſure, Henry VIII. after he had ſerved him with great faithfulneſs, courage, and reſolution, in the moſt hazardous, difficult, and important undertakings. As for the lord Cromwell's character, it is no wonder, that between papiſts and proteſtants it ſhould be various. The firſt repreſent him as a crafty, cruel, ambitions, and covetous man, and an heretic, (which contains all vices, with them, in one word); the latter aſſure us, that he was a perſon of great wit and excellent parts, joined to extraordinary diligence and induſtry: that his apprehenſion was quick and clear, his judgment methodical and ſolid, his memory ſtrong and rational, his tongue fluent and pertinent, his preſence ſtately and obliging, his heart large and noble, his temper patient and cautious, his correſpondence well laid and conſtant, his converſation inſinuating and cloſe; none more dextrous in finding out the deſigns of men and courts, and none more reſerved in keeping a ſecret. Though he was raiſed from the meaneſt condition to a high pitch of honour, he carried his greatneſs with wonderful temper, being noted, in the exerciſe of his places of judicature, to have uſed much moderation, and in his greateſt pomp to have taken notice of, and been thankful to mean perſons of his old acquaintance. In his whole behaviour he was courteous and affable to all; a favourer in particular of the poor in their ſuits, and ready to relieve ſuch as were in danger of being oppreſſed by their mighty adverſaries. He was one of the chief inſtruments in the reformation; and though he could not prevent the promulgation, he ſtopped the execution, as far as he could, of the bloody act of the ſix articles.—As he was good abroad, ſo was he alſo at home; calling his ſervants yearly to give an account of what they had got under him, and what they deſired of him, warning them to improve their opportunities; becauſe, he ſaid, he was too great to ſtand long; providing for them as carefully as for his own ſon, by his purſe and credit, that they might live as handſomely when he was dead, as they did when he was alive. In a word, we are aſſured, that for piety towards God, fidelity to his king, prudence in the management of his affairs, gratitude to his benefactors, dutifulneſs, charity and benevolence, there was not any one then ſuperior to him in England."—And it deſerves to be remembered, that he preferred more men of integrity and abilities, both eccleſiaſtics and laymen, than any one of his predeceſſors in power had ever done. Reader, admire and imitate his great example.

His monument bore the following inſcription:

Cromwell, ſurnamed the Great,
Whom Wolſey firſt raiſed
From the forge, to eminent good fortunes;
Whom Henry the eighth uſed as his inſtrument
To ſuppreſs the pope's ſupremacy, and to diſſolve religious ſtructures;
Whom he advanced to the higheſt pitch of honour and authority;
Whom he caſt down ſuddenly, and bereft both of life and dignities;
Lies here interred.

Character of king Henry VIII.

Lord Herbert has juſtly remarked, that the hiſtory of this prince is his beſt character and deſcription. Indeed his conduct was ſo different in the different periods of his life, and he was ſo frequently inconſiſtent with himſelf, that to give an accurate ſummary of leading qualities, which conſtitute a character, is a very difficult taſk. In his youth he was ſincere, open, gallant, and liberal; in his more advanced years, he became rapacious, arbitrary, froward, fretful, and ſo wantonly cruel, that he ſeemed to delight in the blood of his ſubjects. His exterior qualities were fit to captivate the multitude, being handſome in his perſon; but in the latter part of his life he grew very corpulent. The regard which he acquired among foreign princes, is a circumſtance which entitles him in ſome degree to the name of a great prince; while the tyranny, the barbarity, and abſolute power he maintained at home, will not admit of his being termed a good one. A liſt of his vices would contain many of thoſe that are moſt diſhonourable to human nature; ſuch as injuſtice, cruelty, pride, arrogance, obſtinacy, profuſion, rapacity, preſumption, caprice, and pedantic bigotry: by which he was rendered a dupe to the flattery of his own courtiers, and, at times, to the intrigues of foreign princes. In his earlier years, when he had no hopes of aſcending the throne, he applied to his ſtudies with great ſucceſs, making a conſiderable proficiency both in philoſophy and divinity: yet his ſtock of knowledge was of little ſervice to himſelf, and much leſs to his people. He aſcended the throne, eſteemed for his affability, and generoſity, but theſe qualities degenerated gradually, into moroſeneſs and an inſatiable avarice; to which he ſacrificed every laudable principle. He arrogated to himſelf a lawleſs dominion over the reaſon of others, and ſet himſelf up as chief arbiter in all religious diſputes. He wreſted the ſupremacy from the ſee of Rome, rather from reaſons of ſtate, private convenience, and the impulſe of brutal paſſions, than motives of right reaſon, juſtice, and conſcience. Affecting a ſuperiority to human nature, he became a ſtranger to its tendereſt emotions, and a ſlave to its impetuous paſſions. He never contributed to happineſs, of which he was not to partake; if therefore there are any traces of beneficence in his life, they aroſe not from a view of alleviating the anxieties of others, but procuring repoſe for himſelf. His conduct, with reſpect to religion, ſtirred up many diſputants; while his bigotry and deſpotiſm blaſted the fruits of free enquiry. As he perverted law to the deſtruction of humanity, ſo he eſtabliſhed a religion of his own on the ruins of reaſon. But of all his diſgraceful foibles, his capricious amours are moſt glaring; and no human being, one would think, can read of a man in the character of a monarch, who having obtained poſſeſſion of the moſt deſirable object of his paſſion, could ſend her to the block, in order to pave the way for the gratification of a new, unwarrantable deſire, without ſhuddering at the hideous thought. The cruel fate of the unfortunate Anne Boleyn, will fix an eternal mark of infamy on his character; ſo that however foreign nations might reſpect his power, and his own ſubjects forget his vices, impartial hiſtory will regard Henry VIII. as a monſter. Nevertheleſs, though encircled with vices, he was evidently an inſtrument in the hand of Providence, to lay the foundation of thoſe civil and religious liberties, we, of this age, now enjoy. The great diſpoſer of all events frequently purſues means, to us the moſt improbable, hereby confounding the wiſdom of the wiſe, in order to execute his benevolent and gracious deſigns. In the hiſtory of the Jews, we find a remarkable ſucceſſion of good and bad kings, all of whom were made ſubſervient to the grand deſign of infinite wiſdom, the introduction of Chriſtianity; and here, in our Engliſh annals, we may plainly ſee, that the inordinate paſſions, and very vices of a proud, arrogant tyrant, were employed to procure mankind the ſecond moſt invaluable gift of heaven, the Proteſtant religion.

A. D. 1547. EDWARD VI. who, at the time of his father's death reſided at Hertford with his ſiſter Elizabeth, was conducted from thence by the earl of Hertford and Sir Thomas Brown, to the Tower of London, where he was received by the council, aſſembled in a body, and proclaimed king of England. The regent and counſellors had no ſooner taken poſſeſſion of their reſpective offices, than they departed from the late king's appointment in a principal article. It was intimated, that the dignity of government required that one of the number ſhould be choſen as a repreſentative of the king, who might receive addreſſes from foreign ambaſſadors, diſpatches from foreign miniſters, and whoſe name ſhould be uſed in all public buſineſs. This propoſal was oppoſed by the chancellor Wriotheſley, who repreſented this innovation as an infringement of the late king's will, which being ſtrengthened by act of parliament, could only be altered by the ſame authority by which it was eſtabliſhed. The executors and counſellors were of a different opinion; and readily acquieſced in a propoſal, which ſeemed well calculated to preſerve the public peace and tranquillity. It was therefore agreed to name a protector; and they made choice of the king's maternal uncle, the earl of Hertford; who being ſtrongly intereſted in his ſafety, and having no claim to inherit the crown, could never have any ſeparate intereſt to induce him to put Edward's perſon or authority in danger. This change in the adminiſtration was made known to the public by proclamation; and diſpatches were ſent to inform all foreign courts of it. All in poſſeſſion of any office now reſigned their former commiſſions, and accepted new ones in the name of the young king. Even the biſhops themſelves were obliged to make the ſame ſubmiſſion. They then, agreeable to Henry's intention a little time before his death, proceeded to ſupply the titles which had fallen by attainders, or the failure of iſſue; evidence was examined touching the particulars of Henry's promiſes; in conſequence of which they created Hertford the protector; duke of Somerſet, marſhal and lord-treaſurer; Wriotheſley, earl of Southampton; the earl of Eſſex, marquis of Nottingham; Dudley, viſcount Liſle, earl of Warwick; Sir Thomas Seymour, baron Sudley; and Sir Richard Rich, Sir William Willoughby, and Sir Edward Sheffield, were promoted to the dignity of barons. As ſoon as the obſequies of the late king were performed, young Edward was crowned with great magnificence on the twentieth of February; and after the ceremony an amneſty was publiſhed; from which, however, the duke of Norfolk, cardinal Pole, Edward Courtney, eldeſt ſon of the marquis of Exeter, with three other perſons, were excluded. The friends of religious liberty now congratulated themſelves on theſe new arrangements of government, openly avowing their ſentiments, even while the laws continued in full force againſt them. The king himſelf was educated in the reformed religion, and had already exhibited ſtriking proofs of genius, capacity, and an amiable diſpoſition, averſe to cruelty and perſecution.

The religion and politics of the earl of Southampton, who was of a fierce, turbulent diſpoſition, being very different from thoſe of the council, the protector reſolved to ſeize the firſt opportunity to expel him from the regency; nor was he long waiting for a pretence. Wriotheſley granted a commiſſion under the great ſeal, to empower four lawyers, Southwell, Tregonell, Oliver, and Bellaſis, to execute, in his abſence, the office of chancellor; a ſtep which he took of his own authority, without the conſent of the king, or the regents. On complaints being made to the council, they conſulted the judges, who determined, that the commiſſion was illegal, and that the chancellor, by preſuming to grant it, had not only forfeited the great ſeal, but was liable to puniſhment. The council ſummoned him to appear before them; when he endeavoured to ſhew, that if the commiſſion he had granted was illegal, it might be declared null and void, and all the ill conſequences of it eaſily prevented; but as he held his office by the will of the late king, founded on an act of parliament, he could not loſe it without a trial in parliament. Notwithſtanding this defence, the council declared he had forfeited his office; that he ſhould be fined, and conveyed to his own houſe, and there remain a priſoner during pleaſure. The duke of Somerſet now obtained a patent from the young king, in which he was named protector, with full regal power; and all the executors, except the earl of Southampton, were, with the twelve additional counſellors, aſſigned to him for a council. He reſerved a power of nominating others at pleaſure, and was bound to conſult ſuch only as he thought proper, without incurring penalties from any law, ſtatute, or proclamation. Thus the protector made himſelf maſter of the government: however, the connivance of the executors, and their acquieſcence, made this change univerſally ſubmitted to; and the young king diſcovering an extraordinary regard for his uncle, who was, in the main, a man of moderation and ſtrict probity, no objections were made to his aſſumed power. Men of ſenſe, who obſerved the nation divided by the religious zeal of oppoſite parties, eſteemed it neceſſary to entruſt the government to one perſon, who might, by checking the efforts of all parties, ſecure the public tranquillity.

The protector had, for a long time, been conſidered as a ſecret partizan of the reformers; and, being now freed from reſtraint, made no ſcruple of diſcovering his intention to correct all abuſes in the antient eſtabliſhed religion. He took care, that all who were entruſted with the king's education ſhould be proteſtants; and as the young prince grew extremely fond of every kind of literature, eſpecially of theological, for one of his tender years, it was foreſeen, that in the courſe of his reign the Romiſh religion would be totally aboliſhed in England. In all the duke of Somerſet's ſchemes to this end, he had conſtantly recourſe to the advice of Cranmer, who being poſſeſſed of moderation and prudence, was deſirous of bringing over the people by inſenſible innovations, to that ſyſtem of doctrines and diſcipline, which, in his opinion, was the moſt pure and perfect. He ſeems to have intended the eſtabliſhment of an hierarchy, which, from its being ſuited to a great and ſettled government, might remain a perpetual barrier againſt the efforts of Rome, and might retain the reverence of the people, after the firſt fervours of zeal were diminiſhed. The perſon who moſt zealouſly oppoſed the deſigns of Cranmer, was Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter; who, from his having diſpleaſed Henry, had no place in the council, but gained by his capacity, experience, and bigotry, the higheſt confidence of his party. He magnified the great wiſdom and learning of the late king, and inſiſted on the neceſſity of perſevering in conformity to the eccleſiaſtical model of that learned monarch, at leaſt till the young king ſhould be of age. He defended the uſe of images, which the proteſtants now openly attacked; and biſhop Ridley having decried holy water in a ſermon, he wrote an apology for it, and maintained, that, by the power of the Almighty, it might be rendered an inſtrument of doing good, equally as St. Peter's ſhadow, the hem of Chriſt's garment, or the clay and ſpittle laid upon the eyes of the blind.

An act of parliament having, in the laſt reign, inveſted the crown with legiſlative power, and royal proclamations, even during a minority, were armed with the force of laws, the protector, ſupported by this ſtatute, reſolved to employ his authority in favour of the reformers; and having, for a time, ſuſpended the juriſdiction of the biſhops, he appointed a general viſitation throughout England. The viſitors, who conſiſted of a mixture of clergy and laity, had ſix circuits aſſigned them; and beſides correcting the immoralities of the clergy, were inſtructed to bring the diſcipline and worſhip ſomewhat nearer to the reformed churches.

In conducting this delicate affair, Cranmer and Somerſet ſhewed the greateſt moderation. The viſitors were to retain, for the preſent, all images which had not been abuſed by idolatrous worſhip; to inſtruct the people not to deſpiſe the ceremonies that were not yet abrogated; and only to avoid ſome particular ſuperſtitions, as uſing of conſecrated candles, in order to drive away the devil; and the ſprinkling of their beds with holy water. In order to reſtrain the abuſes of preaching, twelve homilies were publiſhed, which the clergy were enjoined to read to the people; and all of that order were prohibited from preaching any where, but in their pariſh churches, without permiſſion. Theſe meaſures met with ſome oppoſition from Bonner, but he ſoon after retracted and acquieſced. Gardiner continued to oppoſe them with great ſteadineſs; which drawing on him the indignation of the council, he was ſent to the Fleet, where he was treated with ſome ſeverity. Tunſtal, biſhop of Durham, having alſo made ſome oppoſition to the new regulations, was diſmiſſed the council board; but, for the preſent, no farther ſeverity was exerciſed againſt him, he being a man of moſt unexceptionable character, and great moderation.

Let us now turn our attention to, and take a curſory view of, foreign affairs. The pope had at laſt, with much reluctance, and after long delays, ſummoned a general council, which was aſſembled at Trent, and was employed in aſcertaining the doctrines, and correcting the abuſes of the church. The emperor, deſirous of retrenching the court of Rome, and of gaining over the proteſtants, promoted the latter object of the council. The Roman pontiff, finding his own greatneſs concerned, deſired rather to employ them in the former: he inſtructed his legates to protract the debates, and to engage the divines in diſputes concerning the nice points of faith canvaſſed before them; but the legates ſoon found it neceſſary to interpoſe, in order to appeaſe the animoſities which aroſe among the divines, and to bring them to ſome deciſion. The difficulty of this taſk made them, under the pretence that the plague had broken out at Trent, ſuddenly transfer the council to Bologna, where they hoped it would be more immediately under his holineſs's direction. The emperor, in order to render religion ſubſervient to his views, reſolved to make uſe of the charge of hereſy, as a pretence for ſubduing the proteſtant princes, and oppreſſing the liberties of Germany; but found it neceſſary to prevent the combination of his adverſaries, by concealing his intentions under the deepeſt artifices. He ſeparated from the proteſtant confederacy, the palatine and the elector of Brandenburg. He made war on the elector of Saxony, and the landgrave of Heſſe; took the former priſoner, and by treachery, prevarication, and breaking a ſafe conduct he had granted to the latter, detained him captive. He now appeared to have reached the ſummit of his ambition; and while the German princes were aſtoniſhed at his ſucceſs, they were diſcouraged by receiving the news of the death of Henry VIII. and then of Francis I. who, in every calamity, were their uſual refuge. Henry II. who ſucceeded Francis in the throne, was leſs haſty in his reſolutions, and had leſs animoſities againſt the emperor Charles V. than his predeceſſor. Being governed by the duke of Guiſe and cardinal Lorrain, he liſtened to their advice, in giving immediate aſſiſtance to Scotland, his ancient ally; which had loudly claimed the protection of France, a little before the death of Henry. The religious diſputes and ſtruggles on account of the reformation in Scotland, became daily more violent; but the reſolution taken by cardinal Beaton, the primate, to employ the moſt rigorous puniſhments againſt the reformers, quickened its progreſs. Wiſhart, a gentleman by birth, was celebrated for his extenſive learning, his zeal, the purity of his morals, and for being poſſeſſed of talents neceſſary to draw the attention and affections of the people, ſo that he became a very popular preacher. The magiſtrates of Dundee, in which place he exerciſed his miſſion, were alarmed at his ſucceſs; and being unable or unwilling to treat him with great rigour, denied him only the liberty of preaching, and then baniſhed him out of their juriſdiction. Wiſhart, filled with indignation at his being thus rejected, together with the word of God, threatened them with ſome dreadful calamity, and withdrew to the weſtern part of the country, where he daily increaſed the number of his followers. Mean while the plague breaking out in Dundee, people exclaimed, that the town had drawn down the vengeance of heaven by expelling their pious preacher; and that the peſtilence would continue till he was recalled. Wiſhart no ſooner was informed of the ſentiments of the people in his favour, than he returned; but leſt the contagion ſhould ſpread by the aſſembling of multitudes together, he fixed his pulpit on the top of a gate, where the infected ſtood within, and the others without; and in this ſituation enforced his ſentiments with ſurpriſing ſucceſs. This made cardinal Beaton reſolve to ſtrike a terror into the minds of the people, by the puniſhment of their excellent preacher. He accordingly prevailed on Bothwell to arreſt him, and to deliver him into his hands, contrary to a promiſe he had made that unhappy man. The cardinal, being poſſeſſed of his intended victim, conducted him to St. Andrews, where he was tried, and condemned to the flames for hereſy. The cardinal, finding that though he had gained over Arran, the governor, to his party, he would not concur in Wiſhart's condemnation and execution, reſolved to bring him to puniſhment, by executing his ſentence without the aſſiſtance of the ſecular arm; and he himſelf beheld the diſmal ſpectacle from his window. Wiſhart, who ſuffered with the utmoſt reſignation, obſerved the triumph of his inſulting perſecutor, and foretold, that in a few days he ſhould lie in the ſame place, as low as he was now exalted. This prophecy of the patient martyr was ſoon after accompliſhed; for his diſciples, enraged by the cardinal's cruelty, formed a conſpiracy againſt him; and having joined with them Norman Leſly, who had been ill-treated by the primate, conducted their enterprize in the moſt ſecret manner. One morning early they entered the cardinal's palace, which he had ſtrongly fortified; and, though they were no more than ſixteen perſons, turned out a hundred tradeſmen and fifty ſervants, whom they ſeized ſeparately before their intentions were ſuſpected, and then ſhut the gates. The noiſe in the caſtle had alarmed the cardinal, who barricadoed the door of his chamber; but finding that they had brought fire in order to force an entrance, he opened the door, and reminding them that he was a prieſt, conjured them to ſpare his life. Two of the aſſaſſins then ruſhed upon him with drawn ſwords; but a third, named James Melvill, ſtopped their career, and, filled with the madneſs of enthuſiaſtic zeal, deſired them to reflect, that this ſacrifice was the work and judgment of God, and ought to be executed with becoming deliberation and gravity. Then turning the point of his ſword towards Beaton, he cried, "Repent, thou wicked Cardinal, of all thy ſins and iniquities, but eſpecially of the murder of Wiſhart, that inſtrument of God for the converſion of theſe lands. It is his death which now cries for vengeance againſt thee, and we are ſent by God to inflict the deſerved puniſhment; for here I proteſt, before the Almighty, that it is neither hatred of thy perſon, nor love of thy riches, nor fear of thy power, which moves me to ſeek thy death, but only becauſe thou haſt been, and ſtill remaineſt, an obſtinate enemy to Jeſus Chriſt, and to his Holy Ghoſt." Then, without allowing Beaton time to finiſh his prayers, or to expreſs repentance agreeable to his exhortation, he ran him through the body, and the cardinal fell dead at his feet. Scotland had the misfortune of five ſhort reigns, being ſucceſſively followed by as many long minorities. Juſtice had been continually interrupted by the cabals and factions of the nobility; and the hands of adminiſtration were now weakened by the death of the cardinal, who, though cruel, was poſſeſſed of great abilities. However, the queen-dowager, who was a woman of extraordinary talents and virtue, exerted herſelf as much as poſſible in ſupport of the government, in order to ſupply the weakneſs of Arran the governor.

The government of England having been ſettled, the protector bent his whole attention towards proſecuting the war with Scotland. He aſſembled an army of eighteen thouſand men, and equipped a fleet of ſixty ſail; one half of which were ſhips of war, and the other loaded with ammunition and proviſions. The command of the fleet was given to lord Clinton; while Somerſet himſelf, aſſiſted by the earl of Warwick, led the land forces. Alarmed at this powerful armament, the French ambaſſador applied, by orders from his Court, to the regency, deſiring that a negociation might be opened, in order, if poſſible, to reſtore peace between the two kingdoms, without the effuſion of human blood. This requeſt was complied with; and Tunſtal, biſhop of Durham, and Sir Thomas Rowe, were appointed to meet the Scottiſh commiſſaries at Newcaſtle, where the conferences were begun on the fourth of Auguſt. But the Engliſh plenipotentiaries refuſing to proceed, unleſs their preliminary of a marriage between the two ſovereigns ſhould be granted; and the Scottiſh commiſſioners declaring they had no power to conſent thereto, the negotiation was broke off, and the protector entered Scotland on the fourth of September. Previous to the commencement of hoſtilities, the duke publiſhed a manifeſto, in which he recapitulated the reaſons that induced the Engliſh to have recourſe to arms; urging, by a variety of arguments, even the neceſſity of the marriage of the young queen of Scots with the king of England. Theſe arguments were drawn from the ſituation of the two kingdoms, which nature, by ſurrounding them with the ocean, ſeemed to have deſigned for one nation; from the ſimilarity of the inhabitants in their laws, language, cuſtoms, and manners, whereby they were naturally adapted to be united, and to become one people; from the equality of the young king and queen, with regard to age and fortune; from the imminent danger to which Scotland was perpetually expoſed from the hoſtile attempts of a powerful and richer neighbour; and from the many advantages that muſt reſult to the inhabitants of both kingdoms, from living in a ſtate of peace and ſecurity. The protector added, that excluſive of theſe conſiderations, poſitive engagements had been made for concluding this alliance; and that the Scots were bound in honour to perform, what their intereſt and ſafety ſo ſtrongly demanded. The Scots, inſtead of aſcribing theſe reaſonable propoſals to their true cauſes, imputed them to fear, united with diſtruſtful circumſtances; and the protector ſoon found, that the attachment of the queen-dowager to France, and to the Romiſh religion, would render all his remonſtrances ineffectual: he therefore reſolved to compel the Scots, by force of arms, to adopt a meaſure, which no motives of policy or prudence could induce them to embrace. He accordingly continued his march towards Edinburgh, without meeting with any oppoſition, except from a few caſtles, which were eaſily reduced.

Arran had aſſembled the whole force of the kingdom; and his army, which was double in number to that of the Engliſh, had taken poſt at Muſſelburgh, on an advantageous ſpot of ground, ſecured by the river Eſke, about ſix miles from Edinburgh; and the Engliſh encamped at the village of Preſton-Pans, at the diſtance of about two miles from the enemy. In this ſituation, ſeveral ſkirmiſhes happened between the light troops of each army. Arran having detached the beſt part of his cavalry to inſult the Engliſh quarters; and theſe being attacked by lord Grey and Sir Francis Bryan, were entirely defeated, after a furious engagement, in which lord Hume was dangerouſly wounded, and about eight hundred Scots left dead on the field. Somerſet finding it impoſſible to draw the Scots to an action, and fearing he ſhould be diſtreſſed for want of proviſions, ſent an herald to Arran, offering to abandon his enterprize, and to pay all the damages the Scots had ſuffered from his troops, provided he would give his promiſe, that the young queen ſhould not be given in marriage to any foreign prince, till ſhe arrived at an age of chuſing an huſband for herſelf. The moderation of theſe terms induced the Scots to imagine that the Engliſh were intimidated, and that if they were attacked, the victory would be certain. At the ſame time the prieſts and monks, many of whom had entered the camp, made them to believe that the Engliſh were deteſtable heretics, who being abhorred of God, were expoſed to the divine vengeance, whence their arms could never be crowned with ſucceſs. A movement made by Somerſet towards the ſea, as if he intended to eſcape with his army on board the ſhips, confirmed them in this opinion. Elated with this imagination, and determined to cut off his retreat, they quitted their camp, croſſed the river Eſke, and advanced with great precipitation into the plain, where the Scottiſh regent drew up his army in three diviſions: the firſt, which conſiſted of his beſt troops, was commanded by the earl of Angus; the ſecond by the regent, and the third by the earl of Huntley. The earl of Argyle headed a body of Highland archers, who formed a guard to the artillery. The protector was much pleaſed at this motion of the Scottiſh army; and as the Engliſh had uſually been victorious in regular engagements, he conceived the moſt ſanguine hopes of ſucceſs. He formed his van on the left, fartheſt from the ſea, upon an aſcent, where he ordered them to remain, until the enemy ſhould approach. He drew up his main body, and his rear, towards the right; and beyond the van he poſted lord Grey, at the head of the men at arms, and directed them to flank the Scots, but not till the front of both armies ſhould be engaged. The enemy, advancing along ſhore, were galled with the artillery from the Engliſh ſhips; lord Graham was killed, and the Highlanders thrown into confuſion; when the lord Grey, obſerving their ſituation, neglected his orders, quitted his poſt, and at the head of his weary armed horſe attacked the Scottiſh infantry, hoping to decide the action by one vigorous effort. But he was checked in his career by a ditch, behind which were poſted ſome Scottiſh infantry armed with ſpears, who charged them ſo warmly, that lord Grey was wounded, his men routed, and their ſtandard in great danger of being loſt; and had the Scots been furniſhed with cavalry to have improved their advantage, a total overthrow of the Engliſh muſt have enſued; but as they were almoſt deſtitute in that reſpect, lord Grey had time to rally his horſe behind his infantry. Mean while the protector, Sir Ralph Sadler, and Sir Ralph Vane, exerted themſelves with great activity and ſucceſs in rallying the cavalry. Warwick diſcovered great preſence of mind in preſerving the ranks of the foot, on which the horſe had recoiled. He directed Sir Peter Meutas, captain of the foot arquebuſiers, and Sir Peter Gamboa, captain of ſome Italian and Spaniſh arquebuſiers, to advance on horſeback, with orders to fire on the Scottiſh infantry. They marched to the ſlough, and continually diſcharged their pieces full in the face of the enemy. The ſhips galled them in flank; the artillery, planted on an eminence, deſtroyed them in front: the Engliſh archers poured in upon them an inceſſant ſhower of arrows; and the van-guard advanced leiſurely, and in good order, from the hill. The van of the Scots being diſmayed, began to retreat, which was ſoon changed into flight, which was begun by the Iriſh archers. The panic communicated itſelf to the main body; and proceeding to the rear, the field became a ſcene of terror, confuſion, conſternation, and overthrow. The Engliſh obſerving this from the heights, began the purſuit with loud ſhouts, which ſtill added to the diſmay of the vanquiſhed. The horſe, eager to revenge the repulſe they had received in the beginning of the action, made great ſlaughter among the flying enemy; and for the ſpace of five miles, from the field of battle to Edinburgh, the ground was ſtrewed with dead bodies. The carnage was inexpreſſibly terrible. About three thouſand eccleſiaſtics, who made a ſeparate body, were maſſacred without mercy. Never was victory more deciſive, or purchaſed at an eaſier rate by the conquerors. The Engliſh loſt not more than two hundred men; but, according to the moſt moderate computation, above ten thouſand of the Scots were ſlain, and about fifteen hundred taken priſoners. This action, which was fought on the tenth of September, was called the battle of Pinkey, from a neighbouring nobleman's ſeat of that name. The queen-dowager and Arran fled to Stirling; while while the earl of Lenox and lord Wharton, entering the weſt marches at the head of five thouſand men, took and plundered Annan, and ſpread devaſtation over all the neighbouring counties. Had the protector improved his advantage, he might have compelled the Scots to ſubmit to any terms he could have impoſed; but he was impatient to return to England, where he heard cabals were forming againſt his authority, in which his own brother was a principal. Having therefore taken ſeveral caſtles, and reduced to ſubmiſſion ſome counties on the borders, he departed from Scotland. The fleet not only deſtroyed all the ſhips along the coaſt, but took Broughty in the Frith of Tay; and having fortified it, left a garriſon there. Arran, in order to gain time till ſuccours could arrive from France, deſired leave to ſend commiſſioners to treat of a peace: on which Somerſet, appointing Berwick for the place of conference, left Warwick with full powers to negociate; but the Scotch commiſſioners never appeared.

Somerſet, ſoon after his return to England, convened a parliament, and obtained a patent, empowering him to arrogate all the honours and privileges that any princes of the blood, or any uncles of the kings of England had ever poſſeſſed. He even obtained a patent appointing him to ſit on the throne, upon a ſtool or bench, on the right hand of the king. Theſe honours were invidious to the old nobility, and created the duke many powerful enemies. But if the protector diſcovered his vanity in aſſuming ſo much ſtate, he merited the higheſt applauſe on account of the ſtatutes, enacted through his influence, in this ſeſſion of parliament; by which the rigour of former ſtatutes were greatly mitigated, and ſome ſteps taken for ſecuring the liberties of the people. All laws were repealed which extended the crime of treaſon beyond the limits aſſigned it by the ſtatute of the twenty-fifth of Edward III. together with all laws made during the late reign for extending the crime of felony; all former laws againſt Lollards, or heretics; and the bloody ſtatute of the ſix articles: no perſon was to be accuſed of words, but within a month after they were ſpoken. That ſtatute which gave the force of law to the king's proclamations, was alſo repealed. Hereſy, however, ſtill continued to be a capital crime, puniſhable by fire; but as there now remained no preciſe ſtandard by which that crime could be aſcertained, it entirely depended upon the rigour or lenity of the judges. Thus, by theſe repeals, many of the moſt rigorous laws that had ever paſſed in England were annulled; and, after the prevalence of tyranny for a long ſucceſſion of years, ſome dawn both of civil and religious liberty began to appear. Several laws were alſo paſſed by this parliament, which greatly contributed to promote the reformation. The cup was reſtored to the laity; private maſſes were aboliſhed. The king was empowered to create biſhops, without any election of the chapter; and all proceſſes in the biſhops courts, thoſe of Canterbury excepted, were to be carried on in the king's name, and ſealed by his ſeal, as in the courts of common law. They alſo granted to Edward all the foundations for chantries, chapels, and colleges, of which Henry had not taken poſſeſſion. The preamble to this ſtatute premiſes, that theſe funds ſhould be employed to good and godly uſes, in erecting grammar ſchools, in farther augmenting the revenues of the univerſities, and in making better proviſion for the poor and needy. But the rapacious courtiers had already, in their imaginations, divided the ſpoil; and it was not long before it was ſhared out among them. Cranmer, and ſeveral other prelates, were of opinion, that the revenues of the church, by the impropriation of tythes, and other methods of alienation, were already too much reduced. The primate, therefore, ſtrenuouſly oppoſed the bill, and was joined by the biſhops of London, Ely, Norwich, Hereford, Wincheſter, and Chicheſter; yet, notwithſtanding this oppoſition, it was paſſed into a law. By this act, not fewer than two thouſand three hundred and ſeventy-four religious foundations fell into the hands of the crown. We have already obſerved, that the protector was obſtructed in the proſecution of the war in Scotland, by the intrigues of his brother Thomas, who had married Catharine Parr, the queen-dowager, and had lately been created lord high-admiral of England. He had already gained ſuch an aſcendancy over Edward, that he had perſuaded him to write a letter in his own hand to the houſe of commons, recommending him to their choice as governor of his perſon. Though this attempt ſtruck at the foundation of the protector's greatneſs, he ſtill endeavoured to reclaim his brother by gentle, munificent methods; but finding he was ſtill determined to purſue his ſchemes, Somerſet found it neceſſary to ſummon a parliament, as the only authority that could ſupport him againſt the machinations of his brother. Before the ſeſſion opened, he informed the council of the letter his brother had obtained from the young king, and which he propoſed to lay before the houſe. The council was alarmed at this circumſtance, and ſeveral lords were deputed to diſſuade the admiral from purſuing his raſh projects; yet he continued firm to his purpoſe, till the council threatened to deprive him of all his poſts, commit him to the Tower, and indict him upon the ſtatute which made it death for any perſon to diſturb the eſtabliſhed government. Theſe menaces awakened his attention. He ſaw the conſequences that might reſult from diſobeying the council, and thought proper to abandon his enterprize; but was never thoroughly reconciled to his brother.

A. D. 1548.

In the beginning of this year, the council made ſeveral alterations in the ceremonies of religion. They iſſued orders, forbidding the uſe of candles in proceſſions on Candlemas day; palms on Palm-Sunday; and proſtrations before the croſs on Good-Friday. They left the people at liberty to practice, or lay aſide, auricular confeſſion; and ordered all images to be removed from the churches. As the people were much diſtracted by the oppoſite opinions of their preachers, the council firſt endeavoured to remedy that inconvenience, by laying ſome reſtraints on preaching; but finding this expedient ineffectual, they impoſed a total ſilence on the preachers, and by this means put an end at once to all the polemical contentions of the pulpit: a reſtraint which, in the nature of things, could only be temporary. But the farther Somerſet proceeded in the reformation of England, the more averſe were the queen-dowager and the clergy of Scotland to an union with that nation. Beſides, the hoſtile attempts made againſt Scotland, being neither regular, nor puſhed to the laſt extremity, only ſerved to inſpire that nation with the ſtrongeſt averſion, which was courted in ſo violent a manner. Even the perſons who were inclined to the Engliſh alliance, were averſe to its being impoſed on them by force of arms; and the earl of Huntley pleaſantly ſaid, that he did not diſlike the match, but the manner of wooing. The queen-dowager obſerving, that theſe were prevailing ſentiments, called a parliament, in which it was propoſed that the young queen ſhould, for her greater ſecurity, be ſent to France. Some objections were made to this propoſal; but theſe being anſwered, and the arguments ſtrengthened by French gold, which was plentifully diſtributed among the nobles; and alſo by the zeal of the clergy, who dreaded the conſequences of the Engliſh alliance, it was determined to ſend the queen to her ancient ally. Accordingly the young queen, attended by the lords Areſkine and Levingſtone, embarked on board a fleet deſtined for France, and ſafely arrived at Breſt, whence ſhe was conducted to Paris, and was ſoon after contracted to the dauphin.

In the month of May the expected ſuccours from France arrived in the Frith, to the number of ſix thouſand, half of whom were Germans, with ſome pieces of artillery, under the command of D'Eſſe d'Eſpanvilliers. Small as this ſeaſonable ſupply was, it raiſed the ſpirits of the Scots under their miſfortunes. The ſiege of Haddington was immediately undertaken; and the Scots had the good fortune to ſurpriſe and cut off a party ſent to its relief, under the command of Sir Robert Bowes and Sir Thomas Palmer. But on the approach of the earl of Shrewſbury, at the head of twenty-two thouſand men, they raiſed the ſiege, and retired with great precipitation. Shrewſbury, however, made no attempt to diſtreſs the enemy: he contented himſelf with reinforcing the garriſon, and leaving a large ſupply of proviſions and ammunition in the place. This was effected without the leaſt oppoſition, and the earl immediately returned to England. While the war was thus weakly conducted in Scotland, the reformation, under the protection of Somerſet and Cranmer, gained great ground in England. The parliament meeting on the twenty-fourth of November, enacted a ſtatute, by which prieſts were permitted to marry; and another confirmed the new liturgy, which was much the ſame as that now uſed by our church of England. But though the protector was cordially attached to the progreſs of this work, prudence required that he ſhould proceed with caution, as the Romiſh religion had ſtill many votaries, and himſelf many enemies; among whom his own brother was the moſt inveterate and dangerous. He had renewed his former practices, and carried them to a much greater length. The queen dowager, his wife, had ſome time ſince died in child-bed; and he flattered himſelf with the hopes of eſpouſing the princeſs Elizabeth, who was then in her ſixteenth year, and ſeems to have liſtened to the inſinuations of a man poſſeſſed of every talent proper to captivate the affections of the fair. But as Henry had excluded his daughters from the ſucceſſion, if they married without the conſent of his executors, which Seymour could never hope to attain, it was concluded that he propoſed to effect his purpoſe by expedients ſtill more raſh and criminal. He could depend upon ten thouſand of his ſervants and retainers, and had provided arms for their uſe. He bribed all who had immediate acceſs to the king's perſon; endeavoured to bring over the young prince to his intereſt; vilified his brother's adminiſtration; and by his promiſes and perſuaſions, induced many of the principal nobility to join his party.

A. D. 1549. Somerſet, on being informed of theſe alarming circumſtances, endeavoured by gentle methods, and even heaping new favors upon the admiral, to bring him back to his duty, but all his endeavours proved ineffectual; he rejected every offer, and ſet his brother at defiance. The protector therefore now began to think of uſing more ſevere methods. He laid the whole of his conduct before the council; who drew up a charge againſt him, conſiſting of thirty-three articles, and he was committed to the Tower. This quarrel was inflamed by the earl of Warwick, who had formed a deſign of raiſing his own fortune on the ruin of both the brothers. This ſecret incendiary was the ſon of Dudley, one of Henry VII. judges. The late king had reſtored the blood of young Dudley, by act of parliament; and, finding him a man of abilities, entruſted him with many important commands; raiſed him to the dignity of viſcount Liſle; conferred on him the poſt of admiral; and gave him, by his will, a place among the executors. During the minority, Dudley obtained the title of earl of Warwick; and having undermined the credit of Southampton, was one of the chief of the protector's counſellors. But his vices obſcured all his virtues; for he had an exorbitant ambition, a contempt for juſtice, and inſatiable avarice; and finding lord Seymour, whoſe abilities he chiefly dreaded, was involving himſelf in ruin by his raſh conduct, he reſolved to remove the principal object of his greatneſs, by puſhing him down the precipice. Somerſet, finding his brother's ſeditious ſchemes endangering the public peace, was the more eaſily perſuaded by Warwick to proceed againſt him. Some of his accomplices were now taken into cuſtody; yet the protector ſtill ſuſpended the blow, and ſhewing himſelf unwilling to ruin his brother, offered to deſiſt from the proſecution, if he would promiſe to be cordially reconciled to him, renounce all his ambitious hopes, and be contented with enjoying a private life in the country. Seymour anſwered the friendly offer only by menaces. On which commiſſioners were ſent to interrogate him in priſon; but he refuſed to anſwer the queſtions that were put to him: deſired that his trial might proceed in a legal method; that the witneſſes might be confronted with him; and that the heads of his accuſations ſhould be laid before him. Theſe reaſonable demands were denied him; and a bill of attainder was preferred, which paſſed the houſe of lords without any material oppoſition. The commons were more ſcrupulous: ſome of the members objected againſt the whole method of proceeding by bills of attainder; and required a formal trial ſhould be given to every man before his condemnation. This oppoſition alarmed the miniſtry. A meſſage was ſent from the king, requiring them to proceed; ordering, at the ſame time, thoſe narratives which had ſatisfied the lords to be laid before them. This conceſſion produced the deſired effect; the bill paſſed in a very full houſe; near four hundred voted for it, when not above nine or ten were againſt it. The royal aſſent immediately followed, and lord Seymour was ſoon after, on the tenth of May, beheaded, contrary to the ſenſe of the nation in general, who, not without reaſon, accuſed the protector of cruelty and injuſtice, in depriving his brother of life, without legal proofs of the ſeveral articles of accuſation alledged, many of which were of a very frivolous nature.

Though the proteſtant reformers had renounced opinions, which for ſeveral ages had been eſteemed infallibly certain, they had ſo little idea of true religious liberty, which allows no limits to private judgment, conſcience, and freedom of enquiry, and which maintains Chriſtian charity for men of every perſuaſion, that they were ready to burn all who preſumed to differ from them, in the ſame flames from which they themſelves had narrowly eſcaped.

The new liturgy, though received and approved by all who wiſhed well to the reformation, yet met with very great oppoſition from the catholic party: they were unwilling to abandon the tenets of their ancient religion, and exerted their whole intereſt to raiſe diſturbances in the nation. A great variety of opinions prevailed, and all attempts to reduce them to uniformity were fruitleſs. Hence the council granted a commiſſion to the primate, and ſome others, to examine and ſearch after all anabaptiſts, heretics, and contemners of the new ritual. Theſe they were enjoined, if poſſible, to reclaim; to impoſe penance on them, and to give them abſolution; or, if they continued obſtinate, to impriſon, excommunicate, and deliver them over to the ſecular arm. Several perſons were taken up for maintaining heretical opinions, but being prevailed upon to abjure them, were diſmiſſed. A woman, named Joan Bocher, an anabaptiſt, who denied the incarnation of Chriſt, perſevered in her error, and was committed to the flames. Cranmer, though of a mild diſpoſition, thought it neceſſary to puniſh her; and having engaged Edward to ſign her ſentence, the young monarch told him, with tears in his eyes, that if any wrong was done, the guilt ſhould lay entirely upon his head. Cranmer uſed every argument to reform the woman, but in vain; on which he ſuffered the ſentence to be executed. Soon after one Van Paris, a Dutchman, was condemned for having embraced the hereſy of Arius, and ſuffered with ſo much reſolution and fanatical zeal, that he embraced with tranſport the faggots which conſumed him. But theſe ſeverities were ill calculated for removing the evil; they tended rather to increaſe than exterminate error: however, they produced at that time a temporary effect; a conformity to the new liturgy was eſtabliſhed, and the murmurs againſt the late innovations ceaſed. The lady Mary alone, refuſing to admit the eſtabliſhed modes of worſhip, continued to adhere to the maſs. On her being teazed and menaced on this account, ſhe applied to the emperor, who uſing his intereſt with Sir Philip Hobby, the Engliſh ambaſſador, ſhe obtained from the council a temporary connivance.

No inſtitution can well be ſuppoſed to have been more prejudicial to the intereſts of mankind, than that of the monks and friars, yet it was attended with many ſalutary effects, which ceaſing with the monaſtic order, occaſioned much murmuring among the people of England. When the monaſteries were ſuppreſſed, a great number of monks were under the neceſſity of living by their labour, ſo that every kind of employ was overſtocked. The monaſtic eſtates had been farmed out on moderate terms to vaſt numbers of common people, who were thereby enabled to maintain their families on the profits of agriculture; but the lands being now divided among the nobility, the rents were raiſed, and the farmers perceiving that wool was a more profitable commodity than meal, converted their arable land into paſtures. In conſequence of this, bread became dear, to the unſpeakable diſtreſs of the poor. As multitudes were deprived of employ, and therefore of ſubſiſtence, through the neglect of agriculture, the nation abounded with complaints againſt the nobility, as the ſources of this wretchedneſs. The protector attended to the remonſtrances of the ſufferers, and reſolved to exert his utmoſt endeavours in redreſſing their grievances. In order to remove the ſubject of their complaints, he appointed commiſſioners with full power to try and decide all cauſes relative to incloſures, highways and cottages. This meaſure being very diſpleaſing to the nobility and gentry, they exclaimed againſt the commiſſion as illegal; and the peaſants imagining their deſign was to reduce them to ſervitude, determined to redreſs themſelves by force of arms. The inſurrection began at once in ſeveral counties of England, as if the populace had engaged in a general conſpiracy. The rioters in Wiltſhire were diſperſed by Sir William Herbert; thoſe in the neighbouring counties, of Oxford and Glouceſter, by lord Gray of Wilton. Many of the inſurgents were ſlain in the field; others ſuffered by martial law. The malcontents of Devonſhire, amounting to ten thouſand, were headed by one Humphrey Arundel, an experienced ſoldier, and encouraged by the preaching of ſome eccleſiaſtics. They preſented a petition to the king, deſiring liberty to practice the ancient ceremonies of the Roman church; and redreſs of various grievances. Theſe demands the council anſwered by a formal manifeſto, concluding with an offer of pardon on their immediate ſubmiſſion; but the monks perſuaded them, that an abject ſurrender of themſelves, would be attended with the moſt grievous oppreſſion and enthralment. Thus inſtigated, they undertook the ſiege of Exeter, which was gallantly defended by the inhabitants. Lord Ruſſel then lay at Honiton, when being joined by Sir William Herbert, lord Gray, and ſome others, he marched to the relief of Exeter, which was now reduced to the laſt extremity. Theſe jointly attacked the rebels, drove them from all their poſts, ſlew a great number both in the action and purſuit, and took many priſoners. Arundel and the other leaders were conducted to London, tried and executed; and thoſe of the lower claſs were condemned by martial law. The ſedition in Norfolk was more alarming, and terrible in its conſequences. The inſurgents amounted to ſixteen thouſand, under the conduct of one Kit, a tanner, and Conyers, an eccleſiaſtic, who performed the office of their chaplain. Theſe committed all manner of outrages, and preſented to the king a ſet of articles, demanding that farms ſhould be reduced to the ancient rents; that the price of wool ſhould be abated; and that all incloſures ſhould be laid open. The king promiſed them pardon on ſubmiſſion. Diſdaining the offer, they eſtabliſhed their quarters on Mouſhold-hill, near Norwich; where Kit the tanner ſat in judgment under a large tree, ſince known by the name of the oak of reformation. They inveſted and reduced the city of Norwich; and then impriſoned the mayor, with ſome of the principal citizens. The marquis of Northampton was firſt ſent againſt them; but was worſted in an action, in which lord Sheffield loſt his life. The protector then detached the earl of Warwick thither, with an army of ſix thouſand men, which had been raiſed for the Scottiſh war; and by this means he furniſhed his inveterate enemy with an opportunity of augmenting his fame and character. Warwick having routed ſeveral detachments of the rebels, at laſt attacked their main body, and put them to flight. Two thouſand of them were ſlain in the action and purſuit. Kit, their ringleader, eſcaped from the field; but being taken next day in a barn, was hung in chains at Norwich caſtle, and nine of his accomplices ſuffered on the oak of reformation. The rebels in Yorkſhire, hearing of the fate of their companions, embraced the offer of pardon, and laid down their arms; and a general amneſty was ſoon after publiſhed by the protector. Yet, though all commotions in England were now ſuppreſſed, they were productive of very bad conſequences with reſpect to the foreign intereſt of the nation.

The forces deſtined for Scotland having been detained in England; and M. de Thermes landing there with freſh ſuccours from France, he had leiſure to reduce the diſtracted ſtate of that unhappy country to ſome order. He took the caſtle of Boughty, and put the whole garriſon to the ſword. Haddington however held out againſt all his efforts, and it was determined to reduce the place by famine. But this was not eaſily effected; ſupplies were continually thrown into the place during ſummer, ſo that all his attempts proved unſucceſsful. At laſt winter accompliſhed what his whole power could not perform. The inclemency of the weather was an obſtacle not to be ſurmounted by the Engliſh. The earl of Rutland received orders to diſmantle the place. He accordingly marched thither at the head of a ſtrong body of forces, demoliſhed the fortifications, and brought off the garriſon. Nothing was now left to the Engliſh of all their conqueſts in Scotland, except the caſtles of Lauder, Douglas, Eymouth and Roxburgh. Nor were theſe all the ill conſequences that reſulted from the late commotions. Henry II. of France, encouraged by the inteſtine troubles of England, made an effort to execute his favourite ſcheme of recovering Bologne. The court had for ſome time been apprehenſive that he had formed that deſign, and ſent over ſecretary Paget to the court of Charles V. in order to conclude an alliance with the emperor. But that powerful monarch having formed a deſign of extending his dominions, by acting the part of a champion for the catholic religion, liſtened not to the advances made by the court of England, for entering into a ſtrict confederacy. In the mean time Henry II. entered the territories of Bologne at the head of a numerous army, took ſeveral caſtles, equipped a powerful fleet, and attempted a deſcent on the iſlands of Guernſey and Jerſey; but a ſquadron of Engliſh ſhips being immediately fitted out, fell upon the enemy, and drove them from the iſlands, with the loſs of above a thouſand men. Diſappointed in receiving the expected aſſiſtance from the emperor, Somerſet was deſirous of concluding a peace with France and Scotland; eſpecially as he was in no condition to ſupport the neceſſary expences, and had experienced the difficulties and dangers that attended miniſters in demanding and raiſing new ſubſidies: at the ſame time he was reſolved to complete the great work of the reformation ſo ſucceſsfully begun. He therefore determined to ſacrifice Bologne, in order to gain the friendſhip and aſſiſtance of Henry. But when he propoſed the reſtitution of that place in council, he met with the ſtrongeſt oppoſition from his enemies; who knowing he was in no condition to carry on the war, were determined for that very reaſon, to oppoſe every meaſure that had the leaſt tendency to procure a pacification, and to embrace the firſt opportunity that offered to deprive him of his dignity.

Somerſet, after he had procured the patent, by which he, in a manner, obtained regal authority, had paid but little attention to the opinion of the other executors and counſellors. All who were not entirely devoted to him were ſure to be neglected. The haughtineſs of his carriage, joined to an inferior capacity, and an unlimited authority, irritated daily the diſcontented. Warwick, in particular, having entered into a cloſe connection with Southampton, who had been admitted into the council, formed a ſtrong party, who had determined to ruin the protector. The nobility were greatly diſpleaſed with the regard he had ſhewn the common people, to which they aſcribed the late inſurrections; and from his popular meaſures apprehended a revival of ſimilar diſorders. He had directed a court of requeſts in his own houſe for the benefit of the poorer claſs of people, and readily embraced every meaſure calculated to promote their intereſt and ſafety. Yet his intereſt with the people was far from being conſiderable. The Romiſh party, who had great influence on the lower ranks, were his declared enemies, and took every opportunity of decrying his conduct. His brother's attainder and execution; the great eſtate he had ſuddenly acquired; the magnificent palace in the Strand, which ſtill bears his name, to furniſh ground and materials for which, the pariſh church of St. Mary, and three biſhops houſes had been pulled down; theſe actions had given his enemies too many advantages over him; they miſrepreſented all the meaſures of his adminiſtration, and even his imprudencies were magnified into crimes. At length, after ſeveral complaints and diſputes, lord St. John, preſident of the council, the earls of Warwick, Southampton, with five other members, met at Ely-houſe, where the earl of Warwick reſided, on the ſixth of October; and aſſuming to themſelves the whole power of the government, ſent for the lord mayor and aldermen of London; before whom they arraigned the protector's conduct, and commanded them to obey no orders but what were iſſued by themſelves. The ſame injunctions were laid on the lieutenant of the Tower. The next day Rich, lord chancellor, the marquis of Northampton, the earl of Shrewſbury, and other perſons of high rank, joined the malcontents; and ſecretary Petre, whom the protector ſent to treat with his enemies, choſe to remain with them. Somerſet, on being informed of this defection of the counſellors, removed the king from Hampton-court to Windſor-caſtle; and arming his friends and ſervants, ſeemed reſolved to ſtand on his defence; but finding that no perſons of rank adhered to him, except Cranmer and Paget; that the city and Tower had declared againſt him; that the people did not riſe at his ſummons; and that he was even deſerted by his confidants; he loſt all hopes, and applied to his enemies. This ſtep induced the lord Ruſſel, Sir John Baker, ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, and three other counſellors, who had hitherto remained neuter, to join Warwick's party. The council now vindicated themſelves in a proclamation, and wrote to the ſame purpoſe to the princeſſes Mary and Elizabeth. They then addreſſed the king, and, after the humbleſt proteſtations of duty and ſubmiſſion, declared, that they were the council appointed by his father, and had choſe the duke of Somerſet protector, under the expreſs condition of his being guided by their advice; but he had uſurped the whole authority, and had not only neglected, but oppoſed their councils, they therefore begged, that he would reſtore them to his confidence, and diſmiſs the protector's ſervants. The king complied with their requeſt, and Somerſet only capitulating for gentle treatment, it was promiſed him. Yet, notwithſtanding this, he was ſent to the Tower, with ſome of his friends and partiſans, among whom was Cecil, diſtinguiſhed afterwards in the reign of queen Elizabeth. On the fourteenth of October he was brought before the council, and articles of impeachment exhibited againſt him, of which the following were the chief: that he had not obſerved the conditions on which he had been made protector; that he had treated with ambaſſadors without notifying it to the council; and had, by his own authority, diſpoſed of governments and biſhoprics; that he had held a court of requeſts in his own houſe; that he had debaſed the coin; that he had iſſued proclamations in the affair of incloſures, contrary to the opinion of the whole council; that he had not taken care to ſuppreſs the late inſurrections, but had on the contrary ſupported and encouraged them; that he had occaſioned the loſs of the forts in the territory of Bologne, by neglecting to furniſh them with proviſions and ammunition; that he had endeavoured to inſtill into the king a bad opinion of his counſellors, by perſuading him that they intended to deſtroy him; that he had cauſed the lords of the council to be proclaimed traitors; that he had maliciouſly, not only put the king in great fear, by carrying him ſuddenly to Windſor, but thrown him into a dangerous diſeaſe; that he had armed himſelf and his ſervants; and, laſtly, that he intended to fly to Guernſey or Jerſey. The duke having received no previous notice of theſe articles, could not be prepared to give his anſwer, and was therefore remanded back to the Tower. A revocation of the protector's office was now publiſhed under the great ſeal. But all the arts of Warwick could not perſuade the well-meaning part of the council to believe the duke guilty of any thing intentionally bad, either againſt the king or the conſtitution of his country. They indeed thought him too obnoxious to the landed intereſt of England, to continue longer at the head of affairs; and therefore willingly engaged in meaſures for removing him from the ſeat of power. The marquis of Northampton, the earls of Warwick and Southampton, the lords St. John, Ruſſel, and Wentworth, were appointed regents, and the principal adminiſtration of the government entruſted with the earl of Warwick, wick, but without any title that might give him the leaſt authority over the other counſellors.

The popiſh party aſcribing all the late innovations to Somerſet's councils, were now elevated with the hopes, that his fall would pave the way for the reſtoration of their ancient religion. But Warwick, whoſe views were guided ſolely by ambition, knowing that it would not be eaſy to eradicate the principles of the reformation out of Edward's mind, declared for the new doctrine. Bonner was deprived of the ſee of London, and the earl of Southampton, head of the catholics, treated with ſuch diſgrace, that he retired abruptly from court, dying ſoon after of chagrin and diſappointment. Somerſet, who wanted ſpirit to ſupport his diſgrace with dignity, was prevailed upon to confeſs, on his knees, before the council, all the articles of the charge exhibited againſt him; a ſubmiſſion that diſgraced him in the eyes of the nation. The parliament deprived him of all his offices, and condemned him in a large fine. But Warwick, thinking his abject behaviour had effectually deſtroyed the ſmall remains of his authority, re-admitted him into the council; and even agreed to an alliance between their families, by the marriage of his ſon, lord Dudley, with the lady Jane Seymour, daughter to Somerſet.

A. D. 1550. Though a project for concluding a peace with France, by the reſtoration of Bologne, had ſerved for a pretence againſt the protector's adminiſtration, yet the new council were inclined to adopt the meaſure, and ſent the earl of Bedford, and other commiſſioners, with full powers to negociate. Henry II. refuſed abſolutely to pay the two millions of crowns, which his predeceſſor had acknowledged to be due to the crown of England, as the arrears of penſions; and offered four hundred thouſand crowns for the reſtitution of Bologne, which was accepted, and ſix hoſtages given for the performance of this article. Scotland being comprehended in the treaty, the Engliſh agreed to reſtore Dunglas and Lauder, and to demoliſh the fortreſſes of Eymouth and Roxburgh. A peace was no ſooner concluded, than a ſcheme was formed to enter into cloſer alliance with France, and it was ſoon after agreed that Edward ſhould marry Elizabeth, daughter of Henry, and all the articles of this project were fully ſettled, though it never was carried into execution. The deſign of marrying the king to the daughter of a prince who was a violent perſecutor of the proteſtants, could not be agreeable to that party in England; but in every other reſpect the council ſteadily promoted the reformation. The peace was celebrated with great rejoicings, though very far from being agreeable to the people. They plainly diſcerned that thoſe who accepted of four hundred thouſand crowns, inſtead of two millions, which Francis I. had engaged to pay, were the very perſons who had ſo rancorouſly inveighed againſt Somerſet, for merely propoſing a reſtitution of Bologne, upon reaſonable terms. This inconſiſtent proceeding raiſed ſuch a clamour among the people, that the earl of Warwick thought proper to divert their attention to other objects, that might conduce more to their ſatisfaction. He enquired into the practices of thoſe who had embezzled the king's revenue, or had been guilty of oppreſſion in the execution of their offices; and theſe, on conviction, he puniſhed with the utmoſt rigour. This ſeverity of juſtice, though ariſing from ignoble motives, pleaſed the nation in general, and eſtabliſhed Warwick's authority among the great, who perceiving the vigour with which he acted, began to dread the weight of his reſentment. In the courſe of this year, Thirley reſigned the ſee of Weſtminſter, which was united to that of London, and beſtowed it upon Ridley, biſhop of Rocheſter. Polydore Virgil, who had reſided forty years in England, obtained permiſſion to paſs the remainder of his days in his own country, in conſideration of his having devoted the greateſt part of his life to the compilation of the Engliſh hiſtory.

The reformation now greatly prevailed in England, being patronized by the king, and promoted by the indefatigable labour of archbiſhop Cranmer. Warwick alſo had declared his intention of completing this great work, and now began to carry his deſign into execution. A proſecution was commenced againſt Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, who in ſeveral inſtances had rendered himſelf obnoxious to the adminiſtration. He was required to acknowledge his former miſbehaviour, and confeſs the juſtice of his confinement; to own that the king was ſupreme head of the church; that the power of making and diſpenſing with holidays, was part of the prerogative; that the common-prayer book was a godly commendable form; that the king was a complete ſovereign in his minority; that the ſtatute of the ſix articles was juſtly repealed; and that the king had full authority to correct and reform what was amiſs in eccleſiaſtical diſcipline. The biſhop made no difficulty of ſigning all theſe articles, except the firſt. He maintained that his conduct had been always inoffenſive, and declared that he would never own himſelf guilty of faults he had not committed. But the council, who intended not to accept from him any acknowledgments, multiplied articles in proportion to his ſubmiſſion. At laſt the prelate, from a dread of totally diſhonouring his former conduct, by mean compliances, determined to act with vigour. He refuſed to ſign any articles they might preſent to him; and was depoſed from his ſee by a commiſſion appointed for that purpoſe. Several other biſhops, much leſs ſuſpected and troubleſome than Gardiner, underwent the ſame fate; as Day, biſhop of Chicheſter; Heathe, of Worceſter; and Vaiſy, of Exeter. About the ſame time, an order was iſſued by the council, for purging the library at Weſtminſter of all miſſals, legends, and other ſuperſtitious books. Many of theſe were plated with gold and ſilver, and curiouſly emboſſed. Great havock was alſo made in the libraries of Oxford; in which printed books and manuſcripts were deſtroyed without diſtinction. Volumes of divinity ſuffered for their rich bindings: thoſe of geometry and aſtronomy were ſuppoſed to contain nothing but necromancy; and thoſe of literature were condemned as uſeleſs. The princeſs Mary was not forgot, in this vigorous attack on the remains of popery. She was required to change her religion, or at leaſt, in order for her conviction, to read the ancient fathers. Alarmed at her danger, ſhe formed a plan for eſcaping to the court of Charles V. but her deſign was diſcovered and prevented. The emperor, however, made ſtrong repreſentations in her behalf: he even threatened to commence hoſtilities, if liberty of conſcience ſhould be refuſed her. His interpoſition had the deſired effect. It was not thought adviſeable to plunge the nation into a war on ſo ſlight an occaſion; and Edward, who had imbibed the utmoſt deteſtation for the idolatrous worſhip of the catholics, lamented with tears the obſtinacy of his ſiſter, and his own misfortune, in being obliged to tolerate her errors. This religious zeal of the council did not prevent their finding leiſure to attend both to the public intereſt, and their own temporal concerns. The trade of England had been chiefly carried on by the inhabitants of the Hanſe-towns, or Eaſterlings, as they were called; and to encourage thoſe merchants to ſettle in England, Henry III. had granted them a patent, by which they were exempted from ſeveral heavy duties paid by other foreigners. This company, uſually called the merchants of the Steel-yard, had hitherto engroſſed the whole foreign trade of the kingdom; and as they employed the ſhipping of their own country, the navigation of England had continued rather in a languiſhing condition. The council annulled the privileges of this corporation; and though ſeveral remonſtrances were made by Lubeck, Hamburgh, and the other Hanſe towns, the council perſevered in their reſolution; and the good effects ſoon became viſible to the nation, by the Engliſh being allured to enter into commerce.

A. D. 1551. However, the plans for promoting induſtry were in danger of proving abortive, from domeſtic troubles, and confuſions. The ſweating ſickneſs, which now raged in England, ſwept away great numbers of the inhabitants. Several of the nobility alſo felt the dreadful effects of this alarming contagion; among whom were the duke of Suffolk and his brother. By the death of theſe two noblemen, the title of duke of Suffolk became extinct in the family of Brandon, which was next in the ſucceſſion to the crown, after the two daughters of Henry VIII. The earl of Warwick, who ſeems already to have formed the deſign of placing his own family on the throne, immediately procured Henry Grey, marquis of Dorſet, to be created duke of Suffolk. The laſt earl of Northumberland died without iſſue; and Sir Thomas Piercy, his brother, having been attainted, on account of the ſhare he had in the Yorkſhire inſurrection, during the late reign, the title was extinct, and the eſtate veſted in the crown. Warwick therefore procured for himſelf thoſe ample poſſeſſions which lay in the north, the moſt warlike part of the kingdom; and was dignified with the title of duke of Northumberland. Lord St. John, the treaſurer, was created marquis of Wincheſter, and Sir William Herbert, earl of Pembroke; William Cecil was knighted, and made ſecretary of ſtate, and Sir Robert Dudley, one of Northumberland's ſons, was ſworn one of the ſix ordinary gentlemen of the king's bed-chamber. Northumberland, however, regarding all increaſe of poſſeſſions and titles, for himſelf and his partizans, only as ſteps to farther acquiſitions; and perceiving the duke of Somerſet, though deprived of his dignity, ſtill preſerved a conſiderable degree of popularity, he reſolved to ruin a man, whom he conſidered as a chief obſtacle to his ambitious projects. The alliance lately concluded between their families had been productive of no cordial union. It only afforded Northumberland an opportunity of effecting with more eaſe and certainty the deſtruction of his rival. He began his infamous deſign, by ſecretly corrupting many of that unhappy nobleman's friends and ſervants: he ſometimes provoked him by ill uſage, and at others terrified him by the appearance of danger. He alienated the affections of the young king from his uncle, whom he repreſented as a very dangerous ſubject. He ſpread a report, that Somerſet had cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed king in ſeveral counties, and that he was preparing an armed force to make himſelf maſter of his majeſty's perſon. Thus provoked, the unguarded Somerſet broke out into menacing expreſſions againſt Northumberland; and at other times formed raſh projects, which he immediately abandoned; his treacherous confidants repeated every paſſionate word which eſcaped from his lips to his enemy, and revealed the ſchemes they themſelves had firſt projected. Northumberland thought that the proper ſeaſon for acting was come; and the duke of Somerſet, lord Grey, David and John Seymour, Neudigate and Hammond, two of the duke's ſervants, Sir Thomas Palmer, and Sir Ralph Vane, were arreſted and confined. The next day the ducheſs of Somerſet, with Crane and his wife, her favourites, Sir Michael Stanhope, and others, were thrown into priſon. Sir Thomas Palmer, who had acted as a ſpy upon Somerſet, charged him with having formed a deſign to ſecure the Tower, raiſe a rebellion in London, and an inſurrection in the north; and maintained, that the duke once deſigned to murder Northumberland, Northampton and Pembroke, at a banquet. Palmer's teſtimony with regard to the laſt circumſtance, was confirmed by Crane and his wife; and it ſeems ſome raſh expreſſions of ſuch a nature had really been mentioned, though no regular conſpiracy had been formed, nor any meaſures taken for its execution. This unhappy nobleman was brought to his trial on the firſt of December, before the marquis of Wincheſter, who was created high ſteward. The jury was compoſed of twenty-ſeven peers, among whom were his principal enemies, Northumberland, Pembroke, and Northampton. He was accuſed of high treaſon, for deſigning to raiſe inſurrections; and of felony, in intending the murder of privy counſellors. The witneſſes were examined by the privy council, but neither produced in court, nor confronted with the priſoner; and their depoſitions were given in to the jury. Somerſet's defence, with reſpect to the treaſonable part of the charge, was ſo ſatisfactory, that the peers gave a verdict in his favour. His intention of aſſaulting the privy counſellors, was indeed ſupported by ſomewhat like evidence; the duke himſelf confeſſing, that he had made uſe of words to that effect, though he had formed no reſolution; and the peers brought him in guilty of felony. On receiving his ſentence, he aſked pardon of thoſe peers for having liſtened to deſigns againſt them. Somerſet, being beloved by the people, they, on hearing of his having been acquitted of treaſon, expreſſed their joy by loud acclamations; but their ſatisfaction was ſoon damped, when informed that he was condemned to ſuffer death for felony, purſuant to a ſtatute paſſed in the reign of Henry VIII. declaring it felony for any perſon to form a deſign of killing a privy counſellor. The behaviour of Somerſet, from the time he received ſentence, was calm, reſigned, and unaffected; he employed his time in reading, and compoſing exerciſes of devotion.

A. D. 1552. Northumberland's creatures had taken care to prepoſſeſs the young king againſt his uncle; and, to prevent his relenting, kept him from reflection by a continued round of amuſements, and by preventing any of Somerſet's friends from having acceſs to him. On the twenty-ſecond of January this noble priſoner was conducted to the ſcaffold on Tower-hill, where he was to ſuffer. He was attended on this melancholy occaſion by Dr. Cox; and, after ſome devotional exerciſes, he addreſſed himſelf in a ſpeech to the people, in which he declared his innocence with regard to the king, and his fidelity to his country: he ſubmitted to his ſentence, becauſe awarded by the law; he profeſſed his zeal and affection for the proteſtant religion, and a ſincere ſatisfaction in what he had done to promote it. He expreſſed the higheſt regard for the perſon of the king: he exhorted the people to pay both him and the council the moſt implicit obedience: declared he died in peace with all mankind; aſked pardon of all whom he had offended; and requeſted the prayers of all preſent. When he declared, that he had always promoted the ſervice of the king, and the intereſt of true religion, the people atteſted the truth of this, by crying aloud, "It is moſt true;" and on his praying, that the king might enjoy health and proſperity, there was a general reſponſe of "Amen." The ſpectators appeared to be in great agitation, and on the brink of taking ſome violent meaſure. Some people who had been ordered to appear in arms at the execution, when they ſaw the duke upon the ſcaffold, mended their pace, crying aloud to each other, "Come away!" The precipitation added to this exclamation, which was echoed through the whole multitude, produced an univerſal tumult. This having ſubſided, Sir Antony Brown riding towards the ſcaffold, the people exclaimed, "A pardon! A pardon!" But the duke telling them they were miſtaken, intreated them to allow him to paſs his laſt moments in peace. Having concluded his ſpeech, he adjuſted himſelf with the utmoſt calmneſs for the block. When the fatal ſtroke was given by the executioner, a dreadful groan run through the whole croud of ſpectators; many of whom ruſhed in, and dipped their handkerchiefs in his blood, which they preſerved as a precious relic; and ſoon after, when the ambitious Northumberland met with the ſame fate, they, upbraiding him with his cruelty to Somerſet, diſplayed before his eyes theſe ſymbols of his guilty cruelty. Though many actions in Somerſet's life were exceptionable, he certainly merited a better doom. He was a nobleman eminent for his piety; courteous, affable, ſincere, and candid in all his tranſactions; a patron of the poor, the fatherleſs, the friendleſs, and the oppreſſed: but his virtues were better calculated for a private than a public life; he was a much better general, than a counſellor; his want of penetration and firmneſs rendering him incapable of extricating himſelf from thoſe cabals and violent meaſures, to which that age was ſo much addicted; yet the faults he committed during his adminiſtration, were owing to weakneſs, not to any bad intention. He was never accuſed of perſonal vices, of falſehood, of perverting juſtice, of cruelty, or of oppreſſion. Among the number of his friends, Sir Ralph Vane, a brave old ſoldier, and Sir Miles Partridge, were hanged. Sir Michael Stanhope, with Sir Thomas Arundel, were beheaded, as the duke's confederates; but ſtrenuouſly denied, in their laſt moments, the crime for which they ſuffered. Lord Paget, chancellor of the duchy of Somerſet, was tried in the ſtar-chamber, fined ſix thouſand pounds, and condemned to loſe his office. He was alſo degraded from the order of the garter, as unworthy, on account of his mean birth, to ſhare that honour. Lord Rich was alſo deprived of the ſeals, for having ſent a letter to Somerſet, informing him of the deſigns of the council.

On the twenty-third of January the parliament met, and paſſed ſeveral bills, both of a civil and religious nature; but the moſt remarkable, was that reſpecting the crime of high treaſon; to which the commons annexed a clauſe of infinitely more conſequence than the bill itſelf. It was declared, "That none ſhould be attainted of high treaſon on this act, unleſs two witneſſes ſhould come, and to their face aver the fact for which they were to be tried, except ſuch as ſhould make a voluntary confeſſion; and that none ſhould be queſtioned for any thing ſaid or written againſt the king or government, but within three months after it was done." This equitable and conſtitutional clauſe was ſtrongly oppoſed by all of Northumberland's party, as it totally condemned their late proceedings in the caſe of the unfortunate duke of Somerſet; but notwithſtanding all their ſtate tricks, it paſſed both houſes, and has ever ſince remained one of the chief bulwarks of Engliſh liberty.

Among the moſt eminent prelates of that age, was Tunſtal, biſhop of Durham, highly diſtinguiſhed by his abilities, learning, humanity, and integrity of life. He had oppoſed all innovations in religion; but they were no ſooner eſtabliſhed, than he ſubmitted, and conformed himſelf to every ſyſtem of doctrine and diſcipline eſtabliſhed by authority; concluding, that all private ſentiments ought to be ſacrificed to the greater concern of public tranquillity. The general reſpect entertained for him in Somerſet's adminiſtration, ſecured him from any ſevere treatment: but neither his obedient conduct, nor the unimpeached rectitude of his morals, could protect him from the rapacious cravings of Northumberland, who had formed a deſign of appropriating to himſelf the ample revenues of the ſee of Durham, and of acquiring a principality in the northern counties. A bill of attainder was therefore brought into the houſe of peers againſt Tunſtal for miſpriſion of treaſon, and paſſed with the oppoſition only of Cranmer, who had always a cordial friendſhip for him, and of lord Stourton, a zealous catholic. But when the bill was ſent down to the commons, they demanded that witneſſes ſhould be examined; that the biſhop ſhould be confronted with his accuſers, and be permitted to ſpeak in his own defence; which demands being refuſed, the bill was rejected. Northumberland and his partizans aſcribed this equity, ſo unuſual in a parliament of that age, to the prevalence of Somerſet's party; and a bill for ratifying the attainder of Somerſet and his accomplices, being alſo rejected by the commons, after it had paſſed the upper houſe, confirmed them in this opinion. They therefore reſolved to diſſolve the parliament, which had ſat throughout this whole reign, and to ſummon a new one.

A. D. 1553.

Northumberland exerted himſelf with ſo much induſtry, and employed ſo many corrupt and unjuſtifiable methods in the election of members, that when the parliament met, he found the commons as obſequious to his will, and as ready to concur in all his meaſures, as he could poſſibly have wiſhed. Tunſtal had, during the receſs, been depoſed by lay-commiſſioners; the ſentence was confirmed by this tool of a parliament, who divided the ſee of Durham into two biſhoprics: but the dignity of an earl palatine was inveſted in the king, who gave it to Northumberland. They alſo granted the king two ſubſidies, and two fifteenths. Having executed his deſigns with this ſervile parliament during the ſeſſion of a month, Northumberland cauſed it to be diſſolved, and applied himſelf to other meaſures for the gratification of his ambition: yet he found the emptineſs of the Exchequer an obſtruction to the execution of his projects; for though the king had received four hundred thouſand crowns from France, on delivering up Bologne; notwithſtanding the plunder of churches, colleges, and hoſpitals, with the fall of many manors that belonged to them, yet, from the rapacity of the courtiers, the crown owed about three hundred thouſand pounds ſterling: but as Edward, among other virtues, was inclined to frugality, he would probably, had not his health declined very faſt, have retrieved theſe loſſes in a very ſhort time. The king, on his recovery from the ſmall-pox, had made a tour through ſeveral parts of the kingdom; and, it was ſuppoſed, that in this progreſs he had inflamed his blood with too violent exerciſe; for he was ſeized with a cough, which proved obſtinate, and could neither be removed by regimen or medicines. This diſorder ſoon degenerated into a confirmed conſumption; and many people ſcrupled not to inſinuate, that Northumberland had tampered with his conſtitution. When the phyſicians deſpaired of the king's life, he was committed to the care of an old woman, who engaged in a ſhort time to reſtore him to his former health; but this promiſe ſhe performed with much the ſame fidelity which is well known to belong to our modern quacks. His diſorder increaſed ſo faſt, that when the parliament met in the beginning of March, both houſes were obliged to attend him at Whitehall, to hear the reaſons of their being called together. This infirm ſtate of the young prince rendered him ſuſceptible of any impreſſion. Of this Northumberland took advantage, perceiving that now was the time for him to complete the deſign he had planned, of placing his own family on the throne of England. He therefore ſuffered none but his own creatures to approach the royal perſon: at the ſame time he affected the moſt anxious concern for the young monarch's health and recovery. By theſe hypocritical expreſſions of duty, he gained the firſt place in the affections and confidence of Edward. This point being gained, the next was to prevail upon the king to alter the ſucceſſion. With this view, he repreſented to Edward, that his two ſiſters, Mary and Elizabeth, had been declared illegitimate by act of parliament; and though Henry, by his will, had reſtored them a place in the ſucceſſion, the nation would never ſubmit to ſee the throne of England filled by a baſtard; that they were only his half-ſiſters, and, if legitimate, had no right to the crown as his heirs and ſucceſſors; that his ſiſter Mary's ſucceſſion would be attended with the abolition of the proteſtant religion, and the eſtabliſhment of popery; that when thoſe princeſſes, together with the queen of Scots, were excluded, the ſucceſſion devolved on the marchioneſs of Dorſet, the eldeſt daughter of the French queen, and the duke of Suffolk; that the next heireſs of the marchioneſs was the lady Jane Gray, whom he knew to be ſtrongly attached to the reformed religion, of a moſt amiable character, a friend to virtue, and a lover of her country. Theſe reaſons made a ſtrong impreſſion on the young prince's mind; and, more particularly, his zeal for the proteſtant religion, made him apprehend the conſequences that might attend the throne's being filled by ſo bigotted a papiſt as his ſiſter Mary; and though he had a tender affection for Elizabeth, againſt whom there could be no ſuch objection, he was perſuaded to believe that he could not exclude one ſiſter for illegitimacy, without excluding the other. Edward, therefore, determined to leave his crown to the accompliſhed lady Jane; eſpecially as her mother had been expreſsly mentioned in the will of Henry VIII. as heir to the throne after his own children. The two ſons of the duke of Suffolk having at this time died of the ſweating-ſickneſs, that title was extinct; and Northumberland perſuaded the king to beſtow it upon the marquis of Dorſet; after which he induced the new duke and ducheſs of Suffolk to give their conſent to the marriage of the lady Jane Gray with his fourth ſon, lord Guilford Dudley. In order to ſtrengthen himſelf by other alliances, he married his own daughter to the lord Haſtings, eldeſt ſon of the earl of Huntingdon; and alſo negociated a marriage between the lady Catharine Gray and lord Herbert, eldeſt ſon of the earl of Pembroke. The ſolemnization of theſe marriages was attended with great pomp and feſtivity; and Northumberland being hated by the people, they could not refrain from expreſſing their indignation, at obſerving ſuch public demonſtrations of joy, while their beloved monarch was languiſhing on a bed of ſickneſs. Nothing now remained for Northumberland, but to finiſh his political fabric by a ſpeedy execution of the main part of his deſign. To this end, on the eleventh of June, Sir Edward Montague, chief juſtice of the Common Pleas, Sir John Baker, and Sir Thomas Bromley, two of the judges, the attorney and ſolicitor general, attended the council, in obedience to a ſummons they had received; when the king laid before them minutes of an intended deed for altering the ſucceſſion, with orders to draw them up in the form of a patent. They heſitated to obey, and deſired time to conſider of a ſubject ſo important in itſelf, and which would affect themſelves in particular; but the more they reflected, the greater danger they found in complying. Henry VIII. had made a ſettlement of the crown, in conſequence of an act of parliament; and by another act paſſed in this reign, it was declared treaſon to change the order of ſucceſſion. Theſe reaſons were pleaded before the council; and the judges alledged, that the only proper method for giving a ſanction to the new ſettlement, was to ſummon a parliament, and to obtain the conſent of that aſſembly. Northumberland was ſo incenſed at their conduct, that he behaved in the moſt indecent manner; and it was even feared he would proceed to violence againſt their perſons. Edward obſerved, that he intended to call a parliament, in order to have the ſettlement ratified: but in the mean time required them, on their allegiance, to draw the patent in the manner required; and the council told the judges, that their refuſal would ſubject them to the penalties of treaſon. After the arguments had been canvaſſed in ſeveral meetings, Montague propoſed an expedient, which ſatisfied both counſellors and judges. He deſired that the king and council ſhould paſs a ſpecial commiſſion, requiring the judges to draw a patent for a new ſettlement of the crown; and that, immediately after, a pardon ſhould be granted them for any offence they might have incurred by their compliance. On the patent's being drawn, and brought to the biſhop of Ely, the chancellor, for him to affix the great ſeal to it, that prelate requeſted that all the judges might previouſly ſign it. Goſnald at firſt refuſed, and was with much difficulty prevailed on to comply; but the conſtancy of Sir James Hales, notwithſtanding his being a zealous proteſtant, remained unſhaken. He reſolutely refuſed to put his name to the inſtrument. The chancellor, for his greater ſecurity, next required, that the hands of all the privy counſellors ſhould be ſet to the patent. Cranmer alone, of all the officers of ſtate, oppoſed the ſcheme, and laboured aſſiduouſly to perſuade Edward not to alter the ſucceſſion. He affirmed that, without perjury, he could not ſubſcribe the deed, having already ſworn to the obſervation of Henry's will; but at laſt his reſolution was overcome, by the earneſt intreaties of his ſovereign, and he ſigned the inſtrument. Thus, by the king's letters patent, Mary and Elizabeth were excluded, and the crown ſettled on the heireſſes of the ducheſs of Suffolk, ſhe herſelf conſenting to give place to her daughters. During theſe tranſactions, Edward had declined viſibly every day; and the awful moment now approached, in which this amiable young monarch was to be removed from this tranſitory ſtate of exiſtence. The moſt alarming ſymptoms now increaſed to a violent degree; he felt a difficulty of ſpeech and breathing; his pulſe became feeble, his legs ſwelled, and his colour changed livid; indications that ſhewed too plainly, that this virtuous prince could not be long an inhabitant of this world. But his pious diſpoſitions, and the benevolent turn of his mind, never left him. He prayed with his lateſt breath for the happineſs of England, and expired at Greenwich on the ſixth of July, in the ſixteenth year of his age, and the ſeventh of his reign. He was buried under the fine altar at the head of Henry VIIth's mauſoleum, which was deſtroyed in the civil wars: but the nobleſt monument of his virtues are, Chriſt's hoſpital, St. Thomas's in Southwark, St. Bartholomew's and St. Bride's hoſpitals, for the education of youth, the cure of the diſeaſed, and the employment of idle perſons and vagrants: theſe foundations are immortal inſtances of his piety, benevolence, and charity.

Character of King Edward VI.

This young prince was endowed with every qualification that could recommend him to the affections of his ſubjects, and attract the admiration tion of mankind. His perſon was elegant; his diſpoſition affable and humane; and his mind cultivated by extenſive learning. His ſtrict attachment to equity and juſtice, filled his people; by whom his death was lamented as a public misfortune, with flattering hopes, that his reign would be rendered illuſtrious by his virtues; and had he been indulged with a longer life, there is all the reaſon in the world to ſuppoſe he would have made his people happy, by a wiſe and equitable adminiſtration. His capacity and application to ſtudy were ſo extraordinary, that about the time of his death he underſtood the Greek, Latin, Italian, French, and Spaniſh languages; was verſed in the ſciences of natural philoſophy, logic, and muſic; and was maſter of all the theological diſputes, with which the minds of men of that age were agitated. He kept a book, in which he wrote the characters of all the chief men of the nation; taking notice of the manner of life, and their religious principles. He underſtood fortification, and deſigned well: he was alſo well acquainted with the harbours and ports in his dominions, and with thoſe of Scotland and France, with the depth of water, and the way of entering them. He had ſtudied the buſineſs of the Mint, with the exchange and value of money; and had acquired ſuch knowledge in foreign affairs, that the ambaſſadors who were ſent into England publiſhed very extraordinary things of him in all the courts of Europe. To aſſiſt his memory, he took notes of every thing he heard worth notice, which he wrote firſt in Greek characters, that they might be unintelligible to thoſe about him; and afterwards copied out fair in his journal. This journal, written with his own hand, is in the Britiſh Muſeum, and was tranſcribed by biſhop Burnet, who publiſhed it in his ſecond volume of his Hiſtory of the Reformation. Edward was almoſt idolized by his ſubjects; and his example fired the young nobility with that general emulation, which puſhed them into every glorious purſuit, and raiſed, ſoon after, their drooping country to glory and to empire. Why did ſo fair a ſun ſet, before it had reached its meridian glory? Well may we ſay with the poet,

The ways of heaven are dark and intricate;
Puzzled with mazes and perplex'd with errors;
The underſtanding traces them in vain,
Loſt and bewilder'd in a fruitleſs ſearch.

Memoirs of the life and character of John Wickliffe, D. D.

It it not more pleaſing than uſeful to trace the ſteps, by which divine Providence produced and perfected the Reformation. On this account, agreeable to our promiſe, we have determined to give our readers the life of our countryman Wickliffe, that they may ſee the ſpark which lighted Huſs, and Luther, and Cranmer, and others, till it ſhone forth into that bright and glorious day, which we of this happy nation now enjoy.

Every man, who knows any thing of human nature, is aſſured, that thoſe who attempt reformations of any kind, lie under great difficulties, and are ſubject to numberleſs miſrepreſentations. Reformers are men; and as ſuch, they have their faults; and it too frequently happens, that the zeal for truth (wherewith they are animated, and without which they would not be reformers) carries them too far, and cauſes them to overſhoot the mark which they ſtrain all their nerves to hit. Theſe faults are greedily laid hold of by their adverſaries, while every their minuteſt ſlip is aggravated into the moſt enormous ſtumble. So many too are irritated, nay, and intereſted, to blacken them, that it is no wonder their characters are loaded with a weight of infamy.

Much allowance ſhould be made to theſe and the like conſiderations, by the perſon who ſits down to read any account of the life of Wickliffe; who having been unboundedly free and unreſerved in cenſuring the manners of the Romiſh clergy and others of his time, it is not ſtrange that they have been as free with him; but it is very ſtrange that proteſtant writers have ſuffered themſelves to be biaſſed by the prejudiced repreſentations of popiſh ones. Let us obſerve too, as another juſt apology for this truly great man, before we enter upon the detail of his life, that we cannot be ſurprized that he ſhould have embraced and defended many points of doctrine, which the more enlightened enquiries of following ages have found cauſe to explode. Rather let us admire that he ſaw ſo much, than that he ſaw not every thing, in ſuch an age of ignorance and ſuperſtition; and let us venerate the man, who had ſagacity and courage enough to oppoſe the groſs errors of his day; and to hold forth that inextinguiſhable ray of light, the ſacred ſcripture in our mother tongue, before which the midnight darkneſs of popery has been diſpelled, and to which the proteſtant faith owes its being and ſupport.

This "firſt diſcoverer and guide in our bleſſed reformation," as one calls him, was born in the year 1324, at a village called Spreſwell, in the pariſh of Wickliffe, near Richmond in Yorkſhire, a place of which there are no remains at preſent. Though there is no authentic account of his family, it appears to have been conſiderable. A learned education was given him, and in proper time he was admitted commoner of Queen's college in Oxford; but was ſoon removed to Merton, and made fellow. Merton was at that time diſtinguiſhed for perſons of learning and genius: ſeveral men of the firſt fame, and who afterwards enjoyed the firſt dignities, were cotemporaries with Wickliffe; who was ſoon diſtinguiſhed, among his illuſtrious cotemporaries, for the cloſeneſs of his application, and the vivacity of his genius. He became celebrated in philoſophy and divinity, being ſo remarkable for the elegancy of his wit, and his ſtrength in diſputation, that he was eſteemed more than human by the common ſort of divines. He adorned the learning of the ſchools, by acquiring a deep knowledge of the civil and canon law, as well as of the municipal laws of his own country. He not only ſtudied and commented upon the ſacred writings, but he afterwards tranſlated them into his native language, (the firſt tranſlation ever made) and wrote homilies on ſeveral parts of them. He alſo read with accuracy the writings of St. Auſtin, St. Jerom, St. Andrew, and St. Gregory, the four fathers of the Latin church. And thus furniſhed, he was well adapted to the diſplay of his talents, which were called into exertion about the thirty-ſixth year of his age; when they attracted the notice, not only of the univerſity, but of the whole kingdom.

Enough has been ſaid, by almoſt every writer, of the miſerable ſtate of the church in this age; of the ſcandalous vices, and more ſcandalous ignorance of the eccleſiaſtics, who were in poſſeſſion of the principal power and wealth of the kingdom. But the mendicant friars were now become extremely troubleſome, as well to the univerſity, as to the kingdom in general: under a falſe ſhew of extraordinary ſanctity and poverty, they cloaked the moſt encroaching pride, and exorbitant covetouſneſs. By their means, the number of ſtudents in the univerſity of Oxford had been reduced from thirty to ſix thouſand; parents were afraid to ſend their children thither, leſt the friars ſhould entice them into their convents.

Wickliffe nobly and boldly oppoſed theſe dangerous enemies to ſociety: other men of learning and worth joined with him to refute their prime doctrine, "That the poverty of Chriſt and his apoſtles was a ſufficient foundation for their begging trade, and poſſeſſing all things in common." Wickliffe wrote with great ſpirit againſt them; and his language is extraordinary, conſidering the times. "Freres," ſays he, in one of his tracts, "drawen children fro' Chriſt's religion into their private order by hypocriſie, leſings, and ſteling. For they tellen that their order is more holie than any other: that they ſhullen have higher degree in the bliſs of heaven, than other men, that been not therein: and ſeyn that men of their order ſhullen never come to hell, but ſhullen dome other men, with Chriſt, at domeſday." And here, by the way, we cannot but obſerve, as a comment upon Wickliffe's words, that ſo great was the ignorance and ſuperſtition of mankind in thoſe times, and ſo much had the begging friars inſinuated themſelves into the good opinion of people, that dying men, even the richeſt and greateſt, would, in their laſt hours, ſend to beg an old cloak or covering of one of theſe friars, that they might be buried in it; hoping that Chriſt would take them for friars at the general reſurrection, when appearing in theſe old cloaks, and ſo ſend them to heaven, where otherwiſe they had little hope of arriving.

The reputation which Wickliffe gained by oppoſing theſe mendicants, could only be equalled by the malice with which they purſued him. In conſequence of the former, he was advanced to be maſter of Baliol college in 1361; and four years after he was made warden of Canterbury hall, then founded by Simon de Iſlip, archbiſhop of Canterbury, but now ſwallowed up in Chriſt church. This worthy prelate ſeems to have been very deſirous to place men of diſtinguiſhed worth in his new ſeminary; and the letters of inſtitution, whereby he appointed Wickliffe to the wardenſhip, do equal honour to the patron and his warden. In theſe, he ſpeaks of him "as a perſon in whoſe fidelity, circumſpection, and induſtry, his grace very much confided; and one on whom he had fixed his eyes for that place, on account of the honeſty of his life, his laudable converſation, and knowledge of letters."

Wickliffe conducted himſelf in his headſhip with great approbation, till the death of archbiſhop Iſlip, when his ſucceſſor, archbiſhop Langham, turned him out, in favour of Henry de Wodehall, at the inſtigation of the monks of Canterbury, ſworn foes to Wickliffe. It was in vain that the univerſity interfered, or that an appeal was made to the pope. The pope confirmed the archbiſhop's choice: Wodehall and his monks kept poſſeſſion, and perpetual ſilence was impoſed upon Wickliffe and his aſſociates. It cannot be ſuppoſed, that ſo arbitrary and unfair a ſentence could diminiſh Wickliffe's juſt contempt of the monks and the pope.

An affair of a more public nature now made him more conſpicuous. Pope Urban threatened to cite king Edward to his court at Avignon, for omitting to pay the tribute of ſeven hundred marks, which the pope unjuſtly arrogated, in conſequence of king John's puſillanimity. Some of the monks ventured to defend this claim; and againſt them Wickliffe oppoſed himſelf. This rendered him odious to the Pope, who could ill brook any oppoſition; but it gained him favour at court: he was made king's chaplain; and the duke of Lancaſter in particular took him into his patronage, and procured for him the living of Lutterworth in Leiceſterſhire, which he held to his death. Though he had from the beginning freely declared his ſentiments (as appears particularly from his tract "Of the laſt age of the church," publiſhed in 1356) reſpecting the monks, the corruptions and diſorders of the religious, the exactions and uſurpations of the pope; yet now he began more freely to deliver his doctrines, which were judged novel, becauſe contrary to the received opinions of thoſe times.

In 1372 he took his degree as doctor in divinity, which he publicly profeſſed, and read lectures in it with great applauſe. In theſe he ſtrongly oppoſed the follies and ſuperſtitions of the friars: he charged them with holding fifty errors and hereſies; he ſhewed their corruptions, and detected their practice. This was ſtriking at the root of all the abuſes which had crept into the church, at a time when the greater and more neceſſary articles of faith, and all genuine and rational knowledge of religion, had generally given place to fabulous legends and romantic ſtories.

A ſhameful abuſe prevailed in our kingdom at this time. The pope diſpoſed of all eccleſiaſtical benefices and dignities, which he generally conferred upon foreigners; by which means all the revenues of them went out of the land. In 1374, the king iſſued out a commiſſion for taking a ſurvey of all eccleſiaſtical benefices in the hands of aliens. The number and value of them aſtoniſhed him; and it was reſolved to ſend an embaſſy upon this ſubject to the pope. Dr. Wickliffe was the ſecond perſon mentioned in this commiſſion. Two years were employed in the treaty; when it was concluded that the pope ſhould ceaſe from this practice. But treaties were vain; the parliament complained the very next year that the treaty was infringed, and a long bill was brought into parliament againſt the papal uſurpations; in which they remonſtrated, that the tax paid to the pope amounted to five times as much as that paid to the king; and that God had given his ſheep to the pope to be paſtured, not fleeced. Wickliffe, during this embaſſy, was made more ſenſible of the pride, avarice, ambition, and tyranny of the pope; whom therefore he boldly expoſed, in his public lectures, and private converſation. He as freely reproved the corruptions which prevailed amongſt the prelates and inferior clergy, obſerving, that "the abomination of deſolation had its beginning from a perverſe clergy, as comfort aroſe from a converted clergy!" Of the prelates, he ſays, "O Lord, what token of meekneſs and forſaking of worldly riches is this! A prelate (as an abbot or prior that is dead to the world, the pride and vanity thereof) to ride with fourſcore horſes, with harneſs of ſilver and gold! and to ſpend with earls and barons, and their poor tenants, both thouſand marcs and pounds, to maintain a falſe plea of the world, and forbeare men of their right."

The reader will not wonder, that this freedom expoſed him to the reſentment of thoſe whoſe vices he ſo ſeverely reprehended. The monks complained to the pope; the pope, already enraged at Wickliffe, heard them with ſufficient readineſs. Nineteen articles were drawn up againſt him, taken, as they pretended, from his lectures and ſermons; and the pope, Gregory the XIth, iſſued out ſeveral bulls againſt him, all dated May the 22d, 1377. The articles which they objected to, as held by him, were principally as follow: "That the euchariſt, after the conſecration, was not the real body of Chriſt, but only an emblem or ſign of it: that the church of Rome was no more the head of the univerſal church, than any other church; and that St. Peter had no greater authority given him than the reſt of the apoſtles: that the pope had no more juriſdiction, in the exerciſe of the keys, than any other prieſt: that if the church miſbehaved, it was not only lawful, but meritorious, to diſpoſſeſs her of her temporalities: that when a prince, or temporal lord, was convinced that the church made an ill uſe of her endowments, he was bound, under pain of damnation, to take them away;—That the goſpel was ſufficient to direct a Chriſtian in the conduct of his life;—That neither the pope, nor any other prelate, ought to have priſons for the puniſhing offenders againſt the diſcipline of the church; but that every perſon ought to be left at liberty in the conduct of his life."

Now, though perhaps, in our better days of liberty, we ſhall not be able to diſcern any thing very criminal and heretical, in the greater part of theſe opinions of Wickliffe; yet it is eaſy to ſee how offenſive they muſt have been to the pope and his clergy, as they ſtruck at the foundation of their uſurpations. Let it alſo be remembered, that theſe articles were drawn up by his enemies, and are preſented, all of them, without any of thoſe reſtrictions and qualifications with which ſo wiſe and ſenſible a man muſt unqueſtionably have delivered them.

Upon the force of theſe, bulls were ſent to the king, to the univerſity of Oxford, and to two biſhops, Simon Sudbury of Canterbury, and William Courtney of London, empowering them to examine into the matter of complaint, the univerſity delivering up Wickliffe, and the king aiding in the trial.—Before the bulls arrived, Edward III. died; and in the firſt parliament of Richard I. it was debated, "whether they might lawfully refuſe to ſend the treaſure out of the kingdom, after the pope required it, on pain of cenſures, &c."—The reſolution of this doubt was referred by the king and parliament to Wickliffe, (as high an honour as could be done him) and he not only declared it lawful to refuſe, but undertook to prove it ſo by the principles of the law of Chriſt.

Thus honoured, and powerfully ſupported by the duke of Lancaſter, and the lord Henry Percy, earl marſhal, who took him into their protection, Wickliffe had no great cauſe to fear the trial, to which he was ſummoned by the two prelates at St. Paul's. He came, attended by the two nobles; and the concourſe of people was ſo great, that it was with ſome difficulty he and his two patrons got admittance into the church. A warm altercation enſued between the biſhop of London and the duke of Lancaſter, indecent and unſeemly on the duke's ſide eſpecially: a tumult came on, no buſineſs could be done; the court broke up, when the two noblemen carried off Wickliffe in triumph, and the mob, enraged at the duke of Lancaſter for inſulting their biſhop, plundered his palace in the Savoy.

Another bull from the pope, inſtigating the univerſity and the biſhops to greater zeal againſt Wickliffe, occaſioned another ſummons for his appearance before the delegates at Lambeth. He appeared; when the Londoners, now on his ſide, forced themſelves into the chapel, to encourage the doctor.—Willing to give all proper ſatisfaction, he delivered in a paper, explaining the concluſions wherewith he was charged: but that which procured him an exemption from any harſher ſentence, than that of an injunction of ſilence, (to which little regard was paid) was a meſſage from the king's mother, by Sir Lewis Clifford, to forbid them from proceeding to any definitive againſt Wickliffe. The delegates were confounded at this meſſage; and as their own hiſtorian Walſingham ſays, (who is not a little diſpleaſed with them for this timidity) "at the wind of a reed ſhaken, their ſpeech became as ſoft as oil, to the public loſs of their own dignity, and the damage of the whole church! They were ſtruck with ſuch a dread, that you would think them to be as a man that heareth not, and in whoſe mouth are no reproofs."

However, it ſeems, the fatigues which Wickliffe underwent, by attending the delegates, and in the courſe of this harraſſing affair, threw him into a dangerous fit of illneſs, on his return to Oxford. His old antagoniſts, the begging friars, ſent a ſolemn deputation to him, upon this occaſion, adviſing him to revoke the errors he had advanced and ſpread; thoſe eſpecially which tended to their prejudice: but he, raiſing himſelf on his pillow, ſaid, with much vivacity—"I ſhall not die but live, and declare the evil deeds of the friars." The deputies upon this retired in confuſion, and Wickliffe recovered to make good his promiſe.

The death of his great enemy, pope Gregory XI. in the year 1378, gave Wickliffe reſt from perſecution, and time to open the minds of men, by the diſſeminating his opinions. The ſchiſm too, which happened by the election of two popes, not only threw the church into confuſion, but afforded Wickliffe and his party a fair occaſion to ſpeak freely of the head of the church. He wrote accordingly a tract, entitled, "Of the ſchiſm of the Roman pontiffs:" and being very anxious for a publication of the ſacred ſcriptures in the vulgar tongue, he now alſo printed his book "of the truth of the ſcripture," in which he affirms, that the will of God is evidently revealed in the two teſtaments, and contends earneſtly for a tranſlation of them. Accordingly his wiſhes were ſoon after accompliſhed; and he lived to ſee the "firſt tranſlation of the whole bible into the Engliſh language," publiſhed by himſelf, and his learned aſſociates: for which ſingle work he deſerves ever to be held dear in the memory and eſtimation of every proteſtant.

Courtney, biſhop of London, who ſucceeded Simon Sudbury in the ſee of Canterbury, was always a great oppoſer of Wickliffe and his followers; and was preparing to proceed againſt them with all rigour. But as ſoon as the parliament met in the year 1382, Wickliffe preſented his appeal to the king and both houſes.—And it ſhould ſeem as if he met with powerful ſupport and protection; for, ſpite of all the enmity and virulence which were exerted againſt this heroic confeſſor, we do not find that his enemies were able to prevail againſt him. Anne of Luxemburg, whom the king married in the year 1382, became a great patroneſs of him and his doctrines: ſome of which, though a court, appointed by Courtney, condemned as heretical and erroneous—and who can wonder at this?—yet they were never able to harm his perſon: power for the impriſonment and burning of heretics not yet being given to the church, independent of the crown.

It does not appear that Wickliffe had any thoughts of ſeparating from the Romiſh church entirely; he appears only to have wiſhed for a reformation of many groſs and grievous abuſes then prevailing, and for a demolition of the abſolute and ſpiritual tyranny then exerciſed by the pope and his numerous adherents of monks, friars, &c. For we find, that after his retirement from his profeſſorſhip at Oxford to his living at Lutterworth, he exerciſed the duties of his function in the regular way. He had a ſtroke of the palſy (a diſeaſe frequently occaſioned by great fatigues and anxiety of mind) in the year 1384, when the pope cited him to appear at Rome. He returned a letter of excuſe to his holineſs, and tells him in it, that "Chriſt taught him more obeiſhe (obedience) to God than man." His enemies were ſenſible that this diſtemper would ſoon put a period to his life, and therefore they permitted him to ſpend the remainder of his days in tranquillity, after he had been many years expoſed to continual danger. He was ſeized with another violent fit of the palſy on Innocents-day, in the year 1384, as he was hearing maſs in his church of Lutterworth, when he fell down, never recovered his ſpeech, and ſoon expired, in the ſixtieth year of his age.

He wrote and left behind him many pieces; uncouth indeed to our ears, but elegant and well wrote for thoſe times, and far ſuperior to the cenſure which M. Voltaire ſuperficially throws upon them. Many of theſe are found in different libraries; and their utility is ſufficiently proved, by the ſtrict injunction given by the prieſts, that no man ſhould read them—and by the excommunication, which the pope threatened, againſt thoſe who ſhould even keep any of them in their poſſeſſion. He is ſaid to have written two hundred volumes, beſides his tranſlation of the Bible, a fair copy of which is now in Queen's college library, Oxford, and two more in the univerſity library. "It was done, no doubt, in the moſt expreſſive language of thoſe days, though harſh to our ears: as, for inſtance, the 'knave' of Jeſus Chriſt, for 'ſervant,' and Philip baptized the 'gelding,' for 'eunuch;' ſo much is our language now improved."

The letters teſtimonial given by the univerſity of Oxford, and ſealed with their common ſeal, do his character more honour, than all the invidious repreſentations of his many foes do him prejudice. In theſe it is ſaid, "that his converſation, from his youth to his death, was ſo praiſe-worthy and honeſt in the univerſity, that he never gave any offence, or was aſperſed with any mark of infamy or ſiniſter ſuſpicion; but that in anſwering, reading, preaching, and determining, he behaved himſelf laudably, as a valiant champion of the truth, and catholically vanquiſhed, by ſentiments of holy ſcripture, all ſuch as by their wilful beggary blaſphemed the religion of Chriſt. That this doctor was not convicted of heretical pravity, or by our prelates delivered to be burnt after his burial. For God forbid, that our prelates ſhould have condemned a man of ſo great probity for an heretic, who had not his equal in all the univerſity, in his writings of logic, philoſophy, divinity, morality, and the ſpeculative ſciences."

But though our prelates condemned him not, yet the council of Conſtance ſufficiently ſhewed what ſpirit they were of, and what they would have done, by ordering his bones to be taken up and burnt ſo many years after, and his aſhes to be thrown into the river Swift. His followers indeed, ſometimes called Wickliffites, and more frequently Lollards, felt all the weight of the civil and eccleſiaſtical arm combined to deſtroy them. It has been commonly ſuppoſed that this name, which undoubtedly is of German original, was derived from one Walter Lollard, a German reformer. Du Pin, and others, aſſert this: but a late hiſtorian, of much ingenuity, Moſheim, (in his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, p. 589) quarto) declares, that, upon the ſtricteſt enquiry, he could not be ſatisfied of the truth of this; and gives it as his opinion, that as the religious people, who were called by the name of Lollards in reproach, were remarkable for all charitable offices, particularly attending the ſick, and taking care of their funerals, when, according to the German cuſtom, hymns and pſalms were always ſung; and, as upon other occaſions, they delighted eſpecially in ſpiritual ſongs and hymns—hence they were called, by way of deriſion, Lollards, or pſalm-ſingers; for he tells us, that ſuch is the direct ſignification of the word, derived from the German, lullen, lollen, lallen, with the uſual termination 'hard.' Lollen, or lullen, ſignifies to ſing with a low and ſweet voice, and hence, ſays he, in Engliſh, the phraſe 'to lull aſleep.' Archbiſhop Chichely, in the year 1416, ſet up a kind of inquiſition in every pariſh, to diſcover and puniſh the Wickliffites; but this prevented not the growth of theſe opinions, as the preſent ſtate of the church abundantly proves: nay, even in thoſe days, Kneyghton, one of their own hiſtorians, tells us, "That the number of thoſe who believed in Wickliffe's doctrine, very much increaſed; and, like ſuckers growing out of the root of a tree, were multiplied, and every-where filled the compaſs of the kingdom; inſomuch that a man could not meet two people on the road, but one of them was a diſciple of Wickliffe's."

Thoſe who are deſirous to obtain a more ſatisfactory account of this great and good man, we refer to his life, written by the Rev. Mr. Lewis, who has ſpared no pains to vindicate his memory from the aſperſions of popiſh bigots; and who has laid before the public ſeveral authentic papers, which will afford every friend to the reformed churches much ſatisfaction: while we will conclude our brief account of him with the juſt eulogy, which the able and learned Mr. Wharton long ſince paſſed upon this diſtinguiſhed reformer. "He was a man, than whom the Chriſtian church, in theſe laſt days, has not produced a greater; and who ſeems to have been placed as much above praiſe, as he is above envy."

A. D. 1553. MARY I. was conſidered by the people in general as the legal ſucceſſor of Edward. The proteſtants, indeed, dreaded the effects of her prejudices; but the univerſal hatred againſt the Dudleys, who it was foreſeen would be the real ſovereigns, was more than ſufficient to counterbalance, even with that party, their regard to every other conſideration. Mary was known to be a bigotted catholic; but Henry VIII. having reſtored his daughters to the right of ſucceſſion, her title to the crown admitted of no diſpute. However, the ambition of Northumberland was not to be reſtrained. As he knew it would be impoſſible to execute Edward's will, without getting the princeſſes Mary and Elizabeth into his power, he ſent them orders in the king's name, whoſe death he had concealed for ſome days, to come to court, under pretence that the king's ill ſtate of health made him deſire the conſolation of their company and advice. In conſequence of this invitation, the lady Mary had already reached Hodeſdon, within half a day's journey to the capital, when ſhe received a private meſſage from the earl of Arundel, informing her of her brother's death, and Northumberland's deſigns; upon which ſhe inſtantly returned back, and, by quick journies, arrived arrived firſt at Kenninghall in Norfolk, then at Framlingham in the county of Suffolk; whence ſhe wrote circular letters to the nobility and gentry, reminding them of her right, requiring them to aſſiſt her in defence of her perſon, and commanding them to proclaim her without delay. Northumberland finding it in vain to diſſemble any longer, repaired to Sion-houſe, attended by the duke of Suffolk, the earl of Pembroke, and others of the nobility, to intimate to lady Jane Gray her acceſſion to the throne, by virtue of an act of ſettlement. This lady was no ſooner made acquainted with the deſign of their viſit, than ſhe burſt into a flood of tears, and, overwhelmed with grief, appeared quite inconſolable. Inſenſible of the flattering allurements of ambition; ſhocked at the very idea of poſſeſſing a crown, ſhe refuſed to accept of it; expreſſing her dread of the conſequences attending ſo dangerous an enterpriſe; the preferable right of the two princeſſes; and begging to be permitted to remain in a private ſtation. At laſt, overcome by the perſuaſions of her father, and above all of her huſband, ſhe was prevailed on to relinquiſh her own judgment, and ſubmit to their will. The next day ſhe was conveyed to the Tower, according to a cuſtom which then prevailed, and had been long uſual, for the Engliſh monarchs to paſs a few days after their acceſſion in that fortreſs. The council immediately gave orders to proclaim lady Jane throughout the kingdom; but theſe orders were obeyed only in London, and its environs, on the tenth of July; and the people were ſo aſtoniſhed at the excluſion of Henry's two daughters, and ſo averſe to Northumberland, the deſtructive foe of their favourite Somerſet, that they expreſſed neither joy nor exultation at this event. This odium was increaſed by the behaviour of the duke, who ordered one Pot, a vintner's apprentice, who had uttered ſome ſarcaſtic expreſſions relative to the ſucceſſion, to be deprived of his ears, and expoſed on the pillory, for his inſolence. The proteſtant divines, who were employed to convince the people of Jane's title, found their eloquence fruitleſs; and even Ridley, biſhop of London, who preached a ſermon on that ſubject, produced no effect on his audience. Mean while, Mary exerted herſelf with great activity, to oppoſe the deſigns of Northumberland. She was joined by numbers of the nobility and gentry, particularly by the earls of Bath and Suſſex, Sir Thomas Mordaunt, Sir John Wharton, Sir William Drury, Sir Henry Bedingfield, and the lord Thomas Howard, ſon to the duke of Norfolk. Sir Edward Haſtings, brother to the earl of Huntingdon, having been ordered to levy troops for the ſervice of lady Jane, deſerted to Mary, at the head of four thouſand men. Even the fleet which had been ſent by Northumberland to cruiſe on the coaſt of Suffolk, in order to prevent either the eſcape of Mary, or the landing of foreign forces to her aſſiſtance, ſubmitted to that princeſs. Theſe friends, being informed that the duke of Northumberland was in full march againſt them, adviſed the princeſs to retire into another country. But this advice was needleſs; for the duke, inſtead of marching againſt the enemy, loitered away ſeveral days in the neighbourhood of Cambridge, and wrote in the moſt preſſing terms to the council for a reinforcement. Accordingly, they offered advantageous terms to every volunteer who would enliſt in the ſervice: but as the duke was generally deteſted, very few would engage; while the people flocked to the banners of Mary, and maintained themſelves at their own expence; ſo that, in a ſhort time, her army amounted to forty thouſand men. The departure of the duke of Northumberland afforded the counſellors an opportunity of leaving the Tower, where they had been in ſome meaſure priſoners. They aſſembled at Baynard's caſtle, a houſe belonging to the earl of Pembroke, and invited thither all the noblemen whom they conceived to be well affected to Mary. A conſiderable number attended; and the conference was opened by the earl of Arundel, who inveighed againſt the cruelty and injuſtice of Northumberland, in the ſtrongeſt terms; and concluded with moving, that they ſhould return immediately to their duty and allegiance, by proclaiming Mary queen, as the only method they could now take to preſerve the tranquillity of the ſtate, and recover their honour.

This motion was ſeconded by the earl of Pembroke, who laying his hand on his ſword, ſwore he was ready to anſwer any man who ſhould oppoſe ſo ſalutary a meaſure. But the majority expreſſed their approbation of the propoſal. The lord mayor and aldermen were ordered to attend: then mounting their horſes, they rode to the croſs in Cheapſide, where, on the nineteenth of July, Mary was proclaimed queen of England. The ſame ceremony was performed in all the principal ſtreets of London: Te Deum was ſung in the cathedral of St. Paul's; and this unexpected event celebrated with great rejoicings by the populace. Even the duke of Suffolk, lady Jane's father, who commanded in the Tower, finding it would be in vain to reſiſt, ſurrendered that fortreſs; and lady Jane herſelf, after wearing the vain pageantry of a crown during ten days, returned to a private life with much more ſatisfaction than ſhe felt when royalty was tendered to her. Northumberland, deſerted by his troops, and deſpairing of ſucceſs, made a merit of neceſſity; and finding it impoſſible to eſcape out of the kingdom, he was the firſt, when queen Mary was proclaimed at Cambridge, to throw up his cap, as a token of his loyalty and ſubmiſſion. But this diſſimulation was of no ſervice to him. Mary knew the duke to be an inveterate enemy to her family, and that his expreſſions of loyalty were only the effects of fear. She therefore ſent the earl of Arundel to arreſt that ambitious nobleman. The haughty Northumberland now loſt both his hopes and his courage. Arundel had no ſooner informed him of the purport of his viſit, than he fell at his feet, and, in the moſt ſubmiſſive manner, begged for his life. This abject behaviour, ſo peculiar to fallen inſolence, excited the contempt rather than the pity of Arundel. He told the duke, the queen's orders muſt be obeyed; and Northumberland, together with two of his ſons, and his principal accomplices, were ſent to London, and committed to the Tower. The duke of Suffolk, lady Jane Gray, lord Guilford Dudley, the marquis of Northampton, Sir Thomas Palmer, and Sir John Gates, were alſo taken into cuſtody, and ſhared the ſame fate. But the queen being deſirous of acquiring popularity in the beginning of her reign, by an appearance of clemency, pardoned moſt of them, and eveen reſtored Suffolk to liberty. All oppoſition being thus deſtroyed, Mary, attended by vaſt numbers of people, and a long train of courtiers, ſet out from Framlingham for London, where ſhe was met by the princeſs Elizabeth, with a body of two thouſand men. The queen made a very pompous entry into London, and proceeding immediately to the Tower, where the duke of Norfolk, who had been detained priſoner ever ſince the death of her father; Courtney, ſon to the marquis of Exeter, who, without having been charged with any crime, had been ſubject to the ſame puniſhment, ever ſince his father's attainder; the three prelates, Gardiner, Tunſtal, and Bonner, who had been confined for their adherence to the catholic religion, appeared before her, and implored her protection. She embraced them all in the moſt affectionate manner, ſaying to the conſtable of the Tower, "theſe are my priſoners," and ordered them inſtantly to be ſet at liberty. The prelates were reſtored to their ſees; Courtney was created earl of Devonſhire, and Gardiner made lord high chancellor of England.

The heinouſneſs of Northumberland's offence, in the queen's judgment, could not admit of any lenity. When brought to his trial in Weſtminſter-hall, he deſired permiſſion to aſk the peers two queſtions;—Whether a man could be guilty of treaſon for obeying orders of the council, under the great ſeal? And whether thoſe, who were at leaſt equally guilty, could ſit as his judges?—The duke of Norfolk, who ſat as high ſteward, anſwered, that the great ſeal of an uſurper was no authority; and the perſons alluded to, not lying under any ſentence of attainder, were ſtill innocent in the eye of the law, and capable of ſitting on any trial. From this laſt anſwer, ſo contrary to common ſenſe, the duke foreſaw, that any objection he could make would be over-ruled: he therefore pleaded guilty to the indictment, and reſted upon her majeſty's mercy. At his execution, the duke confeſſed that he had always been a Roman catholic in his heart, and expreſſed great compunction of mind for having plundered the effects of the church, eſpecially as he was rendered incapable of making reſtitution. Sir Thomas Palmer, and Sir John Gates, ſuffered with him; but the marquis of Northampton, and the earl of Warwick, who were alſo condemned, obtained a reprieve, and were afterwards pardoned. But this ſhew of clemency in the queen, and her other popular acts, did not prevent the proteſtants from being agitated on account of the reformation, to which the bulk of the nation were inclined; for, notwithſtanding her promiſe to continue the form of religion eſtabliſhed by Edward, they plainly perceived ſhe intended its abolition. She granted indeed a kind of general amneſty, and remitted the ſubſidy voted to the late king: but theſe were fallacious appearances, ſoon followed by all the rigours of tyranny. After having ſecured the perſons of thoſe from whom ſhe expected the greateſt oppoſition, her next ſtep was to conſult with her friends the beſt method of extirpating the proteſtant religion; and ſuch was her haſty zeal to affect this, that had it not been for the counſels of Charles V. and biſhop Gardiner, ſhe had ſent for cardinal Pole, as legate, to reconcile England to the biſhop of Rome. But they both diſapproving a ſtep of ſuch dangerous tendency, the queen was, with great reluctance, prevailed upon to ſuſpend her reſolution for the preſent, and to content herſelf in publiſhing liberty of conſcience in affairs of religion. However, the proteſtants were alarmed; and their fears were ſoon confirmed by the confidence of the catholics, who made no ſcruple of inveighing, in the moſt bitter terms, againſt the profeſſors of the reformed religion. Bourne, one of the chaplains of biſhop Bonner, in a ſermon preached before that prelate at St. Paul's, uſed the moſt indecent invectives againſt Edward's adminiſtration, particularly with regard to the reformation: by which a tumult was excited among the audience. Some reproached him in the harſheſt terms; others pelted him with ſtones: one threw a dagger, which narrowly miſſed him; and he would probably have been torn in pieces, had not Bradford and Rogers, two eminent proteſtant miniſters, interpoſed, and conveyed him by a private door, out of the church. Such a glaring proof of the people's diſlike to popery, inſtead of being a caution to adminiſtration, had a contrary effect, and induced them to have recourſe to violent meaſures.

This reign had not yet been ſtained with any ſanguinary act; but it was now thought neceſſary to open the ſluices of eccleſiaſtical ſeverity, which ſoon deluged the land with blood. Under pretence of diſcouraging diſputes, Mary began with ſilencing all preachers throughout England, except ſuch as had obtained a particular licence; and thoſe of the Romiſh religion only were favoured with this privilege. Bradford, one of the two proteſtant miniſters who had reſcued Bourne in the late tumult, was committed to priſon, and his companion, Rogers, was confined to his own houſe. Judge Hales, who alone, of all his brethren, had refuſed to ſign the inſtrument which transferred the crown to lady Jane, was ſent to priſon, where he was treated with ſuch ſeverity that he was ſeized with a frenzy, and put an end to his own life. Sir Edward Montague, who was alſo a proteſtant, was deprived of his office, and fined a thouſand pounds, for having aſſiſted in drawing up the ſettlement of the crown in favour of lady Jane. Hooper, biſhop of Glouceſter, and Ferrar, biſhop of St. David's, were impriſoned, for preſuming to preach without a licence from Gardiner. Coverdale, biſhop of Exeter, was alſo confined to his own houſe, for the ſame crime. Peter Martyr, profeſſor of divinity at Oxford, ſuffered ſo many indignities and inſults, that he was obliged to leave his chair, and retire for protection to the archbiſhop s palace at Lambeth. Some zealous catholics moved, that he might be committed to priſon; but Gardiner effectually oppoſed their attempts, and generouſly ſupplied him with money for his journey.

Though Cranmer had employed with ſucceſs his good offices, in abating the prejudices which Henry VIII. had entertained againſt his daughter Mary, yet the activity with which he had ſupported her mother's divorce, and carried on the reformation, had rendered him the object of her hatred; and though Gardiner had been no leſs forward in promoting and defending the divorce, he had ſufficiently atoned for it by his ſufferings in defence of the Romiſh religion. The primate had, therefore, little reaſon to expect favour during the preſent reign; and his honeſt zeal ſoon involved him in perſecution. A report prevailing, that Cranmer had promiſed to officiate in the Latin ſervice, in order to pay his court to the queen, he publiſhed a tract, with a deſign to wipe off this aſperſion; in which, among other things, he ſaid, That as the devil was a liar from the beginning, he had ſtirred up his ſervants to perſecute Chriſt, and his true religion; and now endeavoured to reſtore the Latin ſatisfactory maſſes, a thing of his own invention, by falſely making uſe of Cranmer's name and authority; and that the maſs is neither founded on the ſcriptures, nor on the practice of the primitive church; but diſcovers a plain contradiction to antiquity and the inſpired writings, and is replete with many horrid blaſphemies. On the publication of this inflammatory paper, Cranmer was caſt into priſon; and being tried for concurring with lady Jane, and oppoſing the queen's acceſſion, was ſentenced to ſuffer death for high treaſon; but Providence had reſerved him for a more ſevere trial. Mary ſhould have remembered that Cranmer had done her many good offices with her father; it was owing to his interpoſition, that the ſevere prejudices that monarch had entertained againſt her were mitigated; but being the perſon who pronounced her mother's divorce, and the author of the eſtabliſhment of the reformation in England, he became the object of her inveterate hatred. The impriſonment of the primate was followed by that of biſhop Latimer; nor was there hardly a biſhop, or even a preacher, who had ſignalized himſelf in eſtabliſhing the tenets of the reformation, and did either recant, or fly beyond ſeas, that eſcaped either deprivation or impriſonment. John a Laſco, a Pruſſian nobleman, and miniſter of the German proteſtant church in Auſtin-friars, with all other reformed preachers, who were foreigners, were baniſhed the kingdom. Many Engliſh proteſtants alſo followed them, and every thing bore a melancholy aſpect.

A parliament being ſummoned to meet on the fifth of October, the court gave ſuch candidates the preference, who were willing to favour their deſigns; and it ſoon appeared, that the majority of the commons were devoted to their ſervice; while the peers, being from intereſt or expectation attached to the court, little oppoſition was expected from them. On the firſt of October, Mary was crowned by the biſhop of Wincheſter; and at the ſame time publiſhed an amneſty, from the benefit of which, however, all thoſe who had been arreſted before the month of September, and many others, were nominally excluded. On the opening of the ſeſſion, the parliament ſhewed a contempt of the laws, by celebrating, in the Latin tongue, a maſs of the Holy Ghoſt, though it had been aboliſhed by act of parliament; when Taylor, biſhop of Lincoln, and Dr. Harley, biſhop of Hereford, refuſing to kneel, were thruſt by violence out of the houſe. The only ſtatutes enacted in this ſhort ſeſſion were, an act to limit all treaſons to the caſes ſpecified in a former act on the ſame ſubject in the reign of Edward III. and another to repeal the act of attainder paſſed againſt the marchioneſs of Exeter, whoſe ſon, the earl of Devonſhire, was now re-eſtabliſhed in all the honours of his family. In the enſuing ſeſſion an act paſſed for reverſing the ſentence of divorce between Henry VIII. and Catharine of Arragon, for repealing all the ſtatutes by which that ſentence had been confirmed. By this act the princeſs Elizabeth was again declared illegitimate; and Mary, having no further occaſion for her aſſiſtance, treated her with indignity and cruelty. An act alſo paſſed for aboliſhing all laws which Edward had made touching religion; and prohibiting all forms of worſhip, except thoſe uſed at the cloſe of Henry's reign. Another ſtatute annexed rigorous penalties to the abuſe of eccleſiaſtics, the prophanation of the euchariſt, and pulling down the crucifixes or images. The parliament then renewed an act of the late reign, making it felony for twelve perſons, or any greater number, to aſſemble with a view of changing the eſtabliſhed religion; and repealed the act of attainder againſt the duke of Norfolk.

Mary, after her acceſſion, is ſaid to have deliberated upon three marriages that were propoſed to her. Courtney, earl of Devonſhire, having an engaging perſon, accompanied with a pleaſing addreſs, gained the queen's affections, and hints were dropped of her not being averſe to him; but, neglecting theſe overtures, he attached himſelf to the lady Elizabeth, whoſe youth and agreeable converſation, he preferred to all her ſiſter's power and grandeur. This occaſioned a great coldneſs between Mary and Devonſhire, and made her break out into a declared animoſity againſt Elizabeth, that knew no bounds. Another party propoſed to the queen was cardinal Pole; for he had never taken prieſt's orders, and there appeared many reaſons to induce her to make choice of him; but the cardinal being in the decline of life, and accuſtomed to retirement, was repreſented as unqualified for the buſtle of a court, and the hurry of buſineſs. The queen then caſt her eye towards the emperor's family, from which her mother was deſcended. Charles V. had no ſooner heard of the death of Edward, than he reſolved to acquire the crown of England for his family. His ſon Philip was a widower, and eleven years younger than the queen; yet he imagined this objection would be overlooked, and there was no reaſon to deſpair of her having a numerous iſſue. Charles immediately ſent to inform Mary of his intentions. She being pleaſed with ſo powerful an alliance, and glad to unite herſelf more cloſely to her mother's family, to which ſhe was always ſtrongly attached, willingly embraced the propoſal. Norfolk, Arundel, and Paget adviſed herto conſent; and Gardiner, who was both prime-miniſter and chancellor, conſented to the propoſal. He at the ſame time repreſented both to her and the emperor, the neceſſity of putting a ſtop to the perſecution of the proteſtants, till the nuptials were compleated, which being once over, would give authority to the queen's meaſures, and afterwards enable her to proceed in the work; and obſerved, that it was neceſſary to reconcile the Engliſh to the marriage, by rendering the conditions ſuch as would ſeemingly enſure their independence, and the enjoyment of their ancient privileges. But Mary's intention of eſpouſing Philip becoming generally known, the commons were alarmed at hearing that ſhe was reſolved to contract a foreign alliance, and therefore ſent a committee to remonſtrate againſt it in the ſtrongeſt terms. Upon which ſhe diſſolved the parliament. After the diſſolution of this body, and that of the convocation, the queen, puſhed forward by her zeal, forgot the moderate meaſures propoſed as the line of her conduct. She cauſed the new ſtatutes to be carried into execution with the utmoſt rigour. The maſs was univerſally reſtored. Celibacy was exacted of the prieſthood; and numbers of the clergy were deprived of their benefices, for having availed themſelves of the indulgencies of their late beloved monarch. A viſitation was appointed in order to reſtore more perfectly the ancient rites; and the viſitors were enjoined to forbid the oath of ſupremacy from being taken by the clergy on their promotion to any benefice, notwithſtanding the laws of Henry VIII. were ſtill in force.

A. D. 1554.

Charles in the beginning of this year ſent over the count of Egmont, at the head of a ſplendid embaſſy, to adjuſt the marriage articles; and Gardiner was appointed to act in behalf of the queen. The treaty was at length concluded on the following terms: that though Philip ſhould enjoy the title of king, the adminiſtration ſhould be lodged in the hands of the queen; that no foreigner ſhould be capable of holding any dignified poſt in the kingdom; that no change ſhould be made in the Engliſh laws, cuſtoms, and privileges; that Philip ſhould not carry the queen abroad without her conſent; or any of her children without the conſent of the nobility; that her jointure ſhould amount to ſixty thouſand pounds a year; that the male iſſue of this marriage ſhould enjoy England, together with Burgundy and the Low Countries; and that if Don Carlos, Philip's ſon by his former marriage, ſhould die, and his line become extinct, the queen's iſſue, whether male or female, ſhould ſucceed to Spain, Milan, Sicily, and all the other dominions of Philip. This marriage was univerſally diſliked by the Engliſh. They diſtruſted, with reaſon, the artful emperor, and ſtill more his ſon, who was equally inclined to ſuperſtition and bigotry. Complaints being diffuſed through the nation, the people ſeemed determined to maintain their independence, or periſh in the attempt. Sir Thomas Wyat, a gentleman conſiderable on account of his ample fortune, and more ſo by the opinion the people entertained of his virtues, engaged to arm the Kentiſh men; Sir Peter Carew undertook to aſſemble the inhabitants of Devonſhire; and they perſuaded the duke of Suffolk, by the hopes of reſtoring lady Jane to the throne, to attempt to raiſe the midland counties. Carew, prompted either by his impetuoſity or apprehenſions, roſe in arms before the time appointed; but his troops were ſoon diſperſed by the earl of Bedford, and he himſelf was forced to take refuge in France. Suffolk, informed of the fate of this confederate, and dreading an arreſt, quitted the town, attended by his brothers the lords Thomas and Leonard Gray, and attempted to raiſe the people in the counties of Warwick and Leiceſter, where his chief intereſt lay; but he was ſo hotly purſued by the earl of Huntingdon at the head of three hundred horſe, that he was obliged to diſmiſs his followers; and being diſcovered in his retreat, was ſeized and conducted to London. Wyat was at firſt ſucceſsful, and ſeemed to threaten more fatal conſequences. Having publiſhed a declaration at Maidſtone in Kent, againſt the queen's unjuſt proceedings, and the danger of being enſlaved by a Spaniard, the people flocked to his ſtandard in great numbers. The duke of Norfolk, with Sir Henry Jernegan, were detached againſt them, at the head of the queen's guards, with five hundred of the city trained bands, commanded by one Bret; and they overtook the rebels at Rocheſter, where they had fixed their head-quarters. Upon Norfolk's approach, Sir George Harper pretended to deſert from the inſurgents; but having previouſly ſecured the intereſt of Bret, theſe two perſons repreſented the deſigns of the court in ſuch odious colours, that the whole body of Londoners went over to the rebels, and Norfolk was obliged to make a precipitate retreat, leaving behind him his baggage, and eight pieces of braſs cannon. Wyat, encouraged by this reinforcement, and relying on the favour of the people, eſpecially of the Londoners, who were moſtly proteſtants, reſolved to proceed on his enterprize; and accordingly led his troops to Southwark, where he demanded of the queen that ſhe ſhould put him in poſſeſſion of the Tower, deliver four counſellors as hoſtages, and in order to inſure the liberty of the nation, immediately eſpouſe an Engliſhman. Finding that the bridge was barricadoed againſt him, and that the city was overawed by the regular troops, he marched up to Kingſton, where he croſſed the river with four thouſand men, hoping to animate his friends, who had promiſed to declare in his favour. But he had imprudently ſpent ſo much time in Southwark to no purpoſe, that his popularity began to wane; and though he entered Weſtminſter without oppoſition, his followers finding that no perſon of note eſpouſed his cauſe, gradually diſperſed, and Wyat was at length taken priſoner near Temple-bar by Sir Maurice Berkley. About ſeventy perſons ſuffered for this inſurrection; and four hundred falling on their knees, obtained pardon, and were diſmiſſed. Wyat was condemned and executed. As it had been reported, that at his trial he had impeached the lady Elizabeth, and the earl of Devonſhire, he ſolemnly declared to the ſpectators preſent at his execution, that they had no concern whatever in his rebellion. Mary, deſirous of effecting the ruin of her ſiſter, reſolved to embrace the opportunity of this inſurrection to accompliſh her wicked deſign; and hoping to find againſt that princeſs ſome appearance of guilt, ſhe ordered her to be conducted to London under a ſtrong guard, there to be impriſoned and ſtrictly examined by the council; but this ſcheme not anſwering according to her cruel intention, a marriage was projected between Elizabeth and the duke of Savoy; and when this propoſal was rejected by the princeſs, ſhe was again confined at Woodſtock. The earl of Devonſhire, equally innocent, was committed priſoner to Fotheringay caſtle.

Lady Jane Gray, and her huſband lord Guilford Dudley, had languiſhed in priſon ever ſince the queen's acceſſion; and it was now determined to finiſh the diſmal tragedy. A meſſage was ſent to the lady Jane, deſiring her to prepare for immediate death; which doom ſhe had long expected, and therefore heard it pronounced without much perturbation. The bigotted queen, under pretence of compaſſion for her ſoul, ſent her two divines, who harraſſed her with diſputations, inſtead of adminiſtering any real comfort: yet that amiable lady, even under theſe ſad and mournful circumſtances, had preſence of mind, not only to defend her religion, but alſo to write a letter to her ſiſter Catharine in the Greek language; in which, ſending her at the ſame time a copy of the New Teſtament in that tongue, ſhe exhorted her to maintain an unſhaken perſeverance in the profeſſion ſhe had avowed. It had been propoſed to execute lady Jane and lord Guilford together, on the ſame ſcaffold; but the council, to prevent any diſturbance that ſuch an affecting ſcene might be ſuppoſed to excite among the people, gave orders, that lord Guilford ſhould be beheaded within the verge of the Tower. She viewed her huſband as he went to execution, and even ſaw his headleſs trunk brought back in a cart, to be interred in the chapel. In about two hours after his death, ſhe herſelf ſuffered within the fortreſs. The lieutenant of the Tower requeſting ſhe would favour him with ſome memorial, ſhe gave him her table-book, wherein ſhe had written three ſhort ſentences in the Greek, Latin, and Engliſh languages, declaring her innocence. When brought to the ſcaffold, ſhe turned to the ſpectators, moſt of whom were diſſolved in tears, and obſerved, that innocence was no excuſe for facts and circumſtances that tended to the prejudice of the ſtate. Having ſpent ſome time in devotion, ſhe cauſed herſelf to be diſrobed by her women, and with the utmoſt tranquillity ſubmitted to the fatal ſtroke. Thus, by the ambition of her family, was this lovely flower cropt before its beauties were expanded in full luſtre; for at the time of her death ſhe had not attained the ſeventeenth year of her age. She was a lady of an elegant perſon, an engaging temper, and of a moſt accompliſhed mind. Being of the ſame age with the late king, ſhe had been educated with him, and was well acquainted with the Roman and Greek languages, beſides the modern tongues. She had ſpent moſt of her time in a ſtudious application to learning, ſhewing great indifference to the uſual amuſements of her ſex and ſtation. Roger Aſcham, lady Elizabeth's tutor, one day paying her a viſit, found her reading Plato, while the reſt of the family were engaged in a party hunting in the park; and on his expreſſing admiration at the ſingularity of her choice, ſhe obſerved, that Plato afforded her more real pleaſure than others could reap from all their gaiety and ſports. While her mind was poſſeſſed of this fondneſs for literature, her heart was filled with tenderneſs for her huſband, who deſerved her affection. On the morning of her execution, he deſired permiſſion to ſee her, but ſhe refuſed her conſent: ſhe feared the tenderneſs of a parting interview would overcome the fortitude of both, and render them incapable of finiſhing the period of life with that conſtancy which was neceſſary in their melancholy circumſtances. "Our ſeparation, ſaid ſhe, will only be for a moment; we ſhall ſoon rejoin each other in the regions above, where our affections will be for ever united, and where the ſtorms of adverſity, and even death itſelf, can never afflict us more." Being informed that he met death with great compoſure, ſhe expreſſed an eagerneſs to follow him, and with her departed that beauty, ſpirit, ſenſe and virtue, with which ſhe honoured her country, and which can never be forgot by every faithful hiſtorian. Her fate drew a flood of tears from the eyes of all ſpectators, and even of thoſe who were moſt zealouſly attached to queen Mary. Soon after the death of this innocent victim, the duke of Suffolk was tried, condemned, and executed. He would have been more pitied had not his daughter's untimely fate been cauſed by his temerity. Lord Thomas Gray loſt his life for the ſame crime. Sir Nicholas Throgmorton was tried in Guildhall; but no ſatiſfactory evidence appearing againſt him, and he making an admirable defence, the jury gave a verdict in his favour. Mary was ſo enraged at this diſappointment, that ſhe cauſed him to be ſent back to the Tower, and for ſome time kept in cloſe confinement. The jury were alſo ſummoned before the council, who ſent them all to priſon, and afterwards fined them, ſome a thouſand pounds, and others two thouſand each. This illegal violence proved fatal to thoſe who were afterwards tried; among others, to Sir John Throgmorton, brother to Sir Nicholas, who was condemned on no better evidence than that which had been before rejected. Mary now filled the priſons with all thoſe whom the favour of the people, rather than any appearance of guilt, made the objects of her ſuſpicion. She ordered the chancellor to purge the church of eccleſiaſtics; upon which the archbiſhop of York, with the biſhops of St. David's, Cheſter, and Briſtol, were depoſed, becauſe they had not lived in celibacy; thoſe of Lincoln, Glouceſter, and Hereford, met with the ſame fate, on pretence that they had inculcated erroneous doctrines. Two-thirds of the inferior clergy were deprived of their benefices, on account of their being married; and the maſs was re-eſtabliſhed in all churches, together with the liturgy uſed in the latter part of Henry's reign.

The queen, conſumed by impatience, expected her intended conſort with a degree of anxiety that affected her health. At length, on the nineteenth of July, ſhe received the grateful news, that prince Philip was landed at Southampton. Mary met the prince at Wincheſter, where the nuptials were ſolemnized with great ſplendor, by biſhop Gardiner; and the queen, with her new ſpouſe, made a pompous entry into London. Philip was a prince of profound diſſimulation, and maintained a reſerve very diſguſting to the Engliſh; but he brought with him an immenſe ſum of money; and, in order to acquire popularity, interceded in behalf of the princeſs Elizabeth, whom Gardiner had devoted to deſtruction. By his mediation, that princeſs, the archbiſhop of York, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction, were ſet at liberty. Philip well knew that if Elizabeth fell a ſacrifice to the malevolent diſpoſition of her ſiſter, Mary Stuart, queen of Scotland, and wife to the dauphin of France, was the next in order of ſucceſſion, and conſequently that England would be united to that crown: to prevent an incident of ſuch importance, Philip affected a generoſity little conſiſtent with his real character. The only way to Philip's heart was to gratify his ambition. Mary, however, loved him for thoſe qualities that acquired him the hatred of others.

About this time, cardinal Pole arrived in England, as the pope's legate, the parliament having repealed the act by which that prelate had been condemned, in the reign of Henry VIII. On his arrival in London, he was introduced to the king and queen; after which, he exhorted the parliament to reconcile themſelves and the kingdom to the holy ſee, from which they had been ſo long unhappily divided. The parliament approved the propoſal; of which the legate being informed, he went to the houſe of peers, and after having expatiated on the pope's tender affection to the people of England, preſcribed, by way of penance, that they ſhould aboliſh all the laws enacted againſt the papal authority. He then, in the name of his holineſs, abſolved them from all the cenſures that had been paſſed againſt them, and admitted them into the boſom of the church. The parliament, in conſequence of this indulgence, enacted a ſtatute re-eſtabliſhing the papal dignity and juriſdiction in England, but under this reſtriction, that all alienations of church lands ſhould be authorized; and that the poſſeſſors of them ſhould not be ſubject to any cenſure, or proſecution on that account. They alſo paſſed a law, importing, that whoſoever ſhould attack any poſſeſſor of church lands, on pretence of eccleſiaſtical right, ſhould be ſubject to the penalties in the ſtatute of premunire. The laws againſt heretics were now revived; but cardinal Pole, who was a man of moderation, adviſed in council, that perſecution ſhould be avoided, and the morals of the clergy reformed; nevertheleſs the queen adhered to Gardiner's opinion. She left to Pole the care of reforming the clergy, and committed the charge of extirpating hereſy by torture and fire to Gardiner. The parliament having confirmed to the nobility the poſſeſſion of their church lands, did not heſitate to come into all the meaſures of the court: they readily ſacrificed their liberty on the altar of ſuperſtitious bigotry; and once more lighted up the piles for conſuming all who thought different from the Roman church. Such, however, was their rooted averſion to Spain, that though the queen laboured with the utmoſt difficulty to procure her huſband to be declared preſumptive heir to the crown, and to be inveſted with the adminiſtration of public affairs, ſhe failed in both attempts: ſhe could not even prevail upon the parliament to agree to his coronation, nor obtain from the commons a ſubſidy for aſſiſting the emperor in his war againſt France.

A. D. 1555.

It was now determined to execute the laws againſt hereſy in their full force; and England was ſoon filled with ſcenes of horror, which has ever ſince rendered the catholic religion (if a mixture of judaiſm, paganiſm, and Chriſtianity may be ſo called) an object of general deteſtation. We could wiſh, for the honour of popery and humanity, that the mantle of oblivion could be drawn over theſe deteſtable actions; but the pen of hiſtory muſt not diſſemble the exceſſes and dreadful conſequences of bigotted zeal. The horrid inhuman ſcenes, which muſt be diſplayed, are awful monitors to perſecuting bigots of every communion, and furniſh an important though melancholy leſſon to all mankind. The firſt victim of falſe zeal was Rogers, a prebendary of St. Paul's, who was committed to the flames in Smithfield. He had deſired to ſee his wife before he died; but Gardiner, adding inſult to cruelty, told him, that he was a prieſt, and could not poſſibly have a wife. Hooper, biſhop of Glouceſter, was tried at the ſame time with Rogers, but was ſent to be executed at Glouceſter. Saunders was burned at Coventry: he rejected a pardon that was offered him, and embracing the ſtake, cried, "Welcome the croſs of Chriſt: welcome everlaſting life." Doctor Taylor, vicar of Hadley, ſuffered in the ſame place, ſurrounded by his friends and pariſhoners. Philpot ſealed the truth with his blood in Smithfield. Gardiner, who had expected that the reformers would be ſtruck with terror by a few examples, finding his miſtake, and that the work grew under his hands, devolved the laborious office on others, particularly on Bonner, a man of profligate manners, and of a brutal diſpoſition, who appeared to rejoice in the torments he inflicted on unhappy ſufferers. He ſometimes whipped the priſoners with his own hands till he was tired: he tore off the beard of a weaver, who refuſed to recant; and, to give a ſpecimen of burning, held his hand in the flame of a candle till the ſinews and veins ſhrunk and burſt. It would be to little purpoſe to enumerate all the horrid cruelties practiſed in England, during the three years that theſe perſecutions laſted. However, a few inſtances more may be worth recording, to warn zealous bigots, of every denomination, to keep at the greateſt diſtance from ſuch odious and fruitleſs acts of inhumanity. Ridley, biſhop of London, and Latimer, who had been biſhop of Worceſter, were celebrated for their learning and piety. Theſe died together at Oxford, in the ſame flames, and ſupported each others conſtancy, by their mutual exhortations. Cranmer had been long confined in priſon, and was led from thence to the ſtake, amidſt the inſults of ignorant papiſts, and bore their ſcorn, as well as the torture of his puniſhment with ſingular fortitude. One Hunter, an apprentice of nineteen years of age, having been drawn by a prieſt into a diſpute, in which he unwarily denied the real preſence, was ſo ſenſible of his danger, that he immediately concealed himſelf; but Bonner ſeizing his father, threatened him with the greateſt ſeverities if he did not produce the young man, that he might be brought to his trial. Hunter, hearing of the troubles to which his father was expoſed, delivered himſelf up voluntarily to Bonner, and was condemned by that inhuman monſter to the flames. One Hawkes agreed with his friends, while he was conducted to the ſtake, that if he found the torture tolerable, he ſhould make them a ſignal from amidſt the flames. His zeal for the cauſe, and the raviſhing proſpect of his approaching happineſs ſo ſupported him, that he ſtretched out his arm, the ſignal agreed upon, and thus expired. Multitudes, encouraged by this example, and many others of like conſtancy, were ready to ſuffer, and even longed to obtain a martyr's crown. Even the tender ſex produced many examples of invincible courage, in maintaining the ſacred dictates of conſcience, amidſt all the fury of their perſecutors. In particular, one execution was attended with circumſtances, which even at that time excited aſtoniſhment. A woman in Guernſey being brought to the ſtake, near the time of her labour, was delivered when the faggots were lighted. One of the guards ſnatched the infant from the fire, and attempted to ſave it; but a magiſtrate ordered it to be thrown back, ſaying, he was reſolved, that nothing ſhould ſurvive which ſprang from ſo obſtinate and heretical a parent. Impolitic as theſe proceedings were in every view, repeated orders were ſent from the council to quicken the diligence of the magiſtrates in diſcovering heretics. Theſe acts of violence rendered the Spaniſh government ſtill more odious; which Philip perceiving, he endeavoured to remove the reproach from himſelf, by cauſing Alphonſo, his confeſſor, to preach a ſermon in favour of toleration, in the preſence of the court, in which he charged the biſhops with thoſe cruelties which had excited the indignation of the public; and challenged them to produce one paſſage in the ſcriptures, which authorized them to put people to death merely for matters of faith. The audience heard, with aſtoniſhment, a Spaniſh friar condemn perſecution; and the biſhops were ſo confounded, that they for ſome time ſuſpended their inhuman rage, though afterwards the flames broke out with redoubled fury. But the court finding that Bonner, however cruel and ſhameleſs, would not bear alone the whole infamy, threw off the maſk, and the queen's unrelenting temper appeared without controul. That we might not return to the ſavage cruelties of this bloody reign, we have placed in one view the principal tranſactions againſt the proteſtants, during the ſpace of three years. In which time it was computed, that two hundred and ſeventy-ſeven perſons were brought to the ſtake, beſides thoſe who were puniſhed by confiſcations, fines, and impriſonments. Among thoſe who were burned alive are included five biſhops, twenty-one clergymen, eight lay gentlemen, eighty-four tradeſmen, one hundred huſbandmen, ſervants and labourers, fifty-five women, and four children. Aſtoniſhing as this cruelty appears, the number of proteſtant martyrs in other countries was much greater. Father Paul computes, that in the Netherlands alone, from the time when the edict of Charles V. was promulgated againſt the reformers, there had been fifty thouſand hanged, buried alive, or burned, on account of religion, and that the number in France was very conſiderable.

In the courſe of this year a ſplendid embaſſy was ſent to Rome, to inform his holineſs of all that had been tranſacted in the Engliſh parliament, and to make tender of ſubmiſſion to the holy ſee in the name of the king, queen, and three eſtates of England. But before their arrival, Julius III. was dead, and St. Peter's chair filled by Paul IV. a proud, haughty, inſolent eccleſiaſtic. He was ſo far from receiving the Engliſh ambaſſadors with that kindneſs they had reaſon to expect, that he refuſed to give them audience, becauſe Mary had ſtiled herſelf queen of Ireland, as well as of England; a title which neither herſelf, nor any of her predeceſſors, had received from the holy ſee. In conſequence of this, they were obliged to wait till a bull was expedited for inveſting Mary with that title, and then they were admitted to an audience. The pope appeared aſtoniſhed when the ambaſſadors expreſſed their hopes, that he would confirm to the laity the poſſeſſion of the church lands. He blamed Pole for exceeding his commiſſion; and wondered how any perſon could preſume to harbour a thought that he would grant any confirmation to acts in themſelves iniquitous and ſacrilegious. He even iſſued a bull, denouncing the ſevereſt anathemas upon all who ſhould withhold from the church, or the religious orders, any part of their property. He alſo demanded Peter-pence, which had been ſo long aboliſhed. The nobility heard of theſe determinations of the Pontiff without emotion: the thunder of the Vatican had loſt its force in England; a few only trembled at the threatenings of the holy father. Among theſe ignorant zealots was the queen, who, notwithſtanding the meaſures purſued at the commencement of her reign, thought herſelf obliged to give up ſuch church-lands as remained in her poſſeſſion, and to found new monaſteries till the treaſury was exhauſted. It was in vain that the council repreſented to her the intereſt of her crown; "I prefer (ſaid ſhe) the ſalvation of my ſoul to ten ſuch kingdoms as England." A kind of inquiſition was now eſtabliſhed, by appointing commiſſioners to take an exact account of all hereſies; to puniſh all neglects of the catholic worſhip in churches and chapels; to proceed againſt the clergy who did not preach the doctrine of tranſubſtantiation, or uſe the holy water. The juſtices of the peace were ordered to appoint ſpies over the conduct of the people; to ſummon the accuſed, without diſcovering the accuſer, and to put to the torture ſuch obſtinate perſons who would not confeſs. Nor did the tyranny of the court terminate here; a proclamation was iſſued, commanding all who were poſſeſſed of heretical books to burn them without reading, or ſhewing them to others: and declaring that all who refuſed to pay an implicit obedience to theſe orders ſhould be deemed rebels, and executed immediately by martial law. But this iron hand of oppreſſive tyranny was diſplayed in vain; every martyrdom was more effectual than a thouſand ſermons againſt popery; and the aſhes of a ſufferer, like ſeed diſſeminated in a fertile ſoil, produced an hundred fold.

It was not long before Mary felt the effect of public hatred, excited by her malevolence and cruel diſpoſition. She had flattered herſelf with an imaginary pregnancy, and when ſhe found her miſtake, ſhe fell into a profound melancholy. The miniſtry became extremely unpopular; and Philip, diſguſted with a wife who was continually jealous, without being in any reſpect amiable, made preparations for returning to the continent. The choler which conſumed her, was diſcharged on the proteſtants, by daily enforcing the ſanguinary laws, and even by expreſſions of rage againſt all her ſubjects, by whom ſhe knew herſelf to be hated. Philip had received an invitation from the emperor, together with a declaration of his intention of reſigning to him his dominions. He therefore took this opportunity of retiring to Flanders, and met his father at Bruſſels. The queen's love increaſed by his abſence, and ſhe ſpent the moſt of her time in ſolitude, where ſhe vented her paſſion in tears, and in writing fond epiſtles to her huſband, who ſeldom anſwered them; and when he did, would ſcarcely condeſcend to favour her with a ſingle expreſſion of love or gratitude.

On the twenty-firſt of October, the parliament met at Weſtminſter, but with viſible marks of diſcontent. A bill was paſſed for reſtoring to the church, the tenths, firſt-fruits, and all the impropriations that remained in the hands of the crown; but though the queen herſelf was chiefly affected by this bill it met with great oppoſition from the commons. An application being made to them for a ſubſidy during two years, and for two fifteenths, the latter was refuſed, many of the members objecting, that while the crown was ſtripped of its revenues, it was in vain to beſtow upon it riches. The parliament alſo rejected a bill for incapacitating ſuch as were remiſs in the proſecution of hereſy from being juſtices of the peace; and another, for obliging the exiles to return under certain penalties. Upon which the queen, vexed at their intractable humour, diſſolved the parliament. This ſudden change in the temper of the houſe of commons, is, perhaps, with juſtice, attributed to the death of Gardiner, who died on the twelfth of November. By the death of this prelate, the queen was deprived of her ableſt counſellor, and the only miniſter who had any great authority in the parliament. He was a perſon of a ſelfiſh character; a profound diſſembler: and of a proud, vindictive, and cruel diſpoſition. He underſtood the canon and civil law as well as moſt of his time; he wrote Latin with eaſe and purity, and few of his contemporaries excelled him in the knowledge of the Greek language. He is ſaid to have felt ſome remorſe in his laſt moments for the cruel perſecutions he had carried on againſt the proteſtants, and to have exclaimed, "I have ſinned with Peter, but I have not wept with Peter."

A. D. 1556.

Mary exaſperated at the ſpirit of oppoſition which prevailed throughout the nation, and being in an ill humour on account of her huſband's abſence, ſpent her time in extorting money from her people, in order to ſatisfy his demands. She levied a loan of ſixty thouſand pounds upon a thouſand perſons, of whoſe compliance ſhe was moſt aſſured; but that ſum being not ſufficient, ſhe exacted a general loan from all who poſſeſſed twenty pounds a year. This lying heavy on the gentry, many of them were obliged to diſmiſs their ſervants, to enable them to comply with her demands; and as theſe ſervants, having no means of ſubſiſtence, frequently turned thieves and robbers, the queen publiſhed a proclamation, to oblige their former maſters to take them again into their ſervice. She raiſed ſixty thouſand marks from ſeven thouſand yeomen, and thirty-ſix thouſand pounds from the merchants. Commerce was interrupted by her rapaciouſneſs. The Engliſh company ſettled at Antwerp, refuſing to lend her forty thouſand pounds, ſhe diſſembled her reſentment, till they had bought and ſhipped great quantities of cloth for Antwerp-fair; and then laid an embargo on the ſhips, and obliged the merchants not only to lend her the forty thouſand pounds ſhe at firſt demanded, but to engage for the payment of twenty thouſand more, and to ſubmit to an arbitrary impoſition of twenty ſhillings on each piece. Being informed ſome time after, that the Italian merchants had ſhipped above forty thouſand pieces of cloth for the Levant, for which they were to pay the uſual impoſition of a crown a piece, ſhe entered into an agreement with the merchant adventurers of London, and prohibited the foreigners from making any exportation; for which ſhe received from the Engliſh merchants fifty thouſand pounds, and four crowns on each piece of cloth they exported. She in vain attempted to borrow great ſums abroad, but had ſo little credit, that though ſhe offered the city of Antwerp fourteen per cent. for thirty thouſand pounds, ſhe could not obtain this ſum, until ſhe obliged the city of London to be her ſecurity. Thus ſhe employed the baſeſt expedients to raiſe money, for which ſhe had no other viſible occaſion, but to ſupply the demands of Philip, who appeared entirely indifferent about any thing that related to her. He was become maſter of the wealth of America, and of the richeſt and moſt extenſive dominions in Europe, by the voluntary reſignation of his father, Charles V. who being diſguſted with the world, was reſolved to ſeek that tranquillity and happineſs in a private retreat, which he had ſought in vain, amidſt the tumults of war, and the reſtleſs projects of ambition. He ſummoned the ſtates of the Netherlands, and ſeating himſelf, for the laſt time, on the throne, informed his ſubjects of the reaſons of his reſignation; and after devolving his authority on Philip, told him, that his paternal tenderneſs made him weep, when he reflected on the burden he laid upon him, and that the great and only duty of a prince, was to ſtudy the happineſs of his people. A few months after Charles reſigned his other dominions to his ſon, and ſailed to Spain, retired into the monaſtery of St. Juſt, which being ſeated in a happy climate, amidſt numberleſs beauties of nature, he had choſen for his retreat. He was ſoon ſenſible of the ingratitude of Philip, his ſon, who was negligent in paying the ſmall penſion he had reſerved for himſelf. He employed his leiſure hours in examining the controverſies in divinity, which he had hitherto only conſidered in a political light; and in imitating the works of the moſt famous artiſts and mechanics; of which he had been an admirer and encourager. Having amuſed himſelf with the conſtruction of clocks and watches, he thence remarked the impracticability of what had ſo much engaged his attention during his reign; and how impoſſible it was, that he, who could never frame two machines that would go exactly alike, could ever be able to make all mankind agree in the ſame opinions. The emperor lived a recluſe in his retreat about two years.

A. D. 1537.

Philip now preparing for a war with France, was deſirous of engaging England in the quarrel; and though the queen was extremely averſe to it, her fondneſs for him made her exert her utmoſt endeavours to engage the nation to enter into his views. This was, however, openly oppoſed by cardinal Pole, and many other counſellors, who inſiſted on the marriage articles, which expreſsly provided againſt it. Philip, in order to ſupport his partizans, returned to England on the twentieth of March; and the nation was ſoon after alarmed with an account, that a rebellion was broke out in the northern parts of the kingdom. One Thomas Stafford, and others, were detected in a deſign to ſurprize Scarborough, and a confeſſion being extorted from them, that Henry, the French monarch, had encouraged them in that attempt, it was reſolved to make this act of hoſtility, with others of a like doubtful nature, the ground of a quarrel, and war was declared againſt France, about the middle of June, with great ſolemnity. Having thus procured the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh, Philip paſſed over to the Low Countries, while his general, the duke of Savoy, ſtrengthened with the junction of a body of Britiſh forces, entered Picardy and St. Quintin. As the place was but poorly fortified, and defended by a weak garriſon, he hoped in a few days to compel it to ſurrender: but the governor, nor, admiral Coligni, thinking it his duty to ſave ſo important a fortreſs, threw himſelf into the town, and with a few battalions of French and Scots, and by his exhortations, encouraged the ſoldiers to make a vigorous defence. In the mean time he ſent an expreſs to his uncle Montmorency, the conſtable, requeſting a reinforcement. That general accordingly advanced towards St. Quintin, at the head of his whole army, in order to facilitate the attempt of throwing a body of forces into the town. The duke of Savoy, one of the greateſt generals of his age, informed of the conſtable's deſign, attacked the reinforcement with ſuch fury, that not more than five hundred men entered the place. Animated with this ſucceſs, he fell upon the conſtable, routed his whole army, and took him priſoner. Two thouſand five hundred of the enemy fell on the field of battle, among whom were ſeveral noblemen of the firſt diſtinction. This defeat filled France with conſternation; and the duke of Savoy, to improve the advantage he had gained, diſpatched the duke of Bedford, and the count of Egmont, at the head of four thouſand men, to make an inroad into France. The inhabitants of Paris were ſo terrified, that they began to fortify their city; and had the duke of Savoy marched directly to the capital, he had, in all probability, made himſelf maſter of the place; but he continued the ſiege of St. Quintin, which, by the bravery of the admiral, held out ſeventeen days, when it was taken by ſtorm, and that gallant officer, with his brother, and all who had ſurvived of the garriſon, were made priſoners. The noble conduct of the admiral, in defending the place, ſaved France; for the Spaniards loſt a favourable opportunity of puſhing their conqueſts, till the advanced ſeaſon obliged them to go into winter quarters.

A. D. 1558. The vigilant and active duke of Guiſe, who had been recalled with his army from Italy, now attempted, in the depth of winter, an enterprize, which France, in her greateſt proſperity, had always conſidered as impracticable. Not content with fortifying the frontiers of the kingdom, the duke reſolved to attempt the reduction of Calais. This place was defended by lord Wentworth, an experienced officer; but the garriſon conſiſted only of five hundred ſoldiers, and about two hundred townſmen. It was ſurrounded by moraſſes on the land ſide, and could only be approached by a dyke, at the head of which was a bridge, defended by a fort called Newenham, about a quarter of a mile from the town. Near this fort was another, called St. Agatha; and the entrance of the harbour was defended by a caſtle, called Ryſbank. Such was the ſituation of Calais when Guiſe ſat down before it; when it was not imagined the French could be able to undertake any enterprize of conſequence, ſo ſoon after the defeat they had ſuffered at St. Quintin. When the duke began his march to Calais, a French fleet was ſent into the channel, under pretence of cruiſing on the trading veſſels of the Engliſh; but in reality to aſſiſt the land forces in their operations. The firſt attempt of the French was againſt fort Agatha, which the Engliſh, after a gallant defence, were forced to abandon. The garriſon, however, threw themſelves into fort Newenham, which was immediately inveſted by the enemy. At the ſame time the French ſhips cannonaded Ryſbank, and both forts became untenable. Wentworth ſaw the neceſſity of abandoning theſe places, the greater part of his garriſon being employed in defending them: he therefore gave orders for their capitulating with the enemy, and joining him in Calais, which, without their aſſiſtance, he was in no condition to defend. The garriſon at Newenham followed his inſtructions, and were permitted to retire into the town: but thoſe in the Ryſbank were not ſo fortunate; the French officer refuſed to ſign any capitulation; and the garriſon were obliged to ſurrender priſoners of war. All acceſs to Calais was now totally cut off; and the duke of Guiſe formed, with prodigious labour, a road, conſtructed with pitched hurdles, through the moraſs, by the help of which a large detachment of his army lodged themſelves behind ſome heights, near the walls of the town. Here they erected a battery of fifteen pieces of large cannon againſt the caſtle, in which a practicable breach was ſoon made. D'Andelot, brother to Coligni, was now ordered to draw the water out of the ditch, and ſucceſsfully executed the taſk in one night. The next day the duke ordered a general aſſault, which was made with ſuch fury, that the breach was carried by ſtorm, and the French effected a lodgment in the caſtle. During the enſuing night, Wentworth endeavoured to recover that poſt, but having loſt two hundred men, and the French pouring ſuch numbers into the caſtle, he thought any farther reſiſtance would be madneſs, and accordingly capitulated on the following terms, the beſt he could obtain in his diſtreſſed ſituation: "That he himſelf ſhould remain a priſoner of war, with fifty of the chief officers of his garriſon: that the reſt ſhould be at liberty to retire, either to England or Flanders; and that the place, with all its proviſions, ammunition, cannon, and riches, ſhould be immediately delivered up." This capitulation was ſigned on the ſeventeenth of January. Ham and Guiſnes were taken by the twenty-ſecond, and in leſs than thirty days, the duke of Guiſe reduced what had coſt Edward III. a ſiege of eleven months, at the head of an army fluſhed with glory, acquired in the fields of Creſſy. Mary, even that unfeeling queen, was ſo ſenſibly affected with the loſs of Calais, that ſhe abandoned herſelf to grief, and repeatedly declared to thoſe about her, "That her end was approaching, and that ſhe ſhould never recover the effects of this misfortune." Murmurs and complaints now prevailed throughout the kingdom; the miniſtry could not attempt a vindication of their conduct; while the queen ſuffered all the pangs of the moſt mortifying diſappointment.

In the month of April, the dauphin of France eſpouſed Mary, queen of Scotland; and in June, Philip, king of Spain, obtained a complete victory over the French at Gravelines, where the general de Termes and his principal officers were taken priſoners. The Scots, prompted by French councils, beginning to move on the borders, the Engliſh were under a neceſſity of attending to their defence at home. Mary's repoſe and ſecurity ſeeming to be threatened by this cloſe alliance between France and Scotland, it was found neceſſary to call a parliament, to obtain ſupplies for her exhauſted treaſure; on which ſhe obtained a fifteenth, a ſubſidy of four ſhillings in the pound on land, and two ſhillings and eight pence on goods. The clergy likewiſe granted eight ſhillings in the pound, payable in equal proportions, within four years. The parliament alſo paſſed an act, confirming all the ſales and grants of the crown lands, already made by the queen, or that ſhould be made during the ſeven enſuing years. One Copley, a member, having expreſſed his apprehenſions, that the queen, under ſanction of this dangerous act, might alienate even the crown itſelf to the prejudice of the lawful heir, was, for his preſumption, with ſome others, committed to the Tower.

Throughout this whole inglorious reign, the Engliſh were under great apprehenſions with reſpect to the ſucceſſion, and the life of the lady Elizabeth. The queen's violent hatred of that princeſs, broke out on every occaſion; and it required all Philip's prudence and authority to prevent its producing the moſt fatal effects. Elizabeth retired into the country; and being ſenſible that ſhe was ſurrounded with ſpies, ſpent her time in reading and ſtudy, without intermeddling in buſineſs, or ſeeing much company. While ſhe remained in this dull and inactive ſituation, the Swediſh ambaſſador made her propoſals of marriage in the name of his maſter. She firſt aſked, whether the propoſal had been made to the queen. The ambaſſador replied, that his maſter thought it his duty as a gentleman, to pay his addreſſes to herſelf; and if he was ſo happy as to obtain her conſent, he would next, as a king, apply to her ſiſter. The princeſs would, however, allow him to proceed no farther. The affair, notwithſtanding, coming to the queen's knowledge, ſhe thanked her for this inſtance of duty, and deſired to know how ſhe liked the propoſal of the Swediſh monarch. Though Elizabeth was expoſed to many mortifications and dangers, ſhe reſolved not to make uſe of the relief this match would have afforded her, and covered her refuſal with expreſſing a fond attachment to a ſingle life, which, ſhe ſaid, ſhe preferred to any other. She likewiſe ſhewed great prudence in concealing her religious ſentiments, and eluding all the queſtions that were put to her on that delicate ſubject. During theſe tranſactions, the perſecution again raged in England with infernal fury. Thirty-nine proteſtants ſuffered martyrdom in different parts of England.

The health of queen Mary had for ſome time been in a declining ſtate. On miſtaking her dropſy for a pregnancy, ſhe had uſed an improper regimen, which daily increaſed her diſorder. Every reflection was now a ſubject of torment, begun in this world, and ſtruck a dagger in her heart. The corroding worm, that never dies, began to gnaw its vital ſtrings. The conſciouſneſs of having incurred the hatred of her ſubjects: the idea of Elizabeth's ſucceeding to the crown; her fears, that the catholic religion would be expoſed to danger; her dejection for the loſs of Calais, with which ſhe was deeply affected; and above all, her grief for the abſence of her huſband, who, ſhe knew, intended ſoon to return to Spain, to ſettle during the remainder of his life: theſe melancholy reflections preying upon her mind with the greateſt violence, threw her into a complication of diſorders, attended with a lingering fever, of which ſhe died on the ſeventeenth of November, in the forty-third year of her age, after a ſhort, a cruel, and unhappy reign of five years, four months, and eleven days. She was interred at Weſtminſter, in the chapel of her grand father Henry VII. Some writers have been of opinion, that this unworthy queen had a ſerious ſenſe of religion: but can we call that profeſſion, however diſtinguiſhed, by the ſacred peaceful name of religion, which prompts men to be guilty of ſavage cruelty, and is deſtitute of all the ſocial virtues? There are, we acknowledge a few devout pieces extant, compoſed by Mary. Styrpe has preſerved three of her meditations and prayers; and at the deſire of Queen Catharine Parr, ſhe began to tranſlate Eraſmus's paraphraſe on St. John, but after ſhe had made a ſmall progreſs in it, ſhe left the reſt to Dr. Mallet her chaplain. Eraſmus ſays, that ſhe wrote very good Latin letters, but her French ones are poor performances. Styrpe has printed one from the Cotton library, in anſwer to a haughty mandate from her huſband, on his reſolving to marry the lady Elizabeth to the duke of Savoy, againſt the inclinations of the queen, and that princeſs: in which he bids the former examine her conſcience, whether her repugnance does not proceed from obſtinacy; and inſolently tells her, that if any parliament went contrary to his requeſt, he ſhould lay the blame on her. The mortified Mary, in a moſt abject manner, and the moſt wretched ſtile, ſubmitting entirely to his will, profeſſes to be moſt bounden to him, than any other wife to a huſband, notwithſtanding his ill uſage of her. Other of her letters are preſerved in Hayne's ſtate papers: we wiſh we could add alſo a few of her virtues: but we ſhall here drop the curtain, her true portrait having been faithfully delineated in the hiſtory of her reign. Cardinal Pole, who had long laboured under an intermitting fever, died the ſame day with the queen. He was a prelate remarkable for his candour and ſweetneſs of temper, and was eſteemed by all who knew the value of thoſe amiable qualities. In times, when ſuch cruel perſecutions were raiſed againſt the reformers, Pole experienced not the hatred of proteſtants.

In this reign a law was paſſed by which the number of horſes, arms, and furniture was fixed, with which each perſon, according to the largeneſs of his fortune, ſhould be provided for the defence of the kingdom. For inſtance, a man of a thouſand pounds a year was obliged to maintain at his own expence, ſix horſes for his demi-lances, three of which, at leaſt, were to be furniſhed with ſufficient harneſs, ſteel ſaddles, and proper weapons: he was obliged to have forty corſlets furniſhed; fifty almain revets, or inſtead of them, forty coats of plate, corſlets or brigandines furniſhed; forty pikes, thirty long bows, thirty ſheafs of arrows, thirty ſteel caps or ſkulls, twenty black bills or halberts, twenty haquebuts, and twenty morions, or ſallets. This method was, doubtleſs, ſubject to many inconveniencies; but the revenues of the crown, and the ſupplies of parliament, were ſo inconſiderable, that there was no other method of equipping the troops. The revenue of England, at that time, was very little more than three hundred thouſand pounds a year.

The Engliſh having diſcovered a paſſage to Archangel, during the reign of Edward VI. a beneficial trade had been eſtabliſhed with Muſcovy. Hence a ſolemn embaſſy was ſent by the Czar to queen Mary, which ſeems to have been the firſt that had been ſent by that empire to any European prince. The ambaſſadors were ſhipwrecked on the coaſt of Scotland; but being hoſpitably entertained in that kingdom, proceeded on their journey, and were received in London with great pomp and ſolemnity.

In this reign we find the firſt general law in relation to highways, which were appointed to be repaired by pariſh duties all over England: but the arts and ſciences had made a very ſmall progreſs, and neither commerce, nor the marine of England had yet obtained a reſpectable footing. Hollingſhed, who lived in the next reign, gives a rude account of the preceding generation; and Eraſmus imputes the frequent plagues in England to the ſlovenly habits of the people. The floors, ſays he, are commonly of clay ſtrewed with ruſhes, under which lies unmoleſted an antient collection of beer, greaſe, fragments, bones, excrements of dogs and cats, and every thing that is naſty. Indeed we may form an idea of the ſmall progreſs of the arts, with reſpect to refinement and elegance, about this time, from a perſon of no leſs rank than the comptroller of Edward VI. houſhold, paying only thirty ſhillings a year, of our preſent money, for his houſe in Channel Row, London. Labour and proviſions were only about a fourth of the preſent price.

Memoirs of the life of Dr. Thomas Cranmer, the firſt proteſtant archbiſhop of Canterbury.

Aſlacton, in the county of Nottingham, was the birth place of this eminent prelate: who was born July 2, 1489. His family was antient, and came in with William the Conqueror. He was early deprived of his father Thomas Cranmer, Eſq; and after no extraordinary education, was ſent, by his mother to Cambridge, at the age of fourteen, according to the cuſtom of thoſe times. He took the uſual degrees, and was choſen fellow of Jeſus college: and emerging from the ſubtle and uſeleſs ſtudies of thoſe days, ſoon became celebrated for his learning and abilities.—In the year 1525 he married: but his wife dying in child-bed, within the year, he was re-elected fellow of Jeſus: a favour ſo gratefully acknowledged by him, that he choſe to decline an offer of a much more valuable fellowſhip in cardinal Wolſey's new ſeminary, at Oxford, rather than relinquiſh friends who had ſhewn ſuch regard to him.

In the year 1523, he commenced doctor in divinity: and being in great eſteem for theological learning, he was choſen divinity-lecturer in his own college; and appointed, by the univerſity, one of the examiners in that ſcience. In which office he principally inculcated the doctrine of the holy ſcriptures, then greatly neglected, as being of indiſpenſible neceſſity for the profeſſors of that divine knowledge. The plague happening to break out at Cambridge, Cranmer, with ſome of his pupils, removed to Waltham-abbey: where falling into company with Gardiner and Fox, one the ſecretary, the other almoner of king Henry; that monarch's intended divorce of Catharine his queen, the common ſubject of diſcourſe in thoſe days, came upon the carpet: when Cranmer adviſing an application to our own and to the foreign univerſities for their opinion in the caſe, and giving theſe gentlemen much ſatisfaction; they introduced him to the king: who was as much pleaſed with him; committed him to the care of Sir Thomas Boleyn, ordered him to write his thoughts on the ſubject; made him his chaplain, and admitted him into that favour and eſteem, which he never afterwards forfeited.

In the year 1530, he was ſent by the king, with a ſolemn embaſſy, to diſpute on the ſubject of the divorce at Paris, Rome, and other foreign parts. At Rome he delivered his book which he had written in defence of the divorce to the pope, and offered to juſtify it in a public diſputation: but after various promiſes and appointments, none appeared to oppoſe him: while in private conferences he forced them to confeſs that the marriage was contrary to the law of God. The pope conſtituted him "Penitentiary General of England," and diſmiſſed him. In Germany he gave full ſatisfaction to many learned men, who were before of a contrary perſuaſion: and prevailed on the famous Oſiander to declare the king's marriage unlawful. Before he left Germany he married Oſiander's niece.

While he was abſent the great archbiſhop Warham died: Henry, convinced of Cranmer's merit, determined that he ſhould ſucceed him: and commanded him to return for that purpoſe. He ſuſpected the cauſe, and delayed: deſirous, by all means, to decline this high ſtation: for he had a true and primitive ſenſe of the office. But a ſpirit ſo different from the churchmen of his times ſtimulated the king's reſolution: and the more reluctance Cranmer ſhewed, the greater reſolution Henry exerted. He was conſecrated on March 30, 1533, to the office: and though he received the uſual bulls from the pope, he proteſted, at his conſecration, againſt the oath of allegiance, &c. to him. For he had converſed freely with the reformed in Germany, had read Luther's books, and was zealouſly attached to the glorious cauſe of reformation.

He was diſagreeably employed, as the firſt ſervice he did the king, in pronouncing the ſentence of his divorce from queen Catharine: and next in joining his hands with Anna Boleyn: the conſequence of which marriage was the birth of Elizabeth, to whom he ſtood godfather. And as the queen was greatly intereſted in the reformation, the friends to that good work began to conceive high hopes; and, indeed, it went on with deſirable ſucceſs. The pope's ſupremacy was univerſally exploded; monaſteries, &c. deſtroyed; and that valuable book of "The Erudition of a Chriſtian Man," was ſet forth by our great archbiſhop, with public authority: and the ſacred ſcriptures, at length, to the infinite joy of Cranmer, and the lord Cromwell, his conſtant friend and aſſociate, were not only tranſlated, but introduced into every pariſh. And "the tranſlation was received with inexpreſſible joy: every one, that was able, purchaſed it, and the poor flocked greedily to hear it read: ſome perſons, in years, learned to read on purpoſe, that they might peruſe it: and even little children crowded with eagerneſs to hear it!" One cannot fail to reflect, on this occaſion, how much we are bound to prize this ſacred treaſure, which we enjoy ſo perfectly: and how much to contend againſt every attempt of thoſe enemies, and that church, which would deprive us of it, and again reduce us to legends and ſchoolmen, to ignorance and idolatry!

That he might proceed with true judgment, Cranmer made a collection of their opinions from the works of the antient fathers and later doctors; of which biſhop Burnet ſaw two volumes in folio; and it appears, by a letter of lord Burleigh's, that there were then ſix volumes of Cranmer's collections in his hands. A work of incredible labour, but vaſt utility! A ſhining proof was ſoon after given of his ſincere and diſintereſted conſtancy by his noble oppoſition to what are commonly called king Henry's ſix bloody articles. However he weathered the ſtorm; and publiſhed, with an incomparable preface by himſelf, the larger Bible; ſix of which, even Bonner, then newly conſecrated biſhop of London, cauſed to be fixed, for the peruſal of the people, in his cathedral of St. Paul's.

The enemies of the reformation, however, were reſtleſs: and Henry was no proteſtant in his heart. Cromwell fell a ſacrifice to them; and they aimed every poſſible ſhaft at Cranmer: Gardiner in particular was indefatigable: he cauſed him to be accuſed in parliament; and ſeveral lords of the privy council moved the king to commit the archbiſhop to the Tower. The king perceived their malice; and one evening, on pretence of diverting himſelf on the water, ordered his barge to be rowed to Lambeth ſide. The archbiſhop being informed of it, came down to pay his reſpects, and was ordered by the king, to come into the barge and ſit cloſe by him. Henry made him acquainted with the accuſations of hereſy, faction, &c. which were laid againſt him; and ſpoke of his oppoſition to the ſix articles:—the archbiſhop modeſtly replied, that he could not but acknowledge himſelf to be of the ſame opinion, with reſpect to them; but was not conſcious of having offended againſt them. Then the king, putting on an air of pleaſantry, aſked him, If his bed-chamber could ſtand the teſt of theſe articles? The archbiſhop confeſſed, that he was married in Germany, before his promotion; but aſſured the king, that on paſſing that act, he had parted with his wife, and ſent her abroad to her friends. His majeſty was ſo charmed with his openneſs and integrity, that he diſcovered the whole plot that was laid againſt him: gave him a ring of great value to produce, upon a future emergency; and determined to counterwork Cranmer's enemies; who ſummoned him ſoon after to the council, ſuffered him to wait in the lobby amongſt the footmen; treated him on his admiſſion with haughty contempt; and would have ſent him to the Tower: but he produced the ring; and gained his enemies a ſevere reprimand from Henry, and himſelf the higheſt degree of ſecurity and favour.

Upon this occaſion he ſhewed that lenity and mildneſs which always diſtinguiſhed him; never perſecuted any of his enemies, nay freely forgave even the inveterate Gardiner, on his writing a ſupplicatory letter to him for that end. And now we are upon the ſubject of the archbiſhop's readineſs to forgive and forget injuries, we may relate a pleaſant inſtance of it, which happened ſome time before this. The archbiſhop's firſt wife, whom he married at Cambridge, was kinſwoman to the hoſteſs at the Dolphin Inn, and boarded there: and he often reſorting thither on that account, the popiſh party had raiſed a ſtory, that he was hoſtler to that Inn, and never had the benefit of a learned education. This idle ſtory a Yorkſhire prieſt had with great confidence aſſerted, in an alehouſe which he uſed to frequent; railing at the archbiſhop, and ſaying, that he had no more learning than a gooſe. Some of the pariſh informed lord Cromwell of this; and the prieſt was committed to the Fleet priſon. When he had been there nine or ten weeks, he ſent a relation of his to the archbiſhop, to beg his pardon and to ſue for his diſcharge. The archbiſhop inſtantly ſent for him, and, after a gentle reproof, aſked the prieſt whether he knew him? to which he anſwering, No; the archbiſhop expoſtulated with him, why he ſhould then make ſo free with his character? The prieſt excuſed himſelf by ſaying he was in drink: but this Cranmer told him was a double fault; and then let him know, that if he were inclined to try what a ſcholar he was, he ſhould have liberty to oppoſe him in whateverſcience he pleaſed. The prieſt humbly aſked his pardon, and confeſſed himſelf to be very ignorant, and to underſtand nothing but his mother tongue. No doubt, then, ſaid Cranmer, you are well verſed in the Engliſh Bible, and can anſwer any queſtions out of that; pray tell me, who was David's father? The prieſt ſtood ſtill a while to conſider; but at laſt told the archbiſhop he could not recollect his name. Tell me then, ſays Cranmer, who was Solomon's father? The poor prieſt replied, that he had no ſkill in genealogies, and could not tell. The archbiſhop then adviſing him to frequent alehouſes leſs, and his ſtudy more, and admoniſhing him not to accuſe others for want of learning, till he was maſter of ſome himſelf, diſcharged him out of cuſtody, and ſent him home to his cure. Theſe may ſerve as inſtances of his clement temper. The king, who was a good diſcerner of men, remarking the implacable hatred of his enemies towards him, changed his coat of arms from three cranes to three pelicans, feeding their young with their own blood: and told his grace, "that theſe birds ſhould ſignify to him, that he ought to be ready, like the pelican, to ſhed his blood for his young ones, brought up in the faith of Chriſt; for, ſaid the king, you are like to be tried, if you will ſtand to your tackling at length." The event proved the king to be no bad prophet.

In the year 1546, king Henry left his crown to his only ſon Edward, who was godſon to Cranmer, and had imbibed all the ſpirit of a reformer. This excellent young prince, influenced no leſs by his own inclinations than by the advice of Cranmer and the other friends of reformation, was diligent in every endeavour to promote it. Homilies were compoſed by the archbiſhop, and a catechiſm: Eraſmus's notes on the New Teſtament tranſlated, and fixed in churches; the ſacrament adminiſtered in both kinds; and the liturgy uſed in the vulgar tongue: Ridley, the archbiſhop's great friend, and one of the brighteſt lights of the Engliſh reformation, was equally zealous in the good cauſe: and with him the archbiſhop drew up the forty-two articles of religion, which were reviſed by other biſhops and divines; as through him he had perfectly conquered all his ſcruples reſpecting the doctrine of the corporeal preſence, and publiſhed a much eſteemed treatiſe, entitled, A Defence of the true and catholic Doctrine of the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

But this happy ſcene of proſperity was not to continue: God was pleaſed to deprive the nation of king Edward, in the year 1553, deſigning in his wiſe providence, to perfect the new born church of his Son Jeſus Chriſt in England, by the blood of martyrs, as at the beginning he perfected the church in general. Anxious for the ſucceſs of the reformation, and wrought upon by the artifices of the duke of Northumberland, Edward had been perſuaded to exclude his ſiſters, and to bequeath the crown to that duke's amiable and every way deſerving daughter, the Lady Jane Gray. The archbiſhop did his utmoſt to oppoſe this alteration in the ſucceſſion; but the king was over-ruled; the will was made, and ſubſcribed by the council and the judges. The archbiſhop was ſent for laſt of all, and required to ſubſcribe; but he anſwered, that he could not do it without perjury; having ſworn to the entail of the crown on the two princeſſes Mary and Elizabeth. To this the king replied, That the judges, who being beſt ſkilled in the conſtitution, ought to be regarded in this point, had aſſured him, that notwithſtanding that entail, he might lawfully bequeath the crown to lady Jane. The archbiſhop deſired to diſcourſe with them himſelf about it; and they all agreeing, that he might lawfully ſubſcribe the king's will, he was at laſt prevailed with to reſign his own private ſcruples to their authority, and ſet his hand to it.

Having done this, he thought himſelf obliged in conſcience to join the lady Jane: but her ſhort-lived power ſoon expired; when Mary and perſecution mounted the throne, and Cranmer could expect nothing leſs than what enſued; attainder, impriſonment, deprivation and death.

The Tower was crowded with priſoners; inſomuch that Cranmer, Ridley, Latimer and Bradford, were all put into one chamber; which they were ſo far from thinking an inconvenience, that on the contrary, they bleſſed God for the opportunity of converſing together; reading and comparing the ſcriptures, confirming themſelves in the true faith, and mutually exhorting each other to conſtancy in profeſſing it, and patience in ſuffering for it!

In April, 1554, the archbiſhop, with biſhop Ridley and Latimer, was removed from the Tower to Windſor, and from thence to Oxford, to diſpute with ſome ſelect perſons of both univerſities! but alas! what farces are diſputations, where the fate of men is fixed, and every word is miſconſtrued! and ſuch was the caſe here: for on April the 20th, Cranmer was brought to St. Mary's, before the queen's commiſſioners, and refuſing to ſubſcribe the popiſh articles, he was pronounced an heretic, and ſentence of condemnation was paſſed upon him. Upon which he told them, that he appealed from their unjuſt ſentence, to that of the Almighty: and that he truſted to be received into his preſence in heaven, for maintaining the truth of whoſe ſpiritual preſence at the altar, he was there condemned. After this his ſervants were diſmiſſed from their attendence, and himſelf cloſely confined in Bocardo, the priſon of the city of Oxford. But this ſentence being void in law, as the pope's authority was wanting, a new commiſſion was ſent from Rome in the year 1555: and in St. Mary's church, at the high altar, the court ſat and tried the already condemned Cranmer. He was here well nigh too ſtrong for his judges; and if reaſon and truth could have prevailed, there would have been no doubt who ſhould have been acquitted and who condemned. The February following a new commiſſion was given to biſhop Bonner and biſhop Thirlby, for the degradation of the archbiſhop. When he came down to Oxford he was brought before them: and after they had read their commiſſion from the pope (for not appearing before whom in perſon, as they had cited him, he was declared contumacious, though they themſelves had kept him a cloſe priſoner)—Bonner, in a ſcurrilous oration, inſulted over him in the moſt unchriſtian manner, for which he was often rebuked by biſhop Thirlby, who wept, and declared it the moſt ſorrowful ſcene in his whole life. In the commiſſion it was declared that the cauſe had been impartially heard at Rome: the witneſſes on both ſides examined, and the archbiſhop's counſel allowed to make the beſt defence for him they could: at the reading this, the archbiſhop could not help crying out, "Good God! what lies are theſe; that I, being continually in priſon, and not ſuffered to have counſel or advocate at home, ſhould produce witneſſes and appoint my counſel at Rome! God muſt needs puniſh this ſhameleſs and open lying!" When Bonner had finiſhed his invective, they proceeded to degrade him; and that they might make him as ridiculous as they could, the epiſcopal habit which they put on him, was made of canvas and old clouts: Bonner, mean time, by way of triumph and mockery, calling him Mr. Canterbury, and the like. He bore all with his wonted fortitude and patience; told them, "the degradation gave him no concern, for he had long deſpiſed thoſe ornaments: but when they came to take away his croſier, he held it faſt, and delivered his appeal to Thirlby, ſaying "I appeal to the next general council." When they had ſtripped him of all his habits, they put upon his jacket, a poor yeoman-beadle's gown, thread-bare and ill-ſhaped, and a townſman's cap; and ſo delivered him to the ſecular power, to be carried back to priſon, where he was kept entirely deſtitute of money, and totally ſecluded from his friends. Nay ſuch was the iniquity of the times, that a gentleman was taken into cuſtody by Bonner, and nearly eſcaped a trial, for giving the poor archbiſhop ſome money to buy him a dinner!

He had been impriſoned now almoſt three years; and death ſhould have immediately followed his ſentence and degradation; but his cruel enemies reſerved him for greater miſery and inſult. Every engine that could be thought of was employed to ſhake his conſtancy; but in vain: he held faſt the profeſſion of his faith without wavering. Nay, even when he ſaw the barbarous martyrdom of his dear companions Ridley and Latimer, he was ſo far from ſhrinking, that he not only prayed to God to ſtrengthen them; but alſo by their example, to animate him to a patient expectation and endurance of the ſame fiery trial.—

But, at length, the papiſts determined to try what gentle treatment would effect: they removed him from priſon to the lodgings of the dean of Chriſt church, urged every perſuaſive and affecting motive: and too much melted his gentle nature by the falſe ſun-ſhine of pretended civility and reſpect. Yet this availed not, till they again changed their conduct, and, with ſeverity enough, confined him to a loathſome priſon. This was more than the infirmities of ſo old a man could ſupport: the frailty of human nature prevailed: he began to waver: he fell: fell, but to riſe with ſuperior luſtre; and was induced to ſign ſix different recantations, drawn from him by the malice of his enemies; who notwithſtanding determined not to ſpare his life: for nothing leſs than his death could ſatiate the gloomy queen; who ſaid, that "as he had been the great promoter of hereſy, which had corrupted the whole nation, the abjuration, which was ſufficient in other caſes, ſhould not ſerve his turn; for ſhe was reſolved he ſhould be burned."

The archbiſhop had no ſuſpicion of ſuch a fate, after what he had done: the papiſts deſigned that he ſhould ſoon read his recantation publicly at St. Mary's; upon which they propoſed to have triumphed in his death. Accordingly on the day appointed, Cole mounted the pulpit, and the archbiſhop was placed oppoſite to it on a low ſcaffold, a ſpectacle of contempt and ſcorn to the people! Cole magnified his converſion as the immediate work of God's inſpiration; exhorted him to bear up with reſolution againſt the terrors of death; and by the example of the thief on the croſs, encouraged him not to deſpair, ſince he was returned, though late, into the boſom of the church; and aſſured him, that dirges and maſſes ſhould be ſaid for his ſoul in all the churches of Oxford. As ſoon as the archbiſhop perceived from Cole's ſermon what was the bloody decree, ſtruck with horror at the baſe inhumanity of theſe proceedings, he gave by all his geſtures, a full proof of the deep anguiſh of his ſoul. And at length being called upon by Cole, to declare his faith and reconciliation with the catholic church; he roſe with all poſſible dignity—and while the audience was wrapped in the moſt profound expectation, he kneeled down and repeated the following prayer: "O Father of heaven! O Son of God, Redeemer of the world! O Holy Ghoſt! proceeding from them both; three perſons and one God, have mercy upon me, moſt wretched and miſerable ſinner! I who have offended both heaven and earth, and more grievouſly than any tongue can expreſs, whither then may I go, or where ſhall I fly for ſuccour?—To heaven I may be aſhamed to lift up mine eyes, and in earth I find no refuge: what ſhall I then do: ſhall I deſpair? God forbid! O good God, thou art merciful! and refuſeſt none who come to thee for ſuccour: to thee, therefore, do I run: to thee do I humble myſelf, ſaying, O Lord God, my ſins be great, but yet have mercy upon me, for thy great mercy! O God the Son, thou waſt not made man, this great myſtery was not wrought, for few or ſmall offences! nor thou didſt not give thy Son unto death, O God the Father! for our little and ſmall ſins only, but for all the greateſt ſins of the world: ſo that the ſinner return unto thee with a penitent heart, as I do here at this preſent; wherefore have mercy upon me, O Lord! whoſe property is always to have mercy: for although my ſins be great, yet thy mercy is greater! I crave nothing, O Lord! for my own merits, but for thy name's ſake, that it may be glorified thereby, and for thy dear Son, Jeſus Chriſt's ſake.—And now, therefore, Our Father," &c.

He then roſe up: exhorted the people to a contempt of this world; to obedience to their ſovereign, to mutual love and charity; he told them, that being now on the brink of eternity, he would declare unto them his faith without reſerve and diſſimulation. Then he repeated the apoſtle's creed, profeſſing his belief thereof, and of all things contained in the Old and New Teſtament. By ſpeaking thus in general terms, the attention of the audience was kept up; but amazement continued that attention, when they heard him, inſtead of reading his recantation, declare his great and unfeigned repentance for having been induced to ſubſcribe the popiſh errors: he lamented with many tears his grievous fall, and declared that the hand which had ſo offended, ſhould be burned before the reſt of his body. He then renounced the pope in moſt expreſs terms, and profeſſed his belief concerning the euchariſt to be the ſame, with what he had aſſerted in his book againſt Gardiner.

This was a great diſappointment to the papiſts; they made loud clamours, and charged him with hypocriſy and falſhood: to which he meekly replied, "That he was a plain man, and never had acted the hypocrite, but when he was ſeduced by them to a recantation." He would have gone on further; but Cole cried, "Stop the heritic's mouth, and take him away." Upon which the monks and friars rudely pulled him from the ſcaffold, and hurried him away to the ſtake (where Ridley and Latimer had before been offered up) which was at the north ſide of the city, in the ditch oppoſite Baliol college. But if his enemies were diſappointed by his behaviour in the church, they were doubly ſo by that at the ſtake. He approached it with a chearful countenance; prayed and undreſſed himſelf; his ſhirt was made long down to his feet, which were bare, as was his head, where a hair could not be ſeen. His beard was ſo long and thick, that it covered his face with wonderful gravity; and his reverend countenance moved the hearts both of friends and enemies. The friars tormented him with their admonitions; while Cranmer gave his hand to ſeveral old men who ſtood by, bidding them farewel. When he was tied to the ſtake, and the fire kindled, he ſeemed ſuperior to all ſenſation, but of piety. He ſtretched out the offending hand to the flame, which was ſeen burning for ſome time before the fire came to any other part of his body; nor did he draw it back, but once to wipe his face, till it was intirely conſumed: ſaying often, "This unworthy hand, this hand hath offended:" and raiſing up his eyes to heaven, he expired, with the dying prayer of St. Stephen in his mouth, "Lord Jeſus receive my ſpirit!" He burned, to all appearance, without pain or motion, and ſeemed to repel the torture by mere ſtrength of mind; ſhewing a repentance and a fortitude which ought to cancel all reproach of timidity in his life.

Thus died archbiſhop Cranmer in the ſixty-ſeventh year of his age, and the twenty-third of his primacy; leaving an only ſon of his own name behind him. He was a man naturally of a mild and gentle temper; not ſoon provoked, and yet ſo eaſy to forgive, that it became a kind of proverb concerning him, "Do my lord of Canterbury a ſhrewd turn, and he will be your friend as long as you live." His candour and ſincerity, meekneſs and humility, were admired by all who converſed with him: but the queen could not forgive his zeal for the reformation, nor his divorce of her mother, though he had been the inſtrument of ſaving her own life: and, therefore, ſhe brought him to the ſtake, which has juſtly numbered him amongſt the nobleſt martyrs of Jeſus Chriſt: thus crowning his character; for he may well be eſteemed the apoſtle of the reformed church of England, and as ſuch muſt ever be dear in the mention of every proteſtant. He may truly be ranked with the greateſt primitive biſhops, and the fathers of the very firſt claſs, who were men as well as himſelf: and therefore, if in a ſcrutiny of theirs or of his character, ſome infirmities and imperfections may appear, we may learn to make a wiſe and moral improvement by them. His learning was great, and his endeavour to encourage it greater.

Cranmer's labours were well ſeconded by Ridley, Latimer, and Hooper, who were his fellow martyrs in the cauſe of reformation: but the characters of this illuſtrious quadriumvirate differed one from the other. Cranmer was moſt reſpected, Latimer was moſt followed; Ridley beſt eſteemed, and Hooper moſt beloved. The art and addreſs of Cranmer proved a happy balance to the zeal of Latimer; while the relaxed notions of Hooper were tempered by the wiſdom and virtue of Ridley.

A narrative of the life of biſhop Latimer.

Hugh Latimer, biſhop of Worceſter, was born of mean parents at Thirkeſton, in Leiceſterſhire, about the year 1475, who gave him a good education, and ſent him to Cambridge, where he ſhewed himſelf a zealous papiſt, and inveighed much againſt the reformers, who began to make ſome figure in England. But converſing frequently with Thomas Bilney, the moſt conſiderable perſon at Cambridge of all thoſe who favoured the reformation, he ſaw the errors of popery, and became a zealous proteſtant.

Latimer, thus converted, laboured both publicly and privately to promote the reformed opinions, and preſſed the neceſſity of a holy life, in oppoſition to thoſe outward performances which were then thought the eſſentials of religion. This rendered him obnoxious at Cambridge, then the ſeat of ignorance, bigotry, and ſuperſtition. However, the unaffected piety of maſter Bilney, the chearfulneſs and natural eloquence of honeſt Latimer, wrought greatly upon the junior ſtudents, and increaſed the credit of the proteſtants ſo much, that the papiſt clergy were greatly alarmed, and, according to their uſual practice, called aloud for the ſecular arm.

Under this Bilney ſuffered at Norwich. But his ſufferings, far from ſhocking the reformation at Cambridge, inſpired the readers of it with new courage. Latimer began to exert himſelf more than he had yet done; and ſucceeded to that credit with his party, which Bilney had ſo long ſupported. Among other inſtances of his zeal and reſolution in this cauſe, he gave one which was very remarkable. He had the courage to write to the king [Henry the VIIIth] againſt a proclamation, then juſt publiſhed, forbidding the uſe of the Bible in Engliſh, and other books on religious ſubjects. He had preached before his majeſty once or twice at Windſor, and had been taken notice of by him in a more affable manner, than that monarch uſually indulged towards his ſubjects. But whatever hopes of preferment his ſovereign's favour might have raiſed in him, he choſe to put all to the hazard, rather than omit what he thought his duty. His letter is the picture of an honeſt and ſincere heart: he concludes in theſe terms, "Accept, gracious ſovereign, without diſpleaſure, what I have written; I thought it my duty to mention theſe things to your majeſty. No perſonal quarrel, as God ſhall judge me, have I with any man: I wanted only to induce your majeſty to conſider well, what kind of perſons you have about you, and the ends for which they counſel. Indeed, great prince, many of them, or they are much ſlandered, have very private ends. God grant your majeſty may ſee through all the deſigns of evil men, and be in all things equal to the high office with which you are intruſted. Wherefore, gracious king, remember yourſelf; have pity upon your own ſoul, and think, that the day is at hand when you ſhall give account of your office, and the blood which hath been ſhed by your ſword: in the which day that your grace may ſtand ſtedfaſtly, and not be aſhamed, but be clear and ready in your reckoning, and have your pardon ſealed with the blood of our Saviour Chriſt, which alone ſerveth at that day, is my daily prayer to him who ſuffered death for our ſins. The Spirit of God preſerve you."

Lord Cromwell was now grown up into power, and being a favourer of the reformation, he obtained a benefice in Wiltſhire for Latimer, who immediately went thither and reſided, diſcharging his duty in a very conſcientious manner, though perſecuted much at the ſame time by the Romiſh clergy, who at length carried their malice ſo far as to obtain an archiepiſcopal citation for his appearance in London. His friends would have had him fly; but their perſuaſions were in vain. He ſet out for London in the depth of winter, and under a ſevere fit of the ſtone and cholic; but he was moſt diſtreſſed at the thoughts of leaving his pariſh expoſed to the popiſh clergy. On his arrival at London, he found a court of biſhops and canoniſts ready to receive him; where, inſtead of being examined, as he expected, about his ſermons, a paper was put into his hands which he was ordered to ſubſcribe, declaring his belief in the efficacy of maſſes for the ſouls in purgatory, of prayers to the dead ſaints, of pilgrimages to their ſepulchres and reliques, the pope's power to forgive ſins, the doctrine of merit, the ſeven ſacraments, and the worſhip of images; which when he refuſed to ſign, the archbiſhop, with a frown, begged he would conſider what he did. "We intend not, ſaid he, Mr. Latimer, to be hard upon you; we diſmiſs you for the preſent; take a copy of the articles; examine them carefully; and God grant, that at our next meeting we may find each other in better temper." The next, and ſeveral ſucceeding meetings, the ſame ſcene was acted over again. He continued inflexible, and they continued to diſtreſs him. Three times every week they regularly ſent for him, with a view either to elicit ſomething from him by captious queſtions, or to teize him at length into compliance. Tired out with this uſage, after he was ſummoned, at laſt, inſtead of going, he ſent a letter to the archbiſhop, in which, with great freedom, he tells him, "That the treatment he had lately met with had fretted him into ſuch a diſorder, as rendered him unfit to attend that day; that in the mean time he could not help taking this opportunity to expoſtulate with his grace for detaining him ſo long from his duty; that it ſeemed to him moſt unaccountable, that they, who never preached themſelves, ſhould hinder others; that, as for their examination of him, he really could not imagine what they aimed at; they pretended one thing in the beginning, and another in the progreſs; that if his ſermons were what gave offence, which he perſuaded himſelf were neither contrary to the truth, nor to any canon of the church, he was ready to anſwer whatever might be thought exceptionable in them: that he wiſhed a little more regard might be had to the judgment of the people, and that a diſtinction might be made between the ordinances of God and man; that if ſome abuſes in religion did prevail, as was then commonly ſuppoſed, he thought preaching was the beſt means to diſcountenance them; that he wiſhed all paſtors might be obliged to perform their duty; but that, however, liberty might be given to thoſe who were willing; that as to the articles propoſed to him, he begged to be excuſed ſubſcribing them; while he lived, he never would abet ſuperſtition; and that, laſtly, he hoped the archbiſhop would excuſe what he had written; he knew his duty to his ſuperiors, and would practiſe it; but in that caſe, he thought a ſtronger obligation laid upon him."

The biſhops, however, continued their perſecutions; but their ſchemes were fruſtrated in an unexpected manner. Latimer being raiſed to the ſee of Worceſter in the year 1533, by the favour of Anne Boleyn, then the favourite wife of Henry, to whom, moſt probably, he was recommended by lord Cromwell. And now he had a more extenſive field to promote the principles of the reformation, in which he laboured with the utmoſt pains and aſſiduity. He was remarkably zealous in the diſcharge of his new office; and in overlooking the clergy of his dioceſe, he was uncommonly active, warm, and reſolute, and preſided in his eccleſiaſtical court with the ſame ſpirit. In viſiting, he was frequent and obſervant; in ordaining, ſtrict and wary; in preaching, indefatigable; and in reproving and exhorting, ſevere and perſuaſive.

In 1536 he received a ſummons to attend the parliament and convocation, which gave him a further opportunity of promoting the work of reformation, whereon his heart was ſo much ſet.

In the mean while the biſhop of Worceſter, highly ſatisfied with the proſpect of the times, repaired to his dioceſe, having made a longer ſtay in London than was abſolutely neceſſary. He had no talents, and he pretended to have none for ſtate affairs. His whole ambition was to diſcharge the paſtoral functions of a biſhop, neither aiming to diſplay the abilities of a ſtateſman, nor thoſe of a courtier. How very unqualified he was to ſupport the latter of theſe characters, the following ſtory will prove. It was the cuſtom in thoſe days for the biſhops to make preſents to the king on New-year's day; and many of them would preſent very liberally, proportioning their gifts to their expectancies. Among the reſt, the biſhop of Worceſter, being then in town, waited upon the king with his offering; but inſtead of a purſe of gold, which was the common oblation, he preſented a New Teſtament, with a leaf doubled down in a very conſpicuous manner, to this paſſage; "Whoremongers and "adulterers God will judge."

In 1539 he was ſummoned again to attend the parliament. The biſhop of Wincheſter, Gardiner, was his great enemy; who, upon a particular occaſion, when the biſhops were with the king, kneeled down, and ſolemnly accuſed biſhop Latimer of a ſeditious ſermon preached at court. Being called upon by the king, with ſome ſternneſs, to vindicate himſelf, Latimer was ſo far from denying and palliating what he had ſaid, that he boldly juſtified it; and turning to the king, with that noble unconcern which a good conſcience inſpires, "I never thought myſelf worthy, ſaid he, nor did I ever ſue to be a preacher before your grace; but I was called to it, and would be willing, if you miſlike it, to give place to my betters: for I grant there may be a great many more worthy the room than I am. And if it be your grace's pleaſure to allow them for preachers, I can be content to bear their books after them. But if your grace allow me for a preacher, I would deſire you to give me leave to diſcharge my conſcience, and to frame my doctrine according to my audience. I had been a very dolt indeed to have preached ſo at the borders of your realm, as I preach before your grace." The greatneſs of this anſwer baffled his accuſer's malice; the ſeverity of the king's countenance changed into a gracious ſmile; and the biſhop was diſmiſſed with that obliging freedom, which this monarch never uſed but to thoſe he eſteemed.

However, as the biſhop could not give his vote for the act of the ſix papiſtical articles, drawn up by the duke of Norfolk, he thought it wrong to hold any office in a church where ſuch terms of communion were required; and therefore he reſigned his biſhopric, and retired into the country, where he purpoſed to live a ſequeſtered life. But in the midſt of his ſecurity, an unhappy accident carried him again into the tempeſtuous weather which was abroad: he received a bruiſe by the fall of a tree, and the contuſion was ſo dangerous, that he was obliged to ſeek out for better aſſiſtance than could be afforded him by the unſkilful ſurgeons of thoſe parts. With this view he repaired to London, where he had the misfortune to ſee the fall of his patron the lord Cromwell; a loſs which he was ſoon made ſenſible of. For Gardiner's emiſſaries quickly found him out in his concealment; and ſomething, which ſomebody had ſomewhere heard him ſay againſt the ſix articles, being alledged againſt him, he was ſent to the Tower; where, without any judicial examination, he ſuffered, through one pretence or another, a cruel impriſonment for the remaining ſix years of king Henry's reign.

Upon the death of Henry, the proteſtant intereſt revived under his ſon Edward; and Latimer, immediately upon the change of the government, was ſet at liberty. An addreſs was made by the parliament to the protector, to reſtore him to his biſhopric; biſhopric: the protector was very willing to gratify the parliament, and propoſed the reſumption of his biſhopric to Mr. Latimer; who now thinking himſelf unequal to the weight of it refuſed to reſume it, chuſing rather to accept an invitation from his friend archbiſhop Cranmer, and to take up his reſidence with him at Lambeth, where his chief employment was to hear the complaints, and redreſs the grievances of the poor people; and his character, for ſervices of this kind, was ſo univerſally known, that ſtrangers from every part of England would reſort to him. In theſe employments he ſpent more than two years, during which time he aſſiſted the archbiſhop in compoſing the homilies, which were ſet forth by authority in the firſt year of king Edward. He was alſo appointed to preach the Lent ſermons before his majeſty, which office he alſo performed during the three firſt years of his reign.

Upon the revolution which happened at court after the death of the duke of Somerſet, he ſeems to have retired into the country, and to have made uſe of the king's licence as a general preacher in thoſe parts, where he thought his labours might be moſt ſerviceable. He was thus employed during the remainder of that reign, and continued in the ſame courſe for a ſhort time in the beginning of the next; but as ſoon as the re-introduction of popery was reſolved on, the firſt ſtep towards it was the prohibition of all preaching, and licenſing only ſuch as were known to be popiſhly inclined. The biſhop of Wincheſter, who was now prime-miniſter, having proſcribed Mr. Latimer from the firſt, ſent a meſſage to cite him before the council. He had notice of this deſign ſome hours before the meſſengers arrival, but he made no uſe of the intelligence. The meſſenger found him equipped for his journey; at which, expreſſing his ſurprize, Mr. Latimer told him, that he was as ready to attend him to London, thus called upon to anſwer for his faith, as he ever was to take any journey in his life; and that he doubted not but that God who had enabled him to ſtand before two princes, would enable him to ſtand before a third. The meſſenger then acquainting him that he had no orders to ſeize his perſon, delivered a letter, and departed. However, opening the letter, and finding it a citation from the council, he reſolved to obey it, and ſet out immediately. As he paſſed through Smithfield, he ſaid chearfully, "This place of burning hath long groaned for me." The next morning he waited upon the council, who having loaded him with many ſevere reproaches, ſent him to the Tower.

This was but a repetition of a former part of his life; only he now met with a harſher treatment, and had more frequent occaſion to exerciſe his reſignation, which virtue no man poſſeſſed in a larger meaſure; nay, even the uſual chearfulneſs of his diſpoſition did not forſake him, of which we have an inſtance ſtill remaining. A ſervant leaving his apartment, Latimer called after him, and bid him tell his maſter, that unleſs he took better care of him, he ſhould certainly eſcape. Upon this meſſage, the lieutenant, with ſome diſcompoſure, came and deſired an explanation. "Why you expect, I ſuppoſe, Sir, ſaid he, that I ſhould be burnt; but if you do not allow me a little fire this froſty weather, I can tell you, I ſhall firſt be ſtarved."

Cranmer and Ridley were alſo priſoners in the ſame cauſe with Latimer; and, when it was reſolved to have a public diſputation at Oxford between the moſt eminent of the popiſh and proteſtant divines, theſe three were appointed on the part of the proteſtants. Accordingly they were taken out of the Tower and ſent to Oxford; where they were cloſely confined in the common priſon, and might eaſily imagine how free the diſputation was likely to be, when they found themſelves denied the uſe even of books, pens, and ink.

He behaved with the nobleſt fortitude throughout the public diſpute; wherein, though much artifice was uſed for that purpoſe, he never would be drawn into any formal reaſoning with his adverſaries; full well aſſured that it would anſwer no end to be explicit. However, he anſwered their queſtions as far as civility required; and in thoſe anſwers it is obſervable, he managed the argument much better than either Cranmer or Ridley; who, when they were preſſed in defence of tranſubſtantiation, with ſome paſſages from the fathers, inſtead of diſavowing an inſufficient authority, weakly defended a good cauſe. Whereas, when the ſame proofs were multiplied upon Latimer, he told them plainly, "That ſuch proofs had no weight with him; that the fathers, no doubt, were often deceived, and that he never depended upon them, but when they depended upon ſcripture." "Then you are not of St. Chryſoſtom's faith, replied his antagoniſt, nor of St. Auſtin's." "I have told you, replied Latimer, I am not, except when they bring ſcripture for what they ſay."

The diſpute being ended, ſentence was paſſed upon him in the beginning of October, and he and Ridley were martyred the ſixteenth. They were brought to the fire on the north ſide of Baliol college, where, after a ſermon, being told by an officer that they now might make ready for the ſtake, Latimer, having thrown off his priſon attire, appeared in a ſhrowd prepared for the purpoſe; and "whereas before, ſays Mr. Fox, he ſeemed a withered and crooked old man, he now ſtood bolt upright, as comely a father as one might lightly behold." Being thus ready, he recommended his ſoul to God, and delivered himſelf to the executioner, ſaying to Ridley, "We ſhall this day, my lord, light ſuch a candle in England, as ſhall never be extinguiſhed." He died in the eightieth year of his age, 1555.

Such was the life and death of Hugh Latimer, biſhop of Worceſter, one of the leaders of that glorious army of martyrs, who introduced the reformation into our land. He had a happy temper, formed on the principles of true Chriſtianity. Such was his chearfulneſs, that none of the accidents of life could diſcompoſe him; ſuch was his fortitude, that not even the ſevereſt trials could unman him. He had a collected ſpirit, and on no occaſion wanted a reſource. He could retire within himſelf, and hold the world at defiance.

And as danger could not daunt, ſo neither could ambition allure him. Though converſant in courts, and intimate with princes, he preſerved to the laſt (a rare inſtance of moderation!) his primæval plainneſs. In his profeſſion he was indefatigable; and that he might beſtow as much time as poſſible on the active part of it, he allowed himſelf only thoſe hours for his private ſtudies when the buſy world is at reſt, conſtantly riſing, at all ſeaſons of the year, by two in the morning. How conſcientious he was in the diſcharge of the public parts of his office, we have many examples. No man could perſuade more forcibly; no man could exert, on proper occaſions, a more commanding ſeverity. The wicked, in whatever ſtation, he rebuked with cenſorian dignity; and awed vice more than the penal laws.

He was not eſteemed a very learned man, for he cultivated only uſeful learning, and that he thought lay in a very narrow compaſs. He never engaged in worldly affairs, thinking that a clergyman ought to employ himſelf only in his profeſſion. Thus he lived rather a good, than what the world calls a great man. He had not thoſe commanding talents which give ſuperiority in buſineſs; but for purity and ſincerity of heart, for true ſimplicity of manners, for apoſtolic zeal in the cauſe of religion, and for every virtue, both of a public and private kind, which ſhould adorn the life of a Chriſtian, he was eminent beyond moſt men of his own, or of any other time.

The life of John Huſs, D. D. with ſome account of Jerom of Prague.

John Huſs, of the univerſity of Prague in Bohemia, the firſt martyr abroad for the reformation, is the illuſtrious foreigner whoſe life we here add, not becauſe of any ſingular events which it contains, for we know but few particulars reſpecting him, but to give our readers a view of the ſteps by which the reformation proceeded. Though the unjuſt perſecution by which this heroic martyr was condemned, and the fortitude wherewith he ſuffered, may ſuggeſt to the ſerious, leſſons of the utmoſt importance and utility.

John Huſs, whoſe name in the language of his country ſignifies Gooſe, was born at Huſſenitz, a village in Bohemia, eighteen miles from Prague, about the year 1380, as we conjecture. His parents, though mean, gave him the beſt education they were able; and when tranſplanted to the univerſity of Prague, he gave ſtrong proof of his mental powers, and was remarkable for his diligence and application. We are told, that he commenced bachelor of divinity in 1408, and was ſucceſſively choſen paſtor of the new built church of Bethlehem in Prague, dean and rector of the univerſity; in which ſtations he diſcharged his duty with great fidelity, and became at length ſo conſpicuous for his preaching, which was in conformity with the doctrines of Wickliffe, that he could not long eſcape the notice of the pope and his adherents, againſt whom he inveighed with no ſmall degree of aſperity.

Our countryman Wickliffe, whoſe life we have already given, had kindled the light of reformation, which began to illumine the darkeſt corners of popery and ignorance. His doctrines ſpread into Bohemia, and were well received, as by many others, ſo eſpecially by John Huſs, and his zealous friend and fellow-martyr Jerom of Prague.

Queen Anne, the wife of Richard II. of England, was daughter to the emperor Charles IV. and ſiſter to Winceſlaus, king of Bohemia. She was a princeſs of great piety and knowledge, and had ſtrongly patronized Wickliffe. Upon her death, in 1394, ſeveral of her attendants returning into Bohemia, carried with them many of Wickliffe's books, which were read with much avidity, and tended greatly to promote the cauſe of the reformation. To ſuppreſs them, the archibiſhop of Prague iſſued two orders, which had an effect quite contrary to what he expected; for it ſtimulated the friends of theſe doctrines to greater zeal, and almoſt the whole univerſity united in propagating them.

Huſs had conſiderable influence in the univerſity, not only on account of his learning, eloquence, and exemplary life, but alſo on account of ſome valuable privileges which he had obtained from the king in behalf of the Bohemians in that ſeminary, by which many Germans had been obliged to leave it, and retire to Leipſic; who afterwards became his ſteady enemies, and eſpecially at the council of Conſtance. And being ſtrenuouſly attached to the doctrines of Wickliffe, he ſtrongly oppoſed the decree of the archbiſhop, who however at length obtained a bull from the pope, giving him commiſſion to prevent the ſpreading of theſe errors in his province.

By virtue of this bull the archbiſhop definitively condemned the writings of Wickliffe; and proceeding againſt four doctors, Huſs, with ſome other members of the univerſity, proteſted againſt theſe proceedings. Upon which he was cited to appear perſonally at Rome, to anſwer the accuſations laid againſt him, of preaching both errors and hereſies. Huſs deſired to be excuſed a perſonal appearance; the king, the queen, the nobility and univerſity joined in requeſting the pope to diſpenſe with it. However, Cardinal Colonna declared him contumacious, and accordingly excommunicated him. And this excommunication was afterwards carried much farther, even to all his diſciples and friends. He was declared a promoter of hereſy, and an interdict was paſſed againſt him. From this unjuſt ſentence he appealed to a future council; and notwithſtanding ſo ſevere a decree, and an expulſion in conſequence from his church in Prague, he retired to Huſſenitz, where he continued to promulgate his new doctrine, both from the pulpit and with the pen.

The letters which he wrote at this time are very numerous; and he compiled a treatiſe, wherein he maintained, that the reading the books of heretics cannot be abſolutely forbidden. He wrote in defence of Wickliffe's book on the trinity; and undauntedly declared againſt the vices of the pope, the cardinals, and the clergy of thoſe corrupt times. He cauſed a writing to be fixed upon the church of Bethlehem, charging the clergy with theſe ſix errors: Firſt, Of believing that the prieſt, by ſaying maſs, became the creator of his Creator: Second, Of ſaying that he ought to believe in the virgin, in the pope, and in ſaints: Third, That the prieſts can remit the pain and guilt of ſin: Fourthly, that every one muſt obey their ſuperiors, whether their commands be juſt or unjuſt: Fifth, That every excommunication, juſt or unjuſt, binds the excommunicate: The Sixth relates to ſimony. He wrote alſo many other books; and with what ſtrength of argument, the amazing influence of his doctrines ſufficiently prove.

But though John Huſs and Jerom of Prague ſo far agreed with Wickliffe, that they oppoſed the tyranny and corruptions of the pope and his clergy, yet did they not advance, by any means, ſo far as our Engliſh reformer; they had not ſo clear light; they were not of the ſame opinion with regard to the euchariſt; for neither of them ever oppoſed the real preſence and tranſubſtantiation, as Wickliffe did.

Huſs correſponded with our noble and excellent countryman Sir John Oldcaſtle, lord Cobham. England was then filled with ſcenes of perſecution, which extended to Germany and Bohemia, where John Huſs and Jerom of Prague were marked out to ſhare the fate of Sir John Oldcaſtle. Upon the review of thoſe times can we fail to congratulate our felicity, and to bleſs God for the liberty, civil and religious, which our country enjoys in ſo diſtinguiſhed a manner!

In November, 1414, a general council was aſſembled at Conſtance in Germany, which was one of the greateſt that was ever held, as for other matters, ſo to determine the diſpute concerning the papacy, which was then aſſumed by three perſons, who all appeared under the character of popes! this council was one of the moſt important events of the fifteenth century, and the greateſt of all œcumenical ſynods that ever was held, conſidering the dignity and number of the princes, prelates, and doctors who aſſiſted at it, after the example of the emperor himſelf. According to the liſts made at the emperor's arrival, by his order, there were above one hundred thouſand foreigners then in and about this city. Not a kingdom, republic, ſtate, and ſcarce a city or community in Europe, but had its ambaſſadors or deputies at it. Ten popes, by turns, preſided in it, and the emperor was hardly ever abſent. Thirty-ſix thouſand beds were ſet up for new-comers, and at one time were no leſs than thirty thouſand horſe in the city. The pope had ſix hundred perſons in his retinue, and the emperor four thouſand. There were thirty cardinals, who, with four patriarchs, and two of the pope's legates, had full twelve hundred. Here were twenty-ſeven archbiſhops, two hundred and ſix biſhops, thirty-three titular biſhops, above one hundred and fifty other prelates, and two hundred and three abbots, who altogether may be ſuppoſed to have four or five thouſand in their retinue; prelates, prieſts and preſbyters, are reckoned in ſhort eighteen thouſand; and there were eighty thouſand laymen, all ſtrangers; fourteen auditors of the rota, twenty-ſeven prothonotaries, eighteen auditors of the ſacred palace, and as many ſecretaries of the pope's, who had two hundred under them; and there were computed, two hundred and forty-two writers of apoſtolic bulls, forty-ſeven writers penitentiary, not reckoning one thouſand two hundred ſcribes or writers of other kingdoms, beſides their ſervants: the pope and cardinals had one hundred and twenty-three attorneys, and two hundred and ſeventy-three proctors, with each a man to wait on them; there were four hundred and forty-four doctors of divinity and law, beſides their ſervants, excluſive of ſixty-five heralds at arms, vergers of the conſiſtory, beadles, and other petty officers; with above one thouſand perſons in their retinue. The retinue of the laity was numerous in proportion: the emperor, the four electors preſent, with other ſovereign princes, dukes, marquiſes, or margraves, and burgraves, one hundred and twenty-eight counts, ſix hundred barons, &c. who were all computed at no leſs than ten thouſand, had four or five thouſand men for their guard: there were alſo one hundred and ſix envoys or deputies, from ſeveral places, with about one thouſand ſix hundred in their retinue; above ſix hundred gentlemen, and twenty-three thouſand knights and military officers, with their ſervants; and the garriſon conſiſted of about two thouſand; there were eighty-ſix farriers, eighty-eight carpenters, and blackſmiths, ſixty-five apothecaries, one thouſand ſix hundred barbers, two hundred and forty-two bankers, forty-eight goldſmiths, one hundred and twenty-two ſhoe-makers, two hundred and twenty-eight taylors, all the foregoing maſters with the journeymen of each; three hundred vintners and victuallers, with their drawers, &c. five hundred and five muſicians, ſeven hundred and eighteen common harlots, which another liſt taken from the Vienna manuſcript makes one thouſand five hundred, three hundred and forty-ſix jugglers and ſtage-players. This famous council, which laſted four years and forty-five ſeſſions, made that infamous canon, as Sleiden ſays, in his commentaries, That faith is not to be kept with heretics, nor with thoſe ſuſpected of hereſy; and it aſſerted the authority of a council to be above that of a pope. John Huſs was ſummoned to appear at this council; and to encourage him the emperor ſent him a ſafe conduct, giving him permiſſion freely to come to and return from the council. But it was honourably determined by theſe wiſe men, that "faith is not to be kept with heretics;—" and therefore Huſs was no ſooner arrived, than he was committed priſoner to a chamber in the palace.

He was well accompanied in his journey, and in all the cities through which he paſſed he made public declarations, that he was going to the council to vindicate his doctrines, and invited all his adverſaries to be preſent. Wherever he came great numbers reſorted to him, and ſhewed him ſuch marks of high reverence and eſtimation, that he uſed to ſay, "He no where found ſo bitter enemies againſt him, as among his own countrymen the Bohemians."

But he afterwards met with more bitter enemies in the council; who, reſolving to deſtroy him, drew up ſuch articles of accuſation as they thought proper, and knew he could not abjure; being at once his accuſers and judges, and acting, not by the laws of equity, but of cruelty and revenge.

The ſpirit with which the council of Conſtance acted againſt the popes: their declaring themſelves as a council, and all councils to be above popes; the rigour with which they executed their decrees, and the awful form of their proceedings, are commendable. But to what did it all tend? To no generous principle of love to God, or benevolence to man. It only tranſlated the ſeat of wicked power; the people were as much ſlaves to ignorance; they were as much tied down to ſuperſtition, and they had as little the exerciſe of any one rational ſentiment as ever. This council acted the part of inquiſitors. "They ordered the remains of Dr. Wickliffe to be dug up and burnt, with this charitable caution, if they might be diſcerned from the bodies of other faithful people." His aſhes were caſt into the river Swift, that river conveyed them into the Avon, Avon into the Severn, Severn into the narrow ſeas, they into the main ocean. Thus the aſhes of Wickliffe are the emblems of his doctrine, which is now diſperſed all over the world."

The nobility of Bohemia and Poland ſtrongly interceded for Huſs, and ſo far prevailed, that he ſhould not be condemned unheard, which the commiſſioners appointed to try him, had reſolved upon. When he appeared before them, and the articles of accuſation were read, he freely acknowledged them. But one circumſtance bore more hard upon him, than this acknowledgment, which was, a generous wiſh he vented, to be with the happy ſpirit of Wickliffe. Theſe haughty judges had no idea of a man's felicity whoſe aſhes they had condemned to be burnt! A great many falſe and frivolous objections were raiſed againſt him, which he refuted with a manly eloquence; and recommended himſelf and his cauſe to God; he was carried from the court, and a reſolution was ſoon after taken to burn him as an heretic, if he would not retract. He was then committed to a filthy priſon, where in the day time he was ſo laden with fetters on his legs, that he could ſcarce go, and every night he was faſtened by the hands to a rack againſt the wall; while petitions for his releaſe, upon bail, from his Bohemian friends, were unavailing.

Four biſhops, and two lords were ſent by the emperor to the priſon, to prevail on him to make a recantation. But he called God to witneſs, with tears in his eyes, that he was not conſcious of having preached or written, any thing againſt the truth of God, or the faith of his orthodox church. The deputies then repreſented the great wiſdom and authority of the council; "Let them, ſaid Huſs, ſend the meaneſt perſon of that council, who can convince me by arguments from the word of God, and I will ſubmit my judgment to him." This Chriſtian and pious anſwer had no effect, becauſe he would not take the authority and learning of the council upon truſt, without the leaſt ſhadow of an argument offered: and the deputies departed in high admiration of his obſtinacy.

On the ſeventh of July he was brought the laſt time before the council. He was required to abjure. He refuſed. The biſhop of Lodi preached a bloody perſecuting ſermon, concerning the deſtruction of heretics, the prologue to his fate; and accordingly his fate was determined, his vindication diſregarded, and judgment was pronounced. His books were condemned, and he was declared a maniſeſt heretic: convicted of having taught many hereſies and pernicious errors, of having deſpiſed the keys of the church and eccleſiaſtical cenſures; of having ſeduced and given ſcandal to the faithful by his obſtinacy, and having raſhly appealed to the tribunal of Chriſt: the council therefore cenſured him for being obſtinate and incorrigible, and ordained, "That he ſhould be degraded from the prieſthood, his books publicly burnt, and himſelf delivered to the ſecular power."

He heard this ſentence without the leaſt emotion; he kneeled down with his eyes lifted towards heaven; and with all the ſpirit of primitive martyrdom, he ſaid; "May thy infinite mercy, O my God, pardon this injuſtice of my enemies. Thou knoweſt the injuſtice of my accuſations: how deformed with crimes I have been repreſented: how I have been oppreſſed with worthleſs witneſſes, and a falſe condemnation; yet, O my God, let that mercy of thine, which no tongue can expreſs, prevail with thee not to avenge my wrongs." Theſe excellent ſentences were eſteemed ſo many expreſſions of treaſon; and tended to inflame his adverſaries. Accordingly, the biſhops, appointed by the council, ſtript him of his prieſtly garments, degraded him, and put a mitre of paper on his head, on which devils were painted with this inſcription, "a ringleader of heretics." Our heroic martyr, received this mock-mitre with a gallant air of unconcern, which ſeemed to give him dignity, rather than diſgrace. A ſerenity, a joy, appeared in his looks, which indicated, that his ſoul had cut off many ſtages of tedious journey in her way to the realm of everlaſting peace.

The biſhops delivered Huſs to the emperor, who put him into the hands of the duke of Bavaria. His books were burnt at the gates of the church, and he was led to the ſuburbs to be burnt alive. When he came to the place of execution, he fell on his knees; ſung portions of pſalms, looked ſtedfaſtly towards heaven, and repeated theſe words: "Into thy hands, O Lord, do I commit my ſpirit; thou haſt redeemed me, O moſt good and faithful God!" When the chain was put about him at the ſtake, he ſaid, with a ſmiling countenance, "My Lord Jeſus Chriſt was bound with a harder chain than this for my ſake, and why ſhould I then be aſhamed of this old ruſty one?" When the faggots were piled up to his very neck, the duke of Bavaria was officious enough to deſire him to abjure. "No, ſaid Huſs, I never preached any doctrine of an evil tendency. And what I taught with my lips, I now ſeal with my blood."—He ſaid to the executioner, "You are going to burn a 'gooſe' now; but in a century you will have a 'ſwan,' whom you can neither roaſt nor boil." If he was prophetic, he muſt have meant Martin Luther, to whom his words were applied, and who had a ſwan for his arms. The flames were then applied to the faggots, when the martyr ſung a hymn with ſo loud and chearful a voice, that he was heard through all the cracklings of the combuſtibles, and the noiſe of the multitude. At laſt his voice was interrupted, and he was conſumed in a moſt miſerable manner. The duke of Bavaria ordered the executioner to throw all the martyrs cloaths into the flames; after which his aſhes were carefully gathered together, and caſt into the Rhine. He wrote many treatiſes, which were collected and publiſhed at Nuremburgh, in the year 1558.

Thus fell John Huſs, a martyr to the doctrines of the goſpel which Wickliffe had revived; and which ſtruck ſo eſſentially at the root of corrupt religion, and the ſecular intereſt of the clergy; that there is no wonder, he, as well as his friend Jerom of Prague, was perſecuted with the utmoſt ſeverity.

Jerom, who was remarkable for his extenſive learning and great eloquence, was treated in pretty nearly the ſame manner with John Huſs: a ſafe conduct was given him, and was alſo violated. He ſuffered extremely in an hard impriſonment; and underwent a trial as partial and unjuſt, as Huſs had undergone. He is ſaid by catholic writers to have recanted his opinions, and afterwards to have relented that recantation; but this ſeems to want evidence. When he deſired to plead his cauſe and exculpate himſelf, and this was refuſed him, he is ſaid to have exclaimed againſt the council in theſe words:—— "What barbarity is this! For three hundred and forty days have I been through all the variety of priſons. There is not a miſery, there is not a want, which I have not experienced. To my enemies, you have allowed the fulleſt ſcope of accuſation; to me, you deny the leaſt opportunity of defence. Not an hour will you indulge me in preparing for my trial. You have ſwallowed the blackeſt calumnies againſt me. You have repreſented me as an heretic without knowing my doctrine; as an enemy to the faith before you knew what faith I profeſſed: as a perſecutor of prieſts, before you could have an opportunity of underſtanding my ſentiments on that head. You are a general council: in you center all that this world can communicate of gravity, wiſdom, ſanctity: but ſtill you are men, and men are ſeducible by appearances. The higher your character is for wiſdom, the greater ought your care to be, not to deviate into folly. The cauſe I now plead is not my own cauſe: it is the cauſe of men; it is the cauſe of Chriſtians: it is a cauſe, which is to affect the rights of poſterity, however the experiment is to be made in my perſon." This ſpeech had no effect: Jerom was obliged to hear his charge read, which was reduced under theſe heads, "That he was a derider of the papal dignity, an oppoſer of the pope, an enemy of the cardinals, a perſecutor of the prelates, and an hater of the Chriſtian religion." He anſwered this charge with an amazing force of elocution and ſtrength of argument: "Now, ſaid he, wretch that I am! whither ſhall I turn me! To my accuſers? My accuſers are deaf as adders. To you my judges? You are all prepoſſeſſed by the arts of my accuſers." A Roman catholic hiſtorian has ingenuity enough to declare, That Jerom in all he ſpoke, ſaid nothing unbecoming a great and wiſe man: and he candidly aſſerts, that if what Jerom ſaid was true, he was not only free from capital guilt, but from ſmalleſt blame. The trial of Jerom was brought on the third day after his accuſation, and witneſſes were examined in ſupport of the charge. The priſoner was prepared for his defence, which will appear almoſt incredible, when it is conſidered, that he had been three hundred and forty days ſhut up, in a dark offenſive dungeon, deprived of day-light, food, and ſleep. His ſpirit ſoared above theſe diſadvantages, under which a man leſs animated muſt have ſunk; nor was he more at a loſs for quotations from fathers and antient authors, than if he had been furniſhed with the fineſt library.

Many of the zealots and bigots of the aſſembly were againſt his being heard; as they knew what effect eloquence is uſed to have on the minds of the moſt prejudiced. However, it was carried by the majority, that he ſhould have liberty to proceed in his defence, which he began in ſuch an exalted ſtrain of moving elocution, that the heart of obdurate zeal was ſeen to melt, and the mind of ſuperſtition ſeemed to admit a ray of conviction. He made an admirable diſtinction between evidence as reſting on facts, and as ſupported by malice and calumny. He laid before the aſſembly the whole tenor of his life and conduct. He obſerved, that the greateſt and moſt holy men have been known to differ in points of ſpeculation, with a view to diſtinguiſh truth, not to keep it concealed. He then expreſſed a noble contempt of all his enemies, who would have induced him to retract the cauſe of virtue and truth. He next entered upon an high encomium of Huſs: and declared he was ready to follow him in the glorious tract of martyrdom. He then touched upon the moſt defenſible doctrines of Wickliffe; and concluded what he had to ſay on that head with obſerving, that it was far from his intention to advance any thing againſt the ſtate of the church of God: that it was only againſt the abuſe of the clergy he complained; and that he could not help ſaying with his dying breath, it was certainly impious that the patrimony of the church, which was originally intended for the purpoſe of charity and univerſal benevolence, ſhould be proſtituted to the luſt of the fleſh, and the pride of the eye, in whores, feaſts, foppiſh veſtments, and other reproaches to the name and profeſſion of Chriſtianity.

The priſoner received many interruptions, from the impertinence of ſome, and the inveteracy of others; but he anſwered with ſo much readineſs and vivacity of thought, that at laſt they were aſhamed, and he was permitted to finiſh his defence. His voice was ſweet, clear, and ſonorous; pliable to captivate every paſſion, and able to conciliate every affection. He was admired by his enemies, and compaſſionated by his friends: but he received the ſame ſentence which had been paſſed upon his martyred countryman; and Poggius ſays, the aſſembly condemned him with great reluctance.

The ſame author tells us, that Jerom had two days allowed for his recantation; and that the cardinal of Florence uſed all the arguments he could for that end, but they were ineffectual. The divine was reſolved to ſeal his doctrine with his blood; and he ſuffered death with all the magnanimity of Huſs. He embraced the ſtake, to which he was faſtened with peculiar malice by wet cords. When the executioner went behind him to ſet fire to the pile, "Come here, ſaid the martyr, and kindle it before my eyes; for if I dreaded ſuch a ſight, I ſhould never have come to this place, which I had free opportunity to eſcape." The fire was kindled, and he then ſung a hymn, which was ſoon interrupted by the encircling flames.

Thus died thoſe two Bohemian martyrs; and their blood may be truly ſaid to have been the ſeed of the reformed church; which was ſo far from being cruſhed by malice and cruelty, that it ſoon gathered ſtrength, and became ſuperior to all perſecution.

A. D. 1558. ELIZABETH, daughter of Henry VIII. and Anne Boleyn, was twenty five years of age, when ſhe aſcended the throne, for which ſhe was preſerved by the particular interpoſition of divine Providence. Immediately on the death of Mary, the council notified this event to the houſe of lords, who acquainted the commons with the reſolution, to place her ſiſter Elizabeth on the throne. As this princeſs had diſcovered her moderation and prudence, during the reign of Mary, and as the dangers to which ſhe had been conſtantly expoſed, ſtrongly recommended her to the affections of the people, the joy they expreſſed on this occaſion ſeemed to prognoſticate the future happineſs of her reign. She was at Hatfield at the time of her ſiſter's death, from whence ſhe proceeded to London, through crowds of loyal ſubjects, who vied with each other in giving the ſtrongeſt teſtimonies of their affection. After having received the compliments of the nobility, ſhe diſpatched ambaſſadors to the different powers of Europe to notify her acceſſion. Among the reſt lord Cobham was ſent to Philip, to expreſs her gratitude to that prince, for the protection he had afforded her, and her inclination to enjoy the continuance of his friendſhip. The firſt act of her government was a proclamation, ſtrictly enjoining all her ſubjects to keep the peace, and forbear, upon any pretence whatever, to break, or alter, any order or uſage, at that time eſtabliſhed. With this admirable ſagacity ſhe always regulated her conduct, ſo that the reign of this queen, as it is one of the longeſt, is alſo one of the moſt glorious that is to be found in the Engliſh annals. Elizabeth ſeemed on her change of fortune, to forget the injuries ſhe had received from her enemies. She returned thanks to heaven for her deliverance as for a miracle; but ſhe wiſhed not to make her perſecutors feel the rod of retaliation. Even Sir Henry Bedingfield, who had been her keeper in priſon, and delighted in treating her with the utmoſt rigour, found her inſenſible to the deſire of revenge. This noble inſtance of a ſuperior underſtanding, and beneficent diſpoſition, charmed her enemies. Philip had no ſooner received the news of the queen's acceſſion, than he ſent orders to his ambaſſador at London, to make propoſals of marriage, offering to procure a diſpenſation from Rome. Elizabeth obſerved, that the nation had, during her ſiſter's reign, entertained an extreme averſion to the Spaniſh alliance, and that her own popularity principally aroſe from the proſpect of being freed by her means from the danger of foreign ſubjection. She knew that her marriage with Philip would be ſimilar to that of her father with Catherine of Arragon, and her concluding it would be declaring herſelf illegitimate. She therefore declined the offer, but in ſuch polite and evaſive terms, that the Spaniſh monarch could not juſtly take offence at her refuſal. Notwithſtanding Elizabeth had determined to reſtore the reformed religion in England, her ambaſſador at Rome received orders to notify her acceſſion to the ſovereign pontiff. But Paul IV. behaved with all the inſolence natural to his character. He declared, that England was a fief of the holy ſee, and that Elizabeth was guilty of great temerity in aſſuming, without his conſent, the title and authority of queen; that being illegitimate, ſhe could not inherit that kingdom; but being willing to treat her with paternal indulgence, if ſhe would renounce all pretenſions to the crown, and ſubmit entirely to his will, ſhe ſhould experience all the lenity that was conſiſtent with the dignity of the apoſtolic ſee. The queen, being informed of theſe particulars, obſerved, that the pope, in order to gain too much, was willing to loſe the whole. She therefore recalled her ambaſſador, and immediately purſued thoſe meaſures in favour of the reformed religion, which ſhe had ſecretly embraced. That ſhe might not too much alarm the papiſts, ſhe had retained eleven of her ſiſter's counſellors: but to balance their authority added eight more, whom ſhe knew were warmly inclined to the proteſtant communion; theſe were the marquis of Northampton, the earl of Bedford, Sir Ambroſe Cave, Sir Thomas Knolles, Sir Edward Rogers, Sir Thomas Parry, Sir Nicholas Bacon, whom ſhe created lord keeper, and Sir William Cecil, whom ſhe made ſecretary of ſtate. She alſo diſcharged from priſon, or recalled from exile, thoſe whoſe religion had been their only crime. At the ſame time a proclamation was publiſhed, forbidding all preaching without a ſpecial licence, that the pulpits might not be filled with the clamours of diſcord. The Lord's prayer, the creed, the litany, and the goſpels, were ordered to be read in Engliſh; and, having directed that all the churches ſhould conform to the practice of her own chapel, ſhe forbad the hoſt to be any more elevated in her preſence.

A. D. 1559. The biſhops now apprehending a total abolition of the Romiſh religion, refuſed to officiate at her coronation; but Oglethorpe, biſhop of Carliſle, was, with ſome difficulty, prevailed on to perform that ceremony. On the fourteenth of January, Elizabeth paſſed from the Tower through the ſtreets of London, in grand proceſſion to Weſtminſter, amidſt the acclamations of a prodigious number of ſpectators aſſembled on that occaſion. The queen returned their applauſes with ſuch a modeſt affability, and winning behaviour, as charmed the hearts of all beholders. But no incident, on this occaſion, diſplayed in a ſtronger light the religious ſentiments of the citizens, or tended more to endear the new ſovereign to the people, than her accepting of an Engliſh bible, richly gilt, which was delivered from a pageant in Cheapſide, by a child repreſenting truth, who addreſſed the queen in an oration. She received the book in a moſt gracious manner, kiſſed it, held it up, placed it on her boſom, and declared, that amidſt all the coſtly teſtimonies the city had that day given her of their affection, this preſent was by far the moſt precious and acceptable. Indeed, whenever this queen appeared in public, ſhe ſeemed to rejoice in the concourſe of her ſubjects; to enter into all their amuſements; and thus, without departing from her dignity, which ſhe well knew how to preſerve, ſhe acquired the affections of her people, and greater popularity than any of her predeceſſors.

On the twenty-fifth of January a parliament was ſummoned to aſſemble. Sir Nicholas Bacon opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he expatiated on the virtues of the new queen; and after recommending the religious ſtate of the nation to their conſideration, exhorted them to obſerve a due medium between the extremes of ſuperſtition and religion, as the moſt effectual means of uniting both Roman catholics and proteſtants in one mode of worſhip. He concluded with ſoliciting a ſupply in behalf of her majeſty, which the exigencies of the ſtate required. The commons, though they had been harraſſed by impoſitions in the late reign, chearfully granted the tonnage and poundage, together with a large ſubſidy on funds and moveables. A bill was paſſed for ſuppreſſing the monaſteries lately erected, and reſtoring the tenths and firſt fruits to the crown, which had been ſurrendered by Mary. They alſo enumerated a ſtatute, recognizing Elizabeth to be their lawful ſovereign, by virtue of an act paſſed in the thirty-ſixth year of her father's reign. Then both houſes turned their attention to affairs of religion, and paſſed the following bills: That the ſervice ſhould be performed in the vulgar tongue; that the ſupremacy of the church of England ſhould be veſted in the ſovereign; that all acts relative to religion, which had paſſed in the reign of Edward VI. ſhould be renewed and confirmed; that the nomination to biſhoprics ſhould be veſted in the queen, who might exerciſe her ſupremacy by any perſon ſhe ſhould appoint to that purpoſe; that all perſons in office ſhould take the oath of ſupremacy; and that no perſon, under ſevere penalties, ſhould, by word or writing, ſupport any foreign authority in this kingdom; that there ſhould be a uniformity of worſhip; and that on the vacancy of any biſhopric, the queen might reſume its temporal poſſeſſions. Elizabeth being thus veſted with the ſupremacy, erected a tribunal, called the High Commiſſion court, veſted with the authority appointed by Henry VIII. But of nine thouſand four hundred eccleſiaſtics, who held benefices in England, thoſe who choſe rather to renounce their livings than the Romiſh religion, amounted to fourteen biſhops, twelve archdeacons, fifty canons, and about fourſcore of the inferior clergy. Bonner alone ſuffered under the hand of authority. He was committed to the Marſhalſea, and died in confinement. Some foreign princes interpoſed their good offices, to procure the catholics a toleration in ſome particular places; but the queen would not comply with their requeſt, for the ſake of national peace. But in order to induce the catholics to conform to the eſtabliſhed religion, ſhe cauſed every thing to be ſtruck out of the new liturgy that had any tendency to give them offence.

In the mean time a treaty was concluded with France, on theſe conditions; that Henry ſhould retain Calais for eight years, with all other towns taken from the Engliſh; at the expiration of which they ſhould be reſtored to the queen of England; that he ſhould give ample ſecurity for paying to Elizabeth, or her ſucceſſors, the ſum of five hundred thouſand golden crowns, in default of reſtoring the places at the time appointed; that the French ſhould give hoſtages for the performance of this article; that neither Henry, the queen of Scotland, nor Elizabeth, ſhould attempt any thing againſt each other, directly or indirectly, to the prejudice of this treaty; and that they ſhould not encourage or protect the rebellious ſubjects of each other. A peace with Scotland followed, as a neceſſary conſequence of that with France. But this peace was no ſooner concluded, than the dauphin and his conſort Mary, at the inſtigation of the pope, and the monarchs of France and Spain, who were incenſed at the acceſſion of a proteſtant princeſs, aſſumed the titles of king and queen of Scotland, England, and Ireland: Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, the queen's ambaſſador at Paris, remonſtrated on this inſult offered to his miſtreſs, and receiving a very frivolous anſwer, repeated his complaints; but was told by the French miniſtry, that the queen of Scots was as much entitled to the arms of England, as Elizabeth was to the appellation of queen of France. Elizabeth from this time beheld Mary in the light of a formidable rival, and the king of Spain as her inveterate foe; and therefore determined to uſe every method to conciliate the affections of her people, as the beſt preſervative againſt the united power of her enemies. Capable of diſcerning merit, ſhe appointed men of capacity to the important offices of ſtate; diſpenſed juſtice impartially; evinced a well-judged œconomy; deported herſelf with complacency; and demonſtrated ſo ardent a regard for the welfare of her ſubjects, as produced the warmeſt returns of confidence and affection. At the ſame time ſhe took care to foment the religious diſſentions in Scotland, occaſioned by a ſtrong party embracing the reformation; inſomuch that conferences for a peace were opened at Edinburgh. But before this happened, Henry of France was accidentally ſlain in a tournament, and his ſon Francis aſcended the throne.

A. D. 1560. The French monarch, Francis II. was an abſolute tool in the hands of the houſe of Guiſe, who prompted him to take every method to ſuppreſs the reformation in Scotland. But all his efforts were baffled by the ſuperior genius of Elizabeth, who reduced him to the neceſſity of concluding a treaty, by which it was ſtipulated, that the king of France and Scotland ſhould thenceforth abſtain from bearing the arms of England: that Elizabeth ſhould be further ſatisfied for the injury already done her in that particular; that commiſſioners ſhould be appointed to ſettle the point; and on failure of agreement, the matter ſhould be referred to the arbitration of Spain, and that the king and queen of France and Scotland ſhould confirm the conceſſions that had been made by the French plenipotentiaries to the Scottiſh confederates. This treaty being concluded, an amneſty was publiſhed by the eſtates of Scotland, and ſeveral laws were enacted in favour of the reformation. Though Francis and Mary confirmed theſe laws, they peremptorily refuſed to ratify the treaty with Elizabeth, on pretence that ſhe had treated with their rebellious ſubjects; though their real deſign was to wreſt the crown from her, and place it on the head of their young niece. But their ſcheme proved a ſource of bitter calamities to that unfortunate princeſs, whoſe intereſt they meant to promote. Elizabeth now found ſhe had ſcarce an ally abroad on whom ſhe could depend. Montague, who had been ſent ambaſſador to Philip, met with a very cold reception. That prince bewailed the eſtabliſhment of the reformation in England, reſtored the collar of the order of the garter, and declined renewing an alliance with Elizabeth. The pope ſent a nuncio with inſtructions, and a brief to the queen, exhorting her to return within the pale of the church, promiſing her that a general council ſhould be convoked with all convenient expedition; that he would annul the ſentence of divorce between Henry VIII. and Anne Boleyn, confirm the Engliſh liturgy, and allow the people to communicate in both kinds at the ſacrament: all which temporiſing offers were rejected. At this time the Calviniſts in France were perſecuted with the utmoſt ſeverity, until they formed a conſpiracy againſt the duke of Guiſe, and the cardinal of Lorraine, who were their inveterate enemies. The prince of Conde was ſuppoſed to favour them in private, and a ſcheme was formed for ſurprizing the duke and cardinal. This deſign being diſcovered, was conſtrued into a conſpiracy againſt the king, and twelve hundred perſons were executed, for having been privy to the plot. The ſtates of the kingdom being aſſembled at Orleans, the king of Navarre, and the prince of Conde, attended the meeting, though they knew they were ſuſpected, and hated by the princes of Lorraine. The firſt was ſo narrowly watched, that he could not eſcape; the other was impriſoned, and ſentenced to die by the hands of the common executioner; but the death of Francis II. ſaved the noble priſoner from that ignominious fate. The queen mother was appointed regent during the minority of her ſon Charles IX. who ſucceeded his brother; the king of Navarre was conſtituted lieutenant general; the ſentence againſt Conde was reverſed, and the authority of the princes of Lorraine greatly diminiſhed.

A. D. 1561. The fortune of Mary underwent a ſudden change by the death of the king, her huſband. Catharine of Medicis, mother of Charles IX. aſſumed the whole authority. Mary Stuart, who experienced from her only mortifications, found herſelf obliged to leave a country ſhe loved, and return to her unhappy kingdom, rent to pieces on account of religion. The ſtates of Scotland had ſent to invite her over; and ſhe applied to Elizabeth for liberty to paſs through England; but that queen let her know, that till ſhe had given her ſatisfaction, by ratifying the treaty of Edinburgh, ſhe ought to expect no favour from a perſon whom ſhe had ſo much injured. This denial filled Mary with the higheſt reſentment; and ſending for the Engliſh ambaſſador, "What offence, ſaid ſhe, have I given your miſtreſs, that ſhe ſhould deny me ſo ſmall a favour? But, with God's aſſiſtance, I can return to my own country without her leave." Nor did ſhe delay her departure on account of Elizabeth having refuſed her a ſafe conduct. She repaired to Calais, attended by her uncles, and ſeveral French noblemen of the firſt rank, and embarked in the beginning of Auguſt. Mary ſeemed greatly affected on her leaving France. She kept her eyes fixed upon the coaſt till darkneſs intercepted it from her view. "Farewel France! ſhe cried; farewel, beloved country! I ſhall never ſee thee more." Elizabeth had fitted out a fleet of ſhips, under pretence of purſuing ſome pirates, but probably with a view of intercepting the queen of Scots in her paſſage: ſhe. however, paſſed the Engliſh fleet in a fog, and reached her native ſhore in ſafety. Mary was received by her people with every mark of affection; for no ſooner did the French gallies appear off Leith, than people of all ranks flocked thither, with eager impatience to behold and receive their young ſovereign, who was now nineteen years of age, diſtinguiſhed by her beauty, politeneſs, and elegance of manners. The firſt meaſures embraced by Mary confirmed all the favourable prepoſſeſſions that people had entertained. She beſtowed her confidence entirely on the leaders of the reformed party, who had the greateſt influence, and were alone able to ſupport her government. James, her natural brother, whom ſhe made earl of Murray, had the chief authority. After him Lidington, ſecretary of ſtate, had a principal ſhare in her confidence; and, by their activity, they endeavoured to eſtabliſh order and peace in a country divided by private feuds and public factions. But one circumſtance deprived Mary of that favour which might have been expected from her engaging deportment; ſhe was a papiſt, and it was with the utmoſt difficulty ſhe could obtain permiſſion to celebrate maſs in her own chapel. One ſingle maſs was thought, by the reforming miniſters, more dangerous to the kingdom than an hundred thouſand armed men. Knox, a popular preacher, daily ſignalized himſelf by freſh inſtances of zeal againſt the catholics: he publicly called the queen Jezebel. All the endeavours of Mary to gain this clamorous preacher over to her intereſt were in vain: he was cited before the council, before whom he defended his principles without timidity, and was diſcharged without puniſhment. The bigotry of the miniſters and people was carried to the greateſt height. The uſual prayers in the churches were, "That God would turn the queen's heart, which was obſtinate againſt him and his truth; or were his holy will otherwiſe, that he would ſtrengthen the hearts and hands of the elect, ſtoutly to oppoſe the rage of all tyrants." The pulpits were filled with reproaches againſt the vices of the court; and the queen naturally regretted leaving a country where ſhe had, in early youth, received the firſt impreſſion of thoſe manners, which were now conſidered as ſinful abominations. Thus ſurrounded with dangers, Mary thought her only expedient for preſerving the tranquillity of her kingdom was to maintain a good correſpondence with Elizabeth. In order to this ſhe diſpatched her ſecretary to London, to expreſs her deſire of maintaining a good correſpondence with her; and to requeſt, that this friendſhip might be cemented by Mary's being declared ſucceſſor to the crown of England. No requeſt could be more unreaſonable, or made at a more improper time. Elizabeth replied, that Mary had once diſcovered her intention not to wait for the ſucceſſion, but had openly aſſumed the title of queen of England, and pretended a ſuperior right to her throne: that though her ambaſſadors, and thoſe of her huſband, had ſigned a treaty, in which they renounced that claim, and promiſed ſatisfaction for ſo great an indignity, yet ſhe had rejected the moſt earneſt ſolicitations, and had even incurred ſome danger in croſſing the ſeas, rather than ratify that equitable treaty: that, for her part, whatever claims were advanced, ſhe was determined to live and die queen of England; and, after her death, it was the buſineſs of others to examine who had the beſt pretenſions to ſucceed her, either by the laws or right of blood; and that ſhe would never conſent to ſtrengthen the intereſt or authority of any claimant, by fixing the ſucceſſion on a rival queen. Thus the treaty continued, without being ratified: however, the queen of England agreed to maintain a correſpondence with Mary, and many letters paſſed between them, abounding with expreſſions of the moſt unreſerved friendſhip, while they deteſted each other with all the rage of jealouſy and diſdain.

Elizabeth, obſerving that Mary was ſufficiently depreſſed by her rebellious ſubjects, inſtead of adding at this time to the troubles of Scotland, wiſely employed herſelf in regulating the affairs of her own kingdom. Her firſt attempt was to put the Engliſh navy in a reſpectable condition: ſhe augmented the pay of her ſeamen; filled her magazines with arms; introduced the manufacture of gunpowder into England; ordered a great number of iron and braſs pieces of ordnance to be caſt; reinforced the garriſon of Berwick; introduced and encouraged improvements in agriculture, by permitting the exportation of corn; promoted the trade and navigation of England; regulated the national coin, which her predeceſſors had altered; and ordered her people to attend the exerciſe of arms at ſtated times. The glory that attended her wiſe meaſures attracted the admiration of all Europe; nor were there wanting numbers who made propoſals of marriage to a princeſs who enjoyed ſuch ſingular felicity and renown. The archduke Charles, the emperor's ſecond ſon, with Caſimir, ſon of the elector Palatine, made their applications. Eric, king of Sweden, and Adolph, duke of Holſtein, alſo became her ſuitors. The earl of Arran, heir to the crown of Scotland, was recommended to her by the ſtates of that kingdom. Even ſome of her ſubjects entertained hopes of ſucceſs, though they did not openly declare their pretenſions. The earl of Arundel, though declining in years, flattered himſelf with this proſpect: as did alſo Sir William Pickering, who was much eſteemed for his perſonal merit. But lord Robert Dudley, a younger brother of the late duke of Northumberland, appeared the more likely to ſucceed, as by his addreſs and flattery he had, in a manner, become her favourite, and had great influence in her counſels; whence people long expected that he would be preferred above all the princes who had addreſſed her. The queen gave theſe ſuitors ſuch a gentle refuſal as encouraged their purſuit; and thus allowed them to entertain hopes of ſucceeding in their pretenſions, in order to attach them to her intereſt: yet, though Elizabeth reſolved never to beſtow upon her people an heir to the crown, ſhe ſeemed to have determined that none, who had any pretenſions to the ſucceſſion, ſhould ever have one. By her father's excluſion of the poſterity of Margaret, queen of Scotland, the right of the crown devolved to the houſe of Suffolk; and the lady Catharine Gray, younger ſiſter to the lady Jane, was now heireſs of that family. This lady was ſent to the Tower, for marrying the earl of Hertford without her conſent, and died in confinement. But however ſevere this queen was with regard to thoſe who had any pretenſions to the crown, ſhe was always attentive to remove the oppreſſions of her ſubjects. She revoked all warrants granted to purveyors for victualling the fleet, which were generally executed in a very vexatious manner; and iſſued orders, that the people ſhould be paid in money for whatever proviſions they furniſhed. She reformed the impoſitions of the Exchequer; and took care that the penſions aſſigned to the popiſh clergy, on their reſigning their livings, ſhould be punctually paid. She alſo encreaſed the ſalary of the judges, and allowed them a proviſion for their reſpective circuits. At the ſame time ſhe took care that her œconomy ſhould go hand in hand with her liberality.

A. D. 1562.

The queen regent of France had formed a plan of adminiſtration, in which ſhe gave equal authority to the catholics and the proteſtants; and by dividing the power between the duke of Guiſe and the prince of Condé, endeavoured to render herſelf neceſſary to both; but ſhe found it impoſſible to preſerve a firm concord in ſo delicate a ſituation. An edict had been publiſhed, granting toleration to the proteſtants; but the intereſted views of the duke of Guiſe, under the pretence of religious zeal, produced a diſagreement; and the two parties, after the tranquillity of a moment, renewed their mutual inſults. Coligni and Andelot, aſſembling their friends, flew to arms: Guiſe and Montmorency, getting the king's perſon into their poſſeſſion, obliged the queen regent to embrace their party. Fourteen armies were raiſed, and in motion in different parts of France. Wherever the reformed prevailed, the images were broken, the altars pillaged, and the monaſteries deſtroyed: where ſucceſs attended the Romans, they burned the bibles, they obliged married perſons to perform the ceremony over again, and re-baptized their infants; both ſides employed themſelves in plunder, deſolation, and bloodſhed. Even the parliament of Paris put the ſword into the hands of the enraged multitude, and empowered the catholics to maſſacre thoſe who were called Hugonots. Philip, king of Spain, dreading leſt the doctrines of the reformed ſhould ſpread into the provinces of the Netherlands, had formed a ſecret alliance with the princes of Guiſe, for the ſuppreſſion of what was termed hereſy; and now ſent ſix thouſand men, with a ſupply of money, to reinforce the catholic party. The prince of Condé, finding himſelf unable to oppoſe their united force, ſent to crave the aſſiſtance and protection of Elizabeth; and offered to put Havre-de-Grace into the hands of the Engliſh, on condition of three thouſand men being ſent for its garriſon, three thouſand more to defend Dieppe and Rouen, and his receiving a hundred thouſand crowns. Elizabeth agreed to the propoſal; and three thouſand Engliſh, under the command of Sir Edward Poinings, were ſent to take poſſeſſion of Havre. Soon after the earl of Warwick arrived with another body of three thouſand Engliſh, and took the command of that city. Andelot, aſſiſted by Elizabeth's negociations, had raiſed a conſiderable body of German proteſtants, who marched towards Normandy, in order to act in conjunction with the Engliſh. Mean while the catholics, under the command of the conſtable and the duke of Guiſe, overtaking them at Dreux, a battle was fought with great obſtinacy on both ſides; and, what is very remarkable, Condè and Montmorency, the commanders of each army, were taken priſoners. Guiſe, however, appeared to have the victory: but the admiral, collecting the remains of his army, ſubdued ſome conſiderable places in Normandy; and Elizabeth, to enable him to ſupport his cauſe, ſent him a ſupply of a hundred thouſand crowns.

A. D. 1563. On the twelfth of January the queen ſummoned a parliament; when, a ſhort time before the meeting of that aſſembly, ſhe was ſeized with the ſmall-pox. Her life having been for ſome time deſpaired of, the people became ſenſible of their dangerous ſituation, in caſe of her deceaſe, from the uncertainty which attended the ſucceſſion to the crown. The commons therefore preſented an addreſs to her majeſty, requeſting that ſhe would be graciouſly pleaſed either to marry, or to fix the ſucceſſion in ſuch an explicit manner, as might prevent the calamities which it was natural to fear would reſult from the conteſts of ſeveral claims to the throne. But Elizabeth ſtill found means to elude giving a clear anſwer to their applications; nor could ſhe be prevailed upon to appoint a ſucceſſor. The parliament, however, made no difficulty in granting the neceſſary ſupplies. They were very willing to ſupport the noble deſigns of the queen for the improvement of trade and manufactures, for the augmentation of her navy, for the ſuppreſſion of vice, and for the more effectually reſtraining the progreſs of popery. They granted two fifteenths, and two ſubſidies. In the mean time the duke of Guiſe laid ſiege to Orleans. A very conſiderable progreſs had been made in this undertaking, when the duke was aſſaſſinated by a young enthuſiaſt named Poltrot de Merc. The duke, on finding his end approaching, expreſſed the deepeſt remorſe for having involved his country in the horrors of a civil war; and conjured the queen regent to conclude a peace as ſoon as poſſible with the Hugonots. His advice was followed. Both parties being heartily tired of the war, ſoon agreed to articles of pacification. A toleration, under ſome reſtraints, was again granted to the proteſtants; a general amneſty was publiſhed: Condè was reinſtated in his offices and government; and money being advanced to pay the arrears of the German troops, they were ſent out of the kingdom. It had been ſtipulated between Elizabeth and Condè, that a peace ſhould be concluded by neither party without the other's conſent; but this was little regarded. The leaders of the French proteſtants only obtained a promiſe, that on her relinquiſhing Havre, her charges, and the money ſhe had advanced, ſhould be paid by the king of France, and that Calais ſhould be reſtored to her on the expiration of the ſtipulated term. Elizabeth diſdaining to accept of theſe conditions, and imagining Havre a much better pledge for obtaining her purpoſe, ſhe ſent orders to her general to defend the place againſt the united power of France. The earl of Warwick made a gallant defence, notwithſtanding the many difficulties he laboured under; but the plague breaking out among his troops, he was obliged to ſurrender the place. Nor did the miſfortune terminate there; the garriſon brought home the peſtilence, which afterwards raged with uncommon violence: above twenty thouſand perſons died of it in London only. A peace was ſoon after concluded with France; two hundred thouſand crowns were paid to Elizabeth for the redemption of hoſtages; and the mutual pretenſions of both parties continued.

By the death of the duke of Guiſe, the influence of Mary was greatly leſſened in France, which made her uncle, cardinal of Lorrain, ready to eſpouſe her to any one who could ſtrengthen their intereſt, or give inquietude to the queen of England. Elizabeth was equally vigilant in preventing the execution of their ſchemes; and told the queen of Scots, that nothing could ſatisfy her but her eſpouſing ſome Engliſh nobleman; and even went ſo far as to propoſe her own favourite, the earl of Leiceſter, whom ſhe certainly never meant to part with; for when ſhe perceived that Mary was inclined to liſten to the propoſal, ſhe found means to elude the promiſe ſhe had made of declaring that princeſs her ſucceſſor. England now enjoyed a profound tranquillity. The queen being no longer engaged in foreign affairs, made a progreſs to the univerſity of Cambridge, where ſhe was received with great pomp and magnificence. Every thing was conducted with a ſplendour that did honour to that celebrated ſeat of learning; and ſhe declared her ſatisfaction in an elegant Latin oration, wherein ſhe aſſured the univerſity of her protection, and earneſt deſire of encouraging learning to the utmoſt of her power.

Two years having been conſumed in evaſions, artifices, and uncertainty, A. D. 1565. Mary fixed upon lord Darnley, ſon to the earl of Lenox, as the object of her choice. This young nobleman was her couſin-german by the lady Margaret Douglas, neice to Henry VIII. and daughter to the earl of Angus, by Margaret, queen of Scotland. He had been born and educated in England, where his father had conſtantly reſided, after being expelled his native country by the ſuperior intereſt of the Hamiltons. Darnley was alſo, by his father, deſcended from the ſame family with Mary herſelf; and would, by marrying her, preſerve the royal dignity in the houſe of Stuart. He was, after her, next heir to the crown of England; and thoſe who had affected to deny her title, on account of her being a foreigner, had endeavoured to maintain his claim, and to give it the preference; ſo that the queen of Scots propoſed to unite the rights of the two families by this marriage. But ſuſpecting that Elizabeth would counteract her deſign, ſhe recalled the earl of Lenox, that he might be put into poſſeſſion of his lands which had been confiſcated. The queen of England entered fully into her views, though ſhe ſeemed entirely ignorant of her purpoſe; nor was ſhe ſorry to find Mary had caſt her eyes on a young nobleman, whoſe father poſſeſſed a great eſtate in England; and therefore ſhe imagined would be ſo far ſubject to her pleaſure, that ſhe could prevent the marriage without interrupting the treaty. Underſtanding that the negociation for Darnley's marriage was in great forwardneſs, ſhe permitted that nobleman, on his firſt application, to follow his father into Scotland; but no ſooner did ſhe hear that preparations were making for celebrating the nuptials, than ſhe exclaimed againſt the marriage; ſent Throgmorton to command Darnley, upon his allegiance, immediately to return to England; committed the counteſs of Lenox, and her ſecond ſon to the Tower; and though it was impoſſible for her to aſſign one plauſible pretence for her diſpleaſure, ſhe threatened, proteſted, and complained, as if ſhe had been injured in the niceſt point. The conduct of Elizabeth, though generally judicious, was always full of duplicity and deceit; but never did ſhe evince greater inſincerity, than in her tranſactions with the queen of Scotland. In theſe ſhe was influenced by ſo many narrow prejudices, that ſhe ever ſtudiouſly concealed her real motives.

This ſtate policy, or deep diſſimulation, is always ſhocking to a virtuous mind, though it often ſtands a leading maxim in the ſcience of government. However, notwithſtanding all the efforts and mean arts of Elizabeth, the marriage between the Scottiſh queen and Darnley was celebrated on the twenty-ninth of July. Mary, allured by the youth, beauty, and exterior accompliſhments of her huſband, at firſt overlooked the qualities of his mind, which were far from correſponding with the excellence of his external figure. Addicted to low pleaſures, he was incapable of the genuine ſentiments of love, and deſtitute of gratitude, from thinking that no favours could equal his merit. He was at the ſame time violent in his temper, yet variable in his enterprizes; credulous, and eaſily governed by flatterers. Mary, in the firſt effuſions of tenderneſs, took a pleaſure in exalting him: ſhe granted him the title of king; joined his name with her own in all public acts; but having leiſure to obſerve his weakneſs and libertine follies, ſhe withdrew from him by degrees her confidence, and treated him with neglect. The reſentment he ſhewed upon this occaſion, ſerved only to increaſe her diſguſt; and Darnley, enraged at imaginary ill treatment, reſolved to be revenged on every one whom he deemed the cauſe of this change in her deportment to him. This unworthy huſband not conſidering that he, a ſlave to vice, and wholly occupied by ſelf-love, was never ſincerely attached to the moſt amiable of women. There was at this time in court one David Rezzio, a Piedmonteſe muſician, who had obtained the queen's confidence and favour in a very high degree. Having a good ear, and a tolerable voice, the queen retained him in her ſervice to complete her band of muſic, which gave him frequent opportunities of inſinuating himſelf into her favour. Some time after, her ſecretary for French diſpatches having incurred her diſpleaſure, ſhe promoted Rezzio to that office, which placed him continually near her perſon. Darnley had the misfortune to fall under the management of this man. Rezzio's whole influence with the queen was employed in promoting his marriage. But, when her majeſty's affections were cooled, Rezzio refuſing to humour him any longer in his follies, he imputed the queen's coldneſs, not to his own behaviour, but to the favourite's inſinuations. Theſe ſuſpicions were confirmed by Mary's conduct. She treated this upſtart with the utmoſt familiarity: he was perpetually in her preſence; intermeddled in every buſineſs; and, together with a few favourites, was the companion of her private amuſements.

A. D. 1566. Darnley, inflamed with rage, formed a plan for his deſtruction, in which were engaged the earl of Morton, chancellor, with the lords Ruthven, Lindeſey, and Maitland. Theſe conſpirators, being well acquainted with the levity of their employer, engaged him to ſign a paper, in which he avowed the undertaking, and promiſed to protect them from all conſequences. The ninth of March was the day fixed for the execution of their ſanguinary purpoſe; and all neceſſary precautions were taken to render the deſign ſucceſsful. Mary, then in the ſixth month of her pregnancy, was ſupping in her bed-chamber with her natural ſiſter the counteſs of Argyle, and David Rezzio, when the king entered the apartment by a private paſſage, and placed himſelf at the back of Mary's chair. Lord Ruthven, and the other conſpirators, all armed, ruſhed in after him. The queen, terrified at their appearance, demanded the reaſon of this rude intruſion. They anſwered, that not the leaſt violence was intended againſt her perſon; they meant only to bring that villain, pointing at Rezzio, to his deſerved puniſhment. Rezzio inſtantly run behind his miſtreſs, and clinging round her waiſt, implored her protection; while ſhe interpoſed in his behalf with cries, menaces, and entreaties. But regardleſs ofh erefforts to ſave him, the impatient aſſaſſins ruſhed upon their prey; and by overturning the table, encreaſed the confuſion and horror of this dreadful ſcene. He was now torn from the queen by violence, and dragged into the anti-chamber, where he was diſpatched by the conſpirators, who pierced his body with fifty-ſix wounds. Mary, after having paid a decent tribute of grief, dried up her tears, and employed her mind wholly on meditating a ſevere revenge. The king, with the conſpirators, kept poſſeſſion of the palace, and guarded the queen; when ſhe, obſerving his irreſolution, employed all her perſuaſions and careſſes to diſengage him from his new aſſociates; and at length prevailed on him to eſcape with her in the night to Dunbar, attended only by three perſons. Here many of her ſubjects offered her their ſervices; and having collected an army, which the conſpirators were unable to reſiſt, ſhe obliged them to fly into England, where they lived in great poverty and diſtreſs. However, upon applying to the earl of Bothwell, the queen's new favourite, he pacified her reſentment, and procured them liberty to return to Scotland. Mary now diſcovered the ſtrongeſt proofs of antipathy to her huſband. She encouraged her courtiers to neglect him; and was pleaſed with his mean equipage and few attendants, which drew on him the contempt even of the very populace. She prevailed on him to diſown all his connections with the aſſaſſins; to deny his having any concern in the murder; and even to publiſh a proclamation, containing ſo notorious a falſhood. On the nineteenth of June, Mary was delivered of a ſon, and Sir James Melvil was diſpatched to carry intelligence of this event to Elizabeth. On the evening of his arrival in London, the queen had given a ball to her court at Greenwich, diſplaying all the ſpirit ſhe uſually diſcovered on theſe occaſions: but no ſooner heard the news, than all her joy was damped; and ſinking into melancholy, reclined her head upon her arm, and complained to ſome of her attendants, that the queen of Scots was mother of a fair ſon, while ſhe herſelf was but a barren ſtock; yet, the next day, ſhe put on a chearful countenance, thanked Melvil for his haſte in bringing the agreeable intelligence, and expreſſed the moſt cordial friendſhip for Mary. The birth of a ſon contributed greatly to encourage the zeal of Mary's partizans in England; perſons of all parties began to be impatient for ſome ſettlement of the ſucceſſion. Warm debates were ſupported in both houſes on this occaſion. Some ſpirited ſpeeches were made; in one of which Paul Wentworth affirmed, that the queen was bound in duty not only to provide for the happineſs of her ſubjects, but to ſhew her regard to their future ſecurity, by fixing on a ſucceſſor. The queen, hearing of theſe debates, ſent for the ſpeaker, and having repeated ſome expreſs orders, to proceed no farther on that matter, commanded him to inform the houſe, that if any member remained unſatisfied, he might appear before the privy council, and there give his reaſons. The members ſeeming ſtill diſpoſed to proceed upon the queſtion, ſhe ſent to revoke her orders, and to allow the houſe liberty to debate. Pleaſed with this condeſcenſion, they voted her a ſupply of a ſubſidy and a fifteenth, without any conditions annexed, to be levied at three payments. It was believed, the commons intended, by this liberal ſupply, to engage the queen to yield to their requeſt, therefore on her refuſal, ſhe voluntarily omitted the third payment, obſerving, that money in the purſes of her ſubjects, was as good as in her own exchequer.

While Elizabeth was employed in promoting the happineſs of her people, the Netherlands were agitated with thoſe alarming convulſions, which at laſt gave liberty to a very conſiderable part of that country. Soon after Philip had quitted theſe provinces, in order to reſide in Spain, the diſcontents of the inhabitants arrived at ſuch a height, that it was impoſſible for affairs to continue long in their then ſituation. This univerſal diſſatisfaction flowed from ſeveral cauſes. The people were perſuaded that the king intended to aboliſh the ſmall remains of their privileges, and to erect on their ruins the throne of deſpotic power. The eſtabliſhment of biſhoprics alarmed many principal families, as the juriſdiction and revenues of the abbeys, in which they were nearly concerned, were greatly leſſened. The inquiſition, which was going to be eſtabliſhed in theſe provinces, cauſed an univerſal alarm. The ſtates had been prohibited from aſſembling. The king diſcovered a determined reſolution of exterminating the reformed religion. Theſe meaſures, which ſet the provinces in a flame, were upon the point of being eſtabliſhed. They had for ſeveral years petitioned for permiſſion to aſſemble the ſtates, in order to avert the ſtorm which threatened the deſtruction of their country. Their requeſt was always rejected, and often with contumelious language. This ſtrange behaviour raiſed the reſentment of the people. The prince of Orange, with the counts of Egmont and Horn, withdrew from the council, and joined in a petition to the king. The cardinal de Glanville, who directed all the meaſures of government, had rendered himſelf ſo odious, that the moſt violent attempts were to be feared, if he filled any longer the ſeat of power. Philip, whoſe pride would not ſuffer him to recal the cardinal, adviſed him to withdraw. The cardinal obeyed, and the nobles reſumed their ſeats at the council board. This point obtained, they exerted themſelves to prevent the eſtabliſhment of the inquiſition, which they conſidered as the greateſt oppreſſion that could be laid upon any people. They formed aſſociations; and the proteſtants celebrated divine ſervice openly, notwithſtanding all the threats of government. From this moment Philip conſidered the people of the Low Countries as rebels, while they looked upon him as an unjuſt and arbitrary ſovereign. Such was the beginning of the troubles in the Netherlands, in which the Engliſh were afterwards very intimately engaged. About this period Elizabeth viſited the univerſity of Oxford, where ſhe was magnificently entertained a whole week, during which ſhe aſſiſted at ſeveral academical exerciſes. She anſwered a Greek oration in the ſame language; and in a Latin ſpeech aſſured the univerſity of her favour and protection.

A. D. 1567. The earl of Bothwell, one of the moſt conſiderable noblemen in Scotland, though undiſtinguiſhed either by civil or military talents, had made a figure in the party which oppoſed the earl of Murray, and the rigid reformers. He was profligate in his manners, and his profuſe expences had involved his great fortune in ſuch debts, as ſeemed to leave him no reſource, but in the moſt deſperate enterprizes. Having lately obtained Mary's entire confidence, all her meaſures were directed by his advice, and reports were ſpread of more particular intimacies between them, which gained ground from the increaſe of her hatred to her huſband, who was treated with ſuch neglect, that he ſecretly provided a veſſel to tranſport him to the continent. The ſuſpicions againſt her were even carried ſo far, that when Darnley, reduced to a ſtate of deſperation, left the court, and retired to Glaſgow, an extraordinary kind of illneſs, with which he was afflicted while there, was aſcribed to her having given him a doſe of poiſon. Whatever truth might be in this report, Mary ſeemed greatly alarmed. She repaired to Glaſgow, paid him a viſit, and not only treated him with the utmoſt tenderneſs, but brought him along with her, and by her conduct gave reaſon to believe that ſhe intended to live with him on a more agreeable footing. Darnley, far from having any miſtruſt, had put himſelf into her hands, and attended her to Edinburgh. She lived in the palace of Holyrood houſe; but it being in a low ſituation, and as the noiſe occaſioned by the concourſe of people might diſturb him during his illneſs, theſe reaſons were aſſigned for fitting up an apartment for him in a ſolitary houſe, called the Kirkfield, at ſome diſtance. The queen converſed with him here in the moſt endearing manner, and ſome nights lay in a room below his; but on the ninth of February told him that ſhe ſhould paſs that night in the palace, on account of the marriage of one of her maids of honour. About two in the morning the whole city was alarmed with a violent noiſe, and aſtoniſhment appeared in every countenance, when known that it was occaſioned by the blowing up the houſe where the king reſided. Darnley's body was found at ſome diſtance in a neighbouring field, without any marks of fire, contuſion, or violence. Not the leaſt doubt was made by any that the king had been murdered; and Bothwell was generally conſidered as the author of that atrocious crime. Voices were heard in the ſtreets of Edinburgh, during the ſtillneſs of the night, imputing to Mary and Bothwell the death of the king. The earl of Lenox, who lived in poverty and contempt, at a diſtance from the court, wrote to the queen, demanding juſtice for the murder of his ſon. The court, convinced that it was abſolutely neceſſary to make ſome enquiry, allowed fifteen days for the examination of this important affair; and cited Lenox to appear at court, and prove his charge againſt Bothwell. The earl beginning to entertain apprehenſions, from the power and inſolence of his enemy, requeſted that the day might be prorogued; conjuring the queen, for the ſake of her own honour, to employ more leiſure and deliberation, in determining an affair of ſuch extreme moment. Not the leaſt regard was paid to his application; and though Cunningham, one of Lenox's retinue, appeared in court, and proteſted, in his maſter's name, againſt the acquittal of the criminal, a verdict was given in his favour, as neither accuſer nor witneſs appeared. A parliament was held two days after this extraordinary trial, which ſtrongly confirmed the general opinion of Bothwell's guilt; yet he was the perſon appointed to carry the royal ſceptre on their firſt meeting. In this parliament a rigorous act was paſſed againſt thoſe who poſted up defamatory papers; but no notice was taken of the king's murder. Soon after, Mary having gone to Stirling, to pay a viſit to her ſon, Bothwell aſſembled eight hundred horſe, and way-laying her on her return, ſeized her perſon near Edinburgh, and carried her to Dunbar, with a deſign to force her to marry him. It was generally ſuſpected that the whole tranſaction was managed in concert with the queen; for ſome of the nobility, in order to diſcover the truth, having ſent her a private meſſage, aſſuring her, that if ſhe lay under any conſtraint, they would exert all their power for her relief, ſhe anſwered, that ſhe had indeed been carried to Dunbar by violence, but had been treated with ſo much kindneſs ſince her arrival, that ſhe willingly remained with Bothwell. The nobility were now fully convinced that the whole had been previouſly planned between them, and gave themſelves no farther concern about her captivity. A few days after, Bothwell received a pardon for this violence, and for all other crimes; by which the murder of the king was indirectly forgiven. Notwithſtanding the reſolution of Mary to marry this reputed murderer, a difficulty lay in the way, by ſome thought inſurmountable; he had been married two years before to a woman of merit, ſiſter to the earl of Huntley, and it was neceſſary to ſet this marriage aſide. A ſuit was therefore commenced for a divorce in the ſpiritual court of the archbiſhop of St. Andrews, which was popiſh, governed by the canon law, and in the new conſiſtorial court, which was proteſtant, and regulated by the principles of the reformed divines. The firſt decided in his favour from reaſons of conſanguinity, alledged by Bothwell; the latter from reaſons of adultery, alledged by his wife. The affair being carried on with the utmoſt precipitation, a ſentence of divorce was pronounced, in both courts, in four days. The banns were then ordered to be publiſhed in the church, between the queen and the duke of Orkney, the title Bothwell now bore; which Craig, a miniſter of Edinburgh, refuſed. He even exhorted all who had acceſs to the queen, to adviſe her againſt ſo ſcandalous an alliance; but Mary perſiſting in her weak reſolution, the ceremony was performed by the biſhop of Orkney, on the fifteenth of May, three months and five days after the death of the king; but he was afterwards depoſed by the church for his ſcandalous compliance. Very few lords attended, though many of them had ſigned a petition for her marrying Bothwell; even the French ambaſſador could not be prevailed upon to countenance the marriage by his preſence. This event diſgraced Mary in the eyes of all Europe. Her ſubjects beheld her with horror. The ſuſpicions ſhe lay under with regard to her being an accomplice in the death of the king grew ſtronger. Her connection with the man whom the public voice had pointed out as the murderer: her great anxiety to have him acquitted; a marriage ſo contrary to all decency, negociated by means ſo odious; every thing ſeemed to confirm that Mary, the ſlave of her paſſion for Bothwell, was the partner of his crime. Even though this barbarous action ſhould not be imputed to her, it is impoſſible to clear her of the moſt ſhameful weakneſs. But ſuch is the frailty of human nature, that the beſt characters, under certain fatal circumſtances, tranſgreſs at once the bounds of wiſdom and duty. The guilt of Bothwell was aggravated by his inſolence. He treated the queen herſelf with the greateſt barbarity; and endeavoured to make himſelf maſter of the young prince, who had been committed to the care of lord Erſkine, lately created earl of Mar; but he nobly refuſed to part with his charge. This attempt alarmed the whole nation. The principal nobility met at Stirling caſtle, and formed an aſſociation to protect the prince, and puniſh the king's murderers. Lord Hume appearing firſt in arms, at the head of eight hundred horſe, ſuddenly encompaſſed the queen of Scots and Bothwell, in Bothwick caſtle; but they found means to eſcape to Dunbar. Mean while the confederate lords aſſembled their troops at Edinburgh. Bothwell ſoon after took the field, and advanced againſt them. The two armies met at Carberry hill, about ſix miles from Edinburgh; but the queen was ſoon ſenſible ſhe had no reaſon to depend upon her troops, for they refuſed to ſpill their blood in her cauſe, and ſhe had no reſource but that of holding a conference with the confederates, into whoſe hands ſhe ſurrendered herſelf. They conducted her to Edinburgh, amidſt the inſults of the populace; who not only reproached her with her crimes, but which way ſoever ſhe turned, held before her eyes a banner, on which were painted the murder of her huſband, and the diſtreſs of James, her infant ſon; on which, being overwhelmed with her calamities, ſhe burſt into tears and lamentations. Bothwell, perceiving that the authority of the queen was no longer able to protect him, fled to Dunbar; where, fitting out a few ſmall ſhips, he ſailed for the Orkneys, ſubſiſting for ſome time by piracy. Being purſued thither, the veſſel in which he had embarked was taken, with ſeveral of his ſervants; who afterwards diſcovered all the circumſtances of the king's murder, and were puniſhed for that crime; while Bothwell having eſcaped in a boat, found means to get a paſſage to Denmark; where he was thrown into priſon, loſt his ſenſes, and about ten years after died miſerably, in extreme diſtreſs.

The unfortunate Mary was not permitted by the conſpirators to continue long at the palace: they ſent her under a ſtrong guard to Lochleven, belonging to William Douglas, uterine brother to the earl of Murray. This caſtle was ſituated on a ſmall iſland in the middle of a lake, and acceſſible only by a boat. Here the captive queen was treated with inexpreſſible cruelty, without a ſingle friend to comfort her. The ſufferings of this unhappy princeſs removed the fears and jealouſies of Elizabeth, and ſhe reſolved to employ all her authority to alleviate her misfortunes. She diſpatched Throgmorton to Scotland, with orders to enquire into the real ſituation of Mary, and to promiſe her all the aſſiſtance in her power. At the ſame time he was commiſſioned to demand of the conſpirators the liberty of their ſovereign, and in caſe of refuſal to threaten them with the reſentment of his miſtreſs. But the aſſociated lords, apprehenſive of Elizabeth's political views, thought proper, after ſeveral delays, to refuſe the Engliſh ambaſſador all acceſs to Mary; and ſent her three inſtruments to ſign; by one ſhe was to reſign the crown in favour of her ſon, by another to appoint Murray regent, and by a third to give her ſanction to a council, appointed to adminiſter the government till Murray arrived from France. The queen ſeeing no proſpect of relief, after a plentiful effuſion of tears, ſigned the three inſtruments; and in conſequence of her forced reſignation, the young prince, who was but thirteen months old, was proclaimed king, with the title of James VI. and on the twenty-ninth of July he was crowned at Stirling, the earl of Morton taking, in his name, the coronation oath; in which was a promiſe to extirpate hereſy, and ſome conceſſions in favour of the liberty of the people: but Throgmorton was ordered by Elizabeth not to aſſiſt at the coronation. Soon after was ſtruck a coin, on which this memorable ſaying of the emperor Trajan was engraven, Pro me; ſi merear, in me; "For me; if I deſerve it, againſt me." The earl Murray arriving from France, took poſſeſſion of his high office. In a viſit to the captive queen, he talked to her with great ſeverity on her paſt conduct. He then ſummoned a parliament, which, after voting that ſhe was an accomplice in her huſband's murder, ſentenced her to perpetual impriſonment; ratified her reſignation to the crown; acknowledged her ſon as king, and Murray as regent. Murray, being poſſeſſed of vigour and abilities, now exerted himſelf in reducing the kingdom. He bribed Sir James Balfour to ſurrender Edinburgh caſtle; and forced the garriſon of Dunbar to open its gates, and then demoliſhed its fortifications.

A. D. 1568.

While Bothwell was with Mary, few of the nobility were inclined to ſupport her authority. By his abſence, the ſentiments of many were changed; and ſeveral of the malcontents, obſerving that every thing was carried to extremity againſt the queen, became diſpoſed to embrace her cauſe. But all their endeavours would have been of little avail, had not her charms engaged George Douglas, brother to the laird of Lochlevin, to promiſe her his aſſiſtance. He having admiſſion into the houſe at all times, on the ſecond of May conveyed her into a ſmall boat, and rowed her aſhore. The news of her eſcape was ſoon known to her friends, who conveyed her to Hamilton, where ſhe was joined by a great number of the nobility. A bond of aſſociation was immediately ſigned for her defence, and Mary, in a few days, found herſelf at the head of ſix thouſand men. The regent haſtily aſſembled a body of forces, and though they were inferior in number, he took the field; and on the fifteenth of May a battle was fought at Langſide, near Glaſgow, in which the regent obtained a deciſive victory; and the queen's party was entirely diſperſed. This unfortunate princeſs fled with precipitation to the borders of England. Here ſhe reſolved to ſeek an aſylum; and, entering a fiſhing-boat, landed the ſame day at Workington in Cumberland, and was conducted to the caſtle of Carliſle in a very honourable manner by the deputy governor. From thence ſhe ſent a letter to Elizabeth, ſoliciting that aſſiſtance ſhe had promiſed againſt her rebellious ſubjects. Elizabeth was diſpoſed to comply with the requeſt of the Scottiſh queen: but Cecil cautioned her againſt ſuffering the feelings of humanity to prevail over the dictates of prudence. However, ſhe ſent orders to lady Scroop, the duke of Norfolk's ſiſter, who lived in the neighbourhood, to attend on that princeſs; and ſoon after ſent to her lord Scroop, with Sir Francis Knolles. Though the queen of Scots had, by the influence of their repreſentations, ſubmitted her cauſe to the arbitration of Elizabeth, ſhe uſed every evaſion poſſible to avoid coming to this extremity; but on Elizabeth's alledging, that it was never meant that ſhe ſhould be cited to a trial on the accuſation of her rebellious ſubjects, but that they ſhould be ſummoned to appear, in order to juſtify their conduct; and being confident there would be no difficulty in refuting all the calumnies of her enemies, ſhe was determined to ſupport her cauſe, and procure her reaſonable terms of accommodation: upon theſe aſſurances, Mary agreed to vindicate herſelf by her own commiſſioners, before thoſe appointed by Elizabeth. The conferences were begun at York, and afterwards continued at Hampton-court; where the regent opened fully his charge againſt the queen of Scots; and after expreſſing reluctance to proceed in an affair of ſuch delicacy, accuſed her, in plain terms, of having given her conſent and participation in the aſſaſſination of the king; and the earl of Lenox alſo appearing before the Engliſh commiſſioners, implored vengeance for his ſon's murder; and accuſed Mary, as being an accomplice with Bothwell, in that crime. But copies of this charge being given to Mary's commiſſioners, they abſolutely refuſed to return an anſwer; and grounded their ſilence on having orders from their miſtreſs, that if any thing was advanced that might affect her honour, they were not to make any defence, ſhe being a ſovereign princeſs, and not ſubject to any tribunal; they therefore repeated Mary's requeſt, that ſhe might be admitted to Elizabeth's preſence, to whom, and to whom alone, ſhe was determined to juſtify her innocence. The conſequence of Mary's commiſſioners refuſing to anſwer Murray's charge was the putting an end to the conference. But the Engliſh miniſters deſiring to have in their hands the proofs of her guilt, Murray was called before the Engliſh commiſſioners, and ſeverely reproved, in the queen's name, for the baſe imputation he had thrown upon his ſovereign; and told, that though he had forgot the duty of allegiance, the queen would never overlook what ſhe owed to her friend, her neighbour, and her kinſwoman; and deſired to know what the commiſſioners could ſay in their own juſtification. Murray, thus urged, produced the proofs of his charge againſt the queen of Scots; and, among the reſt, ſome of her love letters and ſonnets to Bothwell, all written in her own hand, with other papers, which contained inconteſtible proofs of Mary's criminal correſpondence with Bothwell; of her conſent to the murder of her huſband; and of her concurrence in the pretended violence, offered by Bothwell, in carrying her off. The friends of this queen have laboured to prove that theſe famous letters were forged, and many volumes have been written with that intention. The ſubject is too diffuſe, nor indeed is it neceſſary to diſcuſs the arguments that have been offered for and againſt the authenticity of theſe letters, as our labours are calculated for the inſtruction of our countrymen, by a faithful diſplay of intereſting facts, and not for the amuſement of little cavilling critics. Let it ſuffice therefore to ſay, that, from a candid examination, we find the proofs brought, to prove them forgeries, are weak and inconcluſive. They are alſo the more exceptionable, as the queen, at a criſis ſo affecting to her honour, refuſed either to acknowledge or deny their authenticity. Every expedient was tried by Elizabeth, to prevail upon Mary to continue the conferences; ſhe remained inflexible, and even accuſed Murray and the other commiſſioners of being the murderers of her huſband; but produced not a ſingle proof againſt them. Elizabeth now offered to bury whatever was paſt in oblivion, and negociate a reconciliation with her ſubjects, provided ſhe would renounce the throne, or aſſociate her ſon with her in the government, and ſuffer the direction of affairs to continue in the hands of Murray during the minority of the prince. But Mary rejected the propoſal with diſdain. "My laſt words, ſaid ſhe, ſhall be the words of the queen of Scotland." Murray having returned in ſafety to Scotland, Mary preſſed Elizabeth, either to enable her to regain poſſeſſion of her kingdom, or to ſuffer her to retire into France, where ſhe intended to ſeek other reſources. The queen evaded anſwering her requeſts, and that unhappy priſoner, whoſe wit and inſinuating graces might have drew many hearts to her intereſt, was removed to Tutbury caſtle, and guarded with the greateſt vigilance.

A. D. 1569.

The duke of Norfolk was the only peer that enjoyed the higheſt title of nobility, and was the firſt ſubject in England. He was at this time a widower, and being of a ſuitable age, ſeveral of his friends, and particularly the earl of Murray, before his departure for Scotland, had propoſed his marrying the queen of Scots. The previouſly obtaining of Elizabeth's conſent was conſidered, both by Murray and Norfolk, as eſſentially neceſſary to the ſucceſs of this ſcheme. But the latter, knowing her former reluctance to all propoſals of marriage with Mary, dreaded leſt Elizabeth would never agree to it, and therefore attempted firſt to gain the approbation of the moſt conſiderable of the nobility. He was ſucceſsful with the earls of Northumberland, Weſtmoreland, Suſſex, and many others: even the earl of Leiceſter, notwithſtanding his being the favourite of Elizabeth, wrote a letter to Mary, ſigned by ſeveral other perſons of the firſt rank, recommending Norfolk to her for a huſband, on ſuch conditions as ſhould be for the advantage of both kingdoms. Mary returning a favourable anſwer, the kings of France and Spain were ſecretly conſulted, who expreſſed their approbation; and though it was all along ſuppoſed that Elizabeth's conſent was to be obtained before this alliance ſhould be completed, it evidently appeared to be Norfolk's intention, by proceeding ſuch lengths without conſulting her, to render his party ſo ſtrong as to put it out of her power to refuſe it. The vigilance both of the queen, and of Cecil, rendered it impoſſible that theſe proceedings ſhould eſcape their notice. Elizabeth dropped ſeveral intimations to the duke, which ſhewed that ſhe was acquainted with his deſigns, and frequently cautioned him to beware on what pillow he repoſed his head; but he wanted courage and prudence to inform her of his intentions. She afterwards ſent for Norfolk, upbraided him ſharply for preſuming to engage in a treaty without her conſent, and commanded him, upon his allegiance, to proceed no farther. The duke promiſed to obey her commands, but retired from court without taking leave, and repaired to his ſeat in Norfolk. Repenting of this ſtep, he ſet out on his return to court, when Fitz Garret, lieutenant of the band of penſioners, apprehended him at St. Albans, and conveyed him to Burnham, three miles from Windſor, and he was ſoon after committed to the Tower. Leſly, biſhop of Roſs, the queen of Scots' ambaſſador, was examined, and confronted with Norfolk before the council: the earl of Pembroke was confined in his own houſe, and Arundel, Lumley and Throgmorton were taken into cuſtody. The queen of Scots was removed to Coventry, and all acceſs to her was for ſome time ſtrictly prohibited. A report prevailing that a rebellion was breaking out in the north, Elizabeth diſpatched orders to Northumberland and Weſtmorland to appear at court, and anſwer for their conduct. They had however proceeded too far to truſt themſelves in her hands. They had communicated their deſign to Mary, and engaged the duke of Alva, governor of the Netherlands, to promiſe them not only a reinforcement of troops, but a ſupply of arms and ammunition. The inſurgents proceeded immediately to Durham, tore the Bible and Common Prayer Book in the public market place, erected a crucifix in the cathedral, and cauſed maſs to be ſaid in an aſſembly of above ſix thouſand perſons. They then made themſelves maſters of Bernard caſtle, and fortified Hartlepool. While part of their forces were employed in theſe operations, amounting to about fifteen thouſand foot, and two thouſand horſe, the reſt formed into ſmall detachments, over-ran all Yorkſhire; the royal army, commanded by the earl of Suſſex, being too weak to prevent their ravages. At length Suſſex, attended by the earl of Rutland, the lords Hunſdon, Evers, and Willoughby of Parham, at the head of ſeven thouſand men, marched againſt the rebels, who diſperſed without ſtriking a blow; the common people retiring to their houſes, while their leaders fled into Scotland. Northumberland was ſeized by the regent, who committed him to the caſtle of Lochleven. The earl of Weſtmoreland was more fortunate: he found means to paſs over into Flanders, where he lived on a ſmall penſion, ſettled on him by the king of Spain.

A. D. 1570. The queen was ſo well pleaſed with Norfolk's behaviour, that ſhe releaſed him from the Tower, and allowed him to live in his own houſe, under ſome appearance of confinement, only engaging him to promiſe, that he would not proceed any farther in his negociations with the queen of Scotland. This princeſs had now recovered, by means of her natural good ſenſe, from that infatuation into which ſhe appears to have been thrown while attached to Bothwell; behaving with ſuch modeſty and judgment, that ſhe charmed all who approached her. On the other hand, Elizabeth endeavoured to ſupport the meaſure ſhe had adopted; and to guard againſt the miſchiefs to which it was expoſed by every prudent expedient. She ſtill obſerved an ambiguous conduct between Mary and her enemies in Scotland; perpetually carried on a negociation, in relation to the terms of her being reſtored; made her conſtant profeſſions of friendſhip, and endeavoured, by theſe artifices, both to prevent her taking any deſperate ſtep for her delivery, and to ſatisfy the French and Spaniſh ambaſſadors, who were continually renewing their ſolicitations. This deceit was received by the queen of Scots with equal diſſimulation; and profeſſions of confidence were returned by profeſſions no leſs inſincere: but Mary had always the unhappineſs to be inferior to her illuſtrious rival in diſcretion, as well as in power; and a different turn was given to their projects by the ſudden death of the regent, who, on the twenty-third of January, was aſſaſſinated by a gentleman of the name of Hamilton, to revenge a private injury. This event involved Scotland in its former anarchy. A body of Scots entered England, committing ravages which equalled in cruelty thoſe of the moſt barbarous times. This expedition ſeems to have been undertaken merely to provoke the Engliſh to avenge their affronts on the Scots in general; but they were miſtaken in their politics. Elizabeth was too cautious to be deceived by ſuch a ſcheme; ſhe declared, that ſhe did not think the party that ſupported the government concerned in the late inſult upon her ſubjects. She even offered her aſſiſtance to reſtore the government to its former vigour, and to redreſs the diſorders that had been committed by Mary's friends. She added, that ſhould her friendly offers be rejected, ſhe was ſufficiently prepared to do herſelf juſtice, and to take a ſevere revenge on thoſe who had wantonly inſulted her crown and dignity. This declaration, which was delivered by Randolph, the Engliſh ambaſſador, to an aſſembly of the ſtates, diſconcerted all the meaſures of Mary's friends: they were not prepared with an anſwer, and obtained a farther time for that purpoſe. In this interval they aſſembling, made themſelves maſters of Edinburgh. Elizabeth, in order to check their progreſs, ſent an army under the command of the earl of Suſſex, who entering Scotland, ſeverely retaliated on the aggreſſors the miſeries they had inflicted on the Engliſh. He was ſoon after recalled, the queen of Scots promiſing that, in return, no French forces ſhould be introduced into Scotland, and that her partizans ſhould deliver up the Engliſh rebels.

A. D. 1571. The jealouſy and vigilance of Elizabeth were now revived by the conduct of the catholic powers, who exerted themſelves to procure the enlargement of the queen of Scots. Pope Pius V. having attempted this in vain, had recourſe to the thunders of the Vatican. He iſſued againſt Elizabeth a bull of excommunication; in which he pretended to deprive her of all title to the crown, and to abſolve her ſubjects from their oaths of allegiance. This attack on the queen's authority was probably made in concert with Mary, in order to forward the northern rebellion. The bull was affixed to the gates of the biſhop of London's palace, by one Felton, who ſcorning either to fly or deny the fact, was ſeized, condemned, and executed.

The tenets of the diſſenters from the eſtabliſhed church, called Puritans, were now daily gaining ground, and called for the vigilance of Elizabeth, equally with the papiſt. They were declared enemies to epiſcopacy, and certain external rites of worſhip. The church of England, in their opinion, was infected with the wickedneſs of the Roman antichriſt. An image, the bending of the knee at the name of Jeſus, the ſign of the croſs in baptiſm, even a ſurplice, a ſquare cap, church muſic, and other indifferent matters, ſtruck them with horror. This love of religious liberty, blended with an obſtinate ſpirit of fanaticiſm, was the radical cauſe from whence ſprung thoſe remarkable revolutions which afterwards happened in the Engliſh government.

A new parliament, after an interval of five years, was aſſembled at Weſtminſter, on the ſecond of April; by which the following laws were enacted. It was declared treaſon to affirm, during the life of the queen, that ſhe was not the lawful ſovereign; that any other poſſeſſed a better title; that ſhe was an heretic, ſchiſmatic, or infidel; or that the laws cannot determine the ſucceſſion of the crown: whoever ſhould aſſert, in writing or printing, that any perſon, except the iſſue of her body, is, or ought to be the queen's heir or ſucceſſor, was, for the firſt offence, to be impriſoned during a year; and, for the ſecond, they were to incur the penalty of a premunire. In this ſeſſion a member, named Strickland, propoſed a reformation of the liturgy, and, particularly, an abolition of the ſign of the croſs in baptiſm. The motion was ſupported, and ſeveral arguments were uſed, to ſhew the propriety of the parliament's interfering in religious matters. It was anſwered, that this was an infringement of the right of ſupremacy; that the queen alone, as head of the church, had power of regulating the ceremonies of worſhip, and that it was dangerous for the commons to meddle with an affair of that kind. But the puritans were not ſo eaſily intimidated from their purpoſe. " The ſalvation of the ſoul, they exclaimed, was in queſtion; a conſideration to which all the kingdoms of the earth are nothing in compariſon." This ſally of zeal, though highly approved in the houſe, did not weaken the general reſpect for the prerogative. It was determined to petition the queen for leave to proceed farther on this ſubject. But Elizabeth was too much offended at the preſumption of Strickland, to paſs it over in ſilence. She ſent for him to the council, and commanded him not to appear any more in the houſe of commons. This peremptory order was too violent, even for the ſubmiſſive parliaments of that age to endure: it excited loud complaints in the houſe, and privileges before unclaimed were aſſerted to belong to the commons. It was juſtly obſerved, that Strickland was not a private man, but a repreſentative of his conſtituents; and that though the queen ought to ſupport her prerogative, it was limited by the laws; for as the ſovereign could not of himſelf make laws, ſo neither could he break them merely by his own authority. We ſhall ſee theſe noble ſeeds of liberty taking deeper root in ſucceeding reigns, and acquiring daily greater force. Elizabeth, finding her exertion of power was likely to excite commotions, ſaved her honour, by giving Strickland permiſſion to attend his duty in parliament.

We ſhall now take a view of ſome events which had paſſed in France and the Netherlands, in order to ſhew the reaſons of Elizabeth's conduct with reſpect to thoſe countries. The league formed at Bayonne, in the year 1556, for exterminating the proteſtants, had reached the ears of Condè, Coligni, and other leaders of the reformed, who finding that the meaſures of the court agreed with their ſuſpicions, reſolved to prevent their enemies from executing their cruel purpoſe. They informed their partizans of the impending danger, and they, obeying the ſummons of their leaders, flew to arms. The king and queen mother were at Monceaux, when they found themſelves ſuddenly ſurrounded by proteſtant troops, which had ſecretly marched thither from all quarters, and they muſt have fallen into their hands, had not a body of Swiſs haſted to their relief, and conducted them to Paris. Afterwards a battle was fought on the plains of St. Dennis; where, though Montmorency, general of the catholics, was ſlain, fighting bravely, the proteſtants were totally defeated. Condè, however, collecting his ſcattered forces, and obtaining a ſtrong reinforcement of German proteſtants, again appeared in the field; and inveſting Chartres, a place of conſiderable importance, obliged the court again to conſent to an accommodation. Every pacification being employed by the court as a ſnare to catch the reformed, a plan was artfully laid for ſeizing the prince and admiral, but he happily eſcaped to Rochelle, and ſummoning their party to their aſſiſtance, the civil war was renewed with greater fury than ever. The forces of the catholics, commanded by the young duke of Anjou, the king's brother, defeated the proteſtants, in the year 1569, at the battle of Jarnac, in which the prince of Condè was ſlain. Admiral Coligni, however, ſtill ſupported the cauſe; and having placed the prince of Navarre, who was then only ſixteen years old, and the young prince of Condè, at the head of the proteſtants, he animated that party with the deſire of rather bravely periſhing in the field, than by the hands of the executioner, and raiſed an army, which being joined by a body of Germans, obliged the duke of Anjou to retreat, and divide his forces. The admiral then inveſted Poictiers, when the duke of Guiſe, emulating the fame his father had acquired by the defence of Mentz, threw himſelf into the town, and inſpired ſuch courage into the garriſon, that the admiral was obliged to raiſe the ſiege. Elizabeth, who had ſteadily fixed her attention on theſe civil commotions in France, was far from being pleaſed with the honour acquired by Guiſe, and being ſolicitous about the fate of the proteſtants, lent ſome money to the queen of Navarre, employed her authority with the German princes, and permitted Henry Champernon to raiſe, and carry into France, a hundred gentlemen volunteers, among whom was Sir Walter Raleigh, who then began to diſtinguiſh himſelf by his bravery. But Coligni, engaging in battle the duke of Anjou, at Moncontour, was wounded and defeated. The court of France now vainly imagined that the power of the Hugonots was entirely deſtroyed, and therefore neglected making preparations againſt an enemy, that ſeemed incapable of being any longer dangerous. They were, however, greatly ſurprized to find that Coligni appeared undiſmayed in another part of the kingdom, where he had aſſembled an army, and even threatened Paris. In the mean time, the treaſury could no longer furniſh ſums neceſſary for a new armament; and the king, notwithſtanding his antipathy to the reformed, was, in the year 1570, obliged to conclude a treaty with them, and to allow them liberty of conſcience. As the admiral, the two young princes, and the other leaders of the reformed, ſeemed to diſtruſt the king's intentions, every artifice was uſed in order to remove their apprehenſions: the terms of the peace were religiouſly obſerved; offices, favours, and honours, were beſtowed upon the principal nobility of the reformed religion; and both the king and council frequently declared, that they were convinced of the impoſſibility of forcing men's conſciences, and that every one ſhould enjoy the free exerciſe of religion. Charles, the French king, among other ſtratagems employed to lull the proteſtants into a fatal ſecurity, ſeemed to enter into a cloſe connection with Elizabeth; and, the better to deceive her, offered her propoſals for marrying the duke of Anjou, a prince whoſe youth, beauty, and bravery, might naturally be ſuppoſed to recommend him to her eſteem. On this offer, the queen immediately founded the deſign of deceiving the court of France. Negociations were entered into with reſpect to the marriage; the terms of the contract were propoſed; difficulties ſtarted and removed; and the two courts, though equally inſincere, ſeemed daily to approach nearer to an agreement. The principal obſtacle appeared to be adjuſting the difference of religion; for though Elizabeth recommended toleration to Charles, ſhe was reſolved not to allow it in her own dominions, even to her huſband. The queen, beſides diſcouraging the partizans of Mary, by the appearance of an alliance between France and England, had other motives for her diſſimulation: her ſituation, with reſpect to Philip, king of Spain, required the utmoſt circumſpection; and the arbitrary proceedings of that prince in the Netherlands, made her deſirous of ſtrengthening herſelf by every political meaſure in her power.

But if France groaned under the laſhes of perſecution or ſuperſtitious tyranny, the Low Countries felt more ſeverely that dreadful ſcourge. Philip was determined to rule thoſe commercial provinces with the iron hand of deſpotic power; and he employed a man well qualified to execute his ſanguinary purpoſes. Ferdinand of Toledo, the man ſelected to accompliſh his tyrannical deſign, had been educated in a camp; and having obtained a conſummate knowledge of the military art, his habits led him to transfer into all governments the ſevere maxims of military diſcipline and martial law. About three years before, he had conducted into the Low Countries from Italy, a powerful body of veteran Spaniſh forces. The Flemings, who were no ſtrangers to his ferocious character, and the inveterate hatred he entertained againſt them, were ſtruck with conſternation. Nor were their terrors ill founded. The military executions of that mercileſs nobleman, will hand down his name with infamy to the lateſt poſterity. All the privileges of that people were aboliſhed by edict. The counts of Egmont and Horne, notwithſtanding all their paſt ſervices, were brought to the ſcaffold. Multitudes of all ranks were thrown into priſon, and thence delivered over to the executioner. He proceeded unoppoſed in his career of cruelty, and nothing was heard of but confiſcation, impriſonment, exile, tortures, and death. Numbers of the Flemings, driven to deſpair, took refuge in England, where they eſtabliſhed, under the queen's protection, thoſe uſeful manufactories for which they had been long famous. It was impoſſible for the deſpotiſm of Alva to be of long continuance, without obſerving ſome popular commotion. Elizabeth declared, ſhe could not behold the deſtruction of an induſtrious body of people, without affording them aſſiſtance. She accordingly ſeized a large ſum of money, which ſome Genoeſe merchants were upon tranſmitting to Alva, for the payment of his forces. This induced him to have recourſe to the moſt oppreſſive meaſures, which ſtill farther incenſed the Flemings againſt their Spaniſh tyrants. Exaſperated in the higheſt degree, Alva laid a plan for raiſing diſturbances in England. He opened a ſecret correſpondence with the queen of Scots, by means of Rodolphi, a Florentine merchant, who had reſided many years in London, and managed all the intrigues between the catholics and the court of Rome. It was agreed, that a powerful army of Spaniſh troops ſhould be landed in England, and at the ſame time an inſurrection ſhould be excited in the heart of the kingdom. But Alva being perſuaded that the attempt could not poſſibly ſucceed, unleſs ſome Engliſh nobleman of authority could be found to head the inſurgents; and no perſon appeared ſo proper for this purpoſe as the duke of Norfolk. Mary, who now deſpaired of ever recovering her crown, or even her liberty, readily embraced the offer: while Norfolk, unable to recover the favour of Elizabeth, engaged in this new conſpiracy. The promiſe of marriage was renewed between them; yet ſtill he flattered himſelf there was nothing criminal in his conduct, as his ſole view was that of obtaining the queen's conſent to marry the captive princeſs. In conſequence of the duke's acquieſcence, three letters were wrote in his name by Rodolphi, one to Alva, another to the pope, and a third to the king of Spain; but Norfolk, though very deſirous of delivering Mary from confinement, refuſed to ſign them. He could only be prevailed upon to ſend Baker, one of his confidants, to the Spaniſh ambaſſador, to vouch for their being authentic. The ſcheme was embraced with great cordiality by Alva and the pope, and every thing ſeemed to wear a very promiſing appearance. The vigilance of Cecil, who had now the title of lord Burleigh, was not ſufficient to diſcover the abettors of this conſpiracy; but a ſubſequent tranſaction, diligently traced, led to the knowledge of every circumſtance. Mary wanted to ſend a ſum of money to lord Herries, for the uſe of her party in Scotland; on which Norfolk engaged to have it delivered to Banniſter, one of his ſervants in the north, who was to find ſome method of conveying it to lord Herries. This money he entruſted to a ſervant who was not in the ſecret, telling him, that the bag contained a ſum of money in ſilver, which he was to deliver with a letter to Banniſter; but the ſervant imagining, from the weight and ſize of the bag that it was full of gold, carried the letter to Burleigh, who immediately ordered Banniſter, Barker, and Hickford, the duke's ſecretary, to be arreſted and ſtrictly examined; and on their being put to the torture, they confeſſed the whole truth. Hickford, though he had been ordered to burn all the papers relating to the conſpiracy, having concealed them under the mats of the duke's chamber, and the tiles of his houſe, theſe were diſcovered, and produced full evidence againſt his maſter. Norfolk, who had not received the leaſt intimation of the diſcoveries made by his ſervants, was brought before the privy council; and though perſuaded to atone for his guilt by an ingenuous confeſſion, he perſiſted in denying every thing laid to his charge.

A. D. 1572. The queen declared, that if he would give her this proof of his ſincere repentance, ſhe would pardon all his former paſt offences; but he ſtill continuing obſtinate, ſhe committed him to the Tower, in order to take his trial. The biſhop of Roſs, who before this diſcovery had been committed to cuſtody, refuſed to anſwer interrogatories; but being informed of the confeſſion made by the duke of Norfolk's ſervants, he made a full diſcovery. Thus that nobleman's guilt was confirmed; and he being tried by a jury of twenty-five peers, was unanimouſly found guilty. The queen, however, heſitated, with reſpect to the execution of Norfolk. She twice ſigned a warrant for that purpoſe, and as often revoked it; and though her miniſters and counſellors urged her to uſe rigour, ſhe ſtill appeared undetermined. At length, after heſitating four months, a parliament was aſſembled. The commons addreſſing her in ſtrong terms for the execution of Norfolk, ſhe conſented, and he was beheaded on Tower-hill, where he ſuffered with great calmneſs, ſincerely regretted by the people, by whom he was much beloved. His anceſtors had long been conſidered as the leaders of the catholics; and this hereditary attachment, united with alliances of blood, had procured him the friendſhip of the moſt conſiderable men of that party; but as he had been educated among the reformers, and maintained that ſtrict regularity of life by which the proteſtants were at that time diſtinguiſhed, he thereby enjoyed the real felicity of being popular, even among the moſt oppoſite parties. The height of his proſperity alone was the cauſe of his misfortunes, and engaged him in connections and attempts, from which his virtue and prudence ought to have for ever kept him at a diſtance. Mary was either the occaſion or cauſe of all theſe diſturbances; but being a ſovereign princeſs, who might think herſelf entitled to make uſe of every expedient to recover her liberty, Elizabeth did not yet chuſe to proceed to extremities againſt her. She however ſent lord Delawar, Sir Thomas Bromley, Sir Ralph Sadler, and Dr. Wilſon, to expoſtulate with her, and to demand ſatisfaction for the various parts of her paſt conduct. Mary endeavoured to juſtify herſelf from thoſe charges that were alledged, either by denying the facts, or laying the blame on others: but Elizabeth was far from being ſatisfied with her apology; and the parliament was ſo exaſperated againſt her, that the commons petitioned for her being immediately tried and executed. Elizabeth put a ſtop to their proceedings in relation to the queen of Scots, yet ſhe was alarmed at her reſtleſs ſpirit, and cloſe connection with Spain; on which account ſhe thought it neceſſary to confine her more ſtrictly, and to change her conduct with reſpect to Scotland, which ſtill remained in a ſtate of confuſion. Kirkaldy of Grange, who commanded in the caſtle of Edinburgh, having declared for Mary, the lords of her party, encouraged by his countenance, made themſelves maſters of the capital, and carried on a vigorous war againſt the regent, who was obliged to retire to Stirling. The inſurgents followed, and made themſelves maſters of his perſon. Perceiving his friends were advancing with a conſiderable body of troops, they immediately put him to death. The earl of Mar was choſen regent in his room; but that nobleman found it impoſſible to govern ſo divided a country. At laſt, the courts of France and England ordered their miniſters to negociate a ceſſation of arms, which they effected. But this tranquillity was of no long duration; Mar ſoon after died of grief, and the earl of Morton was elected to the regency. This nobleman had always been directed in his meaſures by Elizabeth; and it was now determined to ſupport effectually her party, at the head of which he was placed. Sir Henry Killigrew was accordingly ſent ambaſſador into Scotland, where he found the partizans of Mary ſo diſcouraged by the diſcovery of Norfolk's conſpiracy, that they were glad to ſubmit to the royal authority, and accept an indemnity for all paſt offences. The garriſon of Edinburgh caſtle alone continued refractory. Elizabeth ordered Sir William Drury, governor of Berwick, to march to Edinburgh, and lay ſiege to the caſtle. The garriſon ſoon ſurrendered at diſcretion; and Kirkaldy being delivered into the hands of his countrymen, was tried, condemned, and executed. Scotland now ſubmitted to the regency; and for a long time gave no farther inquietude to the queen of England.

But France at this time became the theatre of cruelty hardly to be equalled. The queen of Navarre, and all the reformed, began to place an unreſerved confidence in the treacherous profeſſions of the French court. Elizabeth herſelf, notwithſtanding her great penetration, did not entertain the leaſt diſtruſt of Charles's ſincerity; eſpecially as Walſingham, her ambaſſador, ſent her the moſt ſatisfactory accounts, by every courier, of that perfidious king's honour and ſincerity. Charles, the more effectually to deceive the proteſtants, offered his ſiſter in marriage to Henry, prince of Navarre; and great preparations were made for celebrating the nuptials with uncommon ſplendor. Deluded by theſe vile arts, Coligni, with all the principal leaders of the Hugonots, flocked to Paris, to aſſiſt at a ceremony, which, it was hoped, would finally put a period to thoſe civil wars that had ſo long waſted their country. The queen of Navarre died ſuddenly ſoon after her arrival, not without the moſt violent ſuſpicion of poiſon; and the admiral was dangerouſly wounded by a baſe aſſaſſin, as he was returning to his lodgings; yet Charles was ſtill able, by redoubling his diſſimulation, to retain the proteſtants in their fatal ſecurity. The eve of St. Bartholomew was appointed for putting in execution the infernal plan. The duke of Guiſe, chief projector, communicated the king's intention to the intendant of Paris, who ordered the captains of the different wards to arm the citizens privately, and when the ſignal was given to place lights in their windows, then to break into the houſes of the Hugonots, and put them all to the ſword without diſtinction. The cruel orders were punctually obeyed. About midnight, when the whole city was wrapt in darkneſs, and the unſuſpecting victims folded in the arms of ſleep, the fatal alarm was given, and the catholics began the horrid butchery. The hatred they had long bore to the proteſtant heretics, ſteeled their breaſts againſt the feelings of humanity; ſo that all conditions, ages, and ſexes, ſuſpected of only propenſity to the reformed religion, were involved in one undiſtinguiſhed ruin. The ſtreets of Paris flowed with blood; and the catholics, after the deteſted carnage ceaſed, exerciſed on the dead bodies of the proteſtants all the rage of licentious brutality. They ſeemed to regret that death, by putting an end to their work, leſt their thirſt for blood unſatiated. Above five hundred gentlemen of rank and fortune periſhed in this maſſacre; and near ten thouſand of inferior condition. Among the former were, admiral Coligni, his ſon-in-law Teligni, Rochefoucaut, Sobize, Lavardin, Piles, and Pardillon, who, during the late wars, had diſtinguiſhed themſelves by the moſt heroic actions. Orders were inſtantly diſpatched to all the provinces for a like ſanguinary ſacrifice. The people in the country emulated the ſavage fury that had raged in the capital; and the proteſtants in Meaux, Orleans, Trope, Bourges, Angers, Thoulouſe, Rouen, Lyons, and many other cities, were butchered in the ſame inhuman manner. Even the young king of Navarre, and his couſin the prince of Condé, were devoted to deſtruction by the duke of Guiſe; but Charles, pleaſed with the king of Navarre's amiable manners, and hoping that theſe young princes would be eaſily converted to the catholic faith, ſpared their lives, though he obliged them to purchaſe their ſafety by ſeeming to change their religion. To give a colour to this barbarous perfidy, Charles pretended that a conſpiracy of the Hugonots againſt his perſon was ſuddenly diſcovered, which obliged him, in his own defence, to proceed to this extremity againſt them. Fenelon, the French ambaſſador at London, abhorred the treachery of his court, and did not heſitate to expreſs his grief. He bluſhed, he ſaid, to bear the name of a Frenchman. Being, however, ordered to juſtify the infamous conduct of his maſter, he demanded an audience of Elizabeth. The ſolemnity of his reception was moſt awful and affecting. The whole court appeared plunged in the abyſs of ſorrow. On every face ſat drooping melancholy. Indignation glowed in turn in every countenance, and declared, in the ſtrongeſt language, the ſentiments of the Engliſh nation. An awful ſilence reigned through all the chambers of the royal apartment. The nobility, clad in deep mourning, were ranged on each ſide, who allowed him to paſs without giving him one ſalute or favourable look. When he came into the preſence, the queen heard his apology with great coolneſs, and calmly replied, that ſuppoſing there had been a conſpiracy, it would not remove the blame of the king's counſellors, or juſtify the ſtrange irregularity of their proceedings; that the ſame force which, without reſiſtance, had maſſacred ſo many defenceleſs men, might eaſily have ſecured their perſons, and have reſerved them for a trial, which would have diſtinguiſhed the innocent from the guilty; that it was more worthy of a ſovereign to reſerve the ſword of juſtice in his own hands, than commit it to bloody murderers, who being the declared and mortal enemies of the perſons accuſed, employed it without mercy, and without diſtinction; that, for her part, ſhe ſhould judge of his intentions by his future conduct, and, in the mean time, ſhould act as the ambaſſador deſired, and rather pity than blame his maſter, for the cruel extremities to which he had been carried. Elizabeth was now fully ſenſible of her own dangerous ſituation. She ſaw, in the maſſacre of Paris, the reſult of that general conſpiracy formed for the deſtruction of the proteſtants; and knew that ſhe herſelf, as the head and protectreſs of their religion, was expoſed to the utmoſt reſentment and fury of the papiſts. The violence and cruelty of the Spaniards in the Netherlands, appeared to be another branch of the ſame conſpiracy; and as Charles and Philip, who were nearly allied in bigotry, perfidy, and barbarity, now laid aſide their pretended quarrels, profeſſing the moſt cordial friendſhip for each other, ſhe had reaſon to dread the effects of their united councils. She therefore prepared for the attack with which ſhe ſeemed to be threatened, from the combination of her enemies. She fortified Portſmouth; fitted out her fleet; exerciſed her militia; ſtrove to increaſe her popularity with her ſubjects; and renewed her alliance with the German princes, who were equally alarmed at ſuch treacherous and bloody proceedings. By theſe prudent meaſures ſhe gained the love and eſteem of her ſubjects, who were willing to ſacrifice their lives and fortunes in her defence. But the great power of Philip rendered her exceeding cautious in all her actions. That monarch ſent an ambaſſador to London, with remonſtrances againſt the conduct of Elizabeth. He complained that many of the Flemiſh exiles, who infeſted the ſeas, and committed acts of piracy, were protected in England, contrary to the treaties ſubſiſting between the two courts. Unwilling to engage in an open rupture with Spain, Elizabeth publiſhed a proclamation, commanding all the Flemings ſuſpected of rebellion to depart the kingdom. But this was far from anſwering the views of the Spaniards. Driven to deſpair, thoſe wretched exiles undertook the moſt dangerous expeditions. William Vandermark, a perſon of diſtinction in the Netherlands, having collected a conſiderable number of his countrymen, left England in the beginning of April, and made himſelf maſter of the Brill and Fluſhing. This ſucceſs raiſed the ſpirits of the Flemings; they flocked to his ſtandard; and, before the end of the year, he was joined by the greater part of the provinces of Holland and Zealand. William of Naſſau, prince of Orange, put himſelf at the head of the confederates, who formed, in proceſs of time, the moſt powerful republic in Europe.

A. D. 1573.

Though Elizabeth took care to preſerve peace with Charles, her greateſt ſecurity was founded on the reſiſtance of his proteſtant ſubjects. Thoſe who lived near the frontiers, on receiving the firſt news of the maſſacre of Paris, fled into England, Germany, and Swiſſerland; where, exciting the compaſſion of the proteſtants, they prepared to return into France with encreaſed forces and redoubled zeal, to revenge the treacherous ſlaughter of their brethren. Thoſe who reſided in the middle of the kingdom, fled to the neareſt garriſons in the poſſeſſion of proteſtants; and having found that no faith could be depended on in capitulations, reſolved to defend themſelves to the laſt extremity. Thus the people whom Charles expected to exterminate at one blow, had ſoon an army of eighteen thouſand men, and were in poſſeſſion of above a hundred places of ſtrength in different parts of the kingdom; when, at the ſame time, that prince was threatened with being invaded by all the other proteſtant powers in Europe. To ſuch a pitch of reſentment were the nobility and gentry of England raiſed, that they offered to levy an army of twenty thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe, to tranſport them into France, and to maintain them ſix months at their own expence; but Elizabeth, from political reaſons, refuſed her conſent. The German princes, however, forwarded the levies raiſed by the proteſtants; and the young prince of Condè eſcaping from court, and placing himſelf at the head of theſe troops, prepared to invade France. The catholics had for ſome time cloſely beſieged Rochelle: the Hugonots made a moſt deſperate reſiſtance; and the duke of Anjou, who commanded the catholic army, loſt twenty-four thouſand men, without having made any conſiderable progreſs in the ſiege. Anjou now perceived he had undertaken a taſk he was unable to perform; and advice arriving of his having been elected king of Poland, he readily concluded a treaty with the inhabitants of Rochelle, in which their allies of Niſmes and Montaubon were comprehended.

A. D. 1574.

Charles, exaſperated at this miſcarriage, had formed a plan of new ſeverities; but, before he could carry it into execution, he was ſummoned to give an account of his inhuman actions, and died on the thirtieth of May, in the twenty-fifth year of his age, after having rendered his name odious, and thrown an eternal infamy upon his country. He was ſucceeded in the throne by his brother Henry, duke of Anjou, who had lately been elected king of Poland.

At this period, the affairs of Ireland gave Elizabeth great uneaſineſs. She ſaw no end of ſupporting an army among a ferocious and bigotted people. The earl of Eſſex, an active young nobleman, offered a propoſal to the queen, for putting an end to the troubles in that iſland. Elizabeth accepted the offer; and it was agreed, that the earl ſhould tranſport to Ireland two hundred horſe, and four hundred foot, and maintain them there at his own expence; that theſe forces ſhould act againſt the rebels for two years, the queen furniſhing the ſame number during that period; and that the earl ſhould receive the commiſſion of captain-general for ſeven years. In conſideration of this ſervice, the queen agreed to inveſt him with half the lordſhips of Clandeboy, Ferney, and other lands of a great extent, which he agreed to people with as many ſoldiers as the queen ſhould think proper to maintain on the other half of theſe lordſhips. The expence of maintaining the fortifications was to be equally divided between the queen and the earl. Eſſex was ſo well pleaſed with this poſt of honour, which placed him on the footing of a prince, that he borrowed ten thouſand pounds of Elizabeth, upon a mortgage of his lands in Eſſex, and landed in Ireland about the latter end of Auguſt, accompanied by the lords Dacres and Rich, and many other perſons of diſtinction, who ſerved under him as volunteers. He met with every difficulty that could be expected from an enterprize of this kind; and the earl ſoon found, that the reduction of the rebels, while aſſiſted ſecretly by the Engliſh, was a taſk beyond his power. After having exerted his abilities in vain, he was obliged to return to England, and had ſpent the greater part of his fortune in this fruitleſs expedition.

A. D. 1575.

When Elizabeth heard of the return of Henry III. from France, ſhe ſent an ambaſſador to compliment him on his acceſſion to the throne, and to create him a knight of the garter. The people ſtill continued divided into two religious parties; and as all faith had been violated, and every degree of moderation baniſhed, it ſeemed impoſſible to unite them. Henry had laid a ſcheme for reſtoring his own authority, by acting as umpire between them, and reducing both to a dependance on himſelf. He poſſeſſed all the diſſimulation of his predeceſſor; but being deficient in underſtanding and vigour, inſtead of acquiring a ſuperiority over both parties, he loſt their confidence, and taught each of them to adhere ſtill more cloſely to their particular leaders. When he renewed hoſtilities againſt the Hugonots, he found them more formidable than ever; and was at length obliged to grant them a truce for ſix months, under the mediation of Elizabeth. This was the fifth pacification concluded with the reformed; yet it was no more ſincere on the part of the court than any of the former; yet it diſguſted the catholics, particularly the duke of Guiſe, who from thence took occaſion to reduce his party into a more regular body, by laying the foundation of the famous League, which, without regard to the royal authority, was levelled at the entire ſuppreſſion of the proteſtants, or thoſe who were ſtigmatized with the name of Hugonots.

A. D. 1576. The confederacy of Holland and Zealand was ſtill ſupported by the prince of Orange, againſt all the attempts of Lewis Zuniga, who ſucceeded the duke of Alva in the government of the Netherlands. But finding it would be impoſſible to continue the oppoſition much longer without ſome foreign aſſiſtance, he ſent a deputation to Elizabeth, imploring her protection, and offering to acknowledge her for their ſovereign, if ſhe would engage in their defence. Though many powerful reaſons might have induced Elizabeth to accept of this offer, yet foreſeeing that an open rupture with Spain would be the conſequence of her accepting the dominion of theſe provinces, and that after taking the Hollanders under her protection, ſhe could never, in honour, abandon them, poſitively refuſed the proffered ſovereignty; but told their ambaſſadors, that, in return for the good-will ſhewn her by the prince of Orange and the States, ſhe would uſe all her influence with Philip in their favour. Accordingly, an ambaſſador was diſpatched to the court of Spain; but Philip found means to evade a categorical anſwer, and the war continued to rage with as much violence as ever. An accident, however, delivered the Hollanders, when driven to the brink of deſtruction. Zuniga dying ſuddenly, the Spaniſh troops became diſcontented for want of pay, and licentious for want of a proper commander, which occaſioned their breaking out into a moſt dreadful mutiny. They ſacked and plundered the city of Antwerp and Maeſtricht, and maſſacred near ſeventeen thouſand perſons, of all ages and ſexes; nor was there any poſſibility of preventing their dreadful outrages. They menaced all the cities of the Low Countries with the ſame fate. Alarmed at the deſtruction that awaited them, all the provinces, that of Luxembourg excepted, engaged in an aſſociation for their mutual defence; and diſpatched a deputation to the prince of Orange, imploring his protection, and requeſting that he would put himſelf at their head. Conferences were immediately opened at Ghent; and an union was formed between the provinces, called the pacification of Ghent. By this treaty, which was ſigned on the eighth of November, the contracting parties declared, that they had entered into this union for the defence of the laws and liberties of their country, againſt the encroachments, oppreſſions, and cruelties, long exerciſed on them by the Spaniards. At the ſame time, they declared their willingneſs to acknowledge the king of Spain's authority, provided he would govern them by their ancient laws.

The rebellion in Ireland ſtill continuing, the earl of Eſſex was ſent back to that kingdom, with the title of earl-marſhal, in the room of Sir Nicholas Bagnal. But he ſoon perceived, that notwithſtanding his new dignity, he was little more than a private officer. He however exerted his authority to reduce that turbulent people to order, but without effect; and in a few months after his arrival he died, not without ſuſpicion of having been poiſoned. This fell upon the earl of Leiceſter, who immediately divorced his own wife, and married the widow of the earl of Eſſex.

A. D. 1577. Don John of Auſtria, Philip's natural brother, was appointed governor of the Netherlands. Animated with the ſucceſs which had attended him in his youth, he had formed a plan for marrying the queen of Scots, and acquiring in her right the dominion both of England and Scotland. Elizabeth, who knew his intentions, and had obſerved, from the union of the provinces, that they would make a vigorous defence againſt Spain, had now no longer any ſcruple to engage in the protection of their liberties, which appeared to be cloſely connected with her own ſafety. After ſending them about twenty thouſand pounds, to pay their troops, ſhe concluded a treaty with them, in which ſhe agreed to ſupply them with a thouſand horſe, and five thouſand foot, to be paid by the Flemings; and to lend them one hundred thouſand pounds, upon the bonds of ſome of the moſt conſiderable towns of the Netherlands, to be repaid within the year. It was alſo ſtipulated, that the commander in chief of the Engliſh forces ſhould be admitted into the council of the States; that they ſhould enter into no league without her conſent; that ſhe ſhould be arbitratrix in any difference that might ariſe among them; and that if any prince ſhould attempt hoſtilities againſt her, they ſhould ſend an army to her aid, equal to that ſhe employed in their defence. One of Elizabeth's inducements for entering into this treaty with the States, was to prevent their throwing themſelves into the arms of France; and her ambaſſador was ordered to repreſent this to the king of Spain, as her ſole motive. Philip, however, ſtill continued to ſupply Don John with money and troops, who, notwithſtanding being once repulſed at Rimenant by the Engliſh, and oppoſed both by the army of the States, and by prince Caſimer, who had conducted to the Netherlands a large body of Germans, obtained a conſiderable advantage over the Flemings at Gemblours; but, in the midſt of his proſperity, he was cut off by poiſon, adminiſtered to him ſecretly, as was ſuſpected, by orders from Philip, who dreaded the effects of his ambition. He was ſucceeded in command by the prince of Parma, diſtinguiſhed both by his valour and clemency, who now carried on the war againſt the Flemings.

England, while almoſt all the reſt of Europe was agitated with internal commotions, enjoyed a ſettled tranquillity; chiefly owing to the prudence and vigour of the queen's adminiſtration. Religion was the capital point upon which the political tranſactions of that age depended; and the queen's conduct in that particular had been hitherto much leſs ſevere than that of her predeceſſors. She appeared, indeed, very anxious to keep a ſtrict hand over the puritans; for when any of the eſtabliſhed clergy diſcovered a tendency to their principles, by omitting the habits or ceremonies appointed by law, ſhe ſhewed a determined reſolution to puniſh them, by fines and deprivation; though her orders were frequently eluded, by the protection they received from ſome of the moſt conſiderable of her miniſters. Yet ſhe rigidly maintained her title of governeſs of the church, and would never permit either the parliament or convocation to attempt, without her leave, the leaſt alteration in the eſtabliſhed religion.

A. D. 1579. This princeſs was remarkably diſtinguiſhed by her frugality, which greatly contributed to endear her to the nation. Indeed it was ſometimes carried to an extreme, yet it did not lead her to amaſs treaſures, but was only uſed to prevent her laying burdens on her people. Her ſtrict œconomy enabled her to pay all the debts ſhe found due from the crown, with their full intereſt. By this means ſhe eſtabliſhed her credit on ſuch a foundation, that no prince in Europe could ſo readily command any ſum which the public exigences might require. Hence few materials are offered to hiſtory, during her peaceable and uniform government, except the ſmall part ſhe took in foreign tranſactions, and thoſe of Scotland. This kingdom had hitherto been retained in ſtrict alliance with Elizabeth, by the influence of Morton the regent, who had alſo reſtored its domeſtic tranquillity. But it could not be expected, among a people agitated with religious diſputes, that his authority would be long ſupported. Factions were formed among the nobility, who were diſguſted with Morton's avarice; while the clergy, whoſe narrow revenues were ſtill farther invaded, joined the diſcontented party, and increaſed the confuſion. Oppreſſed with the ponderous weight of government, the regent dropt ſome peeviſh expreſſions, implying a deſire of being relieved from the care of conducting the adminiſtration. This conceſſion, whether real or pretended, was readily laid hold of by the oppoſite party, and he was diſmiſſed from the regency.

A. D. 1580. Morton reſigned his authority into the hands of the young king, then only eleven years of age. The regent ſeemed at firſt determined never more to engage in the buſy ſcenes of active life, but ſeek in domeſtic concerns that peace which was not to be found amidſt the contentions of turbulent parties. But either his ambition would not ſuffer him to continue in the ſhades of obſcurity, or he could not find in retirement that tranquillity he expected, for he returned to court, acquired an aſcendency in the council, and directed, as before, public affairs, but without reſuming the title of regent. The diſcontented faction ſaw their danger, and flew to arms, under pretence of reſcuing their prince from captivity. Elizabeth interpoſed by her ambaſſador, and produced a ſeeming reconciliation between the factions; but though Morton kept his ſtation at the helm of government, his vigilant enemies were numerous, and his ſituation daily more precarious. Meanwhile the count d'Aubigny, of the houſe of Lenox, who had been born and educated in France, appearing to the duke of Guiſe as a proper perſon for detaching James from the Engliſh intereſt, and connecting him with his mother, ſent him to Stirling, the reſidence of young James, and he ſoon ingratiated himſelf into the young monarch's affections. Elizabeth, being much alarmed, ſent her ambaſſador to accuſe d'Aubigny, who was now created earl of Lenox, of being attached to the French, and to warn James againſt entertaining ſuch dangerous connections. Lenox, now finding that the queen had openly declared againſt him, reſolved to ruin Morton, who was at the head of the Engliſh intereſt. That nobleman was therefore arreſted in council, accuſed of being an accomplice in the murder of the late king, and being brought to his trial, was condemned for treaſon. The queen ſent Sir Thomas Randolph to intercede in Morton's behalf; and, by his perſuaſions, the earls of Montroſe, Argyle, Glencarne, Mar, and Angus, were engaged to enter into a confederacy for preſerving the life of the priſoner by force of arms. At the ſame time an Engliſh army moved towards the frontiers of Scotland. The French party ſaw the danger of delaying the execution of the ſentence, and Morton was beheaded at Edinburgh; who died with that conſtancy and reſolution, by which he had been diſtinguiſhed throughout his whole life. This revolution in Scotland rendered Elizabeth extremely uneaſy. She knew that her inveterate enemy, the duke of Guiſe, would take every opportunity of ſupporting the prevailing party; and that the popiſh faction in England would readily join in an attempt to diſturb the government. She was alſo fearful leſt Philip, who ſeemed deſirous of ſupporting the cauſe of Mary, might embrace the opportunity of aſſiſting the king's party in Scotland, in revenge for the reinforcements ſhe had ſent into the Low Countries.

During theſe tranſactions, Sir Francis Drake returned from his voyage round the world. This intrepid ſeaman was a native of Devonſhire; and introduced to court by the vice-chamberlain Hatton. Drake having propoſed to paſs into the South Seas through the Streights of Magellan, a voyage till that time unattempted by the Engliſh; his fleet conſiſted only of the five following ſhips, if they may be ſo called: the Pelican, of an hundred tons, commanded by himſelf; the Elizabeth, of eighty tons, under captain John Winter; the Marygold, a bark of thirty tons, under the command of captain John Thomas; the Swan, a fly-boat of thirty tons, under captain John Cheſter; and the Chriſtopher, a pinnace of fifteen tons, under the command of captain Thomas Moon. On board this ſmall fleet were embarked one hundred and ſixty-four men; and the gallant admiral ſailed on an expedition, which with ſuch ſmall ſhips would, even in our times, be conſidered as a very raſh undertaking. He entered the Pacific Ocean with only his own ſhip, and took a prodigious booty from the Spaniards, who expected no enemy in that diſtant part of the world. He alſo ſacked and plundered the town of Arica, and in one ſhip took four hundred pounds weight of Baldivian gold. But having learned that the viceroy of Peru had fitted out two large ſhips, in order to intercept him in his return, he determined, being not in a condition to fight them, to attempt a new paſſage. He firſt endeavoured to find one by the north of California; but failing in that enterprize, he ſailed for the Eaſt Indies, and returned ſafely by the cape of Good Hope. The council, apprehending that Drake's enterprize would occaſion a rupture with Spain, moved, that the queen ſhould puniſh him, and reſtore the treaſure. But Elizabeth rejected the propoſal; and, in order to teſtify her approbation, ſhe accepted a banquet from Drake on board his ſhip, and conferred on that brave commander the honour of knighthood. The Spaniſh ambaſſador failed not to make complaints againſt, what he termed, the piracies of Drake; but he was told by Elizabeth, that no treaty with his catholic majeſty excluded her ſubjects from trading to the South Seas; and that the inſignificant ceremony practiced by the Spaniards in taking poſſeſſion of ſuch immenſe tracts of land in America, ſhould never preclude her from ſending colonies thither, nor would ſhe ever ſubmit to ſuffer the ocean to be claimed as the property of any perſon, or even prince whatever. The queen, however, ordered part of the treaſure to be reſtored to Pedro Sebrura, a Spaniard, who pretended to be an agent from the merchants whoſe effects Drake had ſeized; but underſtanding afterwards that Philip had ſequeſtered the money, ſhe refuſed to make any farther reſtitution.

A. D. 1581. A parliament being aſſembled, they granted a ſupply of one ſubſidy and two fifteenths, and enacted ſeveral laws for the ſecurity of the government, levelled chiefly againſt the catholics, who had occaſioned many diſturbances. Whoever reconciled any one to the church of Rome, was declared guilty of treaſon: ſaying maſs ſubjected the prieſt to a year's impriſonment, and a fine of one hundred marks: every one who continued, during a month, abſent from the church, was to pay a fine of twenty pounds: the uttering of ſlanderous or ſeditious words, was, for the firſt offence, puniſhed with the pillory and loſs of ears; the ſecond offence was declared felony: the writing or printing ſuch words was made felony, even on the firſt offence. Theſe ſevere laws were owing to ſeminaries founded at Douay, Rheims and Rome, under the direction of the jeſuits; to which places the catholics ſent their children to be educated, where they were taught an extreme hatred to the queen; and propoſed to effect their purpoſes againſt her by ſedition, rebellion, and ſometimes aſſaſſination.

A treaty of marriage between Alençon, duke of Anjou, and Elizabeth, had been for ſome time negociating, and the queen, though he was near twenty years younger than herſelf, became pleaſed with the proofs of love and tenderneſs, evident in his addreſſes. In order to forward his ſuit, the duke ſent over Simier, an artful man, of an agreeable diſpoſition and converſation, who, inſtead of entering into ſerious political reaſonings, amuſed her with ſubjects of gallantry, and the tender attachment of his maſter. Elizabeth liſtened to his diſcourſe, and Simier ſoon inſinuated himſelf ſo firmly into the queen's favour, that he obtained a more ready acceſs to her perſon, than even the moſt favoured miniſters of ſtate. The earl of Leiceſter, who had laughed at every preceding treaty of marriage, now feared, that the queen was at laſt caught in her own ſnare, and that the artful encouragement ſhe had given to her young ſuitor, had, unawares, engaged her affections. He therefore took advantage of the credulity of the times; and to render Simier odious, ſpread a report, that he had gained an aſcendant over the queen by incantations and love potions. In revenge, Simier ſtrove to diſcredit Leiceſter, by revealing to the queen a ſecret, which none of her courtiers dared to diſcover; that he had ſecretly, without her conſent, married the widow of the earl of Eſſex. The queen imagining that this muſt proceed from want of reſpect to her, threatened to ſend Leiceſter to the Tower, and to prevent the effects of his reſentment, took the Frenchman under her protection. Encouraged by the accounts he received from his agent, the duke of Anjou determined to ſolicit his ſuit in perſon. He accordingly landed at Dover, and ſecretly viſited the queen at Greenwich. The duke had no reaſon to be diſpleaſed with his viſit; for ſoon after his departure, ſhe commanded Burleigh, lord treaſurer, Suſſex, Leiceſter, Bedford, Lincoln, Hatton, and Walſingham, her ſecretary, to concert with the French ambaſſadors the terms of the intended contract of marriage. On this occaſion, Henry had ſent over a ſplendid embaſſy; and as the queen had the power of preſcribing what terms ſhe pleaſed, the articles were ſoon ſettled. It was agreed, that the marriage ſhould be celebrated within ſix weeks after the ratification of the articles; that the duke and his retinue ſhould enjoy the free exerciſe of their religion; that after the marriage was ſolemnized, the duke of Anjou ſhould have the title of king, but that the management of national affairs ſhould continue ſolely with Elizabeth; that their children, male or female, ſhould ſucceed to the crown of England; that if there ſhould be two males, the eldeſt, in caſe of Henry's death, ſhould be king of France, and the younger of England; that if there ſhould be one male only, who might ſucceed to the crowns of England and France, he ſhould be obliged to reſide eight months every two years in the former kingdom; that the laws and cuſtoms of England ſhould be obſerved inviolate; and that no foreigner ſhould be promoted by the duke to any offices of ſtate. Theſe articles would have opened a gloomy proſpect to the Engliſh, had not the age of the queen, who was now in her forty-ninth year, contributed to allay their apprehenſions. She had proceeded farther in this affair than ſhe at firſt intended, and was not yet determined to bring matters to a final concluſion. She now ſent Walſingham as ambaſſador to France, with orders to negociate, on the conditions of a mutual alliance between England and France. He purſued his inſtructions with the utmoſt aſſiduity; but had the mortification to perceive that the reſolutions of the queen were fluctuating and unſettled. Sometimes he received orders to purſue the negociation, for completing the marriage preferable to that of the league; and at others ſhe declared for the league in preference to the marriage. The miniſter was aſtoniſhed at this inconſiſtent conduct of the queen, and the whole privy council were doubtful what would be the reſult of this conteſt between inclination and reaſon, love and ambition. The French king had allowed the duke of Anjou to embrace the protection of the States of the Netherlands; and had ſecretly ſupplied him with men and money for that purpoſe: the duke alſo expected ſome money from Elizabeth, to enable him to open the campaign in Flanders. The queen, though her frugality made her long reluctant, after much heſitation, ſent him a preſent of a hundred thouſand crowns, which enabled him to take the field againſt the prince of Parma, and to raiſe the ſiege of Cambray: after which, the States chuſing him governor of the Netherlands, he put his army into winter quarters, and came to England, in order to proſecute his ſuit to the queen. His reception gave him hopes, that ſhe had now ſurmounted all her ſcruples, and was at laſt determined to make choice of him for her huſband. During the pomp attending the anniverſary of her coronation, ſhe had a long and intimate diſcourſe with him, and was afterwards ſeen to take a ring from her finger and put it upon his. All the ſpectators immediately oncluded, that ſhe had given him a promiſe of marriage, and was willing to make it public. The ambaſſador from the States inſtantly diſpatched a letter to them, to let them know this great event; and the inhabitants of Antwerp, who, with the other Flemings, conſidered the queen as a tutelar deity, expreſſed their ſatisfaction by public rejoicings. About this time, Stubbs, a gentleman of Lincoln's Inn, publiſhed a book, which he entitled, "The Gulph wherein England will be ſwallowed by the French Marriage;" for which, being apprehended and proſecuted by the queen's order, he was ſentenced, for his libel, to loſe his right hand. This cruel ſentence was executed on a ſcaffold at Weſtminſter, when ſuch was his conſtancy and loyalty, that he had no ſooner been deprived of one hand, than he took his hat off with the other, and, waving it over his head, cried, God ſave the queen.

A. D. 1582.

Notwithſtanding Elizabeth thus openly diſcovered her attachment to the duke of Anjou, her ambition and prudence filled her mind with anxious doubts. Moſt of her courtiers diſcovered an extreme averſion to the marriage; and the ladies of her bed-chamber did not ſcruple to oppoſe her inclination with warm remonſtrances. Amongſt others againſt the match was Sir Philip Sidney, one of the moſt accompliſhed young gentlemen of the age, who wrote her a letter, in which he diſſuaded her from her preſent purpoſe, with great force of reaſoning. He obſerved, that the ſecurity of her government entirely depended on the affections of her proteſtant ſubjects, whom ſhe could not more effectually diſguſt, than by marrying a prince who was brother to the cruel and perfidious Charles; that her mortal enemies, the catholics, believing that ſhe had uſurped the crown, and was legally depoſed by the pope's bull of excommunication, wanted only a head to conduct their enterprizes; and ſhe herſelf was raſhly ſupplying them with one, by giving to a prince, who, by his education, was zealouſly attached to that communion, an intereſt in the kingdom: that France would ſupply him with partizans, dangerous to a people long unaccuſtomed to war: that as the duke was of a reſtleſs turbulent ſpirit, and had often violated his loyalty to his elder brother, the French king, there could be no room to hope, that he would paſſively ſubmit to a woman, whom he might, in quality of a huſband, think he had a right to command: that the plain and honourable path of cultivating tivating the affections of her people, had, hitherto, rendered her reign ſecure and happy; and that her own prudence, without any foreign aid, would enable her to baffle all the efforts of her moſt malignant enemies. Theſe, and other reflections, equally concluſive, filled the queen with great uneaſineſs, and ſhe paſſed ſeveral nights without ſleep. At length her prudence and ambition prevailing over her temporary inclination, ſhe ſent for the duke of Anjou, and had a long conference with him in private. On leaving her, he expreſſed the moſt violent diſguſt, threw away the ring ſhe had given him, and curſed the mutability of women. He ſoon after went over to his government in the Netherlands; when loſing the confidence of the States, by attacking their liberties, he was expelled that country, and retiring into France, there died.

The diſtracted ſtate of the French monarchy prevented the queen from feeling the effects of that reſentment ſhe had reaſon to dread; and her attention was now directed to the troubles of Scotland, which ſtill raged with irreſiſtible fury. The death of Morton, the influence of the earl of Lenox, and that of James Stuart, now earl of Arran, alarmed the reforming preachers. A faſt was appointed to be held all over the kingdom, when the pulpits reſounded with declamations againſt the king's counſellors and favourites. A conſpiracy was formed for ſeizing the perſon of James, who was then at Ruthven, a ſeat belonging to the earl of Gowry. The utmoſt ſecrecy was obſerved; and the council not having the leaſt intimation of their deſigns, the attempt ſucceeded without any oppoſition. The earls of Gowry and Mar, the lords Lindeſey and Boyd, the maſters Glamis and Oliphant, the abbots of Dumbfermline, Plaiſey, and Cambuſhenneth, were the principal leaders in this enterprize. James wept when he found himſelf deprived of his liberty. "No matter for his tears, (ſaid one of the conſpirators) better that boys ſhould weep than bearded men;" an expreſſion which James never forgave. He was, however, obliged to ſubmit, and acquieſcing in his preſent fate, not only acknowledged that the aſſociators had done him an acceptable ſervice, but agreed to ſummon a convention of the ſtates to ratify their proceedings. Though the eccleſiaſtical ſtate had no right to meddle with civil matters, yet on this occaſion they declared, that the late event was agreeable to all who feared God, and deſired to preſerve the proſperity of the realm. They even threatened thoſe who ſhould dare to oppoſe the authority of the confederated lords with the moſt ſevere church cenſures. The earl of Lenox, unwilling to excite a civil war, retired into France, where he ſoon after died. The earl of Arran was confined a priſoner to his own houſe; and Elizabeth ſent ambaſſadors to compliment the captive king upon his delivery from his late pernicious counſellors.

A. D. 1583. Ambaſſadors alſo arrived from France, to enquire into the king's ſituation, to make profeſſions of their maſter's friendſhip, and to procure an accommodation between James and his mother. This laſt propoſal gave great offence to the clergy, who inveighed againſt the ambaſſadors in their pulpits, and exerted their intereſt to render the deſign abortive. They were ſo violent in their declamations, that the ambaſſadors were publicly affronted in the ſtreets. James had no power to repreſs this inſolent behaviour; and the ambaſſadors, finding it impoſſible to carry on any negociation, quitted the kingdom.

The queen of Scots hearing of her ſon's detention, wrote a letter to Elizabeth, in a more pathetic ſtrain than uſual, in which ſhe aſked only the bleſſing of liberty, for which ſhe offered to ſacrifice her crown, and every other right ſhe poſſeſſed. Elizabeth was affected with Mary's ſituation, but from political motives reſolved to deny her requeſt; though the unhappy priſoner was even diſpoſed to live in England, in a private ſtation, with ſome little degree of reſtraint. In the mean time, James made his eſcape from his keepers, and flying to St. Andrews, ſummoned his friends and partizans to attend him. The confederated lords, perceiving that all oppoſition would be in vain, made no attempts to recover their authority: ſome of them accepted a pardon; and the reſt took ſhelter in Ireland and England. The earl of Arran was now recalled to court, whoſe profligate manners and violent conduct ſoon rendered him extremely unpopular. Though the earl of Gowry had been pardoned for his late attempt on the king, he was thrown into priſon, tried on ſome new accuſations, condemned and executed. Many innocent perſons ſuffered from the tyranny of this favourite.

A. D. 1584. At length the baniſhed noblemen, who were aſſiſted by Elizabeth, found the time favourable for the recovery of their eſtates and authority. They made the attempt, and were ſucceſsful. Arran was degraded from his authority, deprived of the eſtate and title he had uſurped, and the whole kingdom ſeemed to have obtained that tranquillity which had been ſo long ſought for in vain. Theſe revolutions would have been of little conſequence to Elizabeth, had her own ſubjects been perfectly united: but the zeal of the catholics daily threatened her with dangerous inſurrections. The vigilance of her miniſters, particularly of Burleigh and Walſingham, was raiſed in proportion to the activity of the malcontents; and many arts were employed in detecting conſpiracies. Henry Piercy, earl of Northumberland, brother to the earl who had been beheaded ſome years before, and Philip Howard, earl of Arundel, the ſon of the unfortunate duke of Norfolk, fell under their ſuſpicion; and the council ordered the latter to be confined to his own houſe: lord Paget, and Charles Arundel, who had been engaged in treaſonable deſigns with Francis Throgmorton, withdrew beyond ſea. Throgmorton, being taken into cuſtody, confeſſed, that a plan had been laid for an invaſion and inſurrection; for which he was found guilty and executed; and this conſpiracy having been promoted by Mendoza, the Spaniſh ambaſſador, he was ordered to depart the kingdom. As many of theſe conſpiracies were imputed to Mary's intrigues, and as her name was employed in all of them, the council concluded they could not uſe too many precautions againſt the reſtleſs activity of her temper. She was therefore removed from the earl of Shrewſbury's care; for though that nobleman was faithful and vigilant, he had ſhewn great indulgence to her, particularly with reſpect to air and exerciſe; and ſhe was committed to the cuſtody of Sir Drue Drury, and Sir Amias Paulet. The earl of Leiceſter, and other noblemen, now ſet on foot an aſſociation; and the queen being beloved by the whole nation, except the moſt bigotted catholics, people of all ranks flocked to ſign it. This aſſociation was to defend the queen, to revenge her death, or any injury committed againſt her perſon; and to exclude from the throne all claimants, in whoſe behalf any violence ſhould be offered to her majeſty. Mary was ſenſible theſe tranſactions were levelled againſt her, and, to remove all ſuſpicion from herſelf, deſired leave to add her name to the ſubſcription.

In order to diſcourage the malcontents, Elizabeth ſummoned a new parliament on the twenty-third of November, in which the aſſociation was confirmed, and a clauſe added, empowering the queen to name commiſſioners for the trial of any pretender to the crown, who ſhould attempt or imagine againſt her any invaſion, inſurrection, or aſſaſſination; nation; and the perſon found guilty was not only excluded from all claim to the ſucceſſion, but was liable to be puniſhed as her majeſty ſhould direct: and for the greater ſecurity, in caſe of the queen's violent death, a council of regency was appointed to govern the kingdom, and to revenge her murder. A ſevere law was alſo enacted againſt jeſuits and popiſh prieſts, ordering them to depart the kingdom within forty days, under the penalty of treaſon; and to harbour or relieve them was made felony. This parliament alſo preſented a petition to the houſe of lords for a reformation of religion; in which they deſired, that no biſhop might exerciſe the office of ordination, without the concurrence of ſix preſbyters; that no clergyman might be inducted into any benefice, without notice being previouſly given to the pariſh, that they might examine whether any objection lay to his life or doctrine: but the moſt material article touched upon in this petition was the eccleſiaſtical commiſſion, and the oath exacted by that court, called ex officio, which being a ſubject of great importance, as it ſhews the power of the churchmen, and their arbitrary proceedings againſt the diſſenters of that time, deſerves a particular explanation. Parker, the firſt primate after Elizabeth's acceſſion, rigorouſly exacted a conformity to the eſtabliſhed worſhip, by puniſhing all puritanical clergymen, who attempted any innovation in the habits, liturgy, or ceremonies of the church, by fines or deprivation. He dying in 1575, was ſucceeded by Grindall, who being a man of great moderation, could not be brought to execute the laws againſt non-conforming clergymen; and, for this offence, the queen, by an order of the ſtar-chamber, ſequeſtered him from his archiepiſcopal function, and confined him to his own houſe. He dying in 1583, the queen choſe Whitgiſt, a zealous churchman, who having in vain attempted to convince the puritans by arguments, was reſolved to enlighten their underſtandings (an abſolute impoſſibility) by the force of perſecution. He therefore informed the queen, that the ſpiritual authority lodged with the prelates was inſignificant, without the ſanction of the crown; and there being no eccleſiaſtical commiſſions in force, he prevailed upon her to iſſue one more arbitrary than any of the former. Influenced by his pernicious advice, ſhe appointed forty commiſſioners, twelve of whom were eccleſiaſtics, and three commiſſioners made a quorum. Theſe commiſſioners were empowered to viſit and reform all errors, hereſies, and ſchiſms; and to puniſh all breaches of uniformity in the exerciſe of public worſhip. Their proceedings were contrary to all principles of law and equity, being directed to make enquiries, not only by the legal methods of witneſſes and juries, but by every other means they could deviſe; that is, by torture, by inquiſition, or impriſonment. Where they found reaſon of ſuſpicion, they might adminiſter an oath called ex officio, by which the perſon was bound to anſwer all queſtions, and might be obliged to accuſe himſelf, or his moſt intimate friend. The fines they levied were merely diſcretionary, and frequently occaſioned the entire ruin of the ſuppoſed offender. The impriſonment to which they ſentenced any one was limited by no other rule but their own pleaſure. They aſſumed a power of impoſing on the clergy what new articles of ſubſcription they thought proper. Though every other ſpiritual court had, ſince the reformation, been ſubject to inhibitions from the ſupreme courts of law, theſe eccleſiaſtical inquiſitors were freed from that reſtraint, and liable to no controul. The more to enlarge their authority, they were empowered to puniſh all inceſts, adulteries, diſorders in marriage, fornication, and immorality, according to their wiſdom, conſcience, and diſcretion. In ſhort, this court was a real inquiſition, attended with all the ſeverities of that arbitrary tribunal; and being deſtructive of all laws, its erection was, by many, eſteemed a mere uſurpation of the queen, that had no other foundation than a clauſe of a ſtatute which reſtored the ſupremacy to the crown, and authoriſed the ſovereign to appoint commiſſioners for exerciſing that prerogative. The commons, in an humble petition to the upper houſe, had mentioned theſe grievances in the moſt ſubmiſſive terms. The queen, in a ſpeech from the throne, took notice of their preſumption, and obſerved, that ſhe would no longer endure this licence, but would guide her people by God's rule, in the juſt mean, between the corruptions of Rome and the errors of modern ſectaries; and that, as the Romaniſts were the inveterate enemies of her perſon, ſo the other innovating enthuſiaſts were dangerous to all monarchical government; who, under colour of preaching the word of God, preſumed to exerciſe a right of private judgment, in canvaſſing the ſcriptures, and cenſuring the actions of their ſovereign. But, notwithſtanding exertions of royal prerogative, and the deference paid to Elizabeth by lords and commons, the puritans were not to be intimidated. Perſuaded that their tenets were undeniably founded on ſcripture, and jealous of the liberty of conſcience in matters of faith, above five hundred eccleſiaſtics of that perſuaſion ſubſcribed a book of diſcipline conformable to their principles; and the force of laws was unable to prevent Preſbyterianiſm from taking root in the boſom of the church of England. During this ſeſſion of parliament, a horrid conſpiracy againſt the life of Elizabeth was brought to light. William Parry, a bigotted catholic, after having received the queen's pardon for a capital offence, retired into Italy, where he openly profeſſed his religion, which he concealed during his abode in England. Having contracted an intimacy with Palmio, a jeſuit, he too readily liſtened to the deteſtable doctrine of that order, and was perſuaded that he could not perform a more meritorious action, than that of taking away the life of his ſovereign and benefactreſs.' Campeggio, the pope's nuncio, whom Parry conſulted, removed all his doubts, and approved of his pious undertaking. Parry retired to Paris, whence he propoſed to paſs over into England, in order to execute his bloody deſign. Remorſe, however, ſtaggered his reſolution: it is not ſometimes even in the power of fanaticiſm to ſilence the remonſtrances of conſcience. His ſoul ſhuddered at the complicated horror of the action he was going to commit. This bigot now reſolved to try, before he proceeded to extremities, whether he could not alleviate the perſecution of the catholics. Having found means of being introduced to the queen, he told her that many conſpiracies were formed againſt her, and endeavoured to perſuade her, if ſhe had any regard for her life, to give greater indulgence to the Romans in the exerciſe of their religion. He even procured a ſeat in parliament; but having made a warm ſpeech againſt the rigorous laws enacted in the laſt ſeſſion, was taken into cuſtody, and expelled the houſe. Failing in theſe attempts, his reſolution was confirmed, which he imparted to Nevil, next heir to the Weſtmoreland family, who inſtantly highly approved of the atrocious crime. It was reſolved to ſhoot the queen, when ſhe took the air on horſeback: but while they waited for a favourable opportunity, the earl of Weſtmoreland died in exile; and Nevil, hoping to recover the honours and eſtates of that noble family, revealed the whole conſpiracy to the queen's miniſters. Upon which, Parry being caſt into priſon, made a confeſſion of his guilt; and having received ſentence of death, ſuffered the puniſhment appointed by the law for treaſonable practices. About the ſame time Balthazar Gerard, a Burgundian, undertook and executed the aſſaſſination of the prince of Orange at Delf, as that prince roſe from table, in the preſence of his wife and ſiſter, by ſhooting him with a piſtol. This vile aſſaſſin, ſatisfied with reſpect to the rectitude of his motives, which led him thus to deſtroy the leader of thoſe he deemed heretics, ſhewed not the leaſt remorſe for his infernal crime; and on his fleſh being torn off with burning pincers, uttered not the leaſt cry or groan.

A. D. 1585.

This melancholy end of the protector of religious liberty ſpread a general conſternation through the Netherlands, where the people regarded the prince of Orange as their father, and where the prince of Parma had made an alarming progreſs in re-eſtabliſhing the authority of Philip. Being thus reduced to extremity, the States offered the ſovereignty of their country to Henry III. king of France. But the deplorable condition of that monarchy obliged the king to reject ſo advantageous an offer, Elizabeth perceived the neceſſity of aſſiſting them effectually. She, therefore, engaged by a treaty to ſuccour them with five thouſand infantry, and one thouſand cavalry, under the command of a general whom ſhe ſhould appoint; and to pay theſe troops during the war, on condition of being reimburſed upon a re-eſtabliſhment of peace. It was alſo ſtipulated, that the queen ſhould be put in poſſeſſion of Fluſſingen, Rammikens, and the Brille, as ſecurity; that the Engliſh governors ſhould have no juriſdiction over the inhabitants of thoſe places; that the towns ſhould be reſtored on the payment of all expences; that the Engliſh general, and two other perſons nominated by the queen, ſhould have places in the aſſemblies of the States; and that neither a peace nor truce ſhould be made without the mutual conſent of Elizabeth and the confederates; that in caſe of the Engliſh fleet being ſent to ſea, it ſhould be joined with an equal number of ſhips, to be commanded by the Engliſh admiral; and laſtly, that the harbours of both countries ſhould be open to the ſubjects of each nation. The earl of Leiceſter, who was appointed to command the Engliſh forces, embarked on the twenty-third of October, attended by a ſplendid retinue, compoſed of the young earl of Eſſex his ſon-in-law, the lords Audley and North, Sir William Ruſſel, Sir Thomas Shirley, Sir Arthur Baſſet, Sir Walter Waller, Sir Gervaſe Cliſton, and a ſelect company of five hundred gentlemen. He was met, on his arrival at Fluſhing, by his nephew, Sir Philip Sidney, governor of that place; and every town through which he paſſed diſcovered every demonſtration of joy, conſidering him as their guardian angel, their deliverer from impending ruin. Elizabeth, on finding that an open breach with the Spaniards was unavoidable, reſolved to attack their ſettlements in America; and therefore equipping a fleet of twenty ſail, ſhe ſent it to the Weſt Indies, under the command of Sir Francis Drake. He firſt took St. Jago, one of the Cape de Verde iſlands. Then ſailing weſtward, he reduced Carthagena and St. Domingo. In his return through the Gulph of Florida, he burned St. Auguſtine, and St. Helena; then touching at Virginia, he took on board the ſmall remains of a colony which had been planted there by Sir Walter Raleigh, and at their requeſt brought them to England. To theſe people we are indebted for the knowledge of tobacco, a plant hitherto unknown in England. Drake returned with ſuch riches, as inflamed the ſpirits of the Engliſh to engage in future enterprizes, and their ardour was increaſed by accounts of the weakneſs of the Spaniards in thoſe diſtant countries. Leiceſter, whoſe merit was not equal to the favour he enjoyed from the queen, had leſs ſucceſs in the Low Countries. At firſt, he gained ſome advantages over the Spaniards; and throwing ſuccours into Grave, enabled that town to make a vigorous defence; but Van Hermert had the cowardice to capitulate, after a very feeble reſiſtance, for which he ſuffered death by the ſentence of a court-martial. Venlo was beſieged and taken by the prince of Parma. He afterwards inveſted Rhimberg, garriſoned with twelve hundred Engliſh, when Leiceſter endeavoured to draw off the prince from that place, by forming other enterprizes. He laid ſiege with this view to Zutphen, which the Spaniſh general thought ſo important a fortreſs, that he haſted to its relief, and made the marquis of Guaſto advance with a convoy, which he was to throw into the place. They were favoured by a fog; but accidentally meeting with a body of Engliſh cavalry, a furious action enſued, in which the Spaniards were defeated, and the marquis of Gonzaga, an Italian nobleman of great reputation, was ſlain. The purſuit was ſtopped by the prince of Parma's advancing with the main body of the Spaniſh army; but the Engliſh, after having exerted all their valour, were obliged to retreat, with the loſs of Sir Philip Sidney, who having been mortally wounded in the action, was carried off by the ſoldiers, and ſoon after died. He is deſcribed by writers of that age, as a moſt perfect model of an accompliſhed gentleman. Sir Philip's virtuous conduct, heroic valour, elegant erudition, and polite converſation, had rendered him the ornament and delight of the Engliſh court; and as his credit with the queen, and the earl of Leiceſter, was ſolely employed in the encouragement of genius and literature, his praiſes have been tranſmitted to poſterity. While he was lying in the field, mangled with the wounds he had received, and almoſt ſuffocated with thirſt, a bottle of water was offered him; but obſerving a ſoldier by his ſide in the ſame ſituation, he reſigned to him the valuable acquiſition, with this generous obſervation, "That man's neceſſities are ſtill greater than mine." The memory of Sidney's virtues were celebrated in a copy of Latin verſes, wrote by the king of Scots. The States were highly diſpleaſed with Leiceſter's management of the war, nor leſs with his arbitrary and imperious conduct; and at the end of the campaign ſolicited him to redreſs their grievances; yet he ſoon after returned to England, without giving them the leaſt ſatiſfaction.

A. D. 1586.

Philip's deſigns againſt the perſon and government of Elizabeth becoming more apparent, it was of the laſt importance for her to ſecure the friendſhip of the king of Scotland. To this end, ſhe diſpatched Wotton as her ambaſſador to that kingdom; but, notwithſtanding her having given him private inſtructions, with reſpect to her affairs, ſhe informed the king, that when ſhe had any political buſineſs to tranſact with him, ſhe would employ another miniſter; her chief intention in ſending him being to entertain James with his wit, and that he might partake with him in his pleaſures. Wotton was maſter of profound diſſimulation, and knew how to cover the deepeſt deſigns under the appearance of careleſs gaiety. James admitted him into all his amuſements; on which the ambaſſador ſoon made himſelf maſter of his ſecrets; and had the more authority over him in ſtate tranſactions, as he did not ſeem to pay the leaſt attention or regard to ſuch things; while the Scotch miniſters, who obſerved his growing intereſt, endeavoured to acquire his friendſhip, by informing him of every thing they knew of their maſter. But Wotton employed his intrigues to more dangerous purpoſes: he formed a conſpiracy for ſeizing the perſon of James, and delivering him into the hands of the Engliſh queen. This treachery was diſcovered, and Wotton fled into England. Though James was highly exaſperated, he thought it prudent to diſſemble; and ſoon after a treaty of alliance was concluded between him and Elizabeth, for the mutual defence of their dominions and religion, againſt the open combination of all the catholic powers in Europe. By this treaty it was ſtipulated that if Elizabeth was invaded, James ſhould furniſh her with a body of about two thouſand horſe, and five thouſand foot; that Elizabeth, in a ſimilar caſe, ſhould ſend him three thouſand horſe, and ſix thouſand foot; that the charge of theſe armies ſhould be defrayed by the power who demanded aſſiſtance; that if the invaſion ſhould be made in England, within ſixty miles of the frontiers of Scotland, James ſhould march his whole force to the aid of Elizabeth; and that the preſent league ſhould ſuperſede all former alliances of either ſtate with any foreign prince, ſo far as religion was concerned.

The character, principles, and pretenſions of Mary, had early engaged Elizabeth, in her treatment of that unfortunate princeſs, to conſult the dictates of policy and jealouſy, rather than of friendſhip or generoſity; and her reſtraint, reſentment, and high ſpirit, concurring with the ſuggeſtions of the moſt cruel bigots, at laſt engaged Mary in deſigns which terminated in her ruin. The Engliſh, in the ſeminary at Rheims, were filled with the greateſt animoſity againſt Elizabeth, and revered the bull by which the pope had excommunicated and depoſed the queen; ſome of them aſſerting that it had been immediately dictated by the Holy Ghoſt, and that whoever loſt their lives in attempting to murder her, would undoubtedly enjoy an unfading crown of martyrdom. By theſe doctrines, John Savage, who had ſerved ſome years in the Netherlands under the prince of Parma, was inſtigated to attempt the life of Elizabeth; and having made a vow to perſevere in his deſign, was ſent to England, and recommended to the confidence of the moſt zealous papiſts. About the ſame time John Ballard, a prieſt, returned to Paris from his miſſion in England and Scotland; and having obſerved that a ſpirit of mutiny and rebellion prevailed among the devotees of thoſe countries, formed the deſign of dethroning Elizabeth, and reſtoring the exerciſe of their religion by force of arms. This enterprize ſeemed to be favoured by the ſituation of affairs abroad; for the pope, the Spaniards, and the duke of Guiſe, had formed the reſolution of making ſome attempt againſt the queen; and Ballard was warmly encouraged by Mendoza, the Spaniſh ambaſſador at Paris, to hope for ſuccour from thoſe princes. But Charles Paget, a devoted partizan of the queen of Scots, being convinced of Elizabeth's prudence and popularity, ſteadily maintained that it was in vain to expect any ſucceſs from the invaſion of England while that princeſs was alive; and Ballard hence concluded the neceſſity of executing the deſign formed at Rheims: he therefore came to England in the diſguiſe of a ſoldier, aſſuming the name of captain Forteſcue, and endeavoured to execute at once the projects of an aſſaſſination, an inſurrection, and an invaſion. He firſt applied to Anthony Babington, a young gentleman of fortune and polite education, who was ſuſceptible of that falſe zeal, which impels thoſe who are under its influence to believe every thing juſtifiable in defence of the catholic religion. Babington engaged in the conſpiracy ſeveral perſons of diſtinction, who agreed that a ſelect number ſhould join Savage in the execution of his vow. In the mean time the papiſts, in order to carry on the plot without ſuſpicion, publiſhed ſeveral hypocritical writings, in which they profeſſed the higheſt regard for the perſon and government of Elizabeth; admoniſhed the people of their perſuaſion not to engage in any practices againſt the ſtate, but to confine themſelves to ſuch weapons as are alone lawful for Chriſtians to uſe, ſuch as tears, prayers, and faſting. But the watchful eye of Walſingham was not to be deceived: he ſoon obtained hints of the conſpirators deſigns; and by the aſſiſtance of one Maud, a man of impenetrable diſſimulation, who found means to inſinuate himſelf into the favour of Ballard, the miniſter was regularly informed of all their ſchemes. The plan being completely ſettled, Babington wrote to Mary, informing her of all that had paſſed between him and Ballard; that he had undertook, with the aſſiſtance of one hundred gentlemen, to deliver her from her confinement; but at the ſame time inſiſted, that thoſe who were concerned in ſo dangerous an attempt for her ſervice ſhould be aſſured of a reward ſuitable to their merit. This letter was wrote in the uſual cypher which had paſſed between him and Mary; and was ſo pleaſing to her, that ſhe failed not to anſwer it in the ſame cypher, deſiring the conſpirators to be extremely cautious, aſſuring them ſhe highly approved of the deſign, and that the gentlemen might expect all the rewards it might ever be in her power to grant. Babington had employed one Gifford to communicate his deſigns to Mary, who immediately applied to Walſingham, that by his intereſt he might ſecretly carry on a correſpondence with the queen of Scots. Walſingham propoſed the affair to Paulet, who had then the charge of Mary, and deſired him to connive at Gifford's corrupting one of his ſervants; but Paulet deſiring that ſome other expedient might be deviſed, Gifford bribed a brewer, who ſupplied the family with ale, to convey letters to the captive queen. By Paulet's contrivance, the letters were thruſt through a chink in the wall, and anſwers returned by the ſame conveyance. Babington and Ballard being at firſt afraid of Gifford's fidelity, gave him only blank papers folded in the form of letters; but finding by the anſwers that theſe had been faithfully delivered, they laid aſide their ſcruples, and Babington informed Mary of the propoſed foreign invaſion; the plan of an inſurrection at home; that of her delivery; and one for aſſaſſinating the uſurper, by ſix noble gentlemen, as he called them. All the letters, containing theſe and other particulars, were carried to Walſingham, who was ſtill deſirous of having farther information. With this intent, he added to one of Mary's letters delivered to him by Maud, his truſty agent, a poſtſcript, in the ſame cypher, requeſting Babington to ſend her the names of the principal conſpirators. The ſtratagem ſucceeded; and the able miniſter diſcovered, that Savage, already mentioned; Charles Tilney, a man of family, and one of Elizabeth's penſioners; John Charnock, a gentleman of Lancaſhire; Edward Abingdon, whoſe father had been cofferer to Elizabeth; Chidcock Tichbourn, a gentleman of Southampton; and one Barnwell, a perſon of quality in Ireland; were the ſix engaged by oath to aſſaſſinate the queen. The vanity of Babington furniſhed Walſingham with another means of detection. He had cauſed a picture to be drawn, in which he himſelf was repreſented ſtanding amidſt the ſix aſſaſſins, with a motto, importing, that they were all embarked in the ſame dangerous enterprize. A copy of this was delivered to the queen, that, upon ſeeing them, ſhe might be upon her guard. Babington now reſolved to ſend Ballard into France, to haſten the foreign ſuccours; and to procure a licence, applied to Walſingham, pretending great zeal for the queen's ſervice, and his reſolution to make uſe of the confidence he had gained among the catholics, in detecting their conſpiracies. But Ballard being ſeized by a warrant from the ſecretary of ſtate's office, all the conſpirators were terrified, and ſome adviſed their immediately making their eſcape; while others propoſed the inſtant aſſaſſination of Elizabeth. However, the next day their fears ſubſided; for Babington having renewed his correſpondence with Walſingham, that ſubtle ſtateſman perſuaded him that the apprehending of Ballard proceeded only from the uſual diligence of informers. Babington was even prevailed upon to lodge in Walſingham's houſe, that they might frequently converſe together; but obſerving that he was watched with the moſt careful aſſiduity by one Scudamore, he began to be alarmed for his ſafety. Soon after, as they were ſitting at ſupper, Scudamore received a note from Walſingham, ordering him to watch Babington more narrowly than ever; and Babington, by Scudamore's inadvertency, reading the note over his ſhoulder, was ſufficiently convinced of his danger. He roſe haſtily from the table, went out of the room, as if on ſome ſudden occaſion, made the beſt of his way to Weſtminſter, and having acquainted Charnock and ſome others with what he had diſcovered, they withdrew immediately into the woods, where they concealed themſelves for ten days; but were at laſt taken near Harrow on the Hill, dreſſed like countrymen, and brought priſoners to London. On the thirteenth of September Babington and Ballard, with five of their accomplices, were arraigned and pleaded guilty; and the next day ſeven more of the conſpirators were convicted on evidence. The firſt ſeven ſuffered the ſentence pronounced againſt traitors in its utmoſt rigour, but the others were ſuffered to hang till they were dead. They all behaved with great decency, and confeſſed their ſorrow for that part of the conſpiracy relative to the murder of Elizabeth.

This horrid plot having, by the vigilance of adminiſtration, been fully detected, and rendered abortive, meaſures were taken for the trial and conviction of the queen of Scots. But great difficulties occurred with regard to the manner of proceeding. Scarce a precedent in the hiſtory of mankind could be found of a meaſure of this ſort; not one in the annals of England. Walſingham, with the majority of the council, inſiſted upon a fair, open, candid trial of the indiſcreet captive. Mary had been guarded ſo ſtrictly, that ſhe remained entirely ignorant of what had happened to her prejudice, till Sir Thomas Gorges accoſted her by Elizabeth's orders, when ſhe was mounted on horſeback to go a hunting; and informed her, that all her accomplices were diſcovered and ſeized. Mary was not permitted to return to her former place of reſidence, but was conducted from one gentleman's houſe to another, till ſhe was placed in Fotheringay caſtle in Northamptonſhire. Her two ſecretaries, Nau and Curle, were apprehended; all her papers were ſeized, and tranſmitted to the council; alſo many letters from perſons abroad, and ſome from Engliſh noblemen, expreſſing their firm attachment to her perſon and title. The queen took no notice of this laſt diſcovery; but the perſons themſelves, finding their correſpondence detected, endeavoured to atone for their imprudence, by declaring themſelves from thenceforward moſt inveterate enemies to the queen of Scots.

It was now determined by the council to try Mary, not by the common laws relative to treaſon, but by an act of parliament that had been paſſed in the laſt ſeſſion againſt that crime. Accordingly the queen appointed a commiſſion, conſiſting of forty noblemen, privy counſellors, and judges, who were empowered to examine and paſs ſentence on the devoted queen of Scots, whom they ſtiled daughter and heir to James V. late king of Scotland. On the eleventh of October, the commiſſioners repaired to Fotheringay caſtle. Sir Walter Mildmay and Sir Edward Baker delivered to the queen of Scots a letter from Elizabeth, informing her of the commiſſion, and her approaching trial. Mary read the letter with a countenance more becoming her dignity than her ſituation; and told them, without the leaſt emotion, that it was very ſurpriſing the queen ſhould command her as a ſubject to ſubmit to a trial and examination before perſons of a rank far inferior to herſelf; that ſhe would ſubmit to no trial that had a tendency to leſſen her royal majeſty, or the dignity of her ſon; that however her ſpirits might be broken by misfortunes, ſhe was not yet reduced to the abject ſtate her enemies deſired, nor would ſhe ever be prevailed upon to conſent to her own degradation and diſhonour; that though ſhe had long lived in England, ſhe had lived in captivity; was ignorant of the laws and ſtatutes of the kingdom, deſtitute of council, and could not conceive who could be her peers, or ſit in judgment on a ſovereign princeſs; that ſhe had never enjoyed the protection of the laws of England, and therefore could not be ſuppoſed to have ſubjected herſelf to their juriſdiction; that if in her own perſon every rule of juſtice ſhould be violated, ſhe ſhould find her revenge in the judgment of the whole world, where her innocence would triumph on a theatre infinitely larger than that of a ſingle kingdom. This ſpirited anſwer to Elizabeth's letter greatly embarraſſed the commiſſioners, who deputed lord Burleigh, the treaſurer Bromley, the chancellor, and Sir Chriſtopher Hatton, vice-chamberlain, to prevail upon her to relinquiſh her plea with regard to her royal dignity, and to ſubmit chearfully to a trial, which was now abſolutely not to be avoided, even though ſhe might refuſe to appear before the commiſſioners, or to plead. Various arguments were urged on this occaſion; but thoſe advanced in the following ſpeech, delivered by vice-chamberlain Hatton, made the ſtrongeſt impreſſion on the queen of Scots: "You are, madam, ſaid he, accuſed, but not condemned, of having conſpired the deſtruction of our lady and queen anointed. You ſay, you are a queen; but in a crime of this nature, and ſuch a ſituation as your's, the royal dignity itſelf is not ſufficient, by either the civil or canon law, or the law of nature and nations, to exempt you from judgment. If you are innocent, you injure your reputation by avoiding a trial. We have heard your proteſtations of innocence; but queen Elizabeth thinks otherwiſe, and is heartily ſorry for the appearances that lie againſt you. She has therefore appointed commiſſioners, honourable perſons, prudent and upright men, to examine the merits of your cauſe. They are ready to hear you with equity, and even with indulgence, and will rejoice if you can clear yourſelf of the imputations which have been thrown upon you. Believe me, madam, the queen herſelf will rejoice; for ſhe affirmed to me, at my departure, that no misfortune had ever given her ſo much uneaſineſs, as that you ſhould be ſuſpected of a concurrence in theſe criminal tranſactions. Laying aſide, therefore, the fruitleſs claim of your privilege, which can now avail you nothing, truſt to the better defence of your innocence; make that appear in open trial, and leave not upon your memory a ſtain of infamy, which muſt attend your obſtinate ſilence on this occaſion." Theſe arguments produced the deſired effect: Mary gave up her plea of royalty, and agreed to appear before the high court of commiſſioners. The trial had the appearance of great ſolemnity. At the upper end of the room was placed a chair of ſtate for the queen of England, under a royal canopy; over againſt it ſtood another for the queen of Scots; by the walls, on both ſides, benches were placed for the commiſſioners. As ſoon as the court was opened, the chancellor, turning to Mary, told her, "That ſhe was accuſed of conſpiring the deſtruction of the queen, the realm of England, and the proteſtant religion; and that they were commiſſioned to examine into the truth of the accuſation, and to hear her anſwer." Mary replied, "That ſhe came into England to crave the aſſiſtance which had been promiſed her; that ſhe was a queen, and not a ſubject to Elizabeth; and that if ſhe appeared before them, it was only to ſecure her honour and reputation." The chancellor denied that any aſſiſtance had been promiſed her; and declared, that her proteſtation was in vain; for ſince the law, upon which the accuſation was founded, allowed of no diſtinction in the perſon of the tranſgreſſor, it could not be admitted. The commiſſioners, however, accommodated matters, by ordering both her proteſtation and his anſwer to be recorded. They then touched upon other facts; but as they no way affected Mary's life, ſhe took no pains to confute their aſſertions. The grand buſineſs was to prove the main charge of the impeachment, That Mary had concurred in the deſign of aſſaſſinating Elizabeth. To prove this accuſation, copies of the intercepted letters between her and Babington, in which were expreſſed, in the cleareſt terms, her approbation of the murder, were produced; the evidence of Nau and Curle, her two ſecretaries, who without being put to the torture readily ſwore, that ſhe received theſe letters from Babington, and that by her orders they had written the anſwers. The confeſſion of Babington correſponded with the depoſitions of her ſecretaries. Mary was incapable of making a ſatisfactory defence before the commiſſioners; her reply conſiſting chiefly in her own denial. She aſſerted, that as Nau and Curle had taken an oath of ſecrecy and fidelity to her, their evidence ought not to be credited; and that if her ſervants had received any letters, or wrote any anſwers, the imputation could not affect her. She added, that it was eaſy to forge the hand-writing and cypher of another. But if we conſider the enterprizing character of Mary, the odious treatment ſhe had received, her hatred to Elizabeth on that account, and the then prevailing eſtabliſhed opinion among catholics, that it was lawful to make uſe of any violence againſt a prince excommunicated by the pope, we may believe, without difficulty, that Mary might be an accomplice in a conſpiracy, in the ſucceſs of which her own intereſt was principally concerned. To ſay, that her two ſecretaries held a correſpondence with Babington, wherein ſhe was not concerned; or that they ſhould betray their miſtreſs, without ſo much as having been ſuſpected themſelves; or that Walſingham, a miniſter of ſtrict integrity, if ever there was one, had forged the letters, would be to ſtart the moſt indefenſible improbabilities. In truth, the only circumſtance in Mary's defence, which to us appears worthy of notice, was her requiring that Nau and Curle ſhould be confronted with her, affirming, that they would not, to her face, perſiſt in their aſſertions. However agreeable this demand was to natural juſtice, it was obſerved to her that in caſes of high treaſon, the laws and cuſtoms of England did not admit of confronting evidences with the priſoner, and that the judges had it not in their power to grant ſuch an indulgence. The commiſſioners having finiſhed the trial, they on the twenty-fifth of October, adjourned from Fotheringay caſtle to the ſtar chamber at London; where, having taken the oaths of Mary's two ſecretaries, who voluntarily, without hope of reward, ſwore to the authenticity of the letters before produced, they pronounced ſentence of death upon the queen of Scots, and this ſentence they confirmed under their hands and ſeals. The ſame day they publiſhed a declaration, that this ſentence did not derogate from the title and honours of James, king of Scotland, but that he was in the ſame place, degree, and right, as if this ſentence had never been pronounced. Elizabeth had now ſufficiently humbled her hatred rival; but ſhe was too politic to expreſs her joy on this ſolemn occaſion, knowing that her conduct, in this inſtance, would be repreſented in the moſt invidious colours by Mary's numerous partizans; that ſhe ſhould be reproached by foreign princes, and perhaps by poſterity, as having violated the rights of hoſpitality, of kindred, and of royal majeſty. She therefore affected to be deeply intereſted in the fate of her unfortunate relation; declaring, that however injurious her deſigns might be to herſelf, ſhe was willing to bury them for ever in the gulph of oblivion; and that the ſafety of her people alone, which was nearly intereſted in the fate of the queen of Scotland, induced her to with-hold a pardon. She now ſummoned a parliament; that while ſhe indulged the moſt implacable hatred, ſhe might appear to be guided by the voices of her ſubjects; well knowing, that ſhe ſhould not want the moſt earneſt ſolicitations from that aſſembly, to conſent to a meaſure ſo agreeable to her ſecret inclinations. Both houſes unanimouſly ratified the ſentence againſt Mary, and voted an addreſs to Elizabeth, to obtain her conſent to its publication and execution. In her anſwer, ſhe mentioned the danger to which her life was continually expoſed, and her willingneſs to die, did ſhe not foreſee the calamities her death would produce; ſhe mentioned the clemency of her temper, and her violent reluctance to proceed to extremities againſt her unhappy kinſwoman; ſhe maintained that the late law by which Mary was tried, was ſolely intended to give her warning, not to engage in attempts, that might expoſe her to the penalties of her preſent ſituation; and begged them to think again, whether it was poſſible to find any expedient for ſecuring the public tranquillity, beſides the death of the queen of Scots. In obedience to her command, the parliament again took the affair under conſideration; but finding no other expediment, they repeated their ſolicitations and intreaties; and even remonſtrated, that mercy to the queen of Scots was cruelty to them; and affirmed, it would be injuſtice to deny the execution of the law to any individual, much more to the whole body of the people, now unanimouſly ſuing for the pledge of her parental care and tenderneſs. In anſwer to this ſecond addreſs, the queen complained of her unfortunate ſituation; expreſſed the uneaſineſs their importunity gave her; renewed her profeſſions of affection to her people, and diſmiſſed the committee of parliament in great uncertainty with reſpect to her final reſolution. She however complied with their requeſt, in publiſhing the ſentence againſt Mary by proclamation; and this appeared to be attended with the hearty rejoicings of the people. Lords Buckhurſt and Beale were ſent to inform Mary of the ratification of her ſentence by the parliament, and that aſſembly's earneſt applications for its execution, from their apprehenſions, that their religion could never, while ſhe was alive, be firmly ſettled and ſecured. Mary laying hold of this laſt circumſtance, inſiſted, that as her death was demanded by the proteſtants, for the eſtabliſhment of their faith, ſhe was a martyr to her religion, and entitled to all the merits attending that glorious character. "I can hardly believe (ſaid ſhe, ſmiling) that the queen, my ſiſter, has conſented to my death: but if her will be ſuch, that death, which will put an end to my ſufferings, cannot be unwelcome to me: and I think that ſoul unworthy of celeſtial happineſs, that ſhould ſhrink in paſſing through the gloomy valley of the ſhadow of death." Paulet, her keeper, who had received orders to take down her canopy, and no longer to ſerve her with the reſpect due to ſovereign princes, told her, that ſhe was now to be conſidered as a dead perſon, and unworthy of any dignity. To this ſhe replied, that ſhe had received her royal character from the hands of the Almighty, and could not be deprived of it by any earthly power; but this plea of divine right did not exempt her from very ſevere treatment. Great efforts were made by foreign powers, to prevent the execution of the ſentence pronounced againſt Mary. The ambaſſadors of France and Scotland were vehement in their remonſtrances, which had no weight with Elizabeth, who ſtill perſiſted in her former reſolution. Her miniſters ſtrenuouſly oppoſed every argument that had a tendency to make her heſitate. We need not be ſurprized at this if we conſider the ſituation of England at that critical juncture. No ſucceſſor to the crown was declared; the heir by blood, to whom the people were moſt likely to adhere, was, by education, an enemy to the national religion; and, from multiplied injuries, an implacable enemy to the miniſters and principal nobility. Hence their perſonal ſafety, as well as the ſecurity of the government, ſeemed to depend ſolely on the queen's life, who was now ſomewhat advanced in years, and perpetually expoſed to the danger of aſſaſſination. No wonder then, that Elizabeth's wiſe counſellors, who knew themſelves obnoxious to the queen of Scots, endeavoured to puſh every meaſure to extremity, in order to prevent her ever mounting the throne of England. The captive princeſs ſupported herſelf with ſuch placid dignity as does honour to her memory. She wrote a very pathetic letter to Elizabeth, requeſting, that after the fatal ſentence ſhould be executed, her body might be ſent to France, there to be interred near the ſacred relics of her mother, and accompanied to the grave with thoſe rites and ceremonies which her religion required: that the execution of her ſentence might be in public in the ſight of all the world: and that her ſervants, after they had done her the laſt offices, and been witneſſes of her perſeverance in the faith, and of her ſubmiſſion to the will of heaven, might be ſuffered to depart without moleſtation, and enjoy the legacies bequeathed them by their dying miſtreſs. Elizabeth foreſaw the inconveniencies that would ariſe from granting ſome of theſe requeſts, and being unwilling to give Mary, in her preſent ſituation, a refuſal, ſent no anſwer to this letter.

A. D. 1587. Rumours were now ſpread of invaſions, inſurrections, and conſpiracies. The people were terrified, and the death of Mary was conſidered as neceſſary to reſtore the tranquillity of the nation. Elizabeth was obſerved frequently to ſit alone, penſive and ſilent; and ſometimes to utter half ſentences, importing the difficulty and diſtreſs to which ſhe was reduced. But having taken her final reſolution, ſhe ſent for ſecretary Daviſon, and ordered him privately to draw up a warrant for the execution of the queen of Scots; which, ſhe afterwards ſaid, ſhe intended to keep by her, and put in force, in caſe any attempt ſhould be made for the delivery of that princeſs. This warrant ſhe ſigned, and then ordered Daviſon to carry it to the chancellor, that he might affix the great ſeal to it. The next day ſhe ſent Killigrew to Daviſon, with orders to forbear executing her former commands. Daviſon came immediately to court, and informed the queen, that the warrant had already paſſed the ſeals. She ſeemed offended, and blamed him for his precipitation. Daviſon, upon this, was greatly perplexed, and informed the council of what had paſſed. They perſuaded him to ſend away the warrant, and promiſed, if the queen ſhould be diſpleaſed, to juſtify his conduct, and take the whole blame on themſelves. From ſome letters publiſhed by Strype, it appears, that Elizabeth had not expreſly informed any of her miniſters, not even Burleigh himſelf, that ſhe intended to have the warrant ſent at this time for Mary's execution. The ſecretary, however, complied with their advice, and Beale was diſpatched with the warrant, addreſſed to the earls of Shrewſbury, Kent, Derby, and Cumberland, and commanded them to ſee it executed.

On the ſeventh of February, the earls of Shrewſbury and Kent reached Fotheringay caſtle, and being introduced to Mary, informed her of their commiſſion; adding, that ſhe muſt prepare for death by the next morning at eight o'clock. She received the ſummons with great calmneſs. She ſeemed ſurprized that ſhe was to die ſo ſoon, but not terrified, and her looks, words, and geſtures were full of chearful reſignation. She deſired to have a conference with her almoner, confeſſor, and Andrew Melvil, the maſter of her houſhold; but ſhe was told they could not comply with that part of her requeſt which had reſpect to her confeſſor. They, however, recommended to her Dr. Fletcher, dean of Peterborough, who would very readily aſſiſt her in making preparations for eternity. She replied, his aſſiſtance was not neceſſary; and as they had thought proper to deny a requeſt for which the dictates of humanity ſo ſtrongly pleaded, ſhe would endeavour to ſupply the defect by her own prayers. The earls had no ſooner left her, than ſhe ordered that ſupper might ſoon be ready, that after it, ſhe might have the more leiſure to finiſh the few affairs ſhe had to do in this world, and to prepare for her paſſage to the next. She ſupped ſparingly, as was uſual with her, and with her wonted chearfulneſs. Her domeſtics being overwhelmed with affliction, ſhe ſtrove to comfort them; and turning to Burgoin her phyſician, aſked him, if he did not obſerve the invincible force of truth? adding, "they pretend that I muſt die, becauſe I conſpired againſt the life of their queen; but the earl of Kent owned, that the only cauſe of my death, is the apprehenſions my life gives them for their religion. My conſtancy in the faith is my real crime; the reſt is only a colour, invented by intereſted and deſigning men." When ſupper was ended, ſhe ordered her ſervants into her preſence; and drinking to them, they all, in order, pledged her on their knees, begging pardon for every paſt neglect of duty. She in return, aſked their pardon for her offences towards them; and this exchange of mutual forgiveneſs was attended with a plentiful flood of tears. Mary now peruſed her will, in which ſhe had given them legacies; and calling for the inventory of her goods, clothes, and jewels, wrote down the names of thoſe to whom ſhe bequeathed each article, and to ſome ſhe diſtributed money with her own hands. She alſo wrote letters of recommendation for her ſervants to the French king, and to her couſin the duke of Guiſe, whom ſhe made her chief executor. She went to bed at her uſual time; where having ſlept ſome hours, ſhe aroſe, and ſpent the remainder of the night in prayer. As ſhe had foreſeen the difficulty of exerciſing the rites of her religion, ſhe had obtained a conſecrated wafer from pope Pius, and had reſerved it for this laſt period of her life. When it began to grow light, ſhe dreſſed herſelf in the only rich habit ſhe had reſerved for herſelf, which was of ſilk and velvet, telling her maids, that ſhe would willingly have left them this dreſs, rather than the plain one ſhe wore the day before, but it was neceſſary for her to appear in a decent habit at the enſuing ſolemnity. Soon after, the ſheriff of the county, entering her room, told her, that the hour was come for his attending her to the place of execution; to which ſummons, with a compoſed countenance, ſhe anſwered, ſhe was ready. Her head was covered with a vail, extending to the ground, her beads hung at her girdle, and ſhe held a crucifix in her hand. Having an infirmity in her limbs, ſhe leaned on two of Sir Amias Paulet's guards, and followed the ſheriff with a compoſed countenance. When paſſing through a hall adjoining to her chamber, ſhe was met by the earls of Kent and Shrewſbury, Sir Amias Paulet, Sir Drue Drury, and many other gentlemen of diſtinction, among whom was Sir Andrew Melvil, her ſteward, who threw himſelf on his knees, and, wringing his hands, uttered the moſt bitter lamentations. She endeavoured to comfort him; and reclining herſelf, with her cheeks bedewed with tears, kiſſed him, ſaying, "Good Melvil, farewel; once again farewel, good Melvil; give the aſſiſtance of your prayers: you will ſoon behold the ſorrows of your queen and miſtreſs at an end." Then turning to the noblemen, ſhe deſired that her ſervants might be permitted to attend their miſtreſs in her laſt moments. This was oppoſed by the earl of Kent, who told her, that they would be apt, by their cries and lamentations, to diſturb both herſelf and the ſpectators. Touched with his cruelty, ſhe very earneſtly renewed her application, ſaying, "I am couſin to your queen: I am deſcended from the blood-royal of Henry VII. I have been queen of France by marriage: I am an anointed queen of Scotland: can you, will you deny me this ſmall indulgence?" The commiſſioners, concluding a perſiſting in a denial would appear invidious, after a little conſultation, agreed that ſhe might take a few of her ſervants with her; and ſhe made choice of four men, and two maid ſervants. Mary, this devoted victim of ſtate policy, now entered the hall, where ſtood a ſcaffold covered with black, two executioners, and all the apparatus of death, which ſhe beheld with unſhaken fortitude. The hall was crowded with ſpectators, who gazed on this ſhadow of royal dignity with a ſolemn, ſilent aſtoniſhment; and ſeemed greatly moved with the recollection of the ſurpriſing train of her misfortunes, her inflexible conſtancy, her amiable accompliſhments, and the gleaming remains of beauty, faded by years, and furrowed with affliction. Here the warrant of her execution was read, which ſhe heard with ſilent unconcern. The dean of Peterborough then ſtepped forward; and, though ſhe frequently told him that he had no need to concern himſelf about her; that ſhe was ſettled in the belief of the Romiſh faith; and that ſhe meant to lay down her life in its defence; yet ſtill he perſiſted in his exhortations; and, under the vail of pious inſtructions, uttered the moſt cruel expreſſions. During his diſcourſe, the queen could not forbear betraying her impatience, by interrupting him. The dean bid her change her religion; repent of her former wickedneſs; and ſettle her faith upon this ground, that in Chriſt Jeſus alone ſhe could hope to be ſaved. She anſwered, with great earneſtneſs, again and again, "Do not trouble yourſelf any more about the matter; I was born in this religion; I have lived in this religion; and in this religion I am reſolved to die." Shrewſbury and Kent, perceiving that it was to no purpoſe to trouble her any farther with religious diſputes, ordered the dean to deſiſt from his unſeaſonable exhortations, and to pray for her converſion. While the dean was engaged in prayer, ſhe employed herſelf in her private devotions from the office of the Virgin; and when he had finiſhed, uttered aloud ſome petitions in Engliſh for the afflicted church, for herſelf, her ſon, and for queen Elizabeth. The earl of Kent, obſerving that during her devotions ſhe made frequent uſe of the crucifix, reproved her for her attachment to that popiſh trumpery, as he termed it; and exhorted her to have Chriſt in her heart, and not in her hand; to which ſhe mildly replied, that it was difficult to hold ſuch an object in her hand, without feeling her heart touched with ſome compunction. Her private devotions finiſhed, ſhe began, with the aſſiſtance of her women, to diſrobe herſelf; and the executioner alſo lending a hand, ſhe ſmiled, and ſaid, ſhe was not accuſtomed to undreſs herſelf before ſo large a company, nor to be ſerved by ſuch valets; on which her ſervants burſt into tears and lamentations. She laid her finger upon her lips, reminding them of her having engaged for their diſcreet behaviour; gave them her bleſſing; and requeſted their prayers. When prepared for the block, one of her maids, according to the directions ſhe had received, covered her eyes with a handkerchief. This done, Mary laid herſelf down, without the leaſt ſign of fear or trepidation, and the executioner ſevered her head from her body at two ſtrokes. When he held it up to the ſpectators, the dean of Peterborough alone exclaimed, "So periſh all queen Elizabeth's enemies; and the earl of Kent was the only perſon who replied, "Amen." Thus died Mary Stuart, queen of Scotland, on the eighth of February, in the forty-fifth year of her age, and the nineteenth of her captivity in England. She was a princeſs of moſt attracting beauty and addreſs, uncommon underſtanding, and diſtinguiſhed by ſuch qualities, both natural and acquired, as rendered her the moſt lovely of women. But her connections with the profligate Bothwell, joined to the effects of paſſion and blind bigotry, betrayed her into actions which humanity herſelf may alleviate, but cannot excuſe; and afford us a ſtriking inſtance of the frailty, weakneſs, inconſtancy, and depravity of human nature; and from this exemplary puniſhment, which, ſooner or later, will be the inevitable conſequence of criminal indulgences, whatever ſources they may ſpring from, let him who ſtandeth firm on the conceit of his own virtue, who can thank God that he is not as others, "take heed leſt he falleth." The body was embalmed, encloſed in a leaden coffin, and interred in the cathedral of Peterborough, from whence her ſon James afterwards removed it to the chapel of Henry VII.

Elizabeth no ſooner heard of Mary's execution, than ſhe appeared to be ſtruck with the utmoſt ſurprize, indignation, and extravagant ſorrow; her countenance changed; her ſpeech failing her, ſhe ſtood like a ſtatue, for a long time, in ſilent aſtoniſhment. None of her miniſters or counſellors dared to approach her; or, if any were ſo raſh, ſhe chaſed them from her with the moſt violent expreſſions of rage and reſentment, ſaying, that they all of them had been guilty of an unpardonable crime, in putting to death her dear ſiſter and kinſwoman, contrary to her fixed purpoſe and intention, of which they were ſufficiently apprized. She openly declared, that the execution had been done without her knowledge. She wrote a very pathetic letter to the king of Scotland, calling heaven and earth to witneſs, that her intention was to have ſpared the blood of Mary. She committed Daviſon to priſon, and ordered him to be tried in the ſtar-chamber for his offence, where he expreſſed his repentance, and throwing himſelf upon the queen's mercy, was ſentenced to pay a fine of ten thouſand pounds, and to remain in priſon during the queen's pleaſure. The fine, though it reduced him to beggary, was rigorouſly levied, and he remained a long time in cuſtody. All the favour the queen would grant him, was ſending him, from time to time, ſmall ſupplies to keep him from periſhing. Yet notwithſtanding this ſeverity, and the apparent reluctance Elizabeth ſhewed againſt conſenting to the execution of Mary, and the grief ſhe expreſſed afterwards, if any credit is to be given to the apology which Daviſon is ſaid to have ſent to ſecretary Walſingham, and two letters inſerted by Mackenzie in his life of queen Mary, Elizabeth may be charged with great diſſimulation: for though the warrant for the queen of Scots execution was ſent away without the queen's knowledge, it appears by theſe letters, that ſhe would have been glad, if Mary had died by any other means. But, if the grief of Elizabeth was counterfeited, that of the king of Scotland was real. He gave way to the moſt violent complaints, and abandoned himſelf to the wildeſt reſolutions. He refuſed to admit Cary, who brought the letter of Elizabeth, into his preſence. He recalled his ambaſſador from the Engliſh court; war and vengeance ſeemed to have taken poſſeſſion of his ſoul. When the court went into mourning, lord Sinclair appeared in a ſuit of armour, and ſaid, his dreſs only was proper mourning for the queen of Scotland. Elizabeth was alarmed at theſe warlike appearances; and as ſoon as the firſt heat of paſſion was abated, ſhe had recourſe to conciliating meaſures. Walſingham wrote a long letter to James, in which he intimated the danger Scotland would be expoſed to in a war with England: but James was diſſuaded from commencing hoſtilities, chiefly by lord Hunſdon, the Engliſh ambaſſador, a nobleman whom he particularly eſteemed, and by whom a good correſpondence with the queen was gradually reſtored.

Thus Elizabeth, with her uſual policy, having diſſipated the northern ſtorm that threatened to diſcharge its fury on England, ſhe was more at leiſure to watch the motions of the Spaniſh monarch, who had for ſome time been very intent on making warlike preparations. A prodigious number of ſhips were equipping in his ports; and though he had yet not declared war, the queen was not deceived in his intentions. But the navy of England was able to diſpute the prize of victory with Philip, ſovereign of the new world. Drake was ſent with a ſtrong fleet to inſult the coaſts of Spain, intercept the ſupplies of naval and military ſtores continually ſending to Cadiz, and to deſtroy the ſhipping of the enemy, in their harbours. Drake executed his commiſſion with great courage and ſucceſs, burning and deſtroying above one hundred ſail of ſhips, moſt of them laden with proviſions and military ſtores. Then taking the town of St. Vincent, and bombarding Liſbon, he proceeded to the weſtern iſlands, in order to intercept a rich carrack or galleon, and was ſo ſucceſsful as to make her his prize. She was called the St. Philip, and contained an immenſe booty. But the moſt valuable acquiſition was a pacquet of papers found on board, by which the Engliſh learned the nature of the Oriental commerce, which gave the firſt hint of eſtabliſhing an Eaſt India Company. Soon after this expedition, Thomas Cavendiſh, a gentleman who had ſpent a conſiderable eſtate by living at court, returned from his voyage round the world. With a view of retrieving his fortune by an attempt againſt the Spaniſh ſettlements in the new world, he fitted out three ſhips at Plymouth, one of an hundred and twenty tons, another of ſixty, and a third of forty. With theſe ſmall veſſels he ventured into the South Seas, and committed great depredations on the Spaniards. He took nineteen veſſels richly laden, and returned to England in triumph by the Cape of Good Hope. His ſailors and ſoldiers were dreſſed in ſilk; the ſails of his ſhips were of damaſk; his top-ſails cloth of gold; and his booty proportional to this magnificence. His prizes were eſteemed the richeſt ever brought to England.

But the enterprizes of the Engliſh againſt Spain in the Netherlands, were far from being equally ſucceſsful. Stanley and York, whom Leiceſter had appointed governors of Deventer and Zutphen, betrayed their truſt, and ſurrendered theſe towns to the prince of Parma. Alarmed at theſe practices, the States ſent an embaſſy to the Engliſh court, requeſting that the government might be taken from the earl of Leiceſter, and given to ſome more able and prudent general. Elizabeth, notwithſtanding her partiality for her ſavourite, recalled Leiceſter; and Maurice, the young prince of Orange, being appointed governor of the United Provinces, ſoon ſhewed himſelf worthy of his father.

A. D. 1588.

Though Philip had not yet declared war againſt Elizabeth, who had every where committed hoſtilities againſt him, he had long harboured a ſecret and violent reſolution to be revenged on her. His ambition and his hopes were prompted by his preſent proſperity; and if he could ſubdue Elizabeth by an invaſion of England, he hoped to acquire the eternal renown of reuniting the whole Chriſtian world in the catholic communion. Pope Sextus V. not leſs ambitious than Philip, excited him to this enterprize; he again excommunicated the queen, and publiſhed a cruſade againſt her, with the uſual indulgences. Philip had ſpent three years in making ſecret preparations: and no ſooner was his reſolution fully taken, than every part of his vaſt empire reſounded with the noiſe of his armaments, and all his generals, miniſters, and admirals, were employed in promoting the deſign. His fleet, on account of its prodigious ſtrength, and the elevated hopes of the Spaniards, was called the Invincible Armada. A conſecrated banner was procured from the pope, and the gold of Peru was laviſhed on this occaſion. This tremendous armament conſiſted of the following particulars: nineteen thouſand two hundred and ninety ſoldiers; eight thouſand two hundred and fifty ſeamen: two thouſand and eighty galley ſlaves, and two thouſand ſix hundred and thirty pieces of ordnance. The marquis of Santa Croce, an officer of great reputation, was appointed to command the Armada, and by his directions all the naval preparations were conducted. There was hardly a noble family in Spain, but ſent either a ſon, a brother, or a nephew, on board this fleet, in order to acquire riches and eſtates in England, which was conſidered as an eaſy conqueſt. The duke of Parma, in order to inſure ſucceſs, was ordered to provide tranſports, ſufficient to embark an army of twenty-five thouſand men, and land them in England as ſoon as the Spaniſh fleet appeared off the coaſt of Flanders. Ships were accordingly provided, and the duke quartered his troops in the neighbourhood of Gravelines, Dunkirk, and Newport. All the carpenters that could be procured, were employed to build a great number of boats and flat-bottomed veſſels, for tranſporting his cavalry and infantry. The greateſt princes and nobility in Spain and Italy, were filled with the ambition of ſharing in the honour of this great enterprize; and about two thouſand volunteers, many of whom were men of rank, enliſted in the ſervice; nor was the leaſt doubt entertained, but theſe vaſt preparations, conducted by officers of the moſt conſummate ſkill, would be ſucceſsful. Notwithſtanding the pretence of the Spaniards, that this force was to be employed in the Indies, it was concluded by the court of London, to be intended againſt England. The invaſion had been foreforeſeen by the queen; who, finding that ſhe muſt now contend for her crown with the whole force of Spain, prepared for reſiſtance with a mind unterrified at that power, by which all Europe apprehended ſhe would be eaſily overwhelmed. Her magnanimity, on this occaſion, was indeed truly great; but her force was extremely inferior to that of her potent enemy. All the ſailors in the kingdom at that time amounted only to about fourteen thouſand men; and the Engliſh ſhips were in general ſo ſmall, that except a few of the queen's line of battle ſhips, there were not four veſſels belonging to the merchants that exceeded four hundred tons. The royal navy conſiſted only of twenty eight ſail, many of them of a ſmall ſize, and none of them exceeding in bulk our largeſt frigates; and moſt of the reſt rather deſerved the name of pinnaces than of ſhips. The Engliſh fleet had no other advantage than that which aroſe from the courage and dexterity of the mariners, who being accuſtomed to ſail in tempeſtuous ſeas, and to expoſe themſelves to all dangers, as much exceeded the Spaniſh ſailors as their veſſels were inferior in ſize and force to theirs. All the ſea-port towns in England were ordered to furniſh ſhips for reinforcing this ſmall navy, and now diſcovered great alacrity in defending their liberty and religion, againſt the imminent dangers with which they were threatened. Inſtead of fifteen veſſels, which the citizens of London were ordered to equip, they ſhewed their zeal in the common cauſe, (a zeal which would equally redound to their honour, if exerted in the preſent alarming ſtate of public affairs) by fitting out double the number. The nobility and gentry hired, armed, and manned, forty-three ſhips at their own expence. We ſhall be happy, in due ſeaſon, to enrol in this liſt of true patriots the name of that generous, public ſpirited nobleman, whoſe time is now employed in the highly commendable purpoſe of building and fitting out a ſecond rate ſhip of war, to ſtrengthen his majeſty's navy, in order to humble the arrogant proud boaſtings of the combined power of France, Spain, and thoſe ingrates (in this reign the poor) now the high and mighty Lords of the United States. Lord Howard of Effingham, a man of capacity and courage, was made admiral; and under him Drake, Hawkins, and Forbiſher, the moſt renowned ſeamen in Europe. The grand fleet was ſtationed at Plymouth; and a ſmall ſquadron, conſiſting of forty Engliſh and Flemiſh veſſels, commanded by lord Seymour, lay off Dunkirk, in order to intercept the duke of Parma's fleet, that was to convoy the land forces. Twenty thouſand men were ſtationed, in different bodies, along the ſouthern coaſt, and were ordered, if they could not prevent the landing of the Spaniards, to retreat, waſte the country as they retired, and wait till they ſhould be reinforced, from the neighbouring counties, before they came to a battle with the enemy. In order to defend the capital, twenty thouſand foot, and a thouſand horſe, were ſtationed at Tilbury, under the command of the earl of Leiceſter. The main army was compoſed of two thouſand horſe, and thirty-four thouſand foot, commanded by lord Hunſdon, and were appointed to march whitherſoever the enemy appeared.

The fate of England now ſeemed to depend on a ſingle battle; and people of reflection were filled with the moſt dreadful apprehenſions, when they compared the force of fifty thouſand veteran Spaniards, commanded by experienced officers, under the duke of Parma, the greateſt general of the age, with the military power which England, long diſuſed to war, could muſter againſt them. But Elizabeth, undiſmayed by ſurrounding dangers, iſſued her orders with tranquillity, and employed every reſource, which either her domeſtic ſituation, or her foreign alliances, could afford her. She ſent Sir Robert Sidney into Scotland, who prevailed on James to agree to march to her aſſiſtance with all his forces. She engaged the king of Denmark to ſeize a ſquadron of ſhips, which Philip had bought or hired in the Daniſh harbours; and the Hanſe-towns were alſo induced, by the common tie of religion, to delay ſo long the equipment of ſome veſſels in their ports, that they became of no uſe in the intended invaſion. All the proteſtants in Europe conſidered this enterprize as an event on which the fate of their religion depended; and though unable, by their diſtance, to join their forces with thoſe of Elizabeth, beheld with admiration and anxiety the intrepidity with which ſhe endeavoured to encounter the dreadful tempeſt, which was every moment approaching. The queen was ſenſible, that next to her popularity, the firmeſt ſupport of her throne conſiſted in her people's zeal for the proteſtant religion, and the ſtrength of their prejudices againſt popery; ſhe therefore took care to have them reminded of their former danger, from the tyranny of Spain: the inhuman perſecutions which Mary exerciſed againſt the proteſtants, were aſcribed to the councils of that bigotted and imperious nation: the horrid cruelties of the inquiſition, the bloody maſſacres in the Indies, and the ſevere executions in the Netherlands, were ſet before the eyes of the people: a liſt and deſcription was publiſhed, and pictures diſperſed, of the inſtruments of torture, with which it was reported the Spaniſh Armada was loaded; (of which we have given an exact engraving) and every artifice was employed, to animate her ſubjects vigorouſly to defend their religion, their liberties, and their laws. While Elizabeth thus excited the reſentment of the nation againſt popery, ſhe wiſely treated the papiſts themſelves with moderation; and though Sextus V. the preſent pope, had fulminated a new bull of excommunication againſt her, depoſed her therein from the throne, abſolved her ſubjects from their oaths of allegiance, publiſhed a cruſade againſt England, and granted plenary indulgences to all engaged in the Spaniſh invaſion, ſhe rejected all violent councils; and the catholics, ſenſible of this favour, expreſſed in general great zeal for the public ſervice. Some gentlemen of that perſuaſion, ſenſible that they could not reaſonably expect to obtain any truſt or authority, entered as volunteers in the fleet and army: ſome fitted out ſhips at their own expence, and, with a generous diſintereſtedneſs, gave the command of them to proteſtants: while others behaved with activity, in animating their tenants, vaſſals, and neighbours, to defend their country; and all ranks of men, laying aſide party diſtinctions, ſeemed to prepare with one heart to reſiſt their invaders. Still more to excite the martial ſpirit of the nation, Elizabeth appeared on horſeback in the camp at Tilbury, harangued her army, and expreſſed an entire confidence in their loyalty and courage. She aſſured her troops, that the weakneſs of her ſex ſhould not prevent her marching at their head: that ſhe would behold, and reward, their bravery herſelf; and that ſhe would ſooner periſh on the field of battle, than live to ſee the ſlavery of her beloved people. "My arm," ſaid this heroic queen, "is the arm of a woman; but I have the heart of a king, and what is more, of a king of England." The whole army catched the martial ardour of their ſovereign: they were impatient to meet the enemy; and, with an admiration mixed with tenderneſs, they aſked each other, if it were poſſible for Engliſhmen to abandon this glorious cauſe, or, by any dangers, to relinquiſh the defence of their intrepid queen? The pride of haughty Spain was now in the zenith of its glory, and ready to enter upon its grand expedition; but when the Armada was preparing to ſail, the marquis of Santa Croce was ſtopped in his career by death. The duke of Paliano, vice-admiral, died alſo at the very ſame time; and Philip appointed the duke of Medina Sidonia admiral, a nobleman of great family, but wholly unacquainted with maritime affairs. This interval was employed by the Engliſh in making new preparations againſt the impending ſtorm. At length, on the twenty-ninth of May, this formidable Armada ſailed from Liſbon; but being overtaken with a dreadful tempeſt, the fleet was obliged to take ſhelter in the Groyne, having received conſiderable damage. The news of this event having been brought to England, the queen concluded that the Spaniards were diſappointed for this ſummer; and being always ready to ſave expences, ordered Walſingham to write to the admiral, to lay up ſome of the largeſt ſhips, and to diſcharge the ſeamen; but lord Effingham being leſs ſanguine in his hopes, ventured to diſobey theſe orders, and begged leave to retain all the ſhips in the ſervice, though at his own expence: then taking advantage of a north wind, he ſailed towards the coaſt of Spain, with a view to attack the enemy in their harbours; but the wind changing to the oppoſite quarter, he was filled with apprehenſions leſt they ſhould paſs by him at ſea, and therefore returning to Plymouth, he lay at anchor in that harbour. In the mean time, all the damage of the Spaniſh Armada being repaired, it ſet ſail again, after a delay of two months, to proſecute the intended enterprize. This invincible fleet, thought ſo by the vaunting Spaniards, now conſiſted of one hundred and thirty veſſels, near a hundred of which were galleons, and of a larger ſize than any that had ever before been uſed in Europe. It was attended by twenty leſſer ſhips, called caravals, and ten ſalves, with ſix oars each, and was victualled for ſix months. The Spaniſh admiral was ordered to ſail as near the coaſt of France as poſſible, in order to join the duke of Parma, and avoid meeting the Engliſh fleet, which might occaſion ſome delay in the enterprize; for it was never imagined that they would dare to attempt an oppoſition. The interpoſition of Providence in the preſervation of ſtates and kingdoms never more evidently appeared than on this occaſion. After the Spaniards were under ſail they took a fiſherman, from whom they learned that the Engliſh admiral had been lately out at ſea, but it being reported to him that the Spaniſh fleet was, by the late ſtorm, prevented from proſecuting the intended invaſion, he had returned to Plymouth, laid up his ſhips, and diſcharged moſt of the ſailors. From this falſe intelligence the duke of Medina, ſuppoſing that it would be eaſy to deſtroy the Engliſh ſhips, was tempted to break his orders, and to ſail directly for Plymouth: thus a reſolution, founded on the miſtake of a fiſherman, proved the ſafety of England. On the nineteenth of July, about ſun-ſet, the Armada made the Lizard, which the Spaniards happily miſtaking for the Ram-head, bore out to ſea, with a deſign to return and effect their purpoſe the next day. They were ſeen by a Scottiſh pirate. He immediately informed the Engliſh admiral of their approach, who had but juſt got out of port, when he ſaw the Spaniſh Armada approaching in full ſail, diſpoſed in form of a creſcent, and ſtretching to the diſtance of ſeven miles, from the extremity of one diviſion to that of the other. Lord Effingham gave orders to cannonade the Spaniards at a diſtance, and to wait the opportunity which various accidents might afford of intercepting ſome of the enemy's ſcattered veſſels. This anſwered expectation. A large ſhip of Biſcay, which had a conſiderable part of the Spaniſh money on board, took fire; at the ſame time the great galleon of Andaluſia ſprung a maſt; both which veſſels were taken by Sir Francis Drake. While the enemy advanced ſlowly up the Channel, the Engliſh followed their rear, and harraſſed them with perpetual ſkirmiſhes. The Spaniards now began to abate in their confidence of ſucceſs; and they directed their courſe towards Calais, in order to join the duke of Parma. The alarm had no ſooner reached England, than the nobility and gentry ſailed with their veſſels from every harbour, and reinforced the admiral. The earls of Northumberland, Cumberland, and Oxford, Sir Walter Raleigh, Sir Thomas Cecil, Sir Robert Cecil, Sir Charles Blount, Sir Thomas Gerrard, and Sir Thomas Vavaſor, diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their zeal in the ſervice of their country; and the Engliſh fleet, after being joined by their ſhips, amounted to one hundred and forty ſail. The Armada, having reached Calais, caſt anchor, in expectation that the duke of Parma would put to ſea and join his forces. But the duke's veſſels were made for tranſporting ſoldiers, not for fighting; when therefore that general was perſuaded to leave the harbour, he abſolutely refuſed to expoſe his troops to ſuch evident hazards, eſpecially while the Engliſh not only kept at ſea, but ſeemed to triumph over the late ſuppoſed Invincible Armada. While the Spaniards were in this confuſed ſtate of irreſolution, the vigilant Howard took eight of his ſmaller ſhips, and having filled them with combuſtibles, ſent them one after another into the midſt of the enemy's fleet. Terrified at this unuſual appearance of fire ſhips, the Spaniards cut their cables, and diſperſed with the utmoſt diſorder and precipitation. In the midſt of this confuſion, the Engliſh fell upon them, and took twelve of their large ſhips, beſides damaging many more. The Spaniards would now willingly have returned immediately into their own ports; for their admiral found, that though he had loſt a conſiderable part of his own navy, he had deſtroyed only one ſmall Engliſh veſſel; but the wind not permitting his paſſage back through the Channel, he reſolved to proceed northward, and to return home by ſailing round the iſland. For ſome time the Engliſh fleet followed him, and had not their ammunition fallen ſhort, they would have obliged the whole Armada to ſurrender at diſcretion. This reſolution the duke of Medina had once taken, but the perſuaſions of his confeſſor diverted him from it. The event however proved equally fatal to the Spaniards; for a violent ſtorm overtook, and completed the deſtruction of the Invincible Armada. The ſhips, which had already loſt their anchors, were obliged to keep the ſea: the mariners, who were unaccuſtomed to ſuch hardſhips, and unable to govern their unwieldly veſſels, were forced to yield to the raging fury of the tempeſt, and their ſhips being driven, ſome on the weſtern iſlands of Scotland, and others on the coaſt of Ireland, where they were wrecked, not half of the fleet returned to Spain, and thoſe veſſels that did eſcape from their furious purſuers were in a moſt ſhattered condition. It is ſaid Philip, though a ſlave to ambition, had ſuch command over himſelf, that being informed of theſe diſaſters, he fell on his knees, and thanked God that the calamity was no greater. On the other hand, the whole kingdom of England was one continued ſcene of joy. A public thankſgiving was ordered by Elizabeth, and ſhe herſelf repaired in ſolemn proceſſion to St. Paul's, to perform that ſacred duty. Eleven ſtandards, taken from the enemy, were hung up in the church, and the queen cauſed two medals to be ſtruck, in commemoration of this glorious and deciſive victory over the Spaniards. She alſo beſtowed rewards on many of her officers, who had ſo nobly exerted themſelves in defence of their country. About this time died Robert Dudley, earl of Leiceſter, the queen's great but unworthy favourite: but the queen's affection ſeemed to terminate with his death; for ſhe cauſed his goods to be expoſed to ſale, in order to reimburſe herſelf for the money ſhe had lent him.

A. D. 1589. The victory obtained over the Spaniſh Armada, encouraged the Engliſh to engage in any enterprizes againſt Spain, that required their aſſiſtance. Don Antonio, a natural ſon of the royal family of Portugal, laying claim to the crown, the people of England roſolved to endeavour to conquer it for him. Sir Francis Drake, and Sir John Norris, were leaders in this romantic expedition. They hired ſhips, and provided arms at their own expence; near twenty thouſand volunteers reſorted to their banners; but the queen contributed only ſix ſhips, and ſixty thouſand pounds. The fleet ſailed from Plymouth on the fifth of April, and arriving ſafely at the Groyne, entered the harbour, burned ſome ſhips of war, and defeated an army of four or five thouſand men, aſſembled to oppoſe them. They now ſailed for Portugal, and in their paſſage were met by the young earl of Eſſex, who, inflamed with a thirſt for military glory, had, unknown to the queen, equipped a few ſhips at his own expence, and ſecretly left England. As the Spaniards had prepared againſt this invaſion, the Engliſh had the misfortune to find their attack on Liſbon unſucceſsful. On their arrival, they became maſters of the weſtern ſuburb of Liſbon without oppoſition; but the next day a large body of Spaniards ſallied from the citadel, and cut off ſeveral of the Engliſh, with ſome of their beſt officers. The earl of Eſſex behaved with the moſt ſurprizing courage on this occaſion; yet it was determined not to make any farther attempt upon the capital; upon which, after blowing up the caſtle of Caſcaris, and burning Vigo, they returned to England, having loſt a great number of men by ſickneſs and fatigue. In the mean time James, king of Scotland, having renewed his ſuit to the princeſs of Denmark, and ſtill finding obſtacles from the intrigues of Elizabeth, he broke through all her policy; and having cauſed his marriage to be celebrated by proxy, the princeſs embarked for Scotland, but was driven by a ſtorm into a port of Norway; on which James went to Norway, carried his queen thence to Copenhagen, where he paſſed the winter, and the next ſpring conducted her ſafe to Scotland.

In France, the Hugonots were ſtill perſecuted by the League. Unforeſeen events, however, changed the face of things. The inhabitants of Paris, intoxicated with the admiration of Guiſe, and ſtrongly prejudiced againſt the king, took up arms againſt him, and Henry was obliged to fly from his capital for ſafety. Diſſembling his reſentment, he loaded Guiſe and his partizans with favours. Deceived by theſe appearances of friendſhip, Guiſe, and his brother the cardinal of Lorraine, came to court, and were both aſſaſſinated by the king's orders. This perfidious conduct rendered the League more formidable than ever. The citizens of Paris renounced their allegiance, and were followed by thoſe of many conſiderable places in the kingdom. Henry finding it impoſſible to reſiſt the ſtorm that was gathering around him, was obliged to have recourſe to the Hugonots for aſſiſtance; and being ſupported by his chief nobility, he aſſembled an army of near forty thouſand men, and advanced to the gates of Paris. But the city was ſaved by the bloody ſpirit of bigotry which inflamed Jaques Clement, a Dominican monk. This zealot took the reſolution of ſacrificing his own life to ſave the church. He found means to be admitted into the king's preſence, and plunged a dagger into the breaſt of his ſovereign, who expired on the firſt of Auguſt. The king of Navarre, afterwards Henry IV, aſcended the throne; but found, by the rebellion of his ſubjects, he had a kingdom to ſubdue.

Near the concluſion of this year, died that conſummate ſtateſman and wiſe counſellor, Sir Francis Walſingham, ſecretary of ſtate, one of the moſt accompliſhed miniſters that ever appeared in this or any other country, not more diſtinguiſhed by his ſplendid abilities, than his unſullied virtues. He was chancellor of the duchy of Lancaſter, and knight of the garter. The nation ſuſtained an irreparable loſs by the death of this great politician. Though he had paſſed through many high employments in the ſtate, and had been very frugal in his expences, he died ſo poor, that his family was obliged to give him a private burial. He left only one daughter, married firſt to Sir Philip Sidney, and afterwards to the earl of Eſſex, the queen's favourite. He was ſurvived but a few months by Ambroſe Dudley, earl of Warwick; Sir Thomas Randolph, chancellor of the Exchequer; Sir James Crofts, comptroller of the houſhold; George Talbot, earl of Shrewſbury; and Thomas, lord Wentworth, formerly governor of Calais. Theſe were all faithful ſervants to the crown; though not one of them was more regretted than Sir Chriſtopher Hatton, chancellor of England, and of the univerſity of Oxford; a man of unſhaken probity, firmly attached to the intereſt of his country, and a generous patron of learning.

A. D. 1590. The prejudices entertained againſt Henry IV. on account of his religion, made a great part of his nobility deſert him; yet he gained a complete victory over his enemies, which enabled him to blockade Paris; when the duke of Parma, having received orders to march to its relief, he obliged Henry to raiſe the blockade. Henry afterwards obtained freſh ſupplies from Elizabeth, which enabled him to carry on the war with ſucceſs; but finding inſurmountable obſtacles to his aſcending the throne, from the bigotry of the zealous partizans of the League, he at laſt renounced the proteſtant religion, and was received into the boſom of the Romiſh church. During theſe tranſactions in France, ſeveral naval operations were carried on in the Weſt Indies, by different ſquadrons, with various ſucceſs. The lord Thomas Howard was diſpatched, early in the ſpring, to the Azores, with a ſquadron of ſeven ſhips, to intercept the galleons in their return to Europe. The Spaniſh monarch, apprized of this deſign, fitted out fifty-five ſail of ſhips. Howard, who knew nothing of this ſtrong fleet, eſcaped with difficulty. The revenge was not ſo fortunate. Sir Richard Grenville, after an engagement of fifteen hours with the whole force of the enemy, was obliged to ſurrender, yet not before he was mortally wounded. The reſt of the ſquadron returned to England, diſappointed indeed in their expectations of acquiring riches from the new world, but not in eſſentially diſtreſſing the enemy; for the plate fleet had been ſo long detained at the Havannah, through fear of the Engliſh, that they were obliged to put to ſea at an improper ſeaſon; in conſequence of which the greater part were loſt before they reached the ports of Spain.

A. D. 1592. All the vaſt deſigns of Philip were at this period rendered abortive by the death of the prince of Parma, who died in the forty-fifth year of his age. Even Elizabeth is ſaid to have dropped ſome generous expreſſions to the memory of that brave general; and, perhaps, few princes ever excelled him in virtue, in civil, and military accompliſhments. His merits were ſoon conſpicuous after his death. No other general had authority ſufficient to maintain a proper diſcipline among the Spaniſh troops; the ſoldiers mutinied, and a great number of them deſerted.

Elizabeth continued to practice her favourite plan of humbling the pride of Philip, by cutting the ſinews of his ſtrength in the Weſt Indies. Fifteen ſhips were ſent to annoy the Spaniards, under the command of Sir Walter Raleigh; but his fleet being diſperſed in a ſtorm, the expedition failed in its grand aim. However, a ſmall ſquadron was diſpatched to cruize off the Azores, and Sir Martin Forbiſher to the coaſt of Spain, in order to wait for the carracks from the Eaſt Indies. Burroughs, who commanded the firſt of theſe ſquadrons, burned one galleon, and took another very richly laden. The money of this capture publicly known amounted to one hundred and fifty thouſand pounds, and the embezzlements were thought to be at leaſt equal in value.

A. D. 1593. The parliament meeting in February, took into conſideration a book written by Parſons the jeſuit, attempting to prove that the right of ſucceſſion was veſted in the Infanta of Spain. The book was condemned, and all perſons deemed guilty of high treaſon who ſhould keep it in their houſes. Peter Wentworth preſented a petition to the upper houſe, requeſting that they would join with the commons in a ſupplication to her majeſty that ſhe would be pleaſed to entail the ſucceſſion of the crown. Elizabeth was offended at this attempt: Wentworth was ſent to the Tower; and Sir William Bromley, who ſeconded the motion, to the Fleet priſon. But even this arbitrary proceeding could not repreſs their farther attempts for freedom. Morrice, attorney of the court-wards, expoſed, in their proper colours, the enormous abuſes of the eccleſiaſtical commiſſion, and made a motion for redreſſing thoſe grievances. Exaſperated at the temerity of Morrice, the queen ſent for the ſpeaker, and told him, that ſhe had aſſembled the parliament for two purpoſes only; to maintain the uniformity of the national religion, and to provide for the defence of the kingdom againſt the enormous power of Spain; that their deliberations muſt turn entirely on theſe points; that ſhe had already enjoined them not to meddle either with the affairs of the ſtate or religion; and wondered how any perſon could be ſo preſuming as to attempt a ſubject ſo expreſsly contrary to her prohibition. Morrice felt the weight of the queen's reſentment: he was ſeized in the houſe by the ſerjeant at arms, diſcharged from his office, diſabled from acting in his profeſſion, and confined ſome years in Tilbury caſtle. Soon after this, a ſevere bill was paſſed againſt non-conformiſts of all perſuaſions. It was enacted, that any perſon above ſixteen years of age, who obſtinately refuſed, during the ſpace of one month, to attend the public ſervice of the church of England, ſhould be committed to priſon; that if, after having been condemned for this offence, he perſiſted three months in his refuſal, he muſt depart the realm; and that if he either refuſed this condition, or returned from his baniſhment, he was to ſuffer capitally as a felon, without benefit of clergy. Both catholics and puritans had reaſon to complain of this law; but the commons were entirely paſſive; they even granted the queen extraordinary ſupplies, to reimburſe the great expence which had attended the defence of England againſt the Spaniſh invaſion.

The diſaffected party ſtill continued to plot againſt Elizabeth and her government. One Heſket exhorted Ferdinand, earl of Derby, to aſſume the title of king, as grandſon of Mary, daughter to Henry VII. aſſuring him he would be ſupported in his claim by Philip; and threatened him at the ſame time with death, on his noncompliance with, or revelation of the ſcheme. The earl, however, diſcovered it; the traitor was brought to condign puniſhment, and he himſelf died a few months after. At the ſame time a plot was concerted againſt the queen by the count de Fuentes, and don Diego d'Ibarra, who directed the Spaniſh affairs in the Netherlands. Theſe bribed Roderic Lopez, a Portugueſe Jew, and one of her majeſty's phyſicians, to take her off by poiſon. But the deſign being diſcovered, he, with two of his accomplices, were apprehended, and confeſſing their correſpondence with Fuentes and Ibarra, were executed as traitors.

A. D. 1595. At the ſame time the queen was making preparations for carrying the war into the territories of Spain, ſeveral atchievements were performed at ſea by the Engliſh; but the moſt remarkable was an expedition of Sir Walter Raleigh to Guiana, a large tract of land in South America, rather poſſeſſed than inhabited by the Spaniards. At his own expence, he had ſent one Whiddon to view the coaſt, and make all the obſervations in his power. From his report, Raleigh reſolved to wreſt that extenſive country out of the hands of the Spaniards. His undertaking was ſo well approved, that both the treaſurer and admiral of England contributed to the expences of fitting out a fleet for carrying the deſign into execution; and on the ſixth of February Sir Walter ſailed from Plymouth. On the twenty-ſecond of March, he took the city of St. Joſeph, in the iſland of Trinidada, and made Boreo, the Spaniſh governor, priſoner. Having procured all the information poſſible with regard to the ſtrength and riches of Guiana, Raleigh manned his long-boats with about one hundred men, and proceeded above four hundred miles up the river Oroonoko; but met with ſo many difficulties from the navigation, and the heat of the climate, that he did not reap all the advantages ſo brave and dangerous an undertaking deſerved. It is certain that he made great diſcoveries; and though we have no authentic account of the riches he acquired in this undertaking, there is ſufficient reaſon to believe they were very conſiderable. He was received with the higheſt applauſe on his return, and a very pompous account of his voyage was publiſhed.

A. D. 1596. The queen, diſguſted on ſome accounts with the States of the Netherlands, demanded a reimburſement of all the money ſhe had expended in their defence. The States, beſides alledging the conditions of a former treaty, by which they were not bound to repay her till a peace was concluded, pleaded their poverty and diſtreſs, then ſtiling themſelves the poor United States; the ſuperiority of the Spaniards, and the difficulty of ſupporting the war. After much negociation, a new treaty was formed, by which they agreed to free the queen immediately from the expence of the Engliſh auxiliaries, computed at forty thouſand pounds a year; to pay her annually twenty thouſand pounds for ſome years; to aſſiſt her with a certain number of ſhips; and to conclude no treaty or peace without her conſent. They alſo bound themſelves, after a peace ſhould be concluded with Spain, to pay her annually a hundred thouſand pounds, during four years, in lieu of all demands.

Elizabeth had now completed her preparations for attacking Philip's dominions in Europe, by way of retaliation for his intended invaſion of England. For this purpoſe a formidable fleet was equipped at Plymouth, conſiſting of a hundred and ſeventy ſhips, ſeventeen of which were men of war, and the reſt ſmall veſſels and tenders. To theſe the Dutch added twenty ſhips. They had on board ſix thouſand three hundred and ſixty ſoldiers, a thouſand volunteers, together with ſix thouſand ſeven hundred and ſeventy-two ſeamen. This fleet was commanded by lord Effingham, high admiral, and the land forces by the earl of Eſſex; both which commanders, agreeable to the public ſpirit of that age, expended great ſums of their own in this armament. Lord Thomas Howard, Sir Walter Raleigh, Sir Coniers Clifford, Sir George Carew, and Sir Francis Vere, had commands in this expedition, and were appointed a council to the admiral and general. On the firſt of June they ſet ſail for Cadiz, ſending before them ſome armed tenders, which intercepted every ſhip that could carry intelligence to the enemy. Near Cadiz they took an Iriſh veſſel, whereby they received intelligence that the port was full of merchant ſhips of great value; and that the Spaniards, having no apprehenſions of an enemy, lived in perfect ſecurity. It was propoſed by Sir Walter Raleigh, in a council of war, to attack the ſhips and gallies in the harbour, which reſolution was ſtrongly ſeconded by the young earl of Eſſex, who burnt with an eager deſire of ſignalizing his courage on this occaſion. He appeared, however, greatly mortified, on being informed by Effingham, that the queen, dreading the effects of his youthful ardour, had given ſecret orders that he ſhould not be permitted to command the van in the attack. This poſt of honour was allotted to Sir Walter Raleigh, in the Warſpite, and lord Thomas Howard, in the Nonpareil, who were ſeconded by Sir George Carew, in the Mary Roſe, Sir Robert Southwell, in the Lion, Sir Francis Vere, in the Rainbow, vice-admiral Croſs, in the Swiftſure, and Sir Coniers Clifford, in the Dreadnought. The Spaniards, in order more effectually to oppoſe their enemy, ranged their gallies under the walls of the city, ſo as to flank the Engliſh ſhips as they paſſed: culverins were planted to ſecure the channel of the harbour; and the artillery, both of Fort St. Philip, and the curtain of the fortifications, were brought to bear on the Engliſh fleet. Beſides theſe, the Spaniards had put guns on board all their large galleons, which were covered by Fort Puntal, ſituated in the middle of the harbour. At break of day the Engliſh van advanced to the attack, when Eſſex, forgetting the promiſe he had made to the admiral to ſtay in the centre of the fleet, preſſed forward to the hotteſt poſt of danger and glory. Inſpired with emulation, the Engliſh received with undaunted bravery the fire from Fort St. Philip, the curtain, and ſeventeen gallies; but Raleigh anſwered only by a flouriſh of his trumpets, purſuing his courſe, in order to encourage the ſhips that followed him, and to reſerve his fire for the body of the enemy. After a long and moſt deſperate engagement, Sir Walter prepared to board the Spaniſh admiral, a ſhip of fifteen hundred tons; but the Spaniards, perceiving his intention, ran her on ſhore, and ſet her on fire. Three other galleons followed the example of their admiral, but two of them were ſaved by the Engliſh boats. Eſſex then landed at the Puntals, and inſtantly marched to the attack of Cadiz. Five hundred Spaniards advanced to meet him, but being ſtruck with a panic, they retired into the city with the utmoſt precipitation, and were cloſely followed by the Engliſh. Cadiz was now in the utmoſt conſternation; and before any meaſures couſd be taken for making a proper defence, the Engliſh had forced the gate, and were ſoon in poſſeſſion of the market-place. The garriſon and inhabitants fled to the caſtle and town-houſe, but ſoon offered to capitulate; and it was agreed their lives ſhould be ſpared, on the payment of ſeventy thouſand ducats. A prodigious quantity of ſilver was found in the place, and ſent immediately on board the Engliſh fleet. While Eſſex was thus employed in the reduction of Cadiz, Sir Walter Raleigh was ſent to burn the merchant ſhips at Port Real. The Spaniards offered for their ranſom two millions of ducats, but Raleigh rejected the offer, ſaying, he came to deſtroy, not to ranſom. The Spaniards, however, found means to unload ſome of their ſhips, and ſet fire to others. Beſides the merchant ſhips, two galleons, thirteen men of war, eleven ſhips freighted for the Indies, and thirteen others, were captured. A prodigious quantity of military ſtores, prepared for an expedition againſt England, were likewiſe deſtroyed. No Engliſhman of note, except Sir John Wingfield, periſhed in this memorable conqueſt, and about two hundred men. The whole loſs of the Spaniards was eſtimated at twenty millions of ducats. Eſſex regarded this glorious victory only as a ſtep to farther conqueſts. He inſiſted on keeping poſſeſſion of Cadiz; and propoſed to intercept the carracks at the Azores, to aſſault the Groyne, to take St. Sebaſtian and St. Andero: but all the other ſeamen and ſoldiers were impatient to return home, in order to ſecure their plunder. Eſſex complained to the queen of their want of ſpirit; and ſhe herſelf was not pleaſed with their returning without endeavouring to intercept the India fleet, loaded with treaſure: but though ſhe admired the enterprizing genius of Eſſex, ſhe could not help teſtifying her approbation and eſteem for the gallant behaviour of the other officers. She created the admiral earl of Nottingham, at which Eſſex was highly offended; and it being ſaid in the preamble to the patent, that this honour was conferred on him for his good ſervices, in taking Cadiz and deſtroying the Spaniſh ſhips, this merit Eſſex aſcribed ſolely to himſelf; he even offered to maintain his claim, by ſingle combat, againſt the earl of Nottingham, his ſon, or any of his relations.

A. D. 1597.

Information having been received, that the Spaniards, notwithſtanding the damage their fleet had ſuffered at Cadiz, were preparing a ſquadron at Ferrol, and the Groyne, and were marching troops thither, in order to make a deſcent upon Ireland, Elizabeth reſolved to deſtroy the ſhips in thoſe harbours. For this purpoſe ſhe prepared a large fleet of one hundred and twenty ſail, ſeventeen of which were her own ſhips, forty-three were ſmaller veſſels, and the reſt tenders and victuallers. On board of this fleet were embarked five thouſand new raiſed ſoldiers, and a thouſand veteran troops, brought by Sir Thomas Vere from the Netherlands. The earl of Eſſex, who was commander in chief both of the ſea and land forces, was at the head of one ſquadron; Sir Walter Raleigh was appointed vice-admiral of another; lord Thomas Howard of a third, and lord Mountjoy was commander of the land forces under Eſſex. On the ninth of July they ſet ſail from Plymouth; but were no ſooner out of harbour than they were diſperſed and ſhattered by a violent ſtorm, and before they could be refitted their proviſions were ſo far ſpent, that it would have been unſafe to have taken ſo numerous an army along with them. Eſſex therefore diſmiſſed all the ſoldiers, except a thouſand veterans under Vere; and abandoning all thoughts of attacking Ferrol or the Groyne, confined the object of his expedition to intercepting the fleet from Spaniſh America, which was about this time expected to ſtop at the Azores. Thither Eſſex bent his courſe, after having informed Raleigh that he intended to attack Fayal, one of the Azore iſlands. The ſquadrons being by ſome accident ſeparated, Raleigh arrived firſt before that iſland; and, having waited ſome time for the general, thought it moſt prudent to begin the attack alone, leſt a further delay ſhould give the inhabitants time to prepare for their defence. He ſucceeded in the attempt; but Eſſex, thinking that Raleigh had deprived him of the glory of the action, was ſo highly offended, that he caſhiered ſeveral of the captains who had exerted themſelves, with their uſual bravery, to take the place; and would raſhly have inflicted the ſame puniſhment on Raleigh himſelf, had not lord Thomas Howard interpoſed with his good offices, and perſuaded that gallant officer to make his ſubmiſſion to the general. Eſſex, being appeaſed, received Raleigh into favour, and reſtored the other officers to their commands. This miſunderſtanding, however, laid the firſt foundation of that violent animoſity which afterwards ſubſiſted between theſe two gallant commanders. Eſſex now diſpoſed his fleet in a manner proper for intercepting the galleons; and Sir William Monſon, falling in with them, made the ſignal which had been agreed upon: but the Spaniſh fleet no ſooner ſaw the enemy, than they made all the ſail poſſible to Tercera, one of the largeſt of the Azore iſlands, before the Engliſh fleet could overtake them; Eſſex, however, took three ſhips, which were ſo rich as to pay all the expences of the expedition; the reſt, that eſcaped, ſheltered themſelves in the well-fortified and ſafe harbour of Angara. Upon the return of the fleet, the cauſes of the miſcarriage of this enterprize were much canvaſſed in England. The courtiers ſided with Eſſex or Raleigh, according to the reſpect they bore to each; but the people in general, who were pleaſed with the ſpirit and generoſity of the former, were inclined to juſtify his conduct: the queen, who loved the one, and eſteemed the other, maintained a kind of neutrality between both parties.

A. D. 1598. Henry IV. king of France, having received overtures for a peace with Philip, Elizabeth diſpatched Sir Robert Carew to France, in order, if poſſible, to break off the treaty; but all her attempts were in vain, as Henry was determined to give peace to his kingdom, now reduced to the moſt deplorable condition. The negociations were carried on at Vervins; and on the twelfth of June the peace was ratified by Henry; who was put in poſſeſſion of all the places that had been taken by Philip during the courſe of the civil wars. Thus he procured leiſure to attend to the domeſtic ſettlement of the diſtracted ſtate; and, by the wiſdom of his government, he, in a ſhort time, raiſed France from the miſery in which that kingdom was involved to a more flouriſhing condition than it had ever before enjoyed. Elizabeth was ſenſible it was in her power to make peace with Spain on equitable terms; yet, though at firſt averſe to war, ſhe ſeemed now to have attained ſuch an aſcendancy over the enemy, that ſhe was unwilling to put a ſtop to her proſperous fortune. Her paſt victories had entirely ſecured her from any dangerous invaſion. She conſidered, that the weak condition of Philip in the Indies, and the annual return of his treaſures from thence, afforded her a proſpect of the moſt laſting advantages: that Philip, after his peace with France, ſhould ſhe conſent to an accommodation, would be able to turn his whole force againſt the revolted provinces of the Netherlands, which, though they had greatly increaſed their power by commerce and good government, would, nevertheleſs, without her aſſiſtance, be unable to maintain a war againſt ſo powerful a prince; and that it would be unſafe and diſhonourable to abandon their cauſe, till they were placed in a ſtate of greater ſecurity. The earl of Eſſex encouraged her in theſe ſentiments. Lord Burleigh, on the contrary, was deſirous of a peace; and the rivalſhip of theſe two noblemen made each of them inſiſt the more ſtrenuouſly on his own counſel; but the arguments of Eſſex, whoſe perſon was agreeable to the queen, prevailed: the favourite ſeemed daily to gain an aſcendancy over the miniſter; and had he been poſſeſſed of a ſelf-command equal to his ſhining qualities, he might have ſo ſtrongly rivetted himſelf into the queen's affections that none of his enemies could have hurt him; but his high ſpirit could ill ſubmit to the implicit obedience which Elizabeth, ever jealous of her prerogative, had been accuſtomed to receive from her ſubjects. That nobleman was no leſs diſtinguiſhed by his underſtanding, than by his birth and figure. He was brave, generous, ſincere; a firm friend; active, and paſſionately fond of glory; but carried away by his paſſions, and incapable of yielding to the rein of prudence. Theſe paſſions at laſt proved his deſtruction.[a]

On the fourth of Auguſt died, in an advanced age, lord Burleigh, equally lamented by the queen and the people: a zealous and faithful counſellor. This truly great man had long and earneſtly requeſted his miſtreſs to grant him ſome moments of eaſe between buſineſs and the grave; but he aſked in vain. He continued immerſed in all the fatigues of office, till death gave him that repoſe that was denied him by Elizabeth. Lord Burleigh was now on the verge of eighty, and though many miniſters had lived with leſs envy, none ever died with greater reputation. He was chiefly diſtinguiſhed for ſolidity of underſtanding, probity of manners, and indefatigable application to the duties of his ſtation. He was the only man in this reign who left a conſiderable fortune to his poſterity; a fortune not acquired by rapine or plunder, but gained by the regular profits of his office, and preſerved by his frugality. This great ſtateſman wrote La Complainte de l'Ame Pechereſſe, in French verſe, now extant in the king's library; the Execution of Juſtice in England; Meditations on the State of England; Lord Burleigh's Precepts, &c. In a ſhort time after expired, at Madrid, Philip II. king of Spain, the principal enemy of Elizabeth, in the ſeventy-third year of his age, and the forty-third of his reign. This prince had transferred to his daughter, who was married to the arch-duke Albert, the poſſeſſion of the Netherlands; but as it was thought he would have no iſſue, and as the reverſion was reſerved to the crown of Spain, the States ſtill obſtinately perſiſted in their reſiſtance to the Spaniſh arms.

Nothing but the imprudence of Eſſex could now have ſhaken his credit with the queen; but his lofty ſpirit could ill brook controul, even from his miſtreſs. Diſputing with her, one day, on the choice of a governor for Ireland, he was ſo heated, and carried matters ſo high, as imprudently to turn his back on her, with an air of contempt. At this provocation, her anger, naturally violent, was raiſed to ſuch a pitch, that ſhe inſtantly gave him a box on the ear, adding her uſual paſſionate expreſſion, which ſhe thought ſuited his impertinence: when inſtead of recollecting himſelf, and making the ſubmiſſions her ſex required, he clapt his hand upon his ſword, and ſwore, in his turn, that he would not have taken ſo groſs an affront even from Henry, her father. The admiral and vice-chamberlain interpoſed between the ſovereign and the ſubject, and prevented any farther conſequences at that time. The chancellor Egerton, who had a regard for Eſſex, exhorted him to repair his indiſcretion, by making proper acknowledgments; but he was ſo deeply ſtung with the diſhonour, that he not only wrote him a ſpirited letter, full of reſentment againſt the queen, which breathed all the violence of his haughty ſoul, but even ſhewed the letter to his friends, who imprudently diſperſed copies of it: yet, notwithſtanding this additional provocation, the queen's love for him prevailed, and Eſſex became the only confidant of Elizabeth, and ſole director of the affairs of the kingdom.

The troubles which ſtill ſubſiſted in Ireland opened a new ſcene for his ambition, and he raſhly engaged in an undertaking which terminated in crimes and misfortunes. Hugh O'Neale, whom the queen had created earl of Tyrone, and whoſe treachery was equal to his ferocious valour, renewed at this time his rebellious practices. He had already aſſumed the character of the deliverer of his country, and the patron of Iriſh liberty; and having received aſſiſtance from the king of Spain, gained advantages conſiderable enough to make the court of London very uneaſy. It was therefore determined to proſecute the war with vigour, and ſubdue the rebels by extraordinary efforts. For this purpoſe the queen had caſt her eye on Charles Blount, lord Mountjoy; but the earl of Eſſex, ambitious of glory, repreſented the neceſſity of appointing ſome perſon more experienced in war, and of higher quality. Being underſtood to mean himſelf, his deſire was granted, and Elizabeth honoured him with the title of lord deputy of Ireland, granting him more extenſive authority than had ever been conferred on any governor before; being furniſhed with a commiſſion, whereby he was empowered either to continue or finiſh the war: to pardon the earl of Tyrone, and other rebels; an authority never granted to any of his predeceſſors. Had Eſſex liſtened to the advice of his enemies, he could not have engaged in a more fatal undertaking: but the young earl was incapable of caution: he imagined that every difficulty would give way before him; that his preſence, at the head of a numerous army, would awe the rebels into peace, and that he ſhould return crowned with laurel. The queen's preparations were equal to the tenderneſs ſhe cheriſhed for her favourite. To enſure ſucceſs, ſhe gave him an army of twenty thouſand foot, and two thouſand horſe, which, it was ſuppoſed, would be ſufficient to overwhelm the rebels in one campaign. Nor did the earl of Nottingham, Sir Robert Cecil, lord Cobham, and Sir Walter Raleigh, the enemies of Eſſex, throw any obſtacles in the way of theſe preparations; for they imagined the higher the expectations of the queen were raiſed, it would be the more difficult for him to ſatiſfy her.

A. D. 1599. About the middle of March, Eſſex ſet out for his government, attended with the acclamations of the populace, and accompanied by a numerous train of nobility and gentry, who from affection to his perſon attached themſelves to his fortunes. After his arrival in Ireland, he appointed his intimate friend the earl of Southampton general of the horſe, though that nobleman had incurred the queen's diſpleaſure, and though ſhe herſelf had expreſsly enjoined Eſſex not to give him any command; and even repeated orders were hardly ſufficient to induce him to revoke the commiſſion. The reſt of his conduct was conformable to this beginning. Inſtead of leading his powerful army into Ulſter againſt Tyrone, he ſuffered himſelf to be perſuaded by the Iriſh council to march into Munſter, ſituated at the other extremity of the kingdom. He indeed reduced the rebels to ſubmiſſion, but he loſt a conſiderable part of his army in the attempt, and had no ſooner left the country than they again revolted. By this time the ſeaſon was conſiderably advanced, his army ſickly, and greatly reduced in their numbers, ſo that he was obliged to requeſt a reinforcement of two thouſand men, in order to enable him to march againſt the chief of the rebels. The troops were immediately ſent, and Eſſex advanced into Ulſter. Tyrone, though with an army greatly ſuperior in numbers to that of the Engliſh, wiſely avoided a deciſive action, and propoſed a conference with Eſſex, in order, as he pretended, to put a ſtop to the flames of civil diſcord, which had ſo long waſted Ireland. The offer was accepted, and the two generals met without any of their attendants. Tyrone behaved, during the conference, with the greateſt ſubmiſſion, and a ceſſation of arms was concluded till the firſt of May. This unexpected iſſue of the moſt expenſive enterprize that Elizabeth had ever undertaken exaſperated her againſt Eſſex; and her chagrin was heightened by his writing many letters to the council, filled with peeviſh expreſſions, and lamenting that the calumnies of his enemies ſhould be believed againſt him. She informed him of her diſſatisfaction; and commanded him to continue in Ireland till he received her orders to the contrary. The haughty favourite was now ſufficiently alarmed. Dreading, that if he continued any longer at any diſtance from the court, he ſhould loſe all his influence with the queen, while his enemies enjoyed the malignant ſatisfaction of triumphing in his fall, he determined to diſobey the orders of his miſtreſs. He accordingly left Ireland, and arrived at London before any one was apprized of his intentions. He immediately repaired to court, and though covered with dirt and ſweat, he ran up ſtairs to the preſence chamber, then to the privy-chamber, nor did he ſtop till he was in the bed-chamber of the queen, who was juſt riſen, and was ſitting with her hair about her face. Whether Elizabeth's tenderneſs awakened at the ſight of her favourite, or whether ſurprize prevented her from attending to punctilios, ſhe gave him a very kind and flattering reception; and on his departure he was heard to thank God, that though he had met with many troubles and ſtorms abroad, he had found at home a placid and ſweet calm. But this promiſing interval was deceitful. Elizabeth's favourable diſpoſition was entirely owing to the ſurprize at the ſudden and unexpected appearance of her favourite; but ſhe had no ſooner time for recollection, than all his faults recurred to her. When Eſſex, therefore, waited on her in the afternoon, he found her behaviour much altered: ſhe ordered him to be twice examined by the council; to be committed to the cuſtody of the lord-keeper, Egerton, and to be excluded from all company, even from that of his counteſs. Eſſex expreſſed great humiliation and ſorrow; but his vexation, and the triumph obtained by his enemies, preyed ſo deeply on his ſpirits, that he fell into a diſorder, which ſeemed to endanger his life. The queen, who had always declared, that her ſeverity was intended to correct, and not to ruin him, no ſooner heard of his condition, than ſhe was alarmed at his danger, and ordered eight phyſicians to conſult upon his caſe. Being informed that there was reaſon to fear he would not recover, ſhe ſent one of her phyſicians to deliver a meſſage, that if ſhe thought ſuch a ſtep conſiſtent with her honour, ſhe would herſelf pay him a viſit. Thoſe who ſtood by, carefully obſerving her countenance, remarked, that in pronouncing theſe words, her eyes ſwam in tears. The enemies of Eſſex were greatly alarmed at theſe ſymptoms of the queen's returning affection, particularly Sir Walter Raleigh, who was ſo affected by it, that he, in his turn, was ſeized with ſickneſs; and the queen, who had a reſpect for him, ſent him alſo a favourable meſſage, in which ſhe expreſſed her wiſhes for his recovery. Elizabeth's medicine was ſucceſsful with both theſe aſpiring rivals; and Eſſex being allowed to enjoy the company of his counteſs, and to entertain more agreeable hopes with reſpect to himſelf, ſoon became out of danger. The queen was then perſuaded to believe, that he had counterfeited his illneſs, in order to excite compaſſion; and this induced her to relapſe into her former rigour. He ſent her a rich preſent, with a letter, on new year's day, as was then uſual among the courtiers: ſhe read the letter, but rejected the preſent. However, ſhe ſoon after allowed him to retire to his own houſe; and though he ſtill remained in cuſtody, and was allowed no company but his counteſs, he ſent her a letter of thanks for this indulgence. The counteſs of Eſſex, who was the daughter of Sir Francis Walſingham, had, as well as her huſband, a refined taſte in literature, and the chief conſolation of Eſſex, during this period of anxiety and ſuſpence, conſiſted in her company, and his reading, with her, thoſe inſtructive and entertaining authors, which he had never entirely neglected during his greateſt proſperity.

A. D. 1600. The departure of Eſſex from Ireland revived the hopes of Tyrone. The Engliſh army, now without a leader, was not ſufficient to ſtop his progreſs: he reduced the whole province of Ulſter to obedience; and being encouraged by a bull ſent from pope Clement VII. granting him and his adherents the ſame indulgences as thoſe who fought for the recovery of the Holy Land, he flattered himſelf with being ſoon maſter of the whole kingdom. He was alſo promiſed a ſupply of men and money from Spain; and having received a conſecrated plume from the pope, he called himſelf the champion of the catholic religion. Alarmed at theſe circumſtances, the queen ſent lord Mountjoy into Ireland. The whole iſland, on his arrival, was in a very deſperate ſituation; but being a man of capacity and vigour, he was not diſcouraged. He advanced immediately into Ulſter againſt Tyrone, and ſoon penetrated into the heart of that county, the principal ſeat of the rebels. He drove them from the open fields, and obliged them to take refuge in their bogs and foreſts. Sir George Carew had equal advantages in Munſter, and the queen's authority was once more eſtabliſhed in Ireland. The ſucceſs of Mountjoy rendered the ſucceſs of Eſſex leſs excuſable at court; but his popularity increaſed with his misfortunes. The miniſtry was accuſed of malice, and the queen herſelf of injuſtice. Alarmed at the prejudices of the people, Elizabeth determined to inveſtigate fully the military conduct of Eſſex in his late Iriſh expedition. The queen had often expreſſed her intention of juſtifying her own conduct to the public, by having him tried in the ſtar-chamber: but her tenderneſs at laſt prevailed over her ſeverity; and ſhe was contented to have him only examined by the privy-council. Coke, the attorney general, opened the cauſe againſt him, with all that cruelty and inſolence which that great lawyer uſually exerciſed againſt the unfortunate; and Francis, the ſon of Sir Nicholas Bacon, cloſed the charge, with diſplaying the undutiful expreſſions in ſome of the earl's letters. When Eſſex came to plead in his own defence, he, with great ſubmiſſion and humility, renounced all pretences to an apology, and declared his reſolution, on this or any other occaſion, never to have any conteſt with his ſovereign, and this ſubmiſſion was uttered with ſuch eloquence, and in ſo pathetic a manner, that it drew tears from many of the audience. All the privy-council did him juſtice with regard to the loyalty of his intentions; even Cecil, whom he believed his capital enemy, treated him with regard and humanity. Hence he was only ſentenced to be deprived of the offices he poſſeſſed, and to be confined in his own houſe, till her majeſty ſhould be pleaſed to releaſe him. Francis Bacon, who was afterwards ſo eminently diſtinguiſhed by his high offices, and his profound ſkill in the ſciences, was nearly allied to the Cecil family, but met with ſo little protection from his powerful relations, that though he was bred to the law, he had yet obtained no preferment. But Eſſex, who diſcovered his great abilities, had engaged in an intimate friendſhip with him, and had zealouſly endeavoured, though without ſucceſs, to procure for him the office of queen's ſolicitor; and, to comfort him under his diſappointment, had made him a preſent in land to the value of eighteen hundred pounds. The public, therefore, were highly offended at Bacon's appearing before the council againſt his generous benefactor, though he was commanded to do it by the queen: but ſhe was ſo pleaſed with his behaviour on this occaſion, that ſhe directed him to draw up an account of that day's proceedings, in order to ſatisfy the nation with reſpect to the juſtice and lenity of her conduct. Bacon, in executing her commands, repreſented the whole in the moſt favourable terms for Eſſex; deſcribing particularly, in a pleaſing manner, the dutiful ſubmiſſion with which he avoided making a particular defence of his conduct. On his reading the paper to the queen, ſhe ſmiled at that part, ſaying, ſhe ſaw that old love could not eaſily be forgotten; to which Bacon replied, he hoped ſhe meant that of herſelf. Every one now expected, that Eſſex would be reſtored to his former credit; and in this hope they were confirmed, on finding, that though he was ſtill forbid to appear at court, he was continued in his office of maſter of the horſe. The queen gave orders that his ſentence ſhould not be recorded, and reſtored him to his full liberty; but at the ſame time adviſed him to be cautious of giving farther offence, and ordered him not to appear at court.

Eſſex immediately prepared for his departure into the country; but before he ſet out he wrote a letter to the queen, in which he told her, that he kiſſed her majeſty's hands, and the rod with which ſhe had corrected him; but that he never could recover his uſual chearfulneſs till ſhe deigned to admit him to that preſence which had ever been the chief ſource of his happineſs and enjoyment; and that in the mean time he would retire into a country ſolitude, and labour aſſiduouſly to atone for his former offences. Pleaſed with theſe ſentiments, the queen replied, that ſhe wiſhed his actions might be conformable to his expreſſions; but as he had ſo long abuſed her patience, ſhe would take ſome time to try his ſincerity. She added, "That if the furnace of affliction produced ſuch good effects, ſhe ſhould ever after have the better opinion of her chemiſtry."

A. D. 1601. Elizabeth reflected not, that this haughty ſpirit, when driven to extremities, was capable of trampling under foot every ſpecies of duty, as well as the laws of his country. By puſhing her precautions too far, ſhe inflamed his reſentment. He loſt all hopes of her favour, forgot her former kindneſſes, and flew to revenge. He imprudently followed the intereſted counſels of ſome needy friends who lived upon his bounty, and determined to have recourſe to violent meaſures. To increaſe the number of his partizans, he paid his court to the catholics, and ſecretly ſolicited the king of Scotland's aſſiſtance. He acquainted him, "That whatſoever appearances the Engliſh court affected, a reſolution was formed to place the Infanta of Spain on the throne of England; that, to facilitate this deſign, all places of power, all poſts of importance, were in the hands of thoſe who were ſworn enemies to the Stuart family; the lord high-admiral had the command of the navy and army; Buckhurſt was at the head of the treaſury; Cobham was warden of the cinque-ports; Cecil, lord lieutenant of the north; Raleigh, governor of the iſlands of Guernſey and Jerſey; and Carew, preſident of Munſter; places very favourable for landing the Infanta." He added, "The queen's underſtanding was ſo greatly impaired, that ſhe was incapable of acting for herſelf, and was entirely guided by her miniſters; that it was therefore abſolutely neceſſary for him to act openly againſt this conſpiracy, by ſending ambaſſadors immediately to the Engliſh court, to demand a public declaration of his title to the ſucceſſion, and the removal of his enemies, all creatures and penſioners of Spain, from the court and council." But this head-ſtrong nobleman depended chiefly for ſupport on the puritans, whoſe manners he now entirely adopted. The moſt celebrated preachers of that ſect reſorted to his houſe, which became a kind of pulpit, where the fervours of fanaticiſm conſtantly diſcharged themſelves. The genius of the age was ſo entirely devoted to theſe rhapſodies, that the language of the reformation had more attractions for the people than pleaſure itſelf: nothing more effectually ingratiated an ambitious leader with the public than theſe religious entertainments. The ambitious Eſſex ſpared not the queen in his diſcourſes; he repreſented her as an old woman, whoſe temper was as crooked as her perſon. Elizabeth was informed of theſe liberties, which highly incenſed her againſt him. He could not have attacked her in a more tender part. Elizabeth was always fond of flattery, and loved to be complimented on her beauty; nor could either her own good ſenſe, or old age itſelf, cure her of this prepoſterous infirmity. Eſſex had now formed a ſelect council of malcontents, conſiſting of the earl of Southampton, Sir Charles Danvers, Sir Ferdinando Gorges, Sir Chriſtopher Blount, Sir John Davis, and John Littleton, of Frankel. The reſt of his friends, according to a liſt he produced at Drury houſe, the uſual place of their meeting, conſiſted of one hundred and twenty of the firſt noblemen and gentlemen in the kingdom. Here all their plans were laid, and all their reſolutions formed. Among other criminal projects debated in this aſſembly, was that of the moſt proper method of taking up arms; and it was at laſt agreed, that the firſt attack ſhould be made upon the palace; that Sir Chriſtopher Blount, at the head of a choice detachment, ſhould take poſſeſſion of the gates; that Davis ſhould ſeize the hall; Danvers the guard and preſence-chamber; and that Eſſex, attended by a ſelect number of his partizans, ſhould ruſh in from the Mews, oblige the queen to remove his enemies, aſſemble a parliament, and ſettle a new plan of government. The queen was informed of all theſe reſolutions, and took the neceſſary precautions to render them abortive. Eſſex never doubted but the citizens of London, by whom he was greatly beloved, would take up arms at the firſt ſignal. He was, however, miſtaken. The court had taken meaſures to prevent it; and when he appeared in the city, accompanied with about two hundred men, he found that his ſeditious exhortations had no effect. They gazed at him as he paſſed along the ſtreets, but none took up arms in his defence. Diſappointed of aſſiſtance, he returned to his own houſe, which was ſoon ſurrounded by a detachment of the guards, commanded by the admiral. He at firſt determined to defend himſelf to the laſt extremity, and periſh like a ſoldier with the ſword in his hand, rather than by the axe of a baſe executioner. But he ſoon after abandoned this reſolution; and, notwithſtanding all his bravery, ſubmitted at diſcretion. Elizabeth, who had behaved on this occaſion with the greateſt tranquillity and preſence of mind, ſoon gave orders for trying the moſt conſiderable of the priſoners. The earls of Eſſex and Southampton were arraigned on the nineteenth of February. The trial was ſoon finiſhed; the crime was notorious. Far from making any defence, Eſſex gave himſelf up entirely to the ſentiments of religion, which he had before politically affected, and not only acknowledged himſelf guilty, but alſo impeached his friends; a circumſtance, which at other times, he would have conſidered as the moſt infamous baſeneſs. The celebrated Sir Francis Bacon, is reproached with having pleaded on the trial againſt Eſſex, his friend and benefactor, without being obliged to it by any office. Blemiſhes appear in the characters of the greateſt men; Bacon was at this time ambitious of making his fortune. It now reſted with Elizabeth to pardon or execute her favourite nobleman, and ſhe long balanced between juſtice and clemency. She felt all the force of an ill-extinguiſhed paſſion; and if the earl had ſolicited her pardon, love would certainly have granted it. She conſidered this obſtinacy as the conſequence of contempt, and ſigned the warrant for his execution. He ſuffered in the court-yard of the Tower, purſuant to his own requeſt, on the twenty-fifth of February. His behaviour in his laſt moments were conformable to his condition, penitent and reſigned. He reflected not on his enemies, but prayed for the life of the queen, and the proſperity of his country. Thus ended his career of glory, by the hand of the executioner, Robert Devereux, earl of Eſſex, in the thirty-fifth year of his age. He was deſcended from a royal lineage on the female ſide, and endowed with extraordinaty talents and heroic qualities. He was generous, liberal, and humane; a patron of learning, in which he himſelf held a conſiderable rank, a warm friend, and an open enemy. His foibles were vanity, ambition, and an impetuouſity of temper which he could not reſtrain. He ruined himſelf for want of knowing how to enjoy good fortune with moderation. The people, by whom he was much beloved, were irritated by his death; and the queen, who was accuſed of cruelty, no longer heard the uſual acclamations when ſhe appeared in public.

The king of France, deſirous of forming a cloſe connexion with Elizabeth, in order to eſtabliſh a plan for effecting a perpetual balance of power in Europe, made a journey to Calais; and Elizabeth, in hopes of having a perſonal interview with a prince ſhe ſo highly eſteemed, repaired to Dover. Some conſiderations, however, prevented their meeting; but the queen, expreſſing a deſire of conferring on ſome buſineſs of importance with a miniſter in whom an entire confidence might be placed, Henry ſent over Roſny, afterwards duke of Sully. What appears very extraordinary is, that both theſe princes, without communicating their ſentiments to each other, had conceived the ſame deſign of humbling the houſe of Auſtria, and eſtabliſhing a juſt equilibrium between the powers of Europe. It principally conſiſted in uniting the ſeventeen provinces of the Low Countries, into one republic. But the wounds which France had received during the civil wars were not yet healed; the attention of Henry was ſtill neceſſary to recover the languiſhing ſtate of his country. The execution of this deſign therefore was put off, and never after reſumed.

The death of Philip II. king of Spain, did not put a period to the deſigns of the Spaniards for diſturbing the peace of Elizabeth. The ſame councils ſtill continued, and the ſame meaſures were to be purſued. The preparations for an expedition againſt Ireland had been for ſome time finiſhed, but ſuſpended on account of the troubles that broke out in Spain. Theſe having now ſubſided, Don John d'Aquila was ſent at the head of a body of troops into that kingdom, and made religion a pretence for the enterprizes of ambition and rebellion. He aſſumed the title of "General of the Holy War, for the preſervation of the faith in Ireland." Care had been taken to authorize theſe meaſures by bulls from Rome; and d'Aquila endeavoured to perſuade the people, that a queen, deprived of her authority by the pope, had no longer any right to the crown; that her ſubjects, abſolved from their oaths of allegiance by the holy father, ought to take up arms againſt her, and drive her from a throne of which ſhe ought to be conſidered as an uſurper. He added, that the ſole intention of his coming was to aſſiſt them in that religious undertaking, and to deliver them from the dominion of the devil. Mountjoy ſaw the gathering ſtorm, and exerted all his abilities to break its force. The Iriſh ſhewed every where ſigns of a general inſurrection, and the utmoſt vigour was neceſſary to prevent it. He immediately laid ſiege to Kinſale, which the Spaniards had taken after their landing; but he had hardly began his operations, before he received intelligence that another body of two thouſand Spaniards, under the command of Alphonſo Ocampo were landed, and had taken poſſeſſion of Baltimore and Berehaven. He found himſelf therefore obliged to detach Sir George Carew, to oppoſe the progreſs of the enemy. Tyrone immediately advanced to the relief of Kinſale; but Mountjoy having received information of his deſign, advanced to meet him at the head of part of his army, totally defeated the rebels, and took ſeveral of them priſoners. Tyrone himſelf eſcaped into Ulſter, but was utterly incapable of giving the Engliſh any farther diſturbance. The Spaniſh general now perceived that all reſiſtance would be in vain, and immediately offered to ſurrender all the places held by the Spaniards in Ireland, and evacuate the kingdom. The conditions were accepted, and the Spaniards embarked for their own country. This defeat ſtruck the rebels with terror. They ſaw the foreign forces, on whom they ſo greatly depended, incapable of giving them any ſupport, and deſpaired of being able to make head againſt the Engliſh. This war in Ireland was very burdenſome to the queen, and ſhe was obliged to call a parliament in order to obtain ſupplies. No oppoſition was made to the requeſt of her majeſty; but the commons revived the great queſtion with regard to monopolies, ſo deſtructive to trade, and burdenſome to the people. The ſmall revenues of the crown being inſufficient for the queen to confer favours or rewards on thoſe that had ſerved her faithfully, ſhe ſupplied the defect by laviſhing excluſive privileges; and thoſe who were provided ſold them to others. In conſequence of theſe monopolies, almoſt every kind of merchandize was advanced at the pleaſure of individuals; and that liberty, which conſtitutes the very ſoul of commerce, was no longer known. The effects were viſible by a continual decline of trade; and the nation felt all the vexatious effects of avarice, ſupported by the royal authority. Nor was the abuſe confined to the greater objects of commerce, it extended even to the common neceſſaries of life; ſalt, oil, vinegar, paper, cloths, iron, lead, ſkins, bottles, bruſhes, and many other articles. When this aſtoniſhing liſt was read in the houſe of commons, one of the members aſked, with great vivacity, "Is not bread among the number?" And obſerving that the houſe ſeemed aſtoniſhed at the queſtion, "Yes, bread! added he; if things continue on the ſame footing, we ſhall ſee that monopolized before the next parliament." But it appeared uſeleſs to complain, as abſolute authority was then conſidered as the baſis of the Engliſh government. The courtiers, accordingly, ſupported that tenet with all their eloquence. Bacon aſſerted, that the royal prerogative ought neither to be conteſted, nor examined; that it gave the ſovereign the power of extending what was reſtrained by the laws, and of reſtraining what the laws had made free and open. Another obſerved, that it would be a frivolous attempt to bind up the queen's hands by act of parliament; becauſe ſhe was poſſeſſed of an unlimited diſpenſing power, and conſequently could extricate herſelf whenever ſhe pleaſed; and even if the ſtatute ſhould contain a clauſe excluſive of that power, ſhe could equally diſpenſe with that clauſe, and conſequently with the ſtatute itſelf. One of the members went ſo far as to declare, that the Deity had given to princes the power that belonged to himſelf; and attempted to prove his aſſertion from a paſſage in the Pſalms, "I have ſaid that ye are gods." But notwithſtanding theſe ſtrange poſitions of the courtiers, many of the members ſtrongly oppoſed this alarming abuſe; and the laſt parliament having preſented a petition to the throne without effect, they propoſed to paſs a bill againſt all monopolies whatever. The queen perceived this reſolution, and wiſely avoided the blow. She was unwilling to refuſe the royal aſſent to a bill, that, however it might leſſen the prerogative of the crown, could not fail of being very advantageous to her people. She therefore ſent for the ſpeaker, and ordered him to acquaint the houſe, that ſhe would immediately ſuppreſs all ſuch excluſive grants as were moſt burdenſome to her ſubjects. Affected with the goodneſs and condeſcenſion of the queen, the joy of the commons was exceſſive. They had always been uſed to the tone of abſolute authority and haughty refuſal, and could hardly contain themſelves within the bounds of decency, at finding the royal prerogative at laſt give way to the intereſt of the nation. One of the members obſerved, that this meſſage from the queen was a kind of goſpel of glad-tidings, and ought to be written in indelible characters on the tablet of the heart. They voted, that the ſpeaker, at the head of eighty members, ſhould return her majeſty their humble thanks for this inſtance of parental regard. The ſpeech delivered by the ſpeaker on this occaſion was more proper to be addreſſed to the Supreme Being, than an earthly monarch. So fulſome was the language of flattery! Nor did they wait till ſhe had ſatisfied them with regard to the particular monopolies ſhe meant to aboliſh; they immediately voted her four times the uſual ſupply. An inſtance then without example. But they well knew the imperious diſpoſition of the queen, and that by giving even the moſt diſtant hint of their being diſſatisfied with her promiſe, would have forced her into a denial of their requeſts. Thus Elizabeth, by prudently receding in time from what was then conſidered as the right of the crown, maintained her dignity, and preſerved the affections of her people. Her ſucceſſors imitated not her example in this particular: they wanted her addreſs, as well as her power, to triumph over the principles of liberty.

A. D. 1602. Exaſperated at the Spaniards, for having involved her in ſo many difficulties, by fomenting the rebellion, and aſſiſting the inſurgents in Ireland, ſhe reſolved to find them ſufficient employment at home. She accordingly ordered a ſquadron of nine ſhips to be fitted out, under the command of Sir Richard Leveſon and Sir Richard Monſon, with orders to ſail on an expedition to the coaſt of Spain. This fleet left England early in the ſpring, and ſoon after part of the ſquadron fell in with the galleons, loaded with treaſure; but were not ſtrong enough to attack them with any proſpect of ſucceſs. The other diviſion alſo met with a fleet of very rich ſhips, and was, for the ſame reaſon, obliged to let them purſue their courſe unmoleſted. Theſe diſappointments induced the two admirals to join the little ſquadrons, and purſue the deſign of the expedition in company. For ſome time they met with no ſhips of the enemy, and it was determined, in order to prevent the expedition from becoming entirely fruitleſs, to attack the harbour of Coimbra in Portugal, where they were informed a rich carrack had taken ſhelter. The harbour was defended by a caſtle mounted with heavy pieces of cannon; eleven gallies were moored near the entrance, and the militia of the country, amounting to near twenty thouſand men, appeared on the ſhore. But all theſe indications of a powerful oppoſition was not ſufficient to intimidate the Engliſh. They broke into the harbour, diſmounted the guns of the caſtle, ſunk, burnt, and put to flight the gallies, and made themſelves maſters of the carrack. With this prize they returned to England, where her loading was valued at near a million of ducats; a very ſenſible loſs to the Spaniards, and a ſtill more conſiderable ſupply to Elizabeth.

The catholic religion was not tolerated in England, yet great numbers of people ſtill profeſſed the tenets of Rome; the kingdom was full of prieſts of that perſuaſion; and a very rancorous quarrel now broke out between the Jeſuits and the ſecular clergy, on the following occaſion: one Blackwell, a perſon entirely devoted to the intereſt of the jeſuits, had been placed over theſe ſeculars, as their ſuperior. Not content with exerciſing the common juriſdiction, he oppreſſed them in the moſt cruel manner; and when they appealed to the pope for redreſs, the ſuperior repreſented them as ſchiſmatics and heretics. The moſt bitter invectives were publiſhed by both parties, and the whole body of the catholic clergy ſeemed to be engaged in this furious conteſt. Whether the whole affair was ſerious, or a ſcheme to lull the government into a fatal ſecurity, while the Spaniards ſtruck ſome deciſive blow, is now impoſſible to be known; but it is certain that the biſhop of London, from political motives, fomented this diviſion, which at laſt roſe to ſuch a height, that the council of ſtate thought proper to interpoſe their authority; and perceiving that their diſputes were incompatible with the peace of the nation, commanded them all to depart the kingdom immediately.

Lord Mountjoy improved ſo well his late victory in Ireland, that Tyrone and his friends were ſoon reduced to the greateſt diſtreſs; and many of them, after concealing themſelves in woods and moraſſes, where they lived rather like beaſts than men, thought proper to abandon their retreats, and ſubmit to the mercy of the Engliſh government. They were received with kindneſs, and the terms impoſed upon them were ſo mild and generous, that Tyrone himſelf, ſeeing all hopes either of ſucceeding, or eſcaping to the continent, were vaniſhed, applied, in the moſt abject manner, both to the queen herſelf, and the governor, for pardon. The queen was long reſolved not to ſhew the leaſt favour to that ferocious and perfidious rebel, but being continually importuned by her council, who repreſented the prodigious expence ſhe had been at, in maintaining an army in Ireland to purſue the rebels, and that by ſhewing clemency to the great leader in every inſurrection, ſhe would infallibly reſtore tranquillity to that diſtreſſed kingdom, and introduce a proper legiſlation among the people; ſhe was at laſt prevailed upon to recede from her reſolution. She ſigned his pardon, and ſent it to Mountjoy; ſacrificing her reſentment to the peace of her ſubjects, who had ſo long felt all the dreadful effects of civil diſcord.

A. D. 1603. Had that furious leader perceived even the ſmalleſt proſpect of ſupporting himſelf againſt the Engliſh, there is not the leaſt doubt but he would have rejected the conditions with diſdain; but he was deprived of every reſource, and enjoyed only the wretched alternative of accepting the queen's pardon on her own terms, or periſh with hunger. He choſe the former, and on the thirteenth of March, repaired to Mellefont, where he preſented himſelf upon his knees before the lord-deputy, and in that ſubmiſſive poſture received his pardon. O'Rourk, another active chief in the late inſurrections, ſurrendered about a month after Tyrone; and thus that dreadful rebellion, which had raged in Ireland with the utmoſt violence during eight years, and had coſt the queen near four hundred thouſand pounds annually, was entirely ſuppreſſed; the whole kingdom was reduced to a ſtate of ſubjection, and taſted the pleaſures attendant on tranquillity. But Elizabeth was not long capable of enjoying the ſatiſfaction of ſeeing this conſiderable part of her dominions in a ſtate of peace. She had, for ſome time, fallen into a ſtate of melancholy; was obſerved to be continually in tears, and to labour under ſome extraordinary affliction. She had always been particularly careful of her health, but now obſtinately refuſed all the remedies preſcribed by her phyſicians. Her council uſed every method in their power to prevail upon her to recede from this fatal reſolution, but in vain. The archbiſhop of Canterbury, and ſecretary Cecil, begged her, on their knees, to take what was neceſſary for her ſuſtenance and relief; but ſhe refuſed their requeſt, and, in an angry tone of voice, deſired they would leave off their importunities, and ſuffer her to die in quiet. Various are the opinions which have been formed with regard to the cauſe of this profound melancholy: ſome aſcribed it to her repentance for having granted a pardon to Tyrone; others to the chagrin of ſeeing her courtiers turn their eyes upon the king of Scotland as the preſumptive heir to the Engliſh crown, and their ſhewing diſpoſitions to neglect her, at a time when ſhe laboured under the debilities of age and infirmities; while others attributed it to her paſſion for Eſſex, which a very remarkable incident had lately revived. After his return from his expedition to Cadiz, ſhe made him a preſent of a ring, which ſhe deſired him to keep as the pledge of her affection; at the ſame time aſſuring him, that whatever diſgrace might attend him, or whatever prejudices ſhe might entertain againſt his conduct, yet, on ſight of that precious pledge, ſhe would recollect her former tenderneſs, be ready to give him a favourable hearing, and to liſten candidly to his apology. Eſſex, notwithſtanding all his misfortunes, preſerved this pledge of her majeſty's affection; and, when under ſentence of death, reſolved to try the experiment. He accordingly prayed the counteſs of Nottingham to carry the ring to Elizabeth; but the earl, her huſband, the capital enemy of Eſſex, would not ſuffer her to execute the commiſſion. The queen waited for this ring with the moſt paſſionate anxiety, and conſtrued her not receiving it as a mark of contempt. Exaſperated at what ſhe conſidered as the higheſt affront, ſhe ſigned the warrant for his execution. Some time after, the counteſs being ſeized with a violent illneſs, was ſtung with the deepeſt remorſe for her conduct; and having obtained a viſit from the queen, ſhe revealed the fatal ſecret. Aſtoniſhed at this alarming confeſſion, Elizabeth burſt into the moſt violent paſſion of grief and rage. She ſtruck the dying counteſs in her bed, telling her, "That God might pardon her, but ſhe never could." This remarkable fact has been rejected by many hiſtorians as romantic; but from the proofs collected by Dr. Birch, in his memoirs of this princeſs, the truth of it ſeems to be ſufficiently eſtabliſhed. From that moment ſhe gave herſelf up to a deep incurable melancholy, which preyed on her ſpirits. Rejecting all conſolation and ſuſtenance, ſhe threw herſelf upon the floor, where ſhe remained ſullen and immoveable, feeding only on her ſufferings, and declaring, that life was an intolerable burden. She uttered but few words, and theſe were all expreſſive of inward grief, the cauſe whereof ſhe did not chuſe to reveal; giving vent to her deſpondency only by ſighs and groans, which were unable to aſſuage her ſorrow. Ten days and nights ſhe lay upon the carpet, leaning on cuſhions brought her by her maids; and her phyſicians, by all their arguments, could not perſuade her to allow herſelf to be put to bed, or to take any of the remedies they preſcribed. At length, the diſtreſs of her mind preying on her body, her end viſibly approached; when the council aſſembling, ſent the chancellor, admiral, and ſecretary to know her pleaſure, with reſpect to her ſucceſſor. With a faint voice ſhe anſwered, that as ſhe had held the regal ſcepter, ſhe deſired a royal ſucceſſor. Cecil entreating her to explain herſelf more particularly, ſhe added, that ſhe would have a king to ſucceed her; and who ſhould that be, but her neareſt kinſman the king of Scotland? the archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was preſent, then adviſed her to fix her thoughts upon God; ſhe replied, that ſhe did ſo, and that her thoughts had not in the leaſt wandered from him. Soon after, her voice and ſenſes failed; ſhe fell into a lethargic ſlumber, which laſted ſome hours, and then gently expired, without ſtruggle or convulſion, on the twenty-fourth of March, in the ſeventieth year of her age, and the forty-fifth of her reign. She had given orders, that her corpſe ſhould not be touched or ſeen by any one but her own women, which were complied with. It was conveyed from Richmond, where ſhe died, to Whitehall; and was interred with great magnificence in Henry the Seventh's chapel at Weſtminſter.

Before the reign of Elizabeth, the ſtate of the Engliſh manufactures were very low; foreign wares of almoſt all kinds were preferred; and the kings of England had recourſe ſometimes to borrowing money of the city of Antwerp; when, beſides paying ten or twelve per cent. intereſt, they were obliged to make the city of London to join in the ſecurity; but that great and enterprizing merchant, Sir Thomas Greſham, engaged the company of merchant-adventurers to grant Elizabeth a conſiderable loan; and ſhe paying regularly the money, her credit, by degrees, became ſo eſtabliſhed in the city, that ſhe ſhook off this dependance on foreigners. Sir Thomas alſo built, at his own expence, the magnificent fabric of the Exchange. The queen, highly pleaſed with his public ſpirit, viſited the ſtructure, and gave it the name it now bears of the Royal Exchange. In 1567 there were four thouſand eight hundred and fifty-one foreigners in London, of whom three thouſand eight hundred and thirty-eight were Flemings, and only fifty-eight Scots. Afterwards the perſecutions in France and the Low Countries drove a great number of foreigners into England, by whom the manufactures and commerce were greatly improved.

The nobility in this reign acquired, by degrees, a taſte for elegance and ſplendor. Many ſumptuous edifices were built, to the great ornament of the kingdom, and to the promotion of arts and induſtry. Burleigh, though he was thought frugal, and without a paternal eſtate, had a hundred ſervants in his family. He had a ſtanding table for gentlemen, and two other tables for perſons of inferior rank. About his perſon, he had people of great diſtinction; and no leſs than twenty gentlemen, each of whom was worth a thouſand pounds a year. He ſeveral times entertained the queen at his country-houſe, where ſhe ſtaid three, four, or five weeks at a time. The quantity of plate poſſeſſed by this nobleman was amazing; it amounted to fourteen or fifteen thouſand pounds weight; and land being then uſually ſold at ten years purchaſe, and he poſſeſſing only four thouſand pounds a year in land, and eleven thouſand pounds in money, the value of his ſilver plate was nearly equal to all the reſt of his fortune. But the queen, by proclamation, obliged her nobility to retrench in ſome articles of luxury, particularly that of ſervants, and from that moment their influence declined. They had fewer retainers, and conſequently were leſs able to form plots and conſpiracies. A taſte for luxury prevailed among them, by which their fortunes were ſoon impaired: while the merchant and mechanic were enriched by their expence and prodigality. In conſequence of this, the towns became more populous; and the country people, by means of agriculture, acquired an independency, which reſcued them from the yoke of the nobility.

In 1569, Elizabeth obtained from the Czar, John Baſilides, an excluſive patent to the Engliſh for the whole trade of Muſcovy; on which the Engliſh ventured farther into that extenſive country than any Europeans had done before them. They tranſported their goods along the Dwina, in canoes made of the trunk of a tree, which they rowed up the ſtream as far as Walogda; from whence they carried their commodities ſeven days journey by land to Yeraſlau, and then down the Volga to Aſtracan, where they built ſhips, croſſed the Caſpian ſea, and diſtributed their manufactures into Perſia; but were prevented from continuing this bold attempt, from the diſcouragements they met with. After the death of John Baſilides, this patent was revoked by his ſon Theodore; and when the queen remonſtrated againſt it, he told her miniſters, that princes ought to carry an indifferent hand, both between their ſubjects and between foreigners; and not to convert trade, which ought to be common to all, into a monopoly for the private gain of a few. He however continued ſome privileges to the Engliſh, on account of their being the firſt who formed a communication between Europe and Muſcovy.

The ſpirit of this age was ſtrongly bent on naval enterprizes; and beſides the military expeditions againſt the Spaniards, the Engliſh made many attempts for new diſcoveries, and opened many new branches of foreign commerce. Sir Martin Forbiſher undertook three fruitleſs voyages to diſcover a north-weſt paſſage to the Eaſt Indies. Davis, not diſcouraged by this ill ſucceſs, made a new attempt, in which he diſcovered the Streights, now called by his name. In the year ſixteen hundred, Elizabeth granted the Eaſt India Company their firſt patent, when their ſtock amounted to ſeventy-two thouſand pounds. They fitted out for this new branch of trade four ſhips, commanded by James Lancaſter, which returning with a rich cargo encouraged the company to proceed. In this reign two attempts were made to ſettle colonies in America; one by Sir Humphrey Gilbert in Newfoundland, and another by Sir Walter Raleigh in Virginia; but theſe did not, at firſt, prove ſucceſsful. In 1583 the Turkey company was eſtabliſhed; for before that time the Grand Seignior had always conceived England to be a province ſubject to France; but having heard of the queen's power and reputation, he gave a favourable reception to the Engliſh, and granted them larger privileges than he had given to the French.

In 1562, the firſt attempt of the Engliſh for eſtabliſhing a trade to the coaſt of Guiney was made by Mr. John Hawkins. He purchaſed a conſiderable number of negroes in Guiney, and carried them to Hiſpaniola, where he diſpoſed of his ſlaves and merchandize, and loaded his veſſels with hides, ſugar, and ginger, commodities that found a quick ſale in England, and rendered the voyage very lucrative to the merchants.

In the third year of Elizabeth's reign, ſhe was preſented with a pair of black ſilk knit ſtockings; with which, doctor Howell ſays, ſhe was ſo pleaſed, that ſhe never wore cloth hoſe any more.

About the year 1580, the uſe of coaches was introduced into England by the earl of Arundel. Before that time, the queen, on public occaſions, rode on horſeback, generally behind her chamberlain.

were made during this period of hiſtory. One Owen is noted, as being the firſt who caſt braſs cannon in England, ſome ſpecimens of which are ſtill in the Tower of London. They were caſt about the year 1536. Muſquets, or hand guns, were introduced in the year 1521. Theſe ſuperſeded the practice of bows and arrows, which were ſoon after laid aſide. About the year 1535, glaſſes were firſt manufactured in England; the finer ſort was made in Crutched-Friars, London; and the flint glaſs, little inferior to that of Venice, at the Savoy-houſe in the Strand. The firſt manufacture of knives in England was begun in 1563, by Thomas Matthews, on Fleet-bridge, London; the art was ſoon improved, and large quantities were exported to different parts of the world. In 1589, William Lee, M. A. of St. John's college, Cambridge, invented an engine, or ſteel-loom, called a ſtocking-frame; and in 1599 was a preamble in an act for manufacturing ſail-cloth in England; before that period it was imported from France and Germany. About the ſame time, that uſeful inſtrument, the teleſcope, was diſcovered by one Janſſen, a ſpectacle maker at Middleburgh in Zealand. He knew not, however, the theory on which the inſtrument depended, and therefore never made them longer than eighteen inches. Galileo, aſtronomer to the grand duke of Tuſcany, was the artiſt who perfected the diſcovery, and rendered it of the greateſt ſervice in aſtronomical obſervations, and hence the teleſcope acquired the name of Galileo's tube. The progreſs made in the mathematical arts was chiefly confined to the ſtudies of Dee, and one or two more, who were patronized by Burleigh.

During this fertile period ſprung up many eminent characters, diſtinguiſhed by their great abilities and attainments in literature. Henry VIII. Queen Catharine Parr, Edward VI. Lady Jane Grey, Cardinal Wolſey, Leo X. Elizabeth, and other great perſonages, whom we have particularly noticed in the courſe of this hiſtory, were reputed learned perſons in their times. Henry Howard, earl of Surry, was one of the greateſt ornaments in the court of Henry VIII. He was famous for the tenderneſs and elegance of his poetry, in which he excelled all his cotemporaries. Archbiſhop Wareham ſhone as a divine, a lawyer, and a ſtateſman. Eraſmus makes honourable mention of this prelate, whom he eſteemed a perfect model of the epiſcopal character. He died on the twenty-third of Auguſt, 1532. Archbiſhop Cranmer, and Cuthbert Tonſtal, biſhop of Durham, are juſtly eſteemed chief ornaments of our church and nation. John Collet, dean of St. Paul's, was one of thoſe great men that aſſiſted in the revival of learning in England. No higher teſtimony need be given of the dean's merit, than his great intimacy with Eraſmus. There was a remarkable ſimilitude of manners, ſentiments and ſtudies between theſe illuſtrious men, who ventured to withdraw the vail of ſuperſtition; and to prepare the minds of men for that reſtoration of learning and reformation in religion, which ſoon after followed. He founded St. Paul's ſchool, and died in the year 1519. Collet, Lynacre, Lilly, Grocyn, and Latimer, were the firſt who revived the literature of the ancients in England. William Tindale, canon of Chriſt church, Oxford, deſervedly ſtiled the Engliſh apoſtle, was the firſt who tranſlated the New Teſtament into Engliſh from the Greek. This work appeared in 1526; and, three or four years after, he publiſhed an Engliſh tranſlation of the Pentateuch, from the original Hebrew, and intended to have gone through with the whole: but his good deſign provoked the catholic clergy, and he was burnt for hereſy at Wilford, near Bruſſels, in 1536. Sir Thomas More was a great maſter of the elegant learning of the ancients. His Utopia, a kind of political romance, which gained him the higheſt reputation as an author, is an idea of a perfect republic, in an iſland ſuppoſed newly diſcovered in America. He was beheaded for denying the king's ſupremacy, on the 6th of July, 1535. Sir Thomas Smith, Sir John Cheke, and Roger Aſcham, tutor to queen Elizabeth, were the politeſt ſcholars of their time in the univerſity of Cambridge. Among uſeful improvements in learning, they introduced the true pronunciation of the Greek tongue in that ſeat of the muſes. Richard Hooker, ſome time maſter of the Temple, and afterwards rector of Biſhop's Bourne in Kent, was one of the moſt celebrated writers of the age in which he lived. His "Eccleſiaſtical Polity," which is a defence of the government of the Engliſh church againſt the cavils of diſſenters, is written with a claſſic ſimplicity, and eſteemed one of the completeſt works, both for ſtile and argument, in the Engliſh language. Queen Elizabeth uſed to call him, "The judicious Hooker," an epithet by which he is ſtill diſtinguiſhed. He died on the ſecond of November, 1600. Sir Philip Sidney was the delight and admiration of the Engliſh court. He was the ornament of the univerſity, and appeared with equal advantage in a field of battle, at a tournament, in a private converſation among his friends, or in a public character as an ambaſſador. His talents were equally adapted to proſe or verſe, to original compoſition, or tranſlation. His Arcadia was not only admired for its novelty, but continued to be read longer than ſuch compoſitions generally are, and has paſſed through fourteen editions. He died the ſixteenth of October, 1586. John Stowe was one of the moſt induſtrious antiquaries this kingdom has produced. He was bred a taylor, but quitted his employment to purſue his beloved ſtudy of the hiſtory and antiquities of England. His principal works are, A Survey of London; Additions to Hollingſhed's Chronicle; his Annals; the folio volume, commonly called Stowe's Chronicle, was compiled from his papers after his deceaſe. He died the fifth of April, 1605. Sir Thomas Bodley muſt not be omitted in this liſt of men of letters, when we conſider the ample proviſion he has made for literature, by the library he founded at Oxford, and in which he ſtands unrivalled. In 1599 he opened his library, a mauſoleum which will perpetuate his memory as long as books themſelves endure. He died the twenty-eighth of January, 1612. John Gerrarde, a ſurgeon of London, was the greateſt Engliſh botaniſt of that age. He publiſhed his Herbal in 1597, which has ever ſince its firſt appearance been conſidered as a very uſeful work. John Rogers, a clergyman of Lancaſhire, tranſlated the Bible into Engliſh, with notes. Thomas Sternhold, and John Hopkins, tranſlated the Pſalms into metre. John Leland, the famous antiquarian, lived in this period. Fairfax tranſlated Taſſo with eaſe and elegance; and Harrington Arioſto, with tolerable accuracy.

In this reign of Elizabeth flouriſhed thoſe celebrated poets, Spencer, Shakeſpear, and Ben Johnſon.

Spencer was born in London; and, after his ſtudying in Cambridge, took up his reſidence with ſome friends in the north, where he fell in love with his Roſalind, whom he ſo finely celebrates in his paſtorals, and of whoſe cruelty he has written ſuch pathetic complaints. He was patronized by Sir Philip Sidney, who was charmed with reading part of his poem, called the Fairy Queen. He was afterwards created poet-lauret to queen Elizabeth. He at length became ſecretary to lord Gray of Wilton, on that nobleman's being appointed lord deputy of Ireland: after which he was rewarded by a grant from queen Elizabeth of three thouſand acres of land, in the county of Cork. In this retirement he finiſhed his Fairy Queen, and became a more ſucceſsful lover; for the collection of his ſonnets are a kind of hiſtory of the progreſs of a new amour, which ended in marriage. He was here viſited by Sir Walter Raleigh, in 1589, who brought him with him to England, and introduced him to the queen; but in the Iriſh rebellion he was plundered, and deprived of his poſſeſſions. He died in 1598, and was interred in Weſtminſter abbey, where his obſequies were attended by the poets of that time. The Fairy Queen, the moſt celebrated of Spencer's works, contains great beauties, a ſweet and harmonious verſification, and a fine flow of imagination; yet the peruſal of it becomes tedious, and it requires ſome reſolution to carry us on to the end of that long performance.

William Shakeſpeare was the ſon of John Shakeſpeare, a conſiderable dealer in wool; and was born at Stratford upon Avon, in April, 1564. He was educated at a free grammar ſchool; after which he aſſiſted his father in buſineſs, till falling into bad company, he was ſeveral times engaged in the then common practice of ſtealing deer; for which, being proſecuted, he fled to London, where, being without money or friends, he ſupported himſelf by taking care of the horſes of the gentlemen who came to the play; for coaches not being then in uſe, gentlemen rode to the play-houſe on horſeback. Being there diſtinguiſhed by his diligence; he was taken notice of by the players, who, being pleaſed with his converſation, admitted him, in a low ſtation, into the houſe; when his admirable wit ſoon raiſed him, and he became an actor, a manager, and an excellent writer for the ſtage. He was highly eſteemed by queen Elizabeth, who had ſeveral of his plays acted before her; and was ſo pleaſed with the admirable character of Falſtaff, in the two parts of Henry IV. that ſhe ordered him to continue it in another play, and to make him in love; which is ſaid to have occaſioned his writing the Merry Wives of Windſor. He alſo obtained the friendſhip and ſavour of the earl of Southampton, who gave him a thouſand pounds to enable him to complete a purchaſe, which he heard he had a mind to. The latter part of his life was ſpent in eaſe, retirement, and the converſation of his friends. He had an eſtate equal to his wiſhes; and is ſaid to have ſpent ſome years before his death at his native place. He died in 1616, in the fifty-third year of his age. If we conſider Shakeſpeare as a man born in a rude age, and educated in a low manner, without much inſtruction from books, he will appear in our eyes as a prodigy. His dramatic writings abound with animating and paſſionate ſcenes, filled with nervous and pictureſque deſcriptions: he had a fertile and great genius, equally enriched with the tragic and comic vein. Hence he has ever been a favourite of, and ſtill continues to be admired by, the Engliſh.

Ben Johnſon, the ſon of a clergyman, was born at Weſtminſter, in 1574, and educated at Weſtminſter ſchool; from thence he was taken home by his mother, who had married a bricklayer for her ſecond huſband, who obliged him to work at his trade; but being entirely averſe to it, he enliſted himſelf as a ſoldier, and was diſtinguiſhed by his bravery in the wars in the Netherlands. Upon his return to England, he reſumed his former ſtudies, and was admitted into St. John's college, Cambridge; but being unable to ſupport himſelf there, he entered into an obſcure play-houſe, called the Curtain; but was unable to gain any reputation as an actor.

He there quarrelling with one of his brother comedians, fought a duel, in which he killed his antagoniſt. He was committed to priſon, but was ſome time after diſcharged. At his firſt entrance into the play-houſe, he had written a play or two, which were condemned. He offered another, which he had put into the hands of a perſon who careleſsly read it, and was ready to return it with a diſagreeable anſwer; when Shakeſpeare having by accident ſeen it, he was ſo pleaſed, that he brought it upon his own ſtage, where he was manager, and acted himſelf one of the parts. Ever after Shakeſpeare continued to recommend Johnſon, lent his hand in finiſhing ſome of his productions, and played a part in every play wrote by Johnſon, while he continued on the ſtage. Johnſon was afterwards poet laureat to James I. and Charles I. He wrote ſeveral pieces, which are printed with his plays, in ſeven volumes octavo, and died on the ſixteenth of Auguſt, 1637, in the ſixty-third year of his age. Johnſon poſſeſſed all the learning which was wanting in Shakeſpeare, and wanted the genius of which Shakeſpeare was poſſeſſed.

Character of the illuſtrious queen Elizabeth.

In her perſon ſhe was tall and ſtraight; with a fair complexion, fine white teeth, and yellow hair. Having high cheek bones, ſhe had her portraits taken in the garden, without ſhades, ſo that all her pictures from the life appear flat. She had a ſhrill voice, danced with great agility, and played upon ſeveral inſtruments. Hiſtory affords few perſons who have been more expoſed to the calumny of enemies, and the applauſe of friends, than this queen; but poſterity have placed her reputation in a true light; and, in ſpite of religious animoſities, and political factions, have formed almoſt a uniform judgment, with reſpect to her character and conduct. Her penetration, vigilance, vigour, ſteadineſs, and magnanimity, deſerve the higheſt praiſes, and appear not to have been exceeded by any one who ever filled the Engliſh throne. She poſſeſſed an excellent memory, underſtood the dead and living languages, had made great proficiency in the ſciences, and was well acquainted with hiſtory. She anſwered the Poliſh ambaſſador in Latin, without premeditation, and in a very ſpirited manner. She tranſlated Boethius of the Conſolation of Philoſophy; Xenophon's Dialogue between Hiero and Simonides, and the Meditations of the queen of Navarre. She alſo wrote a Comment on Plato, and tranſlated into Latin a play of Euripides, and two of the orations of Iſocrates. Her heroiſm was free from temerity; her active temper from a vain ambition; her friendſhip from partiality; and her frugality from avarice. Few of the ſovereigns of England ſucceeded to the throne in a more difficult and dangerous ſeaſon; yet the government was never conducted with ſuch uniform ſucceſs and felicity. Though the idea of religious liberty was, in that age, very contracted, without knowing the advantages reſulting from a toleration, yet Elizabeth, by her ſuperior prudence, preſerved her people from thoſe confuſions in which theological controverſies, carried on with frantic zeal, had involved all the neighbouring nations. Her ſingular talents for government were equally founded on her capacity and heroic ſpirit; and being endowed with great command over herſelf, when the intereſt of her kingdom required it, ſhe ſoon obtained an uncontrouled aſcendant over her people, whoſe eſteem ſhe won by her wiſdom and virtues. Though her enemies were the moſt active, the moſt enterprizing, and the leaſt ſcrupulous princes of Europe, ſhe was enabled by her courage, and the deep policy of her adminiſtration, to make a ſtrong impreſſion on their ſtates; while her own greatneſs remained untouched and unimpaired. She was the protectreſs of the proteſtant religion, the baſis of its proſperity both at home and abroad, and ſhe is highly deſerving of praiſe for her ſteady adherence to an impartial adminiſtration of juſtice. Her reign was adorned with the wiſeſt miniſters, the braveſt warriors, and the brighteſt literati of the age, who ſhared the praiſe praiſe of her ſucceſſes, but thoſe brilliant ornaments of her crown, inſtead of leſſening, add to the applauſe which is her due; ſeeing they all owed their advancement to her choice, were ſupported by her conſtancy, and with all their abilities were never able to acquire an undue aſcendancy over her. Thus ſhe conſtantly remained miſtreſs in her family, in her court, and in her kingdom. Her œconomy was ſo remarkable, that the ſmalleſt expence, if it could poſſibly have been ſaved, appeared conſiderable in her eyes; even the charge of an expreſs was not below her notice; yet this wiſe queen was ſo void of avarice, that ſhe amaſſed no treaſures, and even refuſed ſubſidies from parliament, when ſhe had no preſent occaſion for money. During that age, the ſplendor of a court was a great part of the public charge; and Elizabeth being a ſingle woman, and being expenſive in no kind of magnificence, except in cloaths, this enabled her to perform great things with her ſcanty revenue; for ſhe is ſaid to have paid a debt of four millions, left on the crown by her father, brother, and ſiſter; an incredible ſum for that age. But with all theſe amiable and great qualities, it muſt be confeſſed, that ſhe had ſome of the foibles belonging to the weakeſt of her ſex. She was proud, imperious, and in ſome caſes even cruel; as an inſtance of which, we need only cite her treatment of the unfortunate queen of Scots, her ſiſter queen and near kinſwoman. She carried not only her prerogative, but her ſtate, to the greateſt height, not permitting any one to ſpeak to her without kneeling. She gave way to the ſallies of anger, the rivalſhip of beauty, a fondneſs for admiration, and flattery to her perſon; ſo that when near ſeventy years of age ſhe liſtened with delight to the moſt fulſome praiſes of her beauty. On contemplating her as a woman, we cannot but be ſtruck with the higheſt admiration of her extenſive and uncommon qualities; yet we are alſo apt to require more ſweetneſs of diſpoſition, more gentleneſs of manners, a greater lenity, and that mildneſs of temper, by which her ſex is diſtinguiſhed. But a more juſt method of forming a true eſtimate of her merit, is to lay aſide all theſe conſiderations, and to conſider her merely as a rational being, entruſted with the government of a part of mankind; in which view, her magnanimity, wiſdom, policy, bravery, and ſteadineſs, have immortalized her fame, and juſtly entitle her to univerſal admiration. Had ſhe been leſs rigorous, leſs imperious, and without theſe foibles, ſhe would have been, what never did, or can exiſt in this world—a perfect character.

A. D. 1603. JAMES VI. of Scotland, was the great grandſon of Margaret, the eldeſt daughter of Henry VII. and on the failure of the male line, his hereditary right to the crown of England remained unqueſtioned. James I. having been long conſidered by the people as the ſucceſſor of Elizabeth, he was proclaimed by the council ſix hours after her demiſe. They then diſpatched letters to notify his acceſſion, and receive his commands; in conſequence of which, having left a commiſſion with his council for the adminiſtration of affairs in Scotland, James departed for England, on the fifth of April, accompanied by the duke of Lenox, the earls of Mar, Murray, and Argyle; the lords Hume and Kinlos, Sir George Hume, treaſurer, and ſecretary Elphinſton. The people, in general, expreſſed moſt extravagant joy on his entering the kingdom, crowding in multitudes to ſee their new ſovereign, and invoking heaven to bleſs him with a long and proſperous reign; but the concourſe of thoſe, whom curioſity had brought together, gave him ſuch offence during his progreſs, that he iſſued a proclamation, forbidding ſuch a tumultuous reſort. At York, he received the homage of almoſt all the nobility in the kingdom; and there, to the ſurprize of all preſent, he honoured Cecil with a gracious reception, though he had been the inveterate enemy of Eſſex, whom James had highly eſteemed, and was the ſon of that Burleigh, who brought his mother to the block. At Newark, to ſhew his high idea of regal prerogative, he commanded a thief to be hanged without any form of trial. Soon after, his ſeverity was exerciſed on Valentine Thomas, of whom he had complained to Elizabeth, that he had calumniated his conduct. He found this unfortunate man impriſoned for that ſuppoſed crime, and had him condemned, under the pretence of a conſpiracy againſt Elizabeth, and ſome of her council. On his arrival at Theobalds, a ſeat belonging to the ſecretary, he was viſited by the council in a body, and augmented that honourable board with ſome of his attendants, to whom he added lord Gough, and baron Burleigh, brother to ſecretary Cecil. When James entered the capital, he was received with the greateſt rejoicings. The whole nation appeared intereſted in favour of their new monarch; and he was crowned at Weſtminſter on Monday, the twenty-fifth of July, by Whitgiſt, archbiſhop of Canterbury, amidſt the acclamations of the people. He began his reign with laviſhing a profuſion of honours on his courtiers. Within ſix weeks after his aſcending the Engliſh throne, he conferred the honour of knighthood on no leſs than two hundred and thirty-ſeven perſons. To ridicule this imprudent manner of beſtowing titles, a paſquinade was affixed to the gate of St. Paul's, advertiſing, that an artiſt had diſcovered the beſt method of retaining, in weak memories, the names of the new nobility. The greater part of theſe honours were conferred upon the Scots, at which the Engliſh were offended, and this partiality might have occaſioned national quarrels, had not James reſolved to employ Engliſhmen only in the adminiſtration. Among theſe ſecretary Cecil, created ſucceſſively lord Effindon, viſcount Cranborne, and earl of Saliſbury, was always regarded prime miniſter and chief counſellor. Very different was the fate of Sir Walter Raleigh, who had been cloſely connected with Cecil in oppoſing Eſſex, whom James conſidered as a zealous partizan of the ſucceſſion in the houſe of Stuart. Among thoſe courtiers who were moſt diſſatisfied with the change of royal favour, were Raleigh, and the lords Gray and Cobham, who were ſo indiſcreet, that a kind of conſpiracy for ſetting Arabella Stuart, the king's couſin-german, upon the throne, was charged againſt them, in conjunction with Aremberg, the Flemiſh ambaſſador, and the three following Engliſh commoners, Sir Griffith Markham, Anthony Copley, and George Brooke, the lord Cobham's brother. The ground of their accuſation was, ſome imprudent words ſpoken in the height of reſentment; and this ended in the condemnation of all the accuſed; though Sir Walter Raleigh could not be brought in guilty without the violation of every eſſential law in the conſtitution, there being no other evidence againſt him, than a letter ſigned by lord Cobham, who afterwards declared, that his name to that letter was fraudulently obtained. In this cauſe Sir Edward Coke, then attorney-general, impleading for the crown, threw out a torrent of abuſe on Raleigh, beſtowing on him the epithets of traitor, monſter, viper, and ſpider of hell: while that great man defended himſelf with temper, eloquence and courage. To all but Brooke, the ſentence of death was mitigated to impriſonment; but Watſon and Clerk, two accomplices in this pretended conſpiracy, were executed.

James, with little judgment, and a ſhallow capacity, had acquired ſome common-place learning, which rendered him conceited and open to adulation. He diſplayed a fondneſs for idleneſs, while he enjoyed a reputation of buſineſs; and affected to decide, by his own judgment, all religious and civil affairs; yet devoted his whole time to amuſement, ſpending his days in hunting, or idle compoſitions, and his evenings in all the variety of entertainments which the ingenuity of his queen could procure him. The ſycophants at court extolled his genius and learning, flattering him with the epithets of moſt ſacred majeſty, and the Solomon of the age. But by this time he had incurred the almoſt general odium of the people, by his encouragement of undeſerving favourites, and his partiality for his own countrymen, who not only engroſſed his whole favour, but became ſo arrogant, that quarrels, murders, and riots, univerſally prevailed. So attached was this king to arbitrary ſentiments, that the moſt apparent proſpect of fatal conſequences could not prevail on him to ſlacken the reins of deſpotiſm; nay, he was ſo ludicrouſly imperious, that he would curſe the people, who, through accident, had obſtructed the courſe of his diverſions, which he preferred to the moſt ſerious concerns. However, notwithſtanding theſe ill qualities, impartiality muſt acknowledge, that he ſerved the ſtate by ſuſpending all monopolies, granted in the late reign, to the obſtruction of commerce; ſuperſeding all illegal delays of ſuits by protections, and putting a ſtop to the abuſe of purveyors. An opportunity was now afforded James of diſplaying his pedantic learning, by a petition from ſeven hundred and fifty clergymen, for the reformation of ſeveral articles in the eſtabliſhed church. The king gave them hopes of an impartial debate, in which he was to preſide as judge; and the aſſembly being met at Hampton-court, James turned principal diſputant, ſilencing all oppoſition by his loquacity and authority. Theſe were ſome of his powerful arguments: "If you aim at Scottiſh preſbytery, it agrees as well with monarchy, as God and the devil. There Jack, Tom, Will, and Dick, ſhall meet to cenſure me and my council. Therefore, I reiterate my former ſpeech; Le roy, s'aviſera. Stay, I pray you, for one ſeven years before I demand; and then, if you find me grow purſy and fat, I may perchance hearken unto ye." The clergy were obliged to acquieſce, with no other conviction, than of their being miſtaken in the hopes they had formed from his education. The churchmen and courtiers ſhewed great exultation on this occaſion. Chancellor Egerton ſaid, that he had often heard of royalty and the prieſthood being united, but never ſaw it verified till now; and archbiſhop Whitgift, carrying his flattery ſtill farther, exclaimed, that he verily believed the king ſpoke by the ſpecial aſſiſtance of the Spirit of God. This curious debate was followed by two proclamations; one commanding all jeſuits and prieſts, who had received orders from any foreign power, to depart the kingdom; and the other enjoining the puritans to conform to the eſtabliſhed church. The latter ſoon after ſuffered ſo ſevere a perſecution, that they offered a petition to the king for relief while he was hunting; when being offended at this unexpected intruſion, he ordered them to lay their grievances before the council: but no ſooner did theſe deputies make this application, than they were ſent to priſon; and Sir Francis Haſtings, Sir Valentine Knightly, and Sir Edward Montague, by whoſe direction they had taken this ſtep, were turned out of the lieutenancy of the county, and the commiſſion of the peace.

The marquis of Roſny, afterwards the famous duke of Sully, a miniſter worthy of Henry IV. was charged with the affairs of France at the Engliſh court. That able ſtateſman propoſed a league with James, in conjunction with Venice, the United Provinces, and the northern crowns, in order to invade the houſe of Auſtria on every ſide, and to humble the exorbitant power of that ambitious family. But the genius of the Engliſh monarch was not adapted to ſuch an enterprize; the love of peace was his ruling paſſion; and Roſny found James to be maſter of ſo much diſſimulation, that all his addreſs was inſufficient to carry his point. James had the art to hide his real intentions. He refuſed to make any declaration but in general terms, of his ſincere deſire of living in friendſhip with France. A ſolemn conference was, however, at laſt held, wherein it was agreed, that the Dutch ſhould have the liberty of levying forces both in France and England; that the two monarchs ſhould ſupply that republic with the ſum of one million four hundred thouſand livres a year; that the whole ſum ſhould be advanced by the king of France, but that one third of it ſhould be deducted to diſcharge a debt due from that monarch to Elizabeth; and that if the Spaniards attacked either the territories of France or England, the contracting parties ſhould aſſiſt each other, James with a force of ſix thouſand, and Henry with one of ten thouſand men.

A. D. 1604.

The parliament aſſembled on the ninth of March, whoſe meeting had been delayed on account of the plague, which had raged ſo dreadfully in London, that above thirty thouſand perſons are ſaid to have died of it in one year; though, at that time, the city contained only a hundred and fifty thouſand inhabitants. The king, in a tedious ſpeech from the throne, while he endeavoured to diſplay his learning, more fully diſplayed his real character. After having expatiated on his title, which he fixed on the baſe of divine right, as being ordained by God for his people, he expreſſed his ſatisfaction at the cordial reception he had received on his firſt entry into his new kingdom. "Shall it be ever blotted out of my mind, ſaid he, how, at my firſt entry, the people of all ſorts rid and ran, nay rather flew to meet me; their eyes flaming nothing but ſparkles of affection; their mouths and tongues uttering nothing but ſounds of joy; their hands, feet, and all the reſt of their members, in their geſtures, diſcovering a paſſionate longing and eagerneſs to meet and embrace their new ſovereign." He then expatiated on the manifold bleſſings England had received in his perſon: which would complete their happineſs, if the two nations were united in one kingdom. He obſerved, that he was the huſband, and the whole iſland his lawful wife, and hoped none would be ſo unreaſonable, as to think a Chriſtian king ſhould be a polygamiſt, or huſband to two wives. He acknowledged the Roman catholic to be the mother church, though defiled with ſome impurities; and that he was conſidering to lighten the burden of laws againſt them; but as to the ſects of puritans and noveliſts, they were inſufferable in a well-governed commonwealth. This ſpeech, which was pedantic, laboured, and extremely prolix, diſſatisfied all parties. The proteſtants were alarmed at the advances made towards the catholics, and the nonconformiſts were enraged to hear the king profeſs himſelf their open enemy; nor was the whole nation leſs diſpleaſed at the hints he threw out of an union with Scotland. The parliament having confirmed the king's title, a motion was made for the redreſs of the following grievances; the wardſhips of children; the abuſe of purveyors, and of monopolies; diſpenſations in penal ſtatutes, the exportation of ordnance, and the abuſes of the exchequer. In a conference with the lords, on a propoſal to petition the king, for leave to take into conſideration their giving him a recompence in exchange for wardſhips, the lords heartily joined in the cauſe, and recommended their comprizing in the petition, licence of alienation, reſpite of homage, and other intolerable burdens, which had been obtained by ſtretches of prerogative. Theſe ſpirited exertions were, however, rendered uſeleſs, by an incident which now diſturbed the concord ſubſiſting between the two houſes. One of the prohibitions in the king's proclamation for aſſembling a parliament was, that no out-law ſhould be returned. Sir Francis Goodwin had been choſen member for the county of Bucks, and his return, as uſual, was made into chancery: but the chancellor pronouncing him an out-law, vacated his ſeat, iſſued writs for a new election, and the county choſe Sir John Forteſcue in his room. The firſt act of the houſe was to reverſe the chancellor's ſentence, and reſtore Sir Francis to his ſeat. On which the lords, by the king's command, deſired a conference on this ſubject; but this the commons refuſed, as the queſtion related ſolely to their own privileges. They, however, agreed, that their ſpeaker ſhould remonſtrate to the king, that though the returns were made by form into chancery, the ſole right of judging, with reſpect to elections, belonged to that houſe alone. James, not ſatisfied, ordered a conference between the houſe and the judges, which, he ſaid, he commanded as an abſolute king; adding, that "all their privileges were derived from his grant, and he hoped they would not turn them againſt himſelf." This opened the eyes of the commons, who now ſaw the conſequences of the power aſſumed by the chancellor, to which their predeceſſors had, in ſome inſtances, blindly ſubmitted; and they were determined to ſhake off that puſillanimity which had rendered them ſo ſubſervient to the orders of the crown in the preceding reign, and to aſſert their privileges with a becoming ſpirit. They appointed a committee to confer with the judges before the king and council; there the queſtion of law appearing in the eye of James, more doubtful than he had hitherto imagined it to be, he propoſed, that Goodwin and Forteſcue ſhould be both ſet aſide, and a writ be iſſued by a warrant of the houſe for a new election. To this Goodwin conſented, and the commons embraced the expedient; which at once ſhewed their reſpect for the king, and ſecured the right they claimed, of being the ſole judges in their own elections and returns.

The attention of the parliament was next turned to a propoſal for a union of the two kingdoms, which true policy would have conſidered as the greateſt advantage to both. The king was very deſirous of completing this union. He told the parliament, "that he juſtly regarded it as the peculiar felicity of his reign, that he had terminated the bloody animoſities of two hoſtile nations, and reduced the whole iſland under one empire, enjoying tranquillity within itſelf, and ſecurity from all foreign invaſions." He added, "that while his ſubjects of both kingdoms reflected on the diſaſters of former times, he hoped they would entertain the ſtrongeſt deſire of ſecuring themſelves againſt a return of ſimilar calamities, by a thorough union of laws, parliaments, and privileges." But theſe reaſons, however powerful, when conſidered without prejudice, loſt their effect. James was ſo bent on the accompliſhment of this ſcheme, that he had aſſumed the title of king of Great-Britain, quartered St. Andrew's croſs with that of St. George; and iſſued a proclamation, to make the coin of Scotland current in England. Let it here be noted, that whenever we ſpeak of the coins and great ſeals of England, we would refer the curious, to our elegant copper-plates, deſigned particularly to illuſtrate the ſubject of our hiſtory, which have been accurately taken from original impreſſions, and procured for the entertainment of our ſubſcribers, at no ſmall trouble and expence.

The commons aſcribed the exceſſive zeal of the king for an union between England and Scotland, to partiality in favour of his antient ſubjects, of which, on other occaſions, they thought they had ſufficient reaſon to complain; they therefore took his plan into conſideration, rather out of compliment to him, than with any deſign to bring it into execution. They were, indeed, chiefly intent on a redreſs of grievances; but the gleam of public virtue, which appeared in the lords at the beginning of the ſeſſion, was now entirely vaniſhed; yet the commons, though thus foiled in their intentions for the public good, were determined that the people ſhould not be robbed, to feed the luxury of the courtiers; when therefore a queſtion of a ſupply was brought before the houſe, the ſame ſpirit of oppoſition appeared among them: they oppoſed vehemently a ſubſidy being granted to the king, who rather than ſuffer the mortification of a refuſal, ſent a meſſage to the houſe, informing them, that he deſired not a ſupply. In this parliament, the commons demanded the delivery of Sir Thomas Shirley, one of their members, who had been committed to the fleet; and puniſhed the warden for contempt of the houſe, in having at firſt refuſed to releaſe his priſoner. Thus the commons eſtabliſhed their power of puniſhing both the perſon at whoſe ſuit any member is arreſted, and the officers who either arreſt or detain them.

Soon after the prorogation of parliament, a peace was finally concluded between Spain and England; one of the articles of which was, that James ſhould fix a day, before the expiration of which the United Provinces ſhould agree to the peace, and in caſe of their refuſal, he ſhould deem himſelf abſolved from his former engagements. It is remarkable, that in James's proclamation, he plainly ſuppoſes, that as he had himſelf, while king of Scotland, always lived in friendſhip with Spain, peace was attached to his perſon; and that merely by his acceſſion to the crown of England, without any articles of agreement, he had ended the war between the two kingdoms. Soon after the concluſion of this treaty, the town of Oſtend capitulated, having endured a three years ſiege. The Spaniards found nothing in the place but heaps of ruins, to recompenſe them for the vaſt ſums of money, and the incredible number of lives they had loſt in making the conqueſt. James gave himſelf no concern about the loſs of this fortreſs, reſolving to improve his preſent connection with Spain. He accordingly diſpatched the earl of Nottingham, lord high admiral, with the character of ambaſſador extraordinary to that court, attended by a numerous and magnificent retinue.

We come now to that page of hiſtory, wherein is recorded an event ſcarcely to be paralleled in the annals of this, or any other country. It ſtands as an awful warning to religious bigots of every deſcription, ſhewing them how far the human mind may be drawn aſide from the paths of right reaſon and moral obligations, by the baneful influence of narrow prejudices, and falſe zeal. The gunpowder plot, whether we conſider either the inſtruments, the means employed, or the end propoſed, is one of thoſe infernal ſchemes, which one would think human nature, in its moſt depraved ſtate, could neither deviſe nor execute. The papiſts had expected at leaſt the free exerciſe of their religion from the ſon of Mary Stuart; but when they found their eſtates were confiſcated, under the diſtinction of popiſh recuſants, and that the laws enacted againſt them were executed with rigour, ſurprize and rage ſtifled the ſoft dictates of humanity, and in the baſe thoughts of revenge they forgot the real duties of religion. Cateſby, a gentleman of an ancient family, in one of his converſations with Piercy, a deſcendant of the houſe of Northumberland, firſt opened his plan for overturning the Engliſh government. Piercy, in a ſally of paſſion, propoſed aſſaſſinating the king; on which Cateſby cried, "In vain would you put an end to the king's life; his children would ſucceed both to his crown, and to his maxims of government. In vain would you extinguiſh the whole royal family: the nobility, the gentry, the parliament, are all infected with the ſame hereſey. To anſwer any good purpoſe, we muſt at one blow deſtroy the king, the royal family, the lords, the commons, and involve all our enemies in one common ruin. Happily, they will be aſſembled on the firſt meeting of parliament, and afford us an opportunity of a glorious revenge. A few of us may run a line below the hall in which they meet; and chuſing the very moment when the king makes his ſpeech to both houſes, conſign over to deſtruction thoſe determined foes to all piety and religion; while the impious inhabitants, meditating perhaps new perſecutions againſt us, ſhall paſs from flames above to flames below, there for ever to endure the torments due to their crimes. The glorious cataſtrophe may eaſily be laid at the door of the puritans." Piercy appeared highly pleaſed with this daring project; and it was agreed between him and Cateſby, to communicate the deſign to a few of their friends, particularly to Thomas Winter, whom they ſent into Flanders, to bring over Guy Fawkes, an officer in the Spaniſh ſervice, with whoſe zeal for the catholic faith, and courage to execute any deſperate enterprize, they were well acquainted. Fawkes having entered into the conſpiracy with all the ardour of wild enthuſiaſm, a houſe was hired in Piercy's name, adjoining to that in which the parliament was to meet. They began their operations in the month of December; and, to prevent ſuſpicion, laid in ſtore of proviſions, and never deſiſted from their labour.

A. D. 1605.

It being expected that the parliament would be aſſembled ſome time in February, the work was carried on with aſtoniſhing perſeverance; nor was reſolution wanting, ſeeing they had provided themſelves with fire-arms, in order, ſhould they have been diſcovered, to periſh rather than be taken. They ſoon pierced through the wall, though three yards in thickneſs; but on their approaching the other ſide, they were alarmed at hearing a noiſe, which they were at a loſs to account for. A diſcovery was now apprehended, and the conſpirators prepared to defend themſelves to the laſt extremity; but upon enquiry, it was found, that the place from whence the noiſe proceeded was a large vault under the houſe of lords, where a quantity of coals were ſelling off, and that the vault would be lett to the higheſt bidder. Piercy immediately hired the place, conveyed into it thirty-ſix barrels of powder, and covered the whole with faggots. The door was boldly flung open, as if it contained nothing dangerous, or that ought to be concealed. The whole train of miſchief was now completely laid; but the parliament being prorogued to the fifth of November, the conſpirators had time to perfect the remaining part of their diabolical project. James, his queen, and prince Henry, were all expected to be preſent at the opening of the parliament. The duke of York, on account of his tender age, they knew would be abſent, and it was agreed, that Piercy ſhould ſeize, or aſſaſſinate him. The princeſs Elizabeth, alſo a child, was at lord Harrington's, in Warwickſhire; but Sir Everard Digby, Rookwood, and Grant, engaged to aſſemble their friends, under the pretence of a hunting match; and, after ſeizing that princeſs, to proclaim her queen. The long wiſhed-for time now drew near, for carrying this infamous ſcheme into execution; and the vile agents waited with impatience for its arrival. The horrid ſecret, though communicated to above twenty perſons, had been kept almoſt a year and a half. Not a ſyllable had tranſpired. Not one of the conſpirators had abandoned the enterprize, either through fear of puniſhment, or the hopes of reward. Fear, pity, and remorſe, the voice of conſcience, and the ſoft whiſpers of humanity, were all ſtifled by a religious phrenzy; but, under the providence of God, the royal family and kingdom were ſaved from deſtruction, by a ſeeming trifling occurrence. About ten days before the meeting of parliament, lord Monteagle, ſon of lord Morley, a catholic peer, received the following letter, which had been delivered to his ſervant by an unknown hand. "My lord, out of the love I bear to ſome of your friends, I have a care of your preſervation: therefore I would adviſe you, as you tender your life, to deviſe ſome excuſe to ſhift off your attendance on this parliament; for God and man have concurred to puniſh the wickedneſs of this time. And think not ſlightly of this advertiſement, but retire yourſelf into the country, where you may expect the event with ſafety; for though there be no appearance of any ſtir, yet, I ſay, they will receive a terrible blow this parliament, and yet they ſhall not ſee who hurts them. This counſel is not to be contemned, becauſe it may do you good, and can do you no harm; for the danger is paſt, as ſoon as you have burned this letter. And I hope God will give you the grace to make good uſe of it; to whoſe holy protection I commend you." Monteagle, alarmed at this ambiguous letter, carried it at midnight to lord

Saliſbury, who conſulted with the earl of Suffolk, lord chamberlain, about the enigmatical contents, which were afterwards communicated to the king, the earls of Nottingham, Worceſter, and Northampton. Having peruſed and canvaſſed this dark intimation, they conjectured, from the earneſt ſtile of the letter, that ſomewhat very dangerous was intended: and that the effect which was repreſented to be at once both ſudden and terrible, ſeemed to denote a contrivance by the means of gunpowder; and it was thought adviſeable, to ſearch all the vaults under both houſes of parliament. Accordingly, on the fourth of November, the lord chamberlain, who was obliged by his office to ſee every thing in readineſs againſt his majeſty's coming, viſited, as uſual, all the places about the parliament houſe. He obſerved, though ſeemingly with a ſlight inſpection, the great piles of wood and faggots in the vault under the upper houſe, and caſt his eye upon Fawkes, who ſtood in a dark corner, and ſaid, he was one of Piercy's ſervants. The lord chamberlain was ſtruck with the appearance of the man, in whoſe countenance all the ſigns of ferocious courage were ſtrongly marked. It appeared a little extraordinary, that Piercy, who ſeldom reſided in town, ſhould have here ſuch a quantity of fuel; and, upon comparing all circumſtances, it was reſolved to make a more thorough ſearch. This reſolution being taken, about midnight, Sir Thomas Knevet, a juſtice of the peace, was ſent, with proper attendants, to examine the cellar, under the pretext of ſearching for ſtolen goods. Fawkes had juſt put the finiſhing ſtroke to his preparations, and was coming out of the vault, when Knevet arrived on the ſpot. The daring conſpirator was inſtantly ſecured; and the faggots being removed, the barrels of powder were laid open to view. Fawkes had a dark lantern in his hand; and the matches, with every thing neceſſary for ſetting fire to the powder, were found in his pockets. The guilt of this determined villain was now apparent; who, knowing that all denial would be in vain, avowed the dreadful deſign, at the ſame time expreſſing the utmoſt regret, that he had loſt the opportunity of firing the powder, and at once deſtroying both his enemies and himſelf. When examined before the council, he diſplayed the ſame intrepid firmneſs, mixed with ſcorn and diſdain. He ſhewed not the leaſt concern, but for the failure of the enterprize, and refuſed to diſcover his accomplices. This obſtinacy continued two or three days; but being cloſely confined in the Tower, and brought before the rack, his courage forſook him, and he made a full diſcovery of all the conſpirators. Such of theſe who reſided in town had not abandoned their hopes of ſucceſs, till they heard that Fawkes was taken. They then fled into Warwickſhire, where Sir Everard Digby, perſuaded that the attempt had ſucceeded, was ready to ſeize the princeſs Elizabeth; but ſhe had prevented their deſign by flying to Coventry. The whole country was now raiſed and armed by the ſheriff; and Sir Richard Walſh, high-conſtable of Worceſterſhire, aſſiſted by the inhabitants, ſurrounded the conſpirators at Holbeach. Their number, including all their attendants, did not exceed eighty perſons. Having confeſſed, and received abſolution, they reſolved to ſell their lives as dear as poſſible. But this conſolation was denied them. A quantity of powder, laid before the fire to dry, taking fire, diſabled them from making any defence. The people ruſhing in upon them, Piercy and Cateſby were killed by a ſingle ſhot. Digby, Winter, Rookwood, and Bates, being taken priſoners, were tried, confeſſed their guilt, and died, as did alſo Garnet, the Jeſuit, by the hands of the common executioner. Fawkes, with ſeveral more, ſuffered in Old Palace Yard.

The earl of Northumberland was fined thirty thouſand pounds, and impriſoned ſeveral years in the Tower, under pretence of his having been acquainted with the conſpiracy; though the only grounds of ſuſpicion were, his having admitted Piercy, his kinſman, into the number of gentlemen penſioners, without tendering him the oath of ſupremacy. The lords Mordaunt and Sturton were fined by the ſtar-chamber; the former ten thouſand pounds, and the latter four thouſand. On the other hand, the lord Monteagle was rewarded with an eſtate of two hundred pounds a year, and a penſion of five hundred. The diſcovery of this aſtoniſhing treaſonable plot, occaſioned the meeting of parliament to be put off till the ninth of November; when the king, in his ſpeech from the throne, obſerved, that it would be highly unjuſt, nay, criminal, to involve the whole body of catholics in the guilt of a few; that it could not be ſuppoſed they were all inclined to engage in ſuch horrid barbarities; that all men who maintained the tenets of the Roman church, ſhould not be conſidered as ſupporters of the pope's power of dethroning kings, or ſanctifying aſſaſſination; for though the wrath of heaven is denounced againſt crimes, yet innocent error may obtain favour. “For my own part, added he, conſpiracy, however atrocious, ſhall never alter my plan of government: while I puniſh guilt with one hand, I will ſupport and protect innocence with the other.” He then charges the members of both houſes, not to think that any foreign princes had a hand in the plot, but to ſpeak and think of them reverently: and concludes with inſtructing them, that they were not to buſy themſelves in propoſing new laws, but to conſult on thoſe propoſed by their king. After this ſpeech, which was drawn to a great length, he prorogued the parliament to the twenty-ſecond of January.

A. D. 1606.

This moderation of James, though much applauded by the courtiers, was far from being agreeable to his ſubjects; on the contrary, the generality of the people were much diſpleaſed with his ſpeech; the puritans particularly ſo, who repreſented his lenity as a proof that his heart was inclined to the doctrines of Rome. But James was at this time cajoled by Spain with the hopes of a family alliance, attended with theſe flattering conditions; that he was to be made the arbiter of all the religious differences in Europe; that a large part of Flanders, and an annual penſion of a million of ducats, were to be the portion of the Infanta, and that he was to aſſiſt Spain againſt the Seven United Provinces: hence proceeded the tenderneſs he diſcovered for the catholics; hence the many proclamations to prevent the public from ſuſpecting that the conſpirators had been promiſed aſſiſtance from Spain; and hence proceeded his charge to the commons, to think and ſpeak reverently of foreign princes. Nevertheleſs, on the meeting of parliament, the heinouſneſs of the late conſpiracy engaged the attention of both houſes; the reſult of which was, an act which appointed an annual thankſgiving on the fifth of November; an act for diſcovering and repreſſing popiſh recuſants; and another to prevent dangers that may ariſe from perſons of this deſcription. When the buſineſs of a ſupply was introduced, it was accompanied with a demand for the redreſs of grievances. Three ſubſidies, and ſix fifteenths were required; but while the houſe debated upon theſe, the whole city was thrown into confuſion, by a report of the king's having been murdered at Oking, about twenty miles weſt of London. The citizens were put under arms; and the frighted members ſent meſſage after meſſage to the council, to know the truth; but in a few hours, James ſent word that he intended to be in London that day. While the minds of men were agitated by this double ſurprize, the courtiers paſſed the ſupply ſo warmly, that they carried the motion; and the next day, when ſome of the members moved that the bill ſhould not paſs till the heavy grievances of the nation were redreſſed, this motion was over-ruled, and the bill being ſent up to the houſe of lords, it met with an eaſy and quick aſſent. This ſupply, though very conſiderable, was ſoon ſquandered by the king's profuſion. A viſit which James received from the king of Denmark, and prince Vaudemont, third ſon to the duke of Lorraine, helped to conſume the large grants the king had juſt received. One continued round of magnificent ſhews, and expenſive amuſements, diſſipated reflection. The whole court was employed in feaſting and revelry, in maſques and interludes. Prince Vaudemont was attended by ſeven earls, ten barons, forty gentlemen, and one hundred and twenty domeſtics, which greatly increaſed the ſplendor that then reigned in every part of the palace.

On the eighteenth of November the parliament met again at Weſtminſter, when the project of an union between the two kingdoms was revived. James laboured hard to complete this his favourite ſcheme. Sir Francis Bacon employed all his powers on the ſame ſubject; and, in order to ſoften the members, ſome trifling conceſſions were made, with reſpect to a few of the leaſt important grievances; but the only point gained, was an act for the utter abolition of the memory of hoſtilities between the two nations; and for repreſſing occaſions of diſcord for the time to come. The king, impatient at theſe delays, ſummoned the two houſes to appear at Whitehall, where he ſtrove to convince them of the advantages that would flow from his plan. Yet, notwithſtanding all his rhetoric, the parliament were determined not to attempt the incorporation of the two nations; while the king's partiality, and the pretenſions of the Scots, forbad all hopes of its being done on advantageous, or even equitable terms.

A. D. 1607. During this ſeſſion, the puritans exerted themſelves, as uſual, in bringing in bills againſt pluralities, and moved for a toleration of thoſe who oppoſed the ceremonies of the church; but all their efforts were in vain. In the mean time, an inſurrection happened in the counties of Northampton, Warwick, and Leiceſter, occaſioned by large tracts of land being encloſed, whereby the people were deprived of their right of commonage. A body, conſiſting of three or four thouſand men, roved about the country, demoliſhing encloſures, and laying open the lands that had been taken from them. They were headed by one John Reynolds, a perſon in very low condition, but who had acquired great authority among the populace. Several proclamations were publiſhed, and the ſheriffs raiſed the poſſe of their reſpective counties againſt them, but carefully avoided coming to blows. At laſt James publiſhed a conciliating proclamation, expreſſing his unwillingneſs to proceed againſt them by martial law, and promiſing them mercy, and redreſs of grievances. This produced the deſired effect; the people laid down their arms, and returned to their reſpective habitations. A few weeks after this commotion ſubſided, James, though no ſupply had been granted him by the parliament, paid a debt of ſixty thouſand pounds contracted by Elizabeth, who, about nine years before, had borrowed that ſum of the city of London, and left it undiſcharged at her deceaſe. In the year following, nothing memorable occurs but the death of Thomas Sackville, earl of Dorſet, lord high-treaſurer. He was ſucceeded in his office by Robert Cecil, earl of Saliſbury, a nobleman every way qualified to inſtruct James in the methods uſed by former kings, for raiſing money without the aſſiſtance of parliament. The king continued to gratify his capricious humour without reſtraint, and to diſpenſe favours with ſuch profuſion, that his finances were reduced to the loweſt ebb. Though he was wholly inattentive to the concerns of the States, he demanded the payment of the debts owing to the crown of England, amounting to eighteen hundred, eighteen thouſand and eight pounds ſterling, which they acknowledged and promiſed to diſcharge after the rate of thirty thouſand pounds, payable half-yearly. All former treaties were confirmed, together with the privileges before this time enjoyed by the Engliſh in Holland, and the Dutch in England.

A. D. 1609. This year is remarkable for the prevailing influence and triumph of liberty, over the efforts of arbitrary power, and Spaniſh cruelty. Never conteſt ſeemed, at firſt, more unequal, than that between Spain and the States of the United Provinces, and never was conqueſt finiſhed with more honour to the weakeſt ſide. On the part of Spain were numbers, riches, diſcipline, and authority; on that of the revolted provinces, were the attachment to liberty, and the enthuſiaſm of religion. The republic, from the ſmalleſt beginnings, had acquired amazing power; and having vanquiſhed the forces of Spain in every quarter of the globe, obliged the Spaniards to declare the Dutch an independent ſtate. Long had the pride of Spain ſtruggled, before it would give up the point; but after a tedious negociation, a truce of twelve years was concluded, under the mediation of the kings of France and England; in which the king of Spain treated with them as a free people. This was very mortifying to James, who always conſidered the Hollanders as rebels. It was his avowed maxim in all debates concerning his prerogative, that ſubjects ought not to withdraw their allegiance from their princes on any account whatever. He therefore conſidered this treaty as a dangerous precedent, and prejudicial to the ſovereign authority of kings. Cecil, who acted for James, was, on the one hand, ſhackled by his maſter's fear of being involved in a war; and, on the other hand, by the warm inclination of the Engliſh to aſſiſt the States. Influenced by theſe contrarieties, his conduct was ſo lukewarm, as to raiſe the jealouſy of the Dutch, and the reſentment of Spain. However, though the former were not aſſiſted by the Engliſh with ſuch vigour as they ought to have been, yet, by their perſeverance in not abandoning them, may be attributed the terms they obtained from Spain, and their being acknowledged a Sovereign State by all other potentates.

A. D. 1610. James, notwithſtanding the many artifices he employed for levying money, ſoon found his exchequer empty, and was obliged to ſummon a parliament, which met on the ninth of February, to raiſe neceſſary ſupplies. This taſk was undertaken by the earl of Saliſbury, who, in order to allure the commons into a compliance, aſſured them of his majeſty's gracious intention to redreſs their grievances. He then apologized for the low ſtate of the king's finances, by obſerving, that he had paid the debts of the late queen; that he had maintained in Ireland an army of nineteen thouſand men; that he had expended large ſums in his journey with his family from Edinburgh to London; in the entertainment of the king of Denmark, and foreign ambaſſadors; in maintaining ſeparate courts for himſelf, the queen, and the prince of Wales; in ſending envoys to the different courts on the continent, continent; and in acts of munificence to his officers and dependants. He declared, that his majeſty, far from having imbibed arbitrary maxims, was ever ready to attend to the remonſtrances of his ſubjects, ſo far as conſiſtent with the reſpect due to ſo great, ſo wiſe, and ſo gracious a ſovereign. But theſe and ſeveral other reaſons were urged by the treaſurer in vain, and without effect; the commons loudly complaining of the king's prodigality, partiality to his countrymen, and deſign on their liberties; as well as the rigour with which he treated the puritans, whoſe cauſe was eſpouſed by a majority of the members then preſent. The king on this occaſion had recourſe to his uſual method of inſignificant harangue; ſometimes menacing, ſometimes reproving, and ſometimes alluring, ſo that the commons expreſſed their willingneſs to comply with his deſires, provided they did not exceed the bounds of reaſon. Accordingly the earl of Saliſbury moved for a conference with the commons, when he propoſed, that an adequate ſupply might be granted for his majeſty's preſent occaſions, and that two hundred thouſand pounds a year ſhould, for the future, be added to the royal revenue, in order to ſupport the dignity of the crown. Fired at this propoſal, the commons voted only one ſubſidy, and one fifteenth, which did not amount to a ſixth part of what had been required; and they refuſed to ſettle any ſtanding revenue, unleſs the king would purchaſe it with ſome valuable conſideration. They complained of his infringement on the liberty of the ſubject, by annexing the force of laws to his proclamations; veſting the high commiſſion court with a power to which it was not entitled; altering the book of rates, and impoſing new cuſtoms on various kinds of merchandize. They deſired, that no one ſhould be compelled to lend money to the king, or aſſign a reaſon for his refuſal. They afterwards paſſed a bill againſt taxes on merchants, together with another againſt eccleſiaſtical regulations, made without authority of parliament; but both theſe were thrown out by the lords. Theſe bold attempts, with others of a ſimilar nature, could not fail of being very diſagreeable to a prince firmly attached to arbitrary principles. He told the parliament in his ſpeech, that he would never agree to have his power diſputed, but ſhould always be willing to explain the motives of his conduct, and to regulate it by the laws. "A good prince (he obſerved elſewhere) though above the laws, will make his actions conformable to them; and thus ſet an example to his people, whilſt he himſelf is not amenable, nor ſubject to the laws." It is not to be wondered, that, with ſuch oppoſite ſentiments, the king and his parliament parted, on prorogation, equally diſſatisfied.

A. D. 1611. Henry IV. of France, by his good ſenſe and experience, was now become one of the greateſt politicians and generals of the age. That prince ſaw, that while the houſe of Auſtria was always ready to aggrandize herſelf, France had every thing to fear from her ambitious projects; and he had formed a noble plan for humbling the wide extending branches of that aſpiring family. But all his great deſigns were blaſted in a moment by the poniard of an infamous aſſaſſin. Ravaillac had for ſome time followed the king in his excurſions, in queſt of an opportunity of perpetrating his horrid purpoſe. One morning he intended to ſtab Henry at the Feuillans, where he went to hear maſs; but was prevented by the interpoſition of the duke de Vendome. After dinner the king appeared extremely uneaſy, and leaning his head upon his hand, was heard to ſay, "My God! what is this that will not ſuffer me to be at quiet?" About four in the afternoon he went into his coach with the duke d'Epernon, and attended by ſeveral other noblemen. In paſſing through the ſtreet de la Roquelaer, which was very narrow, a ſtop was made by two loaded carts: the king had ſent away his guards, and ordered the coach to be opened, that he might ſee the preparations that were making for the queen's entry; all the pages were gone round another way, except two, one of whom went before to clear the ſtreet, and the other had ſtept on one ſide to tie his garter. Ravaillac, who had followed the carriage, took this opportunity to effect his bloody deſign. He mounted on the coach-wheel, and with a two-edged knife ſtruck the king over the ſhoulder of the duke d'Epernon. Henry exclaimed, "I am wounded!" The daring aſſaſſin repeated the blow with greater violence, and the knife, penetrating the thorax, divided the vena cava, ſo that the king expired immediately. Ravaillac was not perceived by any one while he perpetrated this horrid murder, ſo that he might have eſcaped; but he ſtood upon the wheel fixed like a ſtatue, with the bloody knife in his hand. A gentleman coming up would have put him to death immediately, but the duke d'Epernon called aloud, "Save him on your life," and the miſcreant was ſafely ſecured. On his examination, he boldly confeſſed he murdered the king, becauſe he would not take up arms againſt the hugonots, and that his making war againſt the pope, was nothing leſs than making war againſt God; "becauſe the pope was God, and God was the pope." This fanatical villain ſoon after ſuffered for his treachery, all the torments a human being is capable of ſupporting. The diſcovery of the principle on which this regicide had been actuated gave James no ſmall uneaſineſs, and as the jeſuits were univerſally believed to be the prime inſtigators in the bloody tragedy, the king thought it prudent to remove from his perſon men who held the moſt deteſtable of all doctrines. A proclamation was therefore iſſued, commanding all jeſuits and prieſts of the Roman perſuaſion, to depart the kingdom, and all recuſants not to come within ten miles of the court. At the ſame time the juſtices of the peace in every county were ordered to adminiſter the oath of allegiance to all catholics. But theſe precautions did not divert James from exerting himſelf to improve the navigation and commerce of the kingdom. He encouraged diſcoveries of every kind, that had the leaſt tendency to promote the happineſs of his people. He erected large ſtore-houſes for the benefit of victualling his ſhips and ſupplying them with military ſtores, and carried naval architecture to a much greater degree of perfection than it ever before had reached in England. His care for promoting the intereſt of the Eaſt India Company, muſt not be omitted. That company, incorporated by queen Elizabeth, had hitherto ſubſiſted under great diſadvantages, from the difficulty and length of their voyages; but the large returns of a fortunate voyage, induced them to apply to the king for an enlargement of their charter, by which they propoſed to augment the riches and ſtrength of the kingdom, and to deprive the Turks and Perſians of the commerce of the Eaſt Indies. James entered into theſe conſiderations with an attention becoming the father of his people: he granted them a new charter, enlarged their patent, and formed them into a body corporate and politic. Yet, it muſt be confeſſed, James was much better fitted to ſhine in a college than on a throne. His timidity and indolence rendered him little attentive to foreign affairs; but a controverſy at Leyden made him ſummon up all his religious zeal. Vorſtius, a profeſſor of divinity, and a diſciple of Arminius, differed from his Britannic majeſty, in denying that men were condemned to everlaſting torments, by the ſecret decrees of God, and in maintaining the doctrine of free-will. The royal diſputant therefore attacked the profeſſor with all the rage of arrogance and preſumption. Apprehenſive of the conſequences that might enſue from this ſcholaſtic contention, the States thought proper to deprive Vorſtius of the chair he had filled with ſo much reputation. The king was appeaſed by this mark of condeſcenſion in the States, though he charitably hinted to them, "that as to the burning of Vorſtius for his blaſphemies and atheiſm, he left them to their own Chriſtian wiſdom; but ſurely never heretic better deſerved the flames." The States, however, had too much ſenſe and humanity to underſtand his majeſty's meaning; they even procured a chair for the profeſſor in another univerſity. But amidſt theſe theological diſputes, in which James was engaged, he forgot not a project he had formed in favour of Ireland, and which did him more real honour than all his polemical divinity. This was an attempt to civilize the Iriſh, and to make them acquainted with the happineſs that attends a well-regulated ſociety. He began with aboliſhing the Iriſh cuſtoms, which ſupplied the place of laws; and having taken all the natives under his protection, declared them free citizens, and proceeded to govern them by a regular adminiſtration. Statutes were eſtabliſhed, juſtice adminiſtered, oppreſſion baniſhed, and crimes and diſorders of every kind were ſeverely puniſhed. The whole province of Ulſter having fallen to the crown, by the attainder of the rebels, a company was eſtabliſhed in London for planting new colonies in that province. It was divided into moderate ſhares, the largeſt not exceeding two thouſand acres: tenants were tranſported from England and Scotland; and the Iriſh being removed from their hills and faſtneſſes, were ſettled in the open country, where they were taught huſbandry and the arts. By theſe means, Ulſter, from being the moſt wild and diſorderly province in Ireland, ſoon became the moſt cultivated and beſt civilized. In a word, after proceeding regularly, during the courſe of a few years, James came at length to govern by juſtice and the laws, a people who appeared incapable of acknowledging them. He frequently boaſted of the management of Ireland as his maſter-piece, and his vanity in this particular was not altogether without foundation; it doubtleſs forms the moſt glorious monument of his reign.

A. D. 1612. The ſudden death of Henry prince of Wales, on the ſixth of November, diffuſed an univerſal grief throughout the nation. This young prince had not reached his eighteenth year, and yet poſſeſſed more dignity in his behaviour, and commanded more reſpect, than even his father, with all his learning and experience. Endowed with a genius more refined, he devoted his time to thoſe ſtudies and diverſions, in a regular alternate courſe, which tended to embelliſh his mind, and habituate his body to martial and manly atchievements; and this, added to an elegant perſon, rendered him the delight of the Engliſh nation. Nor was this the only loſs the ſtate ſuſtained in the courſe of this year. The king's chief counſellor, the earl of Saliſbury, died on the fourteenth of May. His death was a great misfortune to James, who was thereby deprived of a very able miniſter, and one perfectly acquainted with the diſpoſition and genius of the Engliſh. He was a nobleman of great parts, honour, and fidelity, a lover and encourager of virtue and learning in others. Soon after the death of the prince, the marriage of the princeſs Elizabeth to Frederic, the Elector Palatine, ſerved to diſſipate the grief occaſioned by that melancholy event. This marriage was celebrated with ſuch joy and feſtivity, that the expence of the nuptials amounted to fifty thouſand pounds: but it proved an unhappy union to the king and his ſon-in-law; for the Elector truſting to ſo great an alliance, engaged in enterprizes beyond his ſtrength, and the king was neither able nor willing to extricate him from his diſtreſſes. The fate of Arabella Stuart was ſtill more deplorable than that of her kinſwoman Elizabeth. James, to whom ſhe was couſin-german, had ſeized on her poſſeſſions, and allowed her a penſion for her ſupport. This unhappy lady, tired of ſuch dependence, and urged by her youthful inclinations, married privately Seymour, grandſon to the earl of Hertford, upon which both of them were apprehended, but found means to make their eſcape, one of them on board a French bark, and the other in a Newcaſtle collier. The unfortunate Arabella was retaken, and conveyed to the Tower. The fatigue ſhe had ſuffered, the ſeverity of her treatment, and her diſappointment, had ſuch a fatal effect upon her tender conſtitution, that ſhe immediately loſt her ſenſes, and ſoon after her life. The avowed cauſe of Arabella's melancholy fate, was the jealouſy her conſanguinity gave to the crown.

A. D. 1613. The court was now immerſed in ſenſuality, and nothing prevailed but gaudy parade and thoughtleſs jollity, while the Engliſh and Scottiſh dependants vied with each other in attaching the king to ſome favourite who might gain the aſcendancy over his weak mind, and be the diſpenſer of his prodigal honours. The lord Hay, ſenſible that perſonal beauty would, in the eſteem of the king, preponderate every other accompliſhment, introduced Robert Carr, a youth who had been James's page in Scotland. Without mentioning him at court, he appointed him at a tilting match to preſent his device and buckler to the king, in hopes that he would gain that monarch's attention. On Carr's advancing to execute his office, his horſe threw him, and his leg was broke in the king's preſence. James approaching him, was ſtruck with the beauty of his perſon, and ordered him to be immediately lodged in the palace. He reſorted after the tilting to his chamber, and frequently viſited him during his confinement. James, highly conceited with his own wiſdom, pleaſed himſelf with thinking that, by his leſſons and inſtructions, this raw unexperienced youth would, in a little time, be initiated into all the profound myſteries of government, and equal his wiſeſt miniſters. James ſoon conferred on him honorary titles and lucrative offices. He knighted him, created him viſcount Rocheſter, beſtowed on him the garter, brought him into the privy council, and at laſt honoured him with the ſupreme direction of all his buſineſs and political concerns; and while all his wiſeſt miniſters could with difficulty ſupport the exigencies of government, the king, with an unſparing hand, loaded this inſignificant youth with riches. Having given him an order to receive five thouſand pounds, for his own uſe, from the exchequer, the earl of Saliſbury, to convince his majeſty of his prodigality, invited him to dinner, and led him through a room, where the whole ſum in ſpecie lay on the table; the king, ſurprized at the ſight of ſo much gold, demanded for what uſe it was intended, when being told it was the money his majeſty had ordered to be given to the lord Rocheſter, he ſwore it was too much for any private man, and deſired the treaſurer would give him only two thouſand pounds. James is ſaid to have found his pupil to be ignorant even of the firſt rudiments of the Latin tongue, and that the monarch, laying aſide the ſceptre, inſtructed him in the principles of grammar. Carr was not ſo intoxicated with advancement, as to be entirely inſenſible of his own ignorance and inexperience; he had therefore recourſe to the aſſiſtance and advice of a friend, and found, in Sir Thomas Overbury, a judicious counſellor, who inſtilled into him the principles of prudence and diſcretion. Thus, while he was governed by Overbury's friendly advice, he enjoyed the favours of his prince, without incurring the hatred of the people.

No ſooner had James aſcended the throne, than he remembered his friendſhip for the unhappy families of Howard and Devereux, who had ſuffered for adhering to the cauſe of Mary. Having reſtored young Eſſex to his blood and dignity, and conferred the titles of Suffolk and Northampton on two brothers of the houſe of Norfolk, he endeavoured to unite theſe families, by cauſing the earl of Eſſex to marry the lady Frances Howard, the earl of Suffolk's daughter. But as he was only fourteen years of age, and ſhe no more than thirteen, it was thought proper that he ſhould go abroad before conſummation, and paſs ſome time in his travels. After four years abſence he returned to England, was pleaſed to find his counteſs in the full luſtre of beauty, and poſſeſſed of the admiration of the whole court: but on his claiming the privileges of a huſband, he was received with ſigns of averſion, and met with a flat refuſal. Upon his applying to her parents, they obliged her to retire with him into the country, and to partake of his bed: but nothing could overcome her ſullenneſs and obſtinacy; and ſhe ſtill roſe from his ſide without allowing him the leaſt favour. Diſguſted with repeated denials, he at laſt ſeparated himſelf from her; and from thenceforward abandoned Frances to her own will and diſcretion. This lady had, during her huſband's abſence, received the addreſſes of the favourite, in which he had been too ſucceſsful; and ſhe imagined, that while ſhe refuſed the embraces of Eſſex, ſhe could not be deemed his wife, and that a divorce might open the way for her being married to her beloved Rocheſter. Though they had already indulged themſelves in all the gratifications of love, they thought their happineſs incomplete, and both the lover and his miſtreſs were impatient till marriage crowned their mutual ardour. An affair of ſuch moment could not, however, be concluded without conſulting Overbury, who was accuſtomed to ſhare all Rocheſter's ſecrets. The friend, who had conſidered his patron's attachment to the counteſs of Eſſex merely as an affair of gallantry, which he imagined would endear him to James, who liſtened with pleaſure to the amours of his court, was greatly alarmed at Rocheſter's mentioning his deſign of marrying the counteſs, and uſed every argument to diſſuade him from it. He repreſented how invidious and difficult it would be for her to obtain a divorce from her huſband: the diſgrace of taking to his bed a profligate woman, who, after being married to a young nobleman of the firſt rank, had made no ſcruple of proſtituting her character, to gratify a capricious and momentary paſſion; and, in the zeal of true friendſhip, he threatened Rocheſter with ſeparating himſelf for ever from him, if he could be ſo blind to his honour as to complete the intended marriage. This converſation Rocheſter had the folly to reveal to the counteſs of Eſſex; and on her giving vent to her rage againſt Overbury, he had alſo the weakneſs to ſwear to be revenged on him, for the greateſt inſtance he could have given of a ſincere friendſhip. As ſome contrivance was neceſſary for the execution of their baſe reſolve, Rocheſter complained to the king, that his own indulgence to Overbury had rendered him ſo arrogant, that he ſhould be glad to get rid of him; and therefore deſired that he might be ſent on an embaſſy to Ruſſia; which he repreſented as a retreat for his friend that would be both honourable and profitable. When Overbury conſulted him, he earneſtly diſſuaded him from accepting it, and promiſed to ſatisfy the king if he ſhould be diſpleaſed at his refuſal; to the king, on the other hand, he aggravated the inſolence of Overbury's conduct, and on the twenty-firſt of April obtained a warrant for committing him to the Tower, which James intended as a ſlight puniſhment for his diſobedience. The lieutenant of the Tower, whom Rocheſter had put into that poſt to ſerve his purpoſe, confined Overbury ſo ſtrictly, that he was debarred the ſight of his neareſt relations, and deprived of hearing what paſſed abroad during near ſix months, which time he was permitted to live. This troubleſome counſellor being thus removed from the ſcene of action, the divorce was ſolicited with ſuch ſucceſs, that the ſentence was ſoon pronounced; and the king not only gave his favourite leave to marry the counteſs, but alſo created him earl of Somerſet, that her ſecond choice might not be inferior in dignity to her firſt. The nuptials were ſolemnized in the moſt magnificent manner; and nothing was now wanting to complete their triumph but the death of Overbury, without which that implacable woman could not be ſatisfied. She uſed every art to effect her bloody deſign; and at laſt prevailed both on her huſband and the earl of Northampton, her uncle, to engage in the atrocious deed of taking him off by poiſon. Several attempts were accordingly made for this purpoſe, but the ſtrength of Overbury foiled all the attacks of weak poiſons. At laſt nature gave way to repeated experiments, and he died in his priſon on the ſixteenth of September, by a poiſoned clyſter. His interment was hurried on with the greateſt precipitation; and though the public entertained a ſtrong ſuſpicion, it was not till ſome years after that the full proof of the horrid crime was brought to light.

A. D. 1614.

The earl of Saliſbury having died the preceding year, the favourite and the earl of Suffolk ſucceeded him in the miniſtry; and the taſk of ſupplying an exhauſted treaſury falling to their lot, ſeveral projects were to this end carried into execution. The title of baronet was ſold for a thouſand pounds, and two hundred patents of that ſpecies of knighthood were diſpoſed of. An inferior order, with the title of knights of Nova Scotia, were ſold at three hundred pounds each. The dignities of baron, viſcount, and earl, were reſpectively ſold at ten, fifteen, and twenty thouſand pounds: benevolences were exacted, to the amount of fifty-two thouſand pounds; and theſe expedients proving inſufficient to ſupply the king's neceſſities, a public lottery, the firſt of its kind in England, was appointed to ſupply the deficiency: yet all theſe expedients proved inſufficient; and the invention of the miniſtry being exhauſted, the king found himſelf obliged, though much againſt his inclination, to call a parliament. Great pains were taken to procure a majority; and James, in the exordium of his ſpeech, compared himſelf to a mirror, which diſcovered his true intentions, and aſſured them, "that his integrity was like the whiteneſs of his robe; his purity, like the gold in his crown; his firmneſs and clearneſs, like the precious ſtones he wore; and his affections like the redneſs of his heart;" but his ſpeech was received coldly, and he himſelf obtained little ſatisfaction from this parliament. The commons, ſtill animated by the ſame public ſpirit againſt the prerogative, determined to confine it within proper limits; and inſtead of granting a ſupply, as deſired by the king, they reſumed the ſubject debated in the laſt parliament. Nor did they think their remonſtrances ſufficient: they even applied to the lords for a conference, in order to ſecure the liberty of the ſubject, by circumſcribing the unlimited power of the crown. Informed of their intention, and determined to render their deſign abortive, James diſſolved the parliament, after about a ſeſſion of two months, in which not one ſtatute was enacted, nor any ſupply granted. In the ſpace of ſix hundred years, there are only three inſtances of the parliament's refuſing an aid to the crown. They were diſſolved on the ſeventh of June; after which James wreaked his vengeance on the leading members, by throwing ſeveral of them into priſon.

A. D. 1615. The ſavourite, deprived of the advantage of Overbury's counſel, ſound himſelf greatly embarraſſed in the management of public affairs. Though he had eſcaped the enquiry of juſtice, he had not eſcaped that remorſe, which, amidſt all the hurry and flattery of a court, ſtung him with the remembrance of his ſecret crime. Somerſet, conſcious of the murder of his friend, received ſmall conſolation from the enjoyments of love, and the favour of his ſovereign. The graces of his youth and the gaiety of his manners gradually diſappeared; his politeneſs and obliging manners were changed into ſullenneſs and thoughtful ſilence. James began to eſtrange himſelf from one who no longer contributed to his amuſements. The queen herſelf was inſulted by this minion, and joined a party formed againſt him. After many conſultations on the moſt likely method of effecting the ruin of Somerſet, it was agreed to give the king a new favourite. George Villiers, a young man, remarkable for his beauty and effeminacy, was the object choſen for this purpoſe. James firſt beheld this younger brother, of a good family, at a comedy acted at Cambridge, where he was conſpicuouſly placed, and immediately engaged the affections of the king. Villiers was introduced to court, and ſoon weakened the influence of the favourite. He was immediately knighted, and made a gentleman of the bed-chamber, with the yearly penſion of a thouſand crowns. Somerſet ſaw his fall, and exerted all his influence to avert it; but his efforts were in vain: the diſcovery of Overbury's murder involved him in infamy and ruin. The apothecary's apprentice, who had made up the poiſons, having retired to Fluſhing, talked very freely of this cruel tranſaction. His diſcourſe came at length to the ears of Trumbal, the king's envoy in the Netherlands, who ſent an account of it to Sir Ralph Winwood, ſecretary of ſtate. The evidence of the boy was confirmed by the information of the counteſs of Shrewſbury, then a priſoner in the Tower. That lady had found means to inſinuate herſelf into the confidence of Sir Jarvaiſe Elwis, lieutenant of the Tower; and being of an intriguing diſpoſition, ſhe drew the ſecret from him. James affected to be aſtoniſhed at finding ſuch enormous guilt in a man whom he had admitted to his boſom, and recommended to Sir William Coke, the chief juſtice, a moſt rigorous ſcrutiny, telling him, "that Somerſet and his wife had made him a pimp to carry on their bawdry and murder; and commanded him to ſpare no man whatſoever; adding, God's curſe be upon you and your's, if you ſpare any of them; and God's curſe be upon me and mine, if I pardon any of them." Accordingly Weſton, who had given Overbury the poiſoned tarts and jellies, and at laſt the clyſter; Mrs. Turner, chief confidant of the counteſs of Somerſet; Franklin, the apothecary who had prepared the poiſon; and Sir Jarvaiſe Elwis, were apprehended. All theſe, together with Somerſet and his counteſs, were convicted of the atrocious fact on the fulleſt evidence. Somerſet and his counteſs, notwithſtanding James's tremendous execration, after continuing a long time in priſon, received not only a pardon, but a penſion of four thouſand pounds a year. With this they retired into the country, and languiſhed out old age in obſcurity and infamy. Their guilty love was turned into hatred, and they lived together in the ſame houſe, without any intercourſe or correſpondence with each other.

The fall of Somerſet made way for the advancement of Villiers. He was created duke of Buckingham, lord high admiral of England, conſtable of Windſor. His family was alſo raiſed to the height of favour, honours, and riches. His mother obtained the title of counteſs of Buckingham; his brother was created viſcount Purbeck; and the ſpoils of Somerſet, amounting to the ſum of two hundred thouſand pounds, and an eſtate of nineteen thouſand pounds a year, gave credit and authority to his neceſſitous relations. Thus a profuſion of honours rendered Villiers raſh, precipitant, and inſolent, while, at the ſame time, it increaſed the king's neceſſities, and obliged him to raiſe money by the moſt obnoxious means. To recruit his empty exchequer, James delivered up the three cautionary fortreſſes of Fluſhing, the Brilie, and Rammekins, which had been delivered to queen Elizabeth, as pledges for a debt due to her from the States. At the concluſion of the truce between them and Spain, they had entered into an agreement with the king, that this debt, which then amounted to eight hundred thouſand pounds, ſhould be diſcharged by their paying forty thouſand pounds annually; and five years having elapſed, the debt was reduced to ſix hundred thouſand pounds; and in fifteen years more it would have been finally diſcharged, ſo that the remainder, which only amounted to the annual ſum of fourteen thouſand pounds, was all that accrued to the king. Hence the Dutch now offered, on ſurrendering thoſe places, to pay him immediately two hundred and fifty thouſand pounds, and to incorporate the Engliſh garriſon into their army; and this propoſal being accepted, they were evacuated on the fourteenth of June, 1616, and from this period we may date the full liberty of the Dutch republic. The ſmall ſum above-mentioned was ſoon diſſipated by ways unknown; none of the king's debts were paid; the navy was not repaired; nor had any money been ſent to the army in Ireland, though their arrears formed the chief pretence for treating with the States. At length it was diſcovered, that the lord treaſurer Suffolk had converted the greater part of the money received from Holland to his own uſe. He being father-in-law to Somerſet, conſequently no friend to Villiers, this opportunity to effect his ruin was readily embraced. Accordingly, the lord treaſurer was accuſed in the ſtar-chamber, of ſeveral miſdemeanors in the execution of his office, and particularly of having embezzled large ſums of money. Sir Edward Coke, who carried on the proſecution againſt him for the crown, aggravated the charges brought againſt him, his extortions, his miſmanagement of the king's treaſure, his boldneſs in applying it to his own uſe; the corruptions and artifices of his deputy Bingley. He then produced ſeveral precedents of treaſurers who had been puniſhed for much ſlighter crimes than thoſe of the earl of Suffolk, and diſplayed the dangerous conſequences that muſt reſult from the corrupt adminiſtration of the public money. Had Suffolk thrown himſelf upon the mercy of the king, he would have been acquitted; but he endeavoured to invalidate the evidence brought againſt him, and to juſtify his conduct againſt the malignant accuſations of his enemies. He failed in the attempt; and his judges pronounced him guilty. He was fined thirty thouſand pounds, and condemned to impriſonment during the king's pleaſure. Nor did his deputy eſcape: he was ſeverely reprimanded, and fined two thouſand pounds. The friends of Somerſet were now no longer capable of giving Villiers any diſturbance. This new favourite began his influence by filling all the places about the court with his own creatures. The lord chief juſtice Coke was deprived of his office, and his place was filled by Montague; and Bacon, on the death of Elleſmere, was appointed lord chancellor.

A. D. 1617. James, in the ſummer of this year, reſolved to pay a viſit to his native country, in order to renew his ancient friendſhip, and to introduce that change of eccleſiaſtical diſcipline and government on which his heart was fixed. He had, before his acceſſion, extorted from the Scotch clergy, an acknowledgment of the juriſdiction of biſhops; who were received, though with great reluctance, as perpetual preſidents, or moderators, in their eccleſiaſtical ſynods; and by ſuch gradual innovations, the king flattered himſelf, that he ſhould imperceptibly introduce the epiſcopal authority. This he could not hope to eſtabliſh, without firſt procuring an acknowledgment of his ſupreme authority in all eccleſiaſtical cauſes; but nothing could be more contrary to the principles of the preſbyterian clergy. On his arrival in Scotland, he propoſed to the parliament, then aſſembled, that whatever his majeſty ſhould determine, in the external government of the church, with the conſent of the archbiſhops, biſhops, and a competent number of the miniſtry, ſhould have the force of law, by which means his eccleſiaſtical authority, had this bill paſſed, would have been eſtabliſhed in its full extent; but ſome of the clergy proteſting againſt it, James, dreading clamour and oppoſition, dropped the bill, though by dint of authority, he had cauſed it to be paſſed by the lords of articles. Some time after, he aſſembled, at St. Andrews, a meeting of the biſhops, and thirty-ſix of the moſt eminent clergy, to whom he declared his reſolution. They intreated him rather to ſummon a general aſſembly: yet this aſſembly, which met on the twenty-fifth of November, after the king's departure from Scotland, eluded all his applications to carry his favourite point. Indeed, in every ſtep of this affair, as well as in all the general aſſemblies, the nation ſhewed the utmoſt averſion to all innovations. Hence every prudent man condemned the meaſures of the king, who by an ill-timed zeal for ceremonies, had betrayed equal narrowneſs of mind; with thoſe whom he treated with the utmoſt contempt. James at the ſame time ſhocked the lovers of pure religion among the Engliſh, by iſſuing a proclamation to allow and encourage all kinds of lawful games and diverſions, after divine ſervice on Sundays; which his ſubjects conſidered as an inſtance of profaneneſs and impiety.

A. D. 1618. The ſentiments of the public reſpecting Sir Walter Raleigh were at this time much changed. People had leiſure to reflect on the injuſtice of his ſentence, and were concerned, that a perſon of ſuch an enterprizing ſpirit, ſhould, for the ſpace of thirteen years, have ſuffered the rigours of confinement; and they admired his unbroken activity, which at his age, and under ſuch circumſtances, could undertake and execute ſo great a work as his Hiſtory of the World. Notwithſtanding he was treated by his ſovereign with a barbarous indignity, he had on every opportunity offered his ſervice, and, on many occaſions, had given uſeful advice, particularly with regard to forming the mind of prince Henry. He alſo recovered the queen from a fit of illneſs by medicines of his own compoſing. Theſe ſervices, added to the general good opinion of the people, forced from James a mitigation of his unjuſt treatment; his lands were reſtored to him, and he had ſome indulgencies with reſpect to his liberty; but Raleigh having before made over the conſiderable eſtate of Sherburn to his ſon, the omiſſion of a word in the deed of conveyance made a flaw in young Raleigh's title, and the forfeited lands reverted to the crown. Raleigh's wife petitioned the king on this occaſion; when the anſwer he returned was, "I mun ha the lands, I mun ha the lands for Car."

Raleigh, who had enjoyed full liberty, by reaſon of a coldneſs which ſubſiſted between the courts of England and Spain, offered a project which promiſed to recruit his broken fortune, and flattered the avarice of the king. He had formerly made a voyage to Guiana, in South America, and from his knowledge of the country, had imbibed a notion, that it contained inexhauſtible riches. He had actually marked particular parts of the territory, in which he believed were mines of gold. Upon the ſtrength of theſe conjectures, he offered to James the plan of an expedition, which promiſed mountains of wealth, and it was eagerly received by the king, though he, at the ſame time, aſſured Sarmiento, the Spaniſh ambaſſador, that Raleigh ſhould be bound up by his commiſſion, from all hoſtilities againſt the Spaniards: and that if they were committed, he ſhould be delivered up to the reſentment of his catholic majeſty: but when the commiſſion was made out, it contained no caution againſt attacking the Spaniards. Raleigh ſet ſail on the fourteenth of Auguſt, with fourteen ſhips, all fitted out by private perſons; he himſelf venturing the wreck of his broken fortune, beſides an eſtate which his wife had given up to him. After a tedious voyage, in which the adventurers experienced ſtorms, ſickneſs, and want of water, they reached the coaſt of Guiana, when new obſtacles oppoſed their obtaining the golden prize: The river Oroonoko was too ſhallow for the large ſhips to ſail up it; a diviſion of the force was unavoidable; the ſmaller veſſels, with a detachment of three hundred men, were ſent in queſt of the mines, while Raleigh ſtaid behind with the large ones, to defend the mouth of the river againſt the Spaniards. The detachment was commanded by his ſon; and the pilotage entruſted to his old friend Keymis, who had ſome knowledge of the river. On their landing at the appointed place, they were briſkly attacked by the garriſon of St. Thomas; but they repulſed the enemy, took, burned, and plundered the town, but with the loſs of many men, and of young Raleigh. Among the plunder were found papers containing the whole of Raleigh's ſcheme, which had been ſent to Spain by Sarmiento, to whom James had the weakneſs to divulge it. This ſo enraged the ſoldiers, that refuſing to be conducted farther by Keymis, they returned to the place where their commander lay, without having ſearched for any mines. Before the return of Raleigh's forces, he had heard the news of his accumulated misfortunes; no leſs ſevere than the death of his ſon, the blaſting of all his hopes, and the danger he was in from the violence committed on the Spaniſh town. In vain did Keymis attempt to excuſe his conduct, who, in deſpair, put an end to his life, and this increaſed the perplexity of the unhappy adventurer, who loſt in Keymis an evidence to juſtify his conduct. Theſe diſorders were ſucceeded by a mutiny among the crew: ſome were for returning to England, and ſome againſt it: the unfortunate Raleigh was of the former opinion, and prevailed ſo far as to bring his remaining force home. James was ſoon made acquainted with all the circumſtances of the miſcarriage; and the artful Sarmiento did not fail to work upon his paſſions, by repreſenting, in lively colours, a war between the two nations, and a certain breach of the marriage contract. Alarmed by ſuch artful inſinuations, the king iſſued a proclamation, declaring his abhorrence of what had been tranſacted; however, notwithſtanding the proclamation, Raleigh landed at Plymouth; and having ſurrendered himſelf, wrote a pathetic letter to the king, in which he ſtated his misfortunes in a clear and juſt light; but James was not to be moved by conſiderations of juſtice or compaſſion, being ſolely actuated by the fear of a rupture with Spain. That power was bent on the deſtruction of Raleigh; and his death was to be the cement of friendſhip between the two courts. The only queſtion was, how to compaſs it under the appearance of law. With this view the council endeavoured to render Raleigh's actions as odious as poſſible. A declaration, publiſhed by James on this ſubject, begins with aſſerting, that kings are not bound to give an account of their actions to any but God; however, he declares, that he is willing to repreſent his proceedings in this affair to the world. He then urges ſeveral charges; and, among others, that Raleigh's only deſign was to plunder the Spaniſh ſettlements, and to ſurprize their fleets. Raleigh compoſed an unanſwerable apology for his conduct. But notwithſtanding this, on the eighteenth of October, in the ſixty-ſixth year of his age, he was taken out of his bed, while in a fit of an ague, and brought up to the king's bench. He attempted to make a defence, by explaining the juſtneſs of his conduct in the expedition; but was interrupted by the court, who told him, that the matter of the voyage had nothing to do in the preſent caſe; and they condemned him upon a former ſentence. He then ſupplicated, in very pathetic terms, a reſpite of the execution of the ſentence for a few days, that he might ſettle his private affairs, and vindicate his reputation; but an order was produced, ready ſigned by James, though at that time in Hertfordſhire, for his execution the next morning. Cruel as this haſte was, it had no effect on the compoſure of Raleigh's mind, who met death with the greateſt intrepidity. His manly philoſophical deportment, during the interval of his ſentence and execution, was uniformly calm; nor leſs heroic was his behaviour when he came upon the ſcaffold; here he denied, with an awful appeal to God, the heavy charges which had been laid againſt him; then feeling the edge of the axe, ſaid, "It is a ſhort remedy, but a ſure one, for all ills;" after which he received the fatal blow, with an indifference which left ſtrong impreſſions of veneration and eſteem in the hearts of all the ſpectators. His hard fate was regretted by the whole body of the nobility; and heightened the diſguſt which the public had long entertained to James. The execution of a man of merit, upon a ſentence originally illegal; a ſentence whoſe rigour had been already felt, in the loſs of a large fortune, and of fifteen years impriſonment; a ſentence which had been underſtood to have been pardoned, by the truſt and command lately conferred, was conſidered as an inſtance of the utmoſt cruelty and meanneſs; and this, to forward an alliance which the whole nation deteſted, excited the greateſt indignation and contempt. James had conceived the moſt ridiculous notion, that it was unworthy a prince of Wales to marry any other than the daughter of a king. Gondomar, the Spaniſh ambaſſador in England, in order to open a negociation, had dropped ſome hints, that the infanta, Maria, would not be refuſed, if demanded for the king's ſon; and in order to render the temptation irreſiſtible to the neceſſitous monarch, he gave the greateſt hopes, that an immenſe dowry would be the portion of that princeſs. The deſire of accompliſhing ſo advantageous a treaty, induced James to embrace the propoſal with the greateſt avidity: and after many formalities and ſcruples had been diſcuſſed by the Spaniſh council, certain articles were tranſmitted by lord Digby, the Engliſh ambaſſador at Madrid, for his approbation. But, in this tranſaction, the whole intention of the Spaniſh court ſeems to have been only to amuſe the king, in order to prevent his ſending a powerful aſſiſtance to the proteſtants of Germany.

A commotion was excited, which threatened their ruin; yet the ſentiments of liberty never prevailed more ſtrongly in Europe than at this period: even Hungary, Bohemia, and Auſtria, were as jealous of their rights as the Engliſh themſelves. The ſpirit of independence had taken root in Germany ever ſince the reign of Charles V. The emperor Matthias poſſeſſed the crown of Bohemia; and, to pleaſe the catholics, adopted Ferdinand, his couſin-german, who was arch-duke of Gratz, for his ſucceſſor, who was deſcended from a younger branch of the houſe of Auſtria, and was a zealous Roman. Not ſatisfied with this adoption, he obliged him, through the means of the catholic party, to reſign the nominal crown of Bohemia; and by a partial call of the States, in an aſſembly compoſed of catholics, obtained the election, though he was not to act as ſovereign till after the emperor's death. The kingdom of Bohemia was now governed by a council of papiſts, and the proteſtant party being treated in a very injurious manner, a general aſſembly of the States demanded reparation for the injuries they had received, and then adjourned to another day. The emperor's lieutenants attempted to prevent their meeting again, but the States were ſo enraged at this tyrannical oppoſition, that they ſeized the emperor's officers, and threw the moſt inſolent of them out of the window. The Bohemians now flew to arms, in defence of their religion, and of their ancient conſtitution. The kingdom of Hungary, and the neighbouring principalities, Sileſia, Moravia, Auſtria, and Luſatia, took part in the quarrel, and a ſpirit of diſcord, menacing a civil war, was univerſally diffuſed throughout thoſe populous and martial provinces. In the mean time Matthias died, and Ferdinand obtaining the imperial dignity, all the catholic princes of the empire embraced his defence, and even Saxony, the moſt powerful of the proteſtants. Poland had likewiſe declared in his favour; as did alſo the king of Spain, who intereſting himſelf in the quarrel, prepared powerful ſuccours, and advanced large ſums for the ſupport of Ferdinand, and of the catholic religion. The States of Bohemia, alarmed at theſe vaſt preparations, began alſo to ſolicit foreign aſſiſtance. They caſt their eye upon Frederick, Elector Palatine; who, beſides his having conſiderable forces, was ſon-in-law to the king of England, and nephew to Prince Maurice, who had almoſt an abſolute authority in the United Provinces, and offered him their crown, which he accepted, without conſulting either James or Maurice, and marched with all his forces into Bohemia, to ſupport his new ſubjects. The news of theſe events no ſooner reached England, than it had different effects upon the king and his ſubjects. The people, animated by zeal for liberty, and ardently longing to relieve their proteſtant brethren, were fired with impatience to enter as parties into the quarrel: but the king, whoſe ambition was ſolely centered in the Spaniſh match, had oppoſite diſpoſitions. In the mean time, affairs were haſtening to a criſis. Ferdinand levied a great force, commanded by the duke of Bavaria and the count of Bucquoy, who advanced into Bohemia; and Spinola aſſembled a veteran army of thirty thouſand men in the Netherlands. The news reached England almoſt at the ſame time that Frederick, being defeated in the great and deciſive battle of Prague, had fled with his family into Holland; and that Spinola had invaded the Palatinate, where meeting with no reſiſtance, except from ſome princes of the union, and from two thouſand four hundred Engliſh, under the command of the brave Sir Horace Vere, he had reduced the greateſt part of that principality.

A. D. 1619. Anne of Denmark, James's queen, did not live to know the entire ruin of her daughter's fortune, for her death happened in the beginning of this year, in the forty-fifth of her age. She was of a vain and haughty temper, and the court amuſements, which were under her direction, were pompous and gaudy, without any degree of taſte or propriety: but as ſhe had little influence over her huſband, ſhe eſcaped the odium which fell on all who had the management of public affairs. Murmurs and complaints againſt the king's neutrality and inactivity now roſe high, and this James attempted to turn to his own pecuniary advantage, by demanding an aid towards the recovery of the Palatinate; but whether the people thought this only a pretext, or whether they were diſguſted at its being demanded, when it was too late to expect ſucceſs, the king got little from his ſubjects by this ſtratagem.

A. D. 1620.

It was now ſaid publicly, that he had not only deprived the Elector of that aſſiſtance which the Engliſh were willing to afford him, but had alſo deterred other princes from eſpouſing his quarrel. We cannot ſurmiſe that James was unwilling to preſerve the Palatinate; but he was ſo much governed by the artful Gondomar, that he was perſuaded the moſt effectual expedient for that purpoſe, was the marriage of his ſon with the Infanta of Spain, and that the treaty he was negotiating to that end would infallibly miſcarry, if he took any vigorous meaſures in favour of the Elector. Beſides, his averſion to war rendered him proud of the title of the pacific king; but he never conſidered that his puſillanimity tended only to expoſe him to contempt: he never imagined that the Spaniſh match itſelf was attended with ſuch difficulties, that all his art of negotiation would not be able to remove.

A. D. 1621.

A parliament being now found the only reſource that could furniſh large ſupplies, writs were iſſued for ſummoning that great council of the nation, which aſſembled on the twenty-firſt of January. James opened the ſeſſion with a long ſpeech from the throne, wherein he enumerated the duties of a parliament, expatiated on his preſſing wants, and demanded ſupplies for the relief of the Palatinate. The commons, highly incenſed againſt the ambitious views of the houſe of Auſtria, voted the king two ſubſidies, with which James was ſatisfied for the preſent. This affair being diſcuſſed, the commons received petitions againſt the increaſe of popiſh recuſants, monopolies, and projectors. The king had farmed to certain individuals the power of licenſing taverns and public-houſes; and granted to Sir Giles Mompeſſon and Francis Michel, an excluſive patent for the ſale of gold and ſilver lace. By virtue of this privilege, they had been guilty of ſuch ſcandalous frauds and extortion, that upon complaint being made to the upper houſe, they were ordered to be committed to priſon. Mompeſſon, however, found means to eſcape; but he was degraded from the honour of knighthood, and his eſtate confiſcated. His companion in iniquity was ſentenced to do public penance in the ſtreet, ſitting on horſeback with his face towards the tail, to pay a fine of a thouſand pounds, and to be impriſoned for life. By theſe vigorous proceedings of the two houſes againſt the delinquents, James began to fear for his favoitrite, who had been the author of theſe monopolies. He therefore went to the houſe of peers; and in a ſpeech filled with the moſt affectionate expreſſions, aſſured the parliament, that had he known of theſe grievances, he would have puniſhed the authors with the utmoſt ſeverity; at the ſame time cautioning the houſe not to credit every report, leſt the innocent ſhould ſuffer inſtead of the guilty. The houſe underſtood his meaning, and endeavoured not to trace the evil to its ſource. In a ſhort time after, lord chancellor Bacon, viſcount St. Albans, was impeached by the commons: upon which the king again repaired to the houſe, and in a ſpeech repreſented the neceſſity of puniſhing corrupt judges; and ſolicited farther ſubſidies, as the ſupplies granted by the commons were already expended in ſubſiſting the Elector Palatine and his family, who had taken refuge in Holland. He obſerved, that large ſums would be neceſſary for defraying the expence of ſending extraordinary ambaſſadors to all the courts of Europe, as well as in maintaining an army to act with vigour, if the negotiations proved abortive: and concluded with proteſting, that he would not diſſolve the parliament till all the affairs then under conſideration ſhould be fully determined. Bacon was a nobleman equally admired for the greatneſs of his genius, and beloved for his courteous and affable demeanor: but his want of œconomy, and his indulgence to his ſervants, had involved him in debts; and in order to ſupply his neceſſities, he had been tempted to take bribes from ſuitors in chancery. It is, however affirmed, that notwithſtanding this enormous abuſe, he ſtill maintained, in the ſeat of juſtice, an unſhaken integrity; and had given ſuch juſt and equitable decrees, that none of them were ever afterwards queſtioned or reverſed. Conſcious of his guilt, he implored the mercy of his judges, and endeavoured, by a general confeſſion, to avoid the ſhame of a public enquiry. But the lords were inexorable, and inſiſted on a full confeſſion of all his corrupt practices. He acknowledged twenty-eight articles, and was condemned to pay a fine of forty thouſand pounds; to be impriſoned in the Tower during his majeſty's pleaſure; to be for ever incapable of enjoying any office or employment, and of ſitting any more in parliament. This ſevere ſentence he ſurvived five years; and being ſoon after releaſed from his confinement, he retired into the country, and diſplayed ſuch abilities in literature, as have thrown a vail over his guilt, or rather his weakneſs: his genius only is admired by poſterity. He has left a ſtriking leſſon to thoſe of the human ſpecies who are born for the inſtruction of mankind, how much preferable the exerciſe of their talents is to the attractions of ambition. The bold ſpirit of the commons was growing imperceptibly. Nothing eſcaped their attention and vigilance. It was in this parliament the two parties, afterwards known by the names of Whigs and Tories, were firſt formed; and of whom it may be ſaid, that if they have often threatened the government with total diſſolution, they have, notwithſtanding, been the real cauſe of its conſtant life and vigour. Under the princes of the houſe of Tudor, the great council of the nation were, in reality, nothing more than ſlaves to the court. Though they retained the privilege of making laws and granting the peoples money, they ſuffered themſelves to be led into the moſt paſſive obedience. Without emulation, without principle, without zeal for the ſecurity of the ſubject, without ſpirit in public buſineſs, they ſeemed ignorant of the Engliſh conſtitution, as founded on Magna Charta, or at leaſt abandoned it to the abſolute power of the ſovereign. But now the ſpirit of liberty, or rather of independence, revived, and every tranſaction of government became a ſubject of diſcuſſion. The commons enquired into the ſmalleſt grievances, and examined the rights of the crown even in the minuteſt articles. They drew up a ſpirited remonſtrance, which they propoſed to preſent to his majeſty, wherein they obſerved, "That the power of the houſe of Auſtria threatened the liberties of Europe; that the progreſs of the catholic religion in England occaſioned the moſt alarming apprehenſions, leſt it ſhould once more gain the aſcendant in the kingdom; that the king's lenity towards the profeſſors of that religion, had increaſed their arrogance and preſumption; that the uncontrouled conqueſts made by the Auſtrian family, had raiſed the expectations of the Engliſh papiſts; while the expectation of the Spaniſh match inſpired them with the moſt ſanguine hopes of procuring, if not a final eſtabliſhment, at leaſt an entire toleration of their religion." They then proceeded humbly to offer to his majeſty the following remedies againſt theſe growing evils:

“ That he ſhould immediately undertake the defence of the Palatinate by force of arms; that he ſhould declare war againſt Spain, whoſe arms and riches formed the chief bulwark of the catholic religion in Europe; that he would engage in no negotiations for the marriage of his ſon, but with a proteſtant princeſs; that the children of popiſh recuſants ſhould be taken from their parents, and committed to the care of proteſtant teachers and ſchoolmaſters; and that the fines and confiſcations to which the catholics were ſubject by the law, ſhould be enacted with the utmoſt rigour.” James, who was at Newmarket when he heard of this unprecedented remonſtrance, immediately wrote a letter to the ſpeaker, in which he ſharply rebuked the houſe for debating openly on matters far above their reach and capacity, and ſtrictly forbad them to meddle with any thing that regarded his government or deep matters of ſtate; and eſpecially not to touch on his ſon's marriage with a daughter of Spain, nor to attack the honour of that king, or any of his friends and confederates. In order the more to intimidate them, he mentioned the impriſonment of Sir Edwin Sandys; and though he declared that his confinement was not owing to any offence committed in the houſe, yet he plainly told them, “ That he thought himſelf juſtly entitled to puniſh every miſdemeanor in parliament, as well during its ſitting, as after its diſſolution; and that he intended, for the future, to chaſtize every man whoſe inſolent behaviour ſhould give occaſion for offence.” This letter threw the houſe into a flame. They knew their own ſtrength too well to be intimidated at James's menaces. Inſtead of retracting what they had done, they entered with greater freedom than ever on the national grievances, and the dangerous ſtate of the reformed religion both at home and abroad. They formed a new remonſtrance, drawn up indeed in very reſpectful terms, but not leſs bold and ſpirited than the former. After reminding him with the chearfulneſs with which they undertook to aſſiſt him in the defence of the Palatinate, they obſerved, “ That their zeal for the proteſtant religion, and the intereſt of his majeſty's family, had induced them to repreſent the dangers with which both were threatened, and to point out remedies for thoſe evils; that by his letter to the ſpeaker, he ſeemed determined to deprive them of the parliamentary liberty to ſpeak freely in the houſe, and alſo of the juriſdiction which the houſe exerciſed over its own members; they therefore begged he would not violate a privilege which was their undoubted right, and which they inherited from their anceſtors; a right which he himſelf had confirmed in his ſpeeches to the parliament, and without which it would be impoſſible to diſcuſs and determine the affairs that might fall under their cognizance.” This reſolute anſwer in the commons, raiſed every ſpark of regal pride in the compoſition of James. His anſwer was ſhort, peremptory, and ſuitable to that ſpirit of kingly power which filled his breaſt. After explaining his intentions with regard to the prerogative in very clear and explicit terms, he concluded his reply, with regard to the rights and privileges of parliament, in the following manner: “ And although we cannot allow the ſtile, calling it your undoubted right and inheritance, but could rather have wiſhed you had ſaid, that your privileges were derived from the grace and permiſſion of our anceſtors and us (for moſt of them grew by precedents, which rather ſhew toleration than inheritance) yet we are pleaſed to give our royal aſſurance, that, as long as you continue yourſelves within the limits of your duty, we will be as careful to maintain and preſerve your lawful liberties and privileges, as any of our anceſtors were, nay, as to preſerve our own royal prerogative; ſo as your houſe ſhall only have need to beware to trench upon the prerogative of the crown, which would enforce us, or any juſt king, to retrench them of their privileges, that would pare his prerogative and the flowers of his crown. But of this we hope there will never be cauſe given.” The houſe of commons were juſtly alarmed. They ſaw their title to every privilege, if not plainly denied, yet conſidered at leaſt as very precarious. He plainly told them it might be forfeited by abuſe, and they had already abuſed it. They therefore reſolved to grant no ſupply, till they received ſatisfaction from James for the breach of their privileges, and drew up the following proteſtation, which is ſo very remarkable, that it will be neceſſary to give it at full length. “ The commons now aſſembled in parliament, being juſtly occaſioned thereunto, concerning ſundry liberties, franchiſes, and privileges of parliament, among others here mentioned, do make the following proteſtation: That the liberties, franchiſes, and juriſdictions of parliament, are the antient and undoubted birth-right and inheritance of the ſubjects of England; and that the urgent and arduous affairs concerning the king, ſtate, and defence of the realm, and of the church of England; the maintenance and making of laws, and redreſs of miſchiefs and grievances, which daily happen within this realm, are proper ſubjects and matter of council and debate in parliament, and that in the handling and proceeding of thoſe buſineſſes, every member of the houſe of parliament hath, and of right ought to have, freedom of ſpeech to propound, treat, reaſon, and bring to concluſion the ſame; and that the commons in parliament have like liberty and freedom to treat of theſe matters, in ſuch order as in their judgment ſhall ſeem fitteſt; and that every member of the ſaid houſe hath like freedom from all impeachment, impriſonment, and moleſtation (other than by cenſure of the houſe itſelf) for or concerning any ſpeaking, reaſoning, or declaring of any matter or matters touching the parliament or parliamentary buſineſs. And that if any of the ſaid members be complained of and queſtioned for any thing done or ſaid in parliament, the ſame is to be ſhewn to the king, by the advice and aſſent of all the commons aſſembled in parliament, before the king give credence to any private information.”

James hurried to town from Newmarket, determined to exert the regal authority with which he was intruſted, and convince the commons that they had proceeded too far in aſſerting their liberties. On his arrival, he ſent immediately for the journal book of the commons, and before the council, tore out, with his own hand, the above proteſtation, which he conſidered as an inſult on his prerogative. At the ſame time he declared it abſolutely null and void, becauſe it was voted tumultuouſly at a late hour, and in a very thin houſe; and becauſe it was expreſſed in ſuch general and ambiguous terms, as might be conſidered as a ſufficient foundation for the moſt enormous crimes, and extended to the moſt unwarrantable uſurpations on the prerogative of the crown. Soon after he diſſolved the parliament by proclamation, in which he made an apology to the public for his whole conduct. Some of the leaders among the commons he committed to priſon, and ſent others to execute a commiſſion in Ireland. At laſt he prohibited all diſcourſe on public affairs, as if he had power to prevent the people from ſpeaking on thoſe ſubjects in which they were moſt intereſted; an authority enjoyed not by the moſt deſpotic monarch.

A. D. 1622.

James had already ſeen the conſequence of fruitleſs negotiations in Germany, though he ſtill purſued the ſame plan which had already rendered him ſufficiently contemptible. He diſpatched Digby to the emperor, deſiring a ceſſation of hoſtilities. The miniſter was referred to the duke of Bavaria, who commanded the Auſtrian armies. The duke told him that there needed no treaty for that purpoſe, ſince hoſtilities were already ceaſed by his having taken poſſeſſion of the Palatinate, which he intended to keep till a final accommodation ſhould take place between the contending parties. Notwithſtanding this groſs inſult, and though every circumſtance concurred to convince James that the emperor induſtriouſly eluded all his applications, that weak monarch had the meanneſs to follow Ferdinand through all his evaſions, and renew the conferences at Bruſſels. Frederic, finding the pacific endeavours of his father-in-law were ineffectual, embraced ſome favourable circumſtances ariſing from the expiration of the truce between Spain and the States-General, and the jealouſies of the Germans, excited by the increaſing power of the houſe of Auſtria, to make a final effort for the recovery of his dominions. Three conſiderable armies were raiſed, and commanded by three able generals, Chriſtian, duke of Brunſwick, the prince of Baden, and count Mansfeldt. But the ſame ill ſucceſs ſtill purſued the unfortunate Frederick. Count Tilly, at the head of the Imperial army, defeated the duke of Brunſwick, and ſoon after the prince of Baden. Mansfeldt, though his army was greatly inferior in numbers, ſtill continued the war; but not being ſupported with money either by the Palatinate or the king of England, he could act only on the defenſive. Theſe misfortunes, joined to the perſuaſions of James, who was deſirous that his ſon-in-law ſhould lay down his arms, entirely diſheartened that prince, who retired to Sedan, where he remained an unwelcome gueſt, with his uncle the duke of Brunſwick. Count Mansfeldt was diſmiſſed from his employment; and that famous general retired with his army into the Low Countries, where he was received into the pay of the States-General. In the mean time the weakneſs of James rendered him contemptible in every court of Europe; it was even extended ſo far as to paint him ſometimes with a ſcabbard without a ſword, and ſometimes with a ſword which a number of perſons were trying in vain to draw out of the ſcabbard.

The king of Bohemia was perſuaded, that a vigorous oppoſition always bids faireſt for obtaining equitable terms; yet the repeated requeſts of his father-in-law had forced him to abandon his maxim, and now, when it was too late, he repented of his folly. Count Tilly, after the retreat of Mansfeldt, loſt not a moment to harraſs the Palatinate. He beſieged and took Heidelberg, the richeſt city in it, and ſent its fine libraries of books to Rome. The caſtle was bravely defended by Herbert, an Engliſh colonel, who, after performing prodigies of valour, was killed with a muſquet ball. Tilly next made himſelf maſter of Manheim, notwithſtanding the noble defence made by the garriſon, commanded by Sir Horace Vere. James now gave up all thoughts of recovering the Palatinate from the Emperor. But he ſtill flattered himſelf, that if he could accompliſh his ſon's marriage with the Infanta of Spain, he ſhould be able to obtain, by the aſſiſtance of that court, the territories of his ſon-in-law, and reinſtate him in his former dignity. Ferdinand, however, determined to prevent him from executing his project. He aſſembled a diet at Ratiſbon, in which he declared "That the Elector Palatine, having been guilty of high-treaſon, his eſtates, goods, and dignities, were forfeited; but being unwilling to diminiſh the number of electors, he ordered that Maximilian of Bavaria ſhould be inveſted with the Electorate Palatine." In Spain, Digby, earl of Briſtol, had the ſole management of the negotiation for the marriage. Briſtol was a nobleman of great abilities, and had formerly diſapproved of entering into any engagements with Spain; but appeared now ſo convinced of the ſincerity of that court, that he wrote a letter to James, felicitating him on the entire accompliſhment of his views and projects: a daughter of Spain, whom he repreſented as extremely amiable, would ſoon, he ſaid, be conducted into England, and bring with her an immenſe fortune of two millions, a ſum four times greater than was ever given with any other princeſs. The truth is, that the court of Spain had hitherto carried on the negotiation merely to amuſe the Engliſh monarch; but perceiving that James was determined, on any terms, to complete the alliance, it was thought that ſo favourable an opportunity of reſtoring the catholic faith in England ſhould not be neglected, as it ſeemed more than probable it might eaſily be effected, by means of the Infanta, and her numerous train of domeſtics and dependants, who were to enjoy the free exerciſe of their religion. Purſuant to this reſolution, the behaviour of the Spaniſh court was now entirely changed, and appeared as eager to conclude the negotiation, as before to find excuſes for deferring it. The only difficulty conſiſted in extorting from the Engliſh monarch ſuch conceſſions as might contribute to complete the favourite deſign, and which the impatience of James gave the greateſt reaſon to expect; that the only obſtacles that now remained to the completion of the marriage, were thoſe relating to religion. The earl of Briſtol, ever ſince his arrival in Spain, had been employed in ſettling thoſe preliminaries. At laſt the court of Spain made their final demands with regard to that particular, and the earl of Briſtol ſent them immediately to his maſter. James made ſome difficulty of agreeing to theſe articles; but his deſire of completing the marriage at laſt got the better of his prudence; he ſigned the articles, and ſent them back to Spain. Among all the conceſſions favourable to the catholics, none gave greater diſguſt to the Engliſh than that in which the king engaged that the children of the prince and the Infanta ſhould be educated by their mother till they were ten years of age; a condition which could only be ſtipulated with a view of implanting in their tender minds the ſtrongeſt prejudices in favour of the Romiſh religion; and though ſo early an age might ſeem little ſuſceptible of any laſting impreſſions, yet the ſame motive which prompted the Spaniſh monarch to inſert it ſhould have induced the king of England to reject it. Beſides the public treaty, there were ſeveral private articles, by which both the king and prince of Wales engaged to ſuſpend the penal laws againſt the catholics; to obtain a repeal of them from the parliament, and to tolerate the exerciſe of the popiſh religion in private houſes.

A. D. 1623.

Nothing was wanting to conclude the marriage but the pope's diſpenſation, which was conſidered merely as a formality. Elated by this ſucceſs, James triumphed in his pacific councils, and conſoled himſelf for the contempt he had incurred in all the courts of Europe, in having tamely ſuffered his ſon-in-law to be ſtripped of his eſtates and dignity. But while he was boaſting of his ſuperior wiſdom and ſagacity, his flattering proſpects were ruined by the raſhneſs of a man whom he had raiſed from a private ſtation, to be the curſe of himſelf, his family, and his people.

Buckingham, who was now as much in favour with the prince as with the king, and ſeemed to direct all the affairs of the kingdom, was envious of the great credit obtained by Briſtol in the Spaniſh negotiation. The ambitious favourite therefore determined to ſupplant him, or, at leaſt, to ſhare in the honour of concluding a treaty ſo agreeable to the king. He perſuaded the prince to undertake a journey to the court of Madrid in perſon, in order to bring home his miſtreſs the Infanta. He repreſented to him, that the romantic nature of the adventure could not fail of attracting the admiration and affection of that monarch and his ſubjects, and of introducing him to the princeſs under the character of a fond lover, rather than of a ſtately huſband; that the negotiation with regard to the Palatinate, which had hitherto languiſhed in the hands of miniſters, would quickly be terminated by ſo illuſtrious an agent, ſeconded by the mediation and entreaties of the grateful Infanta: that the Spaniſh generoſity, excited by ſo uncommon an inſtance of truſt and confidence, would undoubtedly make conceſſions far beyond what could be expected from political views and conſiderations. With theſe generous and romantic ideas, ſo peculiarly adapted to the minds of youth, Charles embraced the propoſal with rapture, and it was agreed to make application to the king for leave to carry the deſign into execution immediately. They choſe the moment when James was in the moſt kind and jovial humour; and, by importunities, rather than the force of their reaſons, they extorted from him a haſty and unguarded conſent. But the prince and Buckingham had hardly left the king, before he repented of his weakneſs: every difficulty occurred with a peculiar force, and the danger to which the prince's perſon muſt be expoſed, affected him in a very ſenſible manner. He reflected, that however pardonable this romantic expedition might be conſidered in youth, it muſt reflect diſgrace on mature age: that if the profeſſions of the Spaniſh monarch were ſincere, a few months only muſt finiſh the negotiation, and bring the Infanta to England, without expoſing his only ſon, the heir of his crown, the prop of his age, to ſo dangerous an undertaking; and if he was not ſincere, the loſs would be abſolutely irretrievable. James therefore determined to recal his promiſe, and prevent, by a timely oppoſition, an undertaking which, if unfortunate, muſt render him at once both infamous to his people, and ridiculous to all poſterity. Accordingly when the prince and Buckingham returned for their diſpatches, James informed them of the reaſons which had prevailed upon him to change his reſolution, and begged they would bury all thoughts of ſo ridiculous an adventure in the pit of forgetfulneſs. The prince was greatly affected at this diſappointment, but anſwered only with tears. Buckingham aſſumed the air of authority, and told the king that this retraction of his promiſe, ſo ſoon after it was given, muſt render all his declarations for ever after ſuſpected; that the word of a king ought to be ſacred, and never broken but by the moſt powerful reaſons, or abſolute neceſſity. The king, who was unable to make any effectual oppoſition to the deſigns of the prince and favourite, renewed his conſent; proper directions were given for the journey, and the prince, with Buckingham, and their two attendants, Sir Francis Cottington, the prince's ſecretary, and Endymion Porter, gentleman of his bed-chamber, with Sir Richard Graham, maſter of the horſe to Buckingham, paſſed, diſguiſed and undiſcovered, through France. They even ventured to appear in a court ball at Paris, where Charles ſaw the princeſs Henrietta, then in the bloom of youth and beauty. On the eleventh day after their departure they reached Madrid, where every body was ſurprized at a ſtep ſo very unuſual among the princes of that age. Penetrated with gratitude for the unbounded confidence repoſed in him by the prince, Philip paid him a viſit immediately after he was informed of his arrival; made him the warmeſt proteſtations of friendſhip; ſhewed him every reſpect in the power of majeſty to beſtow; and preſented him with a golden key which opened all his apartments, that the prince might have free acceſs to him at all hours. He gave him the upper hand on all occaſions, except in the apartments aſſigned for his reſidence, where he ſaid the prince was at home. The ſame pomp and ceremony were uſed when Charles firſt viſited the palace as were common at the coronation of the kings of Spain; and the council received public orders to obey him as the king himſelf. Every kind of rejoicing was uſed throughout the kingdom; and all the priſons were thrown open, that even thoſe who before languiſhed in confinement might ſhare in the general joy. Nor was any advantage taken of the prince's preſence, to impoſe any harder condition of the treaty. In the mean time pope Gregory XV. who had granted the diſpenſation, died, and Urban VIII. was placed in the pontifical chair. This event induced the nuncio not to deliver the diſpenſation till it could receive the ſanction of Urban; who hoping that ſome expedient might be diſcovered, during the prince's reſidence in Spain, to effect his converſion to the catholic faith, delayed the diſpenſation. Such a dilatory method of proceeding, occaſioned great uneaſineſs, both to the king of England and the prince. Philip perceived it, and neglected nothing in his power to diſſipate every apprehenſion, and prevail upon the prince to wait till the diſpenſation could be procured from the court of Rome; but, at the ſame time, he made not the leaſt difficulty of granting him permiſſion to return. He even cauſed a pillar to be erected on a ſpot where they parted, as a monument of their mutual friendſhip. And the prince, having ſworn to the obſervance of all the articles in the marriage treaty, ſet out, attended by a numerous train of the Spaniſh nobility, for St. Andero, where he embarked on board an Engliſh veſſel, ſent by the king for that purpoſe. No prince could more engage the affections of the Spaniards than Charles. His character, compoſed of decency, reſerve, modeſty, and ſobriety, rendered him very agreeable to that people. They were in love with his unparalleled confidence, and the romantic gallantry he had practiced towards their princeſs. At the ſame time his advantageous figure, and the blooming graces of youth that adorned his countenance, endeared him to the whole court of Madrid, and made deep impreſſions on the heart of the Infanta. Had the character of Buckingham been equal to that of the prince, every thing had ſucceeded according to their wiſhes; but that nobleman was as much deſpiſed and hated as the prince was eſteemed and beloved. His diſſolute pleaſures, his ſallies of paſſion, his arrogant, impetuous temper, rendered him the object of the Spaniards averſion, and he was in general treated with contempt. Senſible of the affronts he had given to the court of Spain, and fearful of the influence of the Infanta when ſhe arrived in England, he determined to employ all his credit to prevent the marriage from being concluded. But it ſeemed a difficult taſk to prevail upon the prince to treat a court, where he had received the moſt diſtinguiſhed favours, with ingratitude; and, if poſſible, ſtill more difficult to induce James to break off a treaty, the accompliſhment of which had ſo long been the object of his wiſhes, and which he had now ſo nearly brought to a ſucceſsful and happy iſſue. At this diſtance of time it is impoſſible to know the reaſons he made uſe of to accompliſh his deſign: it only appears that he obtained an entire aſcendant over both the king and his ſon. James, indeed, made ſome oppoſition; and had the earl of Briſtol arrived in that critical moment, perhaps the impetuous and turbulent miniſter had ſunk under the burden of his own crimes; but the king wanted ſpirit and reſolution to reſiſt the importunities of Buckingham; he ſacrificed both honour and integrity to the folly of his minion. Orders were ſent to the earl of Briſtol for breaking off all negotiations, juſt at the time when that miniſter had, in all appearance, accommodated every difference between the contracting parties, and the Spaniards were on the point of delivering up the Infanta.

A. D. 1624. Soon after the departure of Charles and Buckingham, the diſpenſation reached Spain, and the Infanta had immediately aſſumed the title of princeſs of Wales. Philip was therefore very unwilling to break off the treaty, eſpecially as he foreſaw that a rupture between the two crowns would be the inevitable conſequence; and determined that nothing on his part ſhould be wanting to complete the marriage, and maintain the harmony that now ſubſiſted between Spain and England. He, on the eighth of January, ſent the earl of Briſtol a written promiſe, by which he engaged to procure the reſtoration of the Palatinate, either by treaty or force of arms. But when he found that this conceſſion was diſregarded, he ordered the Infanta to lay aſide the title of princeſs of Wales, and to drop the ſtudy of the Engliſh language. At the ſame time he iſſued orders for making preparations for war in every part of his dominions, perſuaded that the court of England would not ſtop at the violation of the marriage treaty. This reſolution of James to break off all connexions with Spain, was no ſooner known to the people, than they celebrated the rupture with bonfires, and other public demonſtrations of joy. Buckingham, by giving a partial, and, in many inſtances, a falſe account of the negotiation, eaſily inflamed thoſe ſpirits which were already prejudiced againſt Spain. Eulogiums were poured upon him, as one of the beſt of ſubjects: he was called the deliverer of his country. James, who wanted firmneſs of mind to reſiſt the impetuoſity of the nation, was ſwept away with the torrent, and obliged, contrary to his natural principles, to follow thoſe violent reſolutions that led inevitably to war. He aſſembled a parliament, in order to obtain ſupplies. In his ſpeech to the two houſes, James dropped ſome hints of the cauſes of complaint he had againſt Spain; and graciouſly condeſcended to aſk their advice, which he had ever before rejected, with regard to the conduct of ſo important an affair as the marriage of his ſon. The commons promiſed to aſſiſt him in revenging the affront put upon him by Spain: for Buckingham, by laying before a committee of both houſes a long and partial account, which he pretended was a true and complete narrative, of all the ſteps taken in the Spaniſh negotiation, had entirely gained the confidence of that aſſembly. It contained, indeed, ſo many contradictory circumſtances, that they were ſufficient to open the eyes of every reaſonable man, notwithſtanding the artful vail which was thrown over the whole proceedings. But the narrative concurred ſo well with the paſſions and prejudices of the parliament, that no ſcruple was made of immediately adopting it as a truth that could not be diſputed. Charmed with having at laſt the opportunity, ſo long and ſo ardently deſired, of going to war with papiſts, they thought not of future conſequences, but immediately adviſed the king to break off both treaties with Spain, as well that which regarded the marriage, as that for the reſtitution of the Palatinate.

Having thus given their voice for a war, they joined in a petition to the king, that he would cauſe the laws againſt Romiſh prieſts and jeſuits to be ſtrictly executed; that he would iſſue orders for ſeizing the arms of popiſh recuſants, and obliging them to retire from the capital; that he would revoke all licences granted to ſuch recuſants, and put a ſtop to the great concourſe of people who reſorted to hear maſs in the chapels of ambaſſadors; that he ſhould deprive all papiſts of the poſts they enjoyed under the government, and not relax the laws made againſt popiſh recuſants on any account whatever. James returned a very gracious and condeſcending anſwer; but declared himſelf an enemy to all perſecution on account of religion, from a thorough conviction that it always injures the cauſe it is intended to promote, according to the received maxim, "That the blood of the martyrs was the ſeed of the church." At the ſame time, he condemned an entire indulgence to the catholics; and ſtrongly hinted, that a middle courſe ought to be choſen, as at once the moſt humane and the moſt political. James, having determined to purſue hoſtile meaſures, repaired to the parliament-houſe, where he declared, in a ſpeech to that aſſembly, his reſolution of humbling the pride of Spain, provided they would engage to ſupport him. He began his harangue with lamenting his misfortune, in being obliged, in his old age, to exchange the bleſſings of peace for the inevitable calamities of hoſtile meaſures. He repreſented to them the prodigious expence requiſite for maintaining military armaments; and demanded a vote of ſix ſubſidies and twelve fifteenths, as a proper ſtock before war was declared againſt Spain. He mentioned the large debts he had contracted, principally to ſupport the Elector Palatine and his family; but declared, he inſiſted not on any ſupply for himſelf; the honour and ſecurity of the kingdom was all he was deſirous of ſupporting. He even ſo far forgot his prerogative, which he had hitherto ſo ſtrenuouſly ſupported, that he made a dangerous and unexpected conceſſion, that the ſums granted ſhould be veſted in a committee of parliament, and be iſſued by them without being intruſted to his management. Nothing could be more agreeable to the commons; they readily accepted the offer, but voted much leſs than was demanded; three ſubſidies and three fifteenths were, by the commons, thought a ſufficient ſum for the preſent occaſions of the ſtate; nor did they take the leaſt notice of that part of his ſpeech which regarded his own neceſſities, though he had made a conceſſion greater than they could have even preſumed to aſk. But though they were ſo very parſimonious in their ſupplies, they took advantage of the preſent agreement between the king and the parliament, to make freſh attacks upon the prerogative. James had aboliſhed all the monopolies, ſo loudly and juſtly complained of; but this did not ſatisfy the commons; they paſſed an act, by which it was declared that all monopolies were contrary to the laws and liberties of the kingdom. By the ſame ſtatute it was enacted, that every man enjoyed an entire freedom with regard to his own actions, provided he did nothing detrimental to any perſon; and that no other authority but that of the laws ſhould ſtop this unlimited right; a principle which ſerved as a baſis for the civil liberties of England. In the mean time the Elector Palatine wrote a letter to James, wherein he enumerated the reaſons which offered themſelves both for continuing the negotiations, and attempting to recover the Palatinate by force of arms. The latter now predominated at the Britiſh court, ſince a reſolution had been taken to break off all negotiations with Spain. The indefatigable duke of Brunſwick had raiſed another army for the ſervice of the king of Bohemia, with an intention to force a paſſage into the Low Countries, and join the prince of Orange. The Dutch, in general, were well inclined to the ſame cauſe, and the princes of Germany every day diſcovered freſh ſymptoms of diſcontent at the proceedings of the houſe of Auſtria. But above all, the perſon of the queen of Bohemia, the wiſeſt and moſt virtuous lady of her age, became now an object of public concern. Her merits, her misfortunes, her young family, and the unworthy treatment ſhe had received, like ſo many charms, animated every proteſtant, who was not wholly a ſtranger to the dictates of humanity. James himſelf was ſometimes warmed into compaſſion, and ſometimes into reſentment. He had ſpared her and her family a little of the ſcanty remainder his profuſion had left, and they lived on good terms with the prince of Orange, who was at that time ſincerely diſpoſed to have ſerved them, could James have been prevailed upon to truſt the Dutch, or they to put any confidence in him. But the inſolence of the Dutch traders, and their cruelty towards the Engliſh in the Eaſt Indies, were ſo great, that James at laſt yielded to the repeated inſtances of his ſubjects, and gave the earl of Oxford the command of a ſmall ſquadron of ſhips, in order to intercept the Dutch Eaſt India fleet in their return to Europe. By a treaty lately concluded, the Dutch and the Engliſh were to divide between them the trade of the iſlands they had taken from the Portugueſe and Spaniards; the Engliſh to enjoy one third, and the Dutch two thirds of this valuable trade. Accordingly, Engliſh factories had been ſettled in the Molucca iſlands, and at Banda. A few Engliſh merchants, not more than eighteen or twenty, had, for above two years, lived at Amboyna, where there was a Dutch fort, and two companies of ſoldiers, beſides a civil eſtabliſhment. For ſome time a correſpondence ſubſiſted between the two people; but the Dutch, envying the proſperous ſtate of the Engliſh factory, determined to ruin them. A conſpiracy was accordingly formed againſt their lives, of ſo deteſtable a nature, as is hardly credible to thoſe who do not ſufficiently reflect on the rancour of a people towards their rivals in trade; eſpecially when the ſcene is not only ſufficiently diſtant from all ſeats of juſtice, but where they themſelves preſide, uncontrouled, in the exerciſe of their tyranny, and blinded by the motives of intereſt. It was pretended that the Engliſh and Japaneſe, the whole not exceeding forty perſons, had formed a deſign for deſtroying the Dutch ſettlement. Upon this, Gabriel Towerſon, the chief agent, and the reſt of the Engliſh then upon the iſland, were taken into cuſtody, and ſtrictly examined by the Dutch council. No witneſſes of credit appeared againſt them, and the unhappy priſoners, conſcious of their innocence, denied the fact with the ſtrongeſt aſſeverations. But it had been before determined to put them to death, and only ſome pretence was wanting for carrying the bloody deſign into execution. The rack was therefore to ſupply the place of evidence, and the tortures were ſo dreadful, that even conſcious innocence was unable to ſupport them. Some ſought relief by confeſſion; but, on obtaining the mercy of being put to death, they ſolemnly retracted their confeſſions with their lateſt breath; but others, with matchleſs fortitude, expired under their tortures. By this horrid proceeding, the Dutch continued maſters of the ſpice trade, and have ever ſince kept it in their own hands. No reparation was, however, obtained for this inſolent affront till many years after, when Cromwell held the reins of government. That uſurper obliged them to pay three hundred thouſand pounds on that account. It, however, prevented a junction between the armies deſigned to reduce the Palatinate.

The earl of Briſtol having received orders to leave the court of Madrid, he applied for an audience, in order to fulfil the ceremonial of his departure. Philip expreſſed the higheſt regret that Briſtol's ſervices ſhould meet with ſo unworthy a reward; and that his enemies ſhould have ſo far prevailed, as to inſuſe prejudices into his maſter and his country againſt a miniſter who had ſo faithfully performed his duty to both. He endeavoured to prevail upon him to engage in his ſervice, promiſing to beſtow upon him every advantage of rank and ſortune he himſelf could deſire. But Briſtol, though he expreſſed the utmoſt gratitude for this generous offer, refuſed every thing, and determined to return immediately to his own country, not doubting but the torch of truth would ſoon expoſe the falſhoods of his enemies in their genuine colours. Philip could not even prevail upon him to accept of ten thouſand ducats, though his circumſtances rendered ſuch a preſent neceſſary. The monarch uſed every intreaty in his power to prevail, and aſſured him that neither James, nor any one elſe, ſhould ever know he had received it. "There is one, anſwered the virtuous miniſter, who will be privy to the whole tranſaction; it is the earl of Briſtol, and he will certainly reveal it to the king of England." It was the intereſt of Buckingham to keep Briſtol at a diſtance from the king and the court, leſt the voice of truth, enforced with thoſe powers of oratory which the earl poſſeſſed in a very eminent degree, ſhould diſcloſe ſcenes which he wiſhed to bury in oblivion. He accordingly no ſooner heard of the earl's arrival in England, than he made uſe of all that power he had acquired over the mind of his weak ſovereign, for procuring an order for committing Briſtol to the Tower, till he had anſwered certain queſtions that ſhould be put to him by the council. He was, however, ſoon after releaſed, but ordered to retire to his own houſe. The earl wrote to James, loudly demanding an opportunity of vindicating himſelf, and of laying his whole conduct before his maſter and the public: he aſſerted his own innocence, and threw the blame of every miſcarriage on Buckingham. He had always flattered himſelf that the hatred of the minion could not prevail over the juſtice of his maſter, as if a weak prince was not generally a dupe to the paſſions of others. Buckingham was deſirous that he ſhould own the pretended faults exhibited againſt him; but he juſtly thought a reconciliation offered on ſuch terms a real diſgrace. James himſelf declared, that to require ſuch a thing of an innocent man, was the moſt horrible tyranny. How juſtly ought he to have reproached himſelf, for ſuffering ſo unjuſt a ſentence to take place!

The parliament being prorogued to the twenty-ninth of May, it was neceſſary to make ſome preparations for oppoſing the warlike armament fitting out by the court of Spain, and alſo to aſſiſt the count Palatine. Accordingly ſix thouſand men were ſent over to Holland, to join the army of the States, commanded by the prince of Orange; while another army, under count Mansfeldt, was to penetrate into the Palatinate. Religious zeal had made the recovery of the Palatinate appear a point of vaſt importance to the Engliſh; and the ſame effect might have been expected in France, merely from political views; for while that principality continued in the hands of the houſe of Auſtria, the French dominions were, on all ſides, ſurrounded by the poſſeſſions of that ambitious family, and might be penetrated in every part by ſuperior forces. Of this the court of France was fully ſenſible; but cardinal Richlieu was reſolved firſt to ſubdue the Hugonots, before he proceeded to humble the houſe of Auſtria. However, the proſpect of an alliance with England was readily embraced, by conciliating a marriage between prince Charles, and the princeſs Henrietta Maria, daughter to Lewis XIII. The conferences were opened at Compeigne, and the marriage articles were ſigned at Paris on the tenth of November. They were nearly the ſame in ſubſtance with thoſe which had been concluded with Spain; for as Lewis required only the ſame conditions which had before been granted to his catholic majeſty, James made no ſcruple to comply. One of the conditions was, that the children ſhould be brought up by the mother; or, which is the ſame thing, in the catholic religion, till they were thirteen years of age. To this imprudent article the misfortunes of that family have been attributed, though it was never put in execution. While this negotiation was carried on, count Mansfeldt came over to England; and, after ſome conferences, it was agreed that he ſhould conduct the war in the Lower Palatinate, at the head of twelve thouſand foot and two hundred horſe. The French miniſtry had, in general terms, made great promiſes, not only that the Engliſh troops ſhould be allowed a free paſſage, but that in their march to the Palatinate they ſhould be joined by powerful ſuccours: but when the troops commanded by Mansfeldt ſailed from Dover to Calais, they found that no orders had arrived to permit their landing. After therefore waiting ſome time, they were obliged to ſail towards Zealand, where proper meaſures for their diſembarkation had been alſo neglected. The Zealanders excuſed themſelves from receiving ſuch a number of unexpected gueſts, under a pretence of ſcarcity of proviſions. During a tedious period of ſuſpence, in which meſſengers were ſent to the Hague, and afterwards to London, a peſtilential diſeaſe ſpread among the Engliſh troops, ſo long cooped up in their ſhips, and carried off above two thirds of them. Of the few who eſcaped ſickneſs, ſome deſerted, ſome enliſted themſelves in the ſervice of the States. Thus ended this ill-timed expedition. The refuſal of the Zealanders to allow the king's troops to land, was the ſecond inſult he had received from the Dutch: the firſt being the maſſacre of Amboyna. This tragedy was acted at a time when James was puſhed on, by the violent meaſures of his favourite, to a rupture with Spain; and the friendſhip of the Dutch appeared to him too valuable, to hazard it by an ill-timed reſentment; he therefore accepted of their excuſes, and put up with this flagrant and cruel breach of faith, without exacting any kind of ſatisfaction.

James had laid a ſolid foundation for putting an end to the diſturbances in Ireland, yet he had not been able entirely to complete his plan. The Spaniards ſtill maintained a conſtant correſpondence with the diſaffected papiſts, and kept the Engliſh government in continual alarms. The earl of Tyrone having been received into favour, and obtained the royal protection, lived for ſome time in great ſubmiſſion to the government; but imputing all the marks of favour he had received to the effects of fear, he had the boldneſs, ſoon after, to petition the king for a toleration of the catholic religion. This requeſt being refuſed, he joined the earl of Tyrconnel, and other chiefs of the Iriſh papiſts; and a deſperate confederacy was formed for aſſaſſinating the lord deputy and the council, and maſſacreing all the Engliſh in the kingdom of Ireland. This deſign was happily diſcovered, by a letter dropped in the council chamber; and Tyrone, with other principal conſpirators, fled to Bruſſels, where the Archduke gave them a kind reception, and ſettled on them large penſions, by expreſs orders from the court of Spain. Soon after Tyrone, paſſing over to Ireland, attempted to excite another rebellion; but his intention being diſcovered before he could put it into execution, the chiefs who had engaged in the conſpiracy were apprehended and executed. This, and great diſputes in the Iriſh council, which continued for ſeveral years, occaſioned the government to iſſue a ſevere proclamation againſt the catholics, ordering all regular prieſts to leave Ireland, under very heavy penalties.

A. D. 1625. While James, contrary to his inclination, turned his thoughts on war, which he deteſted, and which he knew not how to conduct, he was ſeized with a diſorder that terminated his weak reign. He had long addicted himſelf to thoſe pleaſures which he could not taſte, that he might baniſh from his mind thoſe reflections which he could not bear. He had accuſtomed himſelf to the uſe of ſweet wines, and to ride hard both before and after drinking. This irregular method of living had occaſioned ſeveral ſevere fits of illneſs, which his phyſicians had rather palliated than removed; for James was too headſtrong to ſubmit with patience to any troubleſome regimen, in order to obtain a cure. Infirmities therefore increaſed upon him with age; nor was the approach of the king of terrors to be prevented any longer. The ſtate of his mind added fuel to his bodily diſorder. He was highly provoked at the behaviour of Buckingham, to whom he imputed all the misfortunes that now ſurrounded him. He was deſirous of humbling that haughty miniſter, but he wanted power to execute his deſign. Finding that all attempts in his preſent ſituation would be in vain, he compoſed himſelf with a kind of ſullen reſignation, meditating how to take the firſt opportunity of a friendly hand for his deliverance. Such was the king's ſituation, when the marquis of Hamilton, who hated Buckingham, died ſuddenly, not without ſtrong ſuſpicions of poiſon. James conſidered the death of that nobleman as a ſure prelude to his own. "If the branches are cut down, ſaid he, the ſtock cannot long ſtand." From that moment he became penſive and melancholy. In the beginning of March he was ſeized with a tertian ague, followed by a fever; and when encouraged by his courtiers with the old proverb, that this diſtemper, during that ſeaſon, was phyſic for a king, he replied, that the ſaying was meant of a young king. The counteſs of Beckingham, and ſome other ladies, who had no great opinion of regular phyſicians, but had a high opinion of empyrics, attended James, whoſe impatience for health drove him into the ſame fatal error. Buckingham had ſome time before been cured of a tertian ague by an emetic, a plaiſter, and a poſſet-drink, which James now inſiſted ſhould be adminiſtered to himſelf. Buckingham uſed every argument in his power to diſſuade him from taking any thing that was not preſcribed by his phyſicians; but all his arguments were in vain: the king ſent for the medicines, and they were given him at his earneſt requeſt. Every ſymptom of his diſeaſe was immediately increaſed, and it was ſoon perceived that he could not long ſurvive. At intervals he ſent for the prince, whom he exhorted to have a tender affection for his wife; to be ſtedfaſt in his religion; to protect the church of England; and to extend his care to the prince Palatine's unhappy family. During the laſt ſtage of his diſorder, he was cloſely beſet by Buckingham and his family, who refuſed, till near the cloſe of life, to permit his courtiers to ſee him. James was very ſenſible of his approaching end, and met the king of terrors with great fortitude. His preparations for death were extremely fervent, in which he was chiefly aſſiſted by lord-keeper Williams. In his laſt moments, he declared he died in the faith of the church of England, and expired on the twenty-ſeventh of March, in the fifty-ninth year of his age, and the twenty-third of his reign. His body was conveyed from Theobalds to Weſtminſter-abbey, where it was interred with great funeral ſolemnity, his ſon performing the office of chief mourner upon the occaſion. By his conſort, Anne of Denmark, James had ſeven children; but two of them only ſurvived him, namely, Charles, who ſucceeded him on the throne; and Elizabeth, married to the unfortunate Elector Palatine.

In this reign the public were free from the expence of a ſtanding army; and while James was boaſting his divine vicegerency, he had not a ſingle regiment of guards. The ſole defence of the kingdom of England was its militia, which amounted to one hundred and ſixty thouſand men, who were kept in good order; for all the counties of England, emulating the capital, were fond of ſhewing a well-trained militia. In 1583 there was a general review made of all the men in England capable of bearing arms, and theſe, according to Raleigh, were found to amount to one million one hundred and ſeventy-two thouſand men.

The growth of London in riches, beauty, and in the number of its inhabitants, has been prodigious. From 1600 it doubled every forty years; conſequently, in 1680 it contained four times as many inhabitants as at the beginning of the century. It was at this time almoſt entirely built of wood, and in every reſpect a very diſagreeable city. The earl of Arundel firſt introduced the general practice of erecting buildings of brick.

As coaches were firſt ſeen in the reign of Elizabeth, the firſt ſedan-chair was ſeen in that of James, and was uſed by the duke of Buckingham. The people, on ſeeing him carried in his chair, were filled with indignation at his pride and arrogance, exclaiming, that he made his fellow-creatures do the ſervice of beaſts.

At this period, all the ſeamen employed in the merchants ſervice appear to have amounted to only ten thouſand men, which is ſcarcely a ſixth part of their preſent number. Raleigh obſerves, that the Dutch traded to England with ſix hundred ſhips, and England to Holland with only ſixty. Moſt of the curious arts were cultivated abroad, particularly in Italy, and the Engliſh excelled only in ſhip-building, and the founding of iron cannon. Nine-tenths of the commerce of England conſiſted in woollen goods; yet the exportation of wool was not prohibited till the nineteenth year of this reign. Moſt of the cloth exported was dyed and dreſſed by the Dutch, who are ſaid to have gained ſeven hundred thouſand pounds a year by this manufacture; and Raleigh computes the loſs to England at four hundred thouſand pounds. Yet a proclamation publiſhed by James againſt exporting cloth in that condition ſucceeded ſo ill, on account of the Dutch refuſing to buy the dreſſed cloth, that great murmurs aroſe againſt it; and this meaſure was retracted by the king, the nation complaining of it as if it had been the moſt impolitic thing in the world. Engliſh cloth was then in ſo little credit, that the king was obliged to ſeek expedients to engage the people of faſhion to wear it. The manufacture of linen was at this time entirely unknown in England, and the ſame may be obſerved of the ſilk manufacture.

After the diſcovery of Greenland, the whale fiſhery was, at firſt, carried on with great ſucceſs; but the Dutch ſoon deprived the Engliſh of this ſource of wealth. A company was now erected for the finding a north-weſt paſſage, and many fruitleſs attempts were made for that purpoſe. The India Company received a new patent; and enlarging their ſtock to one million, five hundred thouſand pounds, fitted out ſeveral ſhips; and in this reign the Bermuda, or Summer Iſlands, as alſo Virginia, were ſettled.

The exports of England, from Chriſtmas 1612 to Chriſtmas 1613, are computed at two millions, four hundred eighty-ſeven thouſand, four hundred and thirty-five pounds; the imports at two millions, one hundred forty-one thouſand, one hundred and fifty-one pounds; ſo that the balance in favour of England was three hundred forty-ſix thouſand, two hundred and eighty-four pounds; but in 1622 the exports were two millions, three hundred twenty thouſand, four hundred and thirty-ſix pounds; the imports two millions, ſix hundred nineteen thouſand, three hundred and fifteen pounds; which made a balance of two hundred ninety-eight thouſand, eight hundred and ſeventy-nine pounds againſt England. The Eaſt-India Company uſually carried out a third of their cargo in commodities. The trade to Turky was one of the moſt gainful to the nation.

Tradeſmen had hitherto carried on their retail buſineſs by means of leaden tokens. The ſilver penny, which had the croſs deeply indented, had been broke in half, and paſſed for half-pennies, or halfpence; and thoſe halves broke again into four pieces, were fourths, or farthings: but copper halfpence and farthings began to be coined in this reign in the place of this ſmall money, which was eaſily loſt. Intereſt was at ten per cent. till 1624, when it was reduced to eight.

This being an age of bigotry, and as the light of reaſon had not yet ſpread its influence, religious liberty was ſtill unknown; nor was a toleration allowed to any, who entertained opinions widely different from thoſe publickly eſtabliſhed. Two Arians were burned during this period, who were offered a pardon at the ſtake, on condition of their making a recantation. The eſtabliſhed worſhip was the only one allowed during this and the former reign; and twenty pounds a month might be levied on any one who did not frequent it. The puritans, at this time members of the eſtabliſhed church, had yet no ſeparate congregations. Such of the clergy as refuſed to comply with the legal ceremonies, were deprived of their livings; nor was it ſafe for any one to ſpeak againſt the forms and ceremonies of the church.

Nor was the liberty of the preſs leſs unknown, being incompatible with thoſe principles of government which then prevailed. Elizabeth had laid the greateſt reſtraints on the preſs; and the ſevereſt penalties were inflicted on thoſe who preſumed to write againſt an eſtabliſhment, either in church or ſtate. James extended the ſame penalties to the importing ſuch books from abroad, and afterwards prohibited the printing of any book, without permiſſion from the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the archbiſhop of York, the biſhop of London, the vice-chancellor of one of the Univerſities, or of ſome perſon appointed by them.

By a proclamation for eſtabliſhing public magazines, whenever wheat fell below thirty-two ſhillings a quarter, rye below eighteen, and barley below ſixteen, the commiſſioners were empowered to purchaſe corn for the magazines. Theſe prices may be conſidered as low; though, by our preſent eſtimation, they would rather paſs for high. At that time, the uſual bread of the poor was made of barley. During the greateſt part of James's reign, the beſt wool was at thirty-three ſhillings a tod.

Fifteenths and ſubſidies having been frequently mentioned in this hiſtory, and ſome of our ſubſcribers deſiring of the writer an explanation of the ſame, he here takes this opportunity of complying with their requeſt. The tax called a fifteenth, originally correſponded to the name, and was the value of a fifteenth part of moveables. But a valuation made in the reign of Edward III. being always adhered to, each town conſtantly paid a particular ſum, aſſeſſed by the inhabitants themſelves. The ſame tax, in corporate towns, was called a tenth, becauſe there it was a tenth of the moveables: but both together were conciſely termed a fifteenth: when the produce of the whole was mentioned, and throughout the kingdom, it amounted to about twenty-nine thouſand pounds. A ſubſidy was not invariable, like a fifteenth: for, in the eighth of Elizabeth, a ſubſidy amounted to a hundred and twenty thouſand pounds; in the fortieth of the ſame reign, it was not above ſeventy-eight thouſand; it afterwards fell to ſeventy thouſand, and was continually decreaſing. This was owing to the method of levying it. One ſubſidy was originally given for four ſhillings in the pound on land, and two ſhillings and eight-pence on moveables, throughout the counties; which, when the nation was enriched by trade, would have amounted to a conſiderable tax, had it been ſtrictly levied; but, during the reign of James, the twentieth part of that ſum was not paid. The tax was ſo far perſonal, that a man paid only in the county where he lived, though he poſſeſſed eſtates in other counties; the aſſeſſor forming a looſe eſtimation of his property, and rating him accordingly. However, to preſerve ſome rule in the eſtimation, it appears to have been the practice to keep an eye to former aſſeſſments, and to rate every man according to his anceſtors, or according to what men of ſuch eſtimated property were accuſtomed to pay. This was a ſufficient reaſon why ſubſidies could not encreaſe, notwithſtanding the encreaſe of money, and the riſe of rents. In ſhort, ſubſidies at laſt became ſo unequal and uncertain, that the parliament was obliged to change them into a land-tax.

James, ſucceſſor of Elizabeth, erected a magnificent monument to her memory, in the eaſt end of the north aiſle of her grandfather Henry VII's chapel. It is an arch of white marble, ſupported by ten Corinthian pillars of black marble; under which lies her effigies, in royal robes. The freeze is adorned with the arms of all the royal marriages from Edward the Confeſſor, and with empalements of ſeveral branches of the royal family. On the tablature over the cornice, at the head of the tomb, is this inſcription, which Speed in his chronicle, thus tranſlates:

For an eternal memorial

Unto Elizabeth, queen of England, France, and Ireland, daughter of king Henry VIII. grandchild to king Henry VII. and great-grandchild to king Edward IV. The mother of her country; the patroneſs and nurſe of religion and learning; a princeſs, for all the endowments of body and mind, and more eſpecially for her royal virtues, above her ſex, INCOMPARABLE.

James, king of Great-Britain, France, and Ireland, heir both of her throne and virtues, hath piouſly erected this monument to a princeſs ſo worthy of commemoration.

On the baſement at the top are theſe words:

The ſiſters, Mary and Elizabeth, who poſſeſſed the ſame throne, are companions in the grave, and here ſleep in hopes of a reſurrection.

On a like tablature on the cornice at the feet is this inſcription:

Religion to its primitive purity reſtored; peace eſtabliſhed; money reduced to its juſt value; domeſtic rebellion quelled; France relieved when involved in inteſtine diviſions; the Netherlands ſupported; the Spaniſh Armada overthrown; Ireland, almoſt loſt by rebellion, retrieved by defeating the Spaniards; the revenue of both Univerſities much enlarged by a law of proviſions; and laſtly, all England enriched.

ELIZABETH,

During forty-five years a moſt wiſe governor, a victorious and triumphant queen, moſt ſtrictly religious; moſt happy, by a calm and reſigned death, in her ſeventy-ſecond year, left her mortal remains, till by Chriſt's word they ſhall riſe again to immortality, to be depoſited in this famous church, by her repaired and re-eſtabliſhed.

On the baſement at the feet are theſe words:

She died the twenty-fourth of March, in the year of ſalvation 1602, in the forty-fifth year of her reign, and the ſeventy-ſecond of her age.

The ſame Engliſh monarch, ſoon after his acceſſion, erected a magnificent tomb for Mary, queen of Scots, in the ſouth aiſle of Henry VIIth's chapel, over a vault to which her body had been removed from the cathedral of Peterborough, where, as we have obſerved, it was firſt interred. It is raiſed in the form of a triumphal arch, ſupported by eight Corinthian pillars, under which lies her portraiture in royal robes. The freeze is adorned with the arms of ſeveral marriages of the kings of Scotland, and the top crowned with her atchievements. On ſeveral tablatures of marble round the tomb are epitaphs, which give a brief account of her royal deſcent and relations; the exquiſite endowments of her body and mind; the troubles of her life; her conſtancy in religion, and reſolution in death. The inſcriptions on the plate are in Engliſh.

The firſt part of her epitaph is upon the ſouth ſide of her tomb, in Roman capitals.

D. O. M.

Sacred to the memory of Mary Stuart, queen of Scotland, and dowager of France; daughter and ſole heireſs of James V. king of Scotland, and grand-daughter of Margaret, eldeſt daughter of Henry VII. by Elizabeth, eldeſt daughter of Edward IV. (kings of England) wife of Francis II. king of France, whilſt ſhe lived, certain and undoubted heireſs to the crown of England, and mother of the moſt potent James, monarch of Great-Britain. She was deſcended from a truly royal and moſt antient line, nearly allied by deſcent and conſanguinity to all the greateſt princes of Europe, and was abundantly adorned with the moſt excellent endowments of body and mind: but as all human affairs have their viciſſitudes, after a confinement of above twenty years, and having ſtruggled with reſolution and fortitude (though ineffectually) with the malignity of calumniators, the jealouſy of the fearful, and the ſnares of capital enemies, ſhe was at length an unprecedented, unheard of example with kings, brought to the block; where, with contempt of this world, triumphant in death, and fearleſs of the executioner; recommending her ſoul to Chriſt her Saviour, her hopes of empire and poſterity to her ſon James, and the example of her patience to all the ſpectators of ſo bloody and mournful a ſcene, ſhe piouſly, patiently, and intrepidly ſubmitted her royal neck to the accurſed axe, and exchanged this tranſitory life for a bleſſed eternity in heaven, on the eighth of February, in the year of our Lord 1587, aged forty-ſix.

The other part of the epitaph is on the north ſide of the monument, in hexameter and pentameter, or elegiac verſes. In Engliſh:

If birth illuſtrious, or if beauty's pride,
A guiltleſs mind, and faith ſeverely try'd;
If wiſdom, fortitude, a candid breaſt,
And hope in Him who comforts the diſtreſt;
If probity of heart, with patience mild
To bear injurious bonds, to be revil'd;
If goodneſs, majeſty, a lib'ral will
To raiſe the wretched, and the poor to fill,

Could 'ſcape blind fortune's thunders, that alike
On good and bad, on low and lofty, ſtrike;
Thou hadſt not early fall'n by being great,
Nor thy ſad image ſeem'd to weep thy fate.
Scotland by right, by marriage France was thine;
To theſe well founded hope did England join;
By triple right a triple crown ſhe wears,
But dim its luſtre to a crown of ſtars.
Happy, too happy if, the ſtorm allay'd,
Tho' late, the neighb'ring realm had her obey'd.
But ſee! ſhe falls to triumph in the grave,
New vigour thence, and fruits her branches have.
Conquer'd, ſhe conquers; free, tho' cloſe confin'd;
Not dead, tho' ſlain; the fates her chains unbind.
So the prun'd vine ſhoots forth with fertile ſprays,
And the cut gem reflects its purple rays;
So genial ſeeds, committed to the earth,
Riſe from the fruitful ſoil a brighter birth.
With blood, God's covenant with man was made;
With blood, the patriarchs his wrath allay'd;
With blood, the firſt-born 'ſcap'd the general doom;
Blood ſtain'd the land which now is her's become.
Oh ſtay thy vengeance heaven, for mercy's ſake;
That fatal day be ever mark'd with black;
To murder kings, abhorr'd for evermore,
Nor Britain ſtain'd again with royal gore:
Let the example periſh with the blow,
Accurs'd its author, and its actor too.
Since in her better part ſhe triumphs ſtill,
Dumb be her fate, and ſilent every ill.
Such was her courſe as heav'n thought fit to ſteer,
She had her joys, ſhe knew her ſorrows here.
Early to life the royal James ſhe gave,
Whom ev'ry kinder pow'r in keeping have.
By nuptials great, by birth ſtill greater known,
And greateſt in her iſſue, ſuch a ſon!
Here Mary lies, of whom we ſighing ſing,
The daughter, wife, and mother of a king.
Grant, heav'n, that to the lateſt times her race
Their happy hours without a cloud may paſs,
H. N. lamenting.

Over the cornice of this tomb, at the head, is part of the twenty-firſt verſe of 1 Peter, chap. ii. In Engliſh:

"Chriſt alſo ſuffered for us, leaving us an example that ye ſhould follow his ſteps."

Over the cornice, alſo in Latin, at the feet, is the twenty-third verſe of the ſame chapter. In Engliſh:

"Who, when he was reviled, reviled not again; when he ſuffered, he threatened not; but committed himſelf to him that judgeth righteouſly."

Character of James I.

In his perſon he was of a middle ſtature, and of a fair complexion; jolly, but not corpulent. His countenance was rather diſagreeable, his eyes being large and rolling, his beard thin, and his tongue too big for his mouth: he had an aukward air, and his gait was remarkably ungraceful, from a weakneſs in his knees, which prevented his walking without aſſiſtance: in his diet he was tolerably temperate, but drank little elſe beſides rich and ſtrong wines.

His mental beauties were as imperfect as his perſonal accompliſhments; a mixture of virtues and vices have admitted no ſtriking lights to ſet off or relieve the ſhades of his character. This prince appears, on a ſlight view, to have poſſeſſed ſome amiable qualities; but when theſe qualities were brought forth into action, we find them all unhappily tainted; and candour herſelf is compelled to acknowledge, that his liberality degenerated into profuſion, his learning into pedantry, his pacific diſpoſition into puſillanimity, his wiſdom into mean cunning, and his friendſhip into light fancy, and puerile fondneſs. He had not the ſmalleſt idea of that manly ſcience which ennobles ſociety; which regulates the paſſions of men in a free ſtate; and which animates, directs, and completes the purpoſes of public ſpirit. He was void of all conception of the difference between liberty and licentiouſneſs; and endeavoured to erect for himſelf, in the minds of the people, as ſtrong an opinion of his infallibility, both in religion and politics, as ever the church of Rome had thought to eſtabliſh over her deluded votaries. James, more of a caſuiſt than a politician, was greatly diſtreſſed, whenever his ſubjects dared diſpute or reaſon upon matters which might lead them to a ſenſe of their true intereſt as a people; and nothing gave him greater pleaſure, than to hear and decide on the uſeleſs ſpeculative points of ſchool-divinity: but he ſeldom advanced a man of merit to preferment. While king of Scotland, his behaviour was, in many points, unexceptionable; but the ridiculous, and even profane flattery, he received from the Engliſh nobility, intoxicated his brain, and filled him with ſelf-conceit. Cecil, who ſtood foremoſt among his ſycophants, had the aſſurance to tell him, on his acceſſion, that he would find his Engliſh ſubjects like aſſes, on whom he might lay any burden, and ſhould need neither bit nor bridle, but their ears. Vain of his hereditary title; a bigot to the doctrines of divine right and paſſive obedience, he aimed to imitate the example of the princes of the Tudor line, who had made great breaches in the Engliſh conſtitution. But he never reflected on the difference between their ſituation and his own. The ignorance, and conſequently the timidity of the Engliſh, was now vaniſhed; they were reſolved to defend with courage what they had acquired by induſtry. The doctrine of reſiſtance was preached from the pulpit, and underſtood in parliament, but with ſuch reſtrictions as left ſufficient room for a king of England to be at once both great and happy. James ſtudied to preſerve peace rather than tranquillity; the ſhadow, rather than the ſubſtance; becauſe the genuine baſis of tranquillity is freedom. Though he held the ſceptre without any ſenſible reverſe of fortune, yet the life of James was very uneven. No prince ever learned more, or profited leſs by experience. The Howards, who continued in the miniſtry, had not ſufficient abilities to hold the reins of government: the Scottiſh favourites were diſagreeable to the nation; and thoſe whom James truſted, wanted both capacity and honeſty to ſerve him. His prodigality rendered him always neceſſitous. One of his minions ſeeing a load of ſilver carrying to the Treaſury, ſaid to a perſon who ſtood near him, "How happy would that money make me!" The king deſired to know what he had been ſaying, and immediately gave him the whole ſum, amounting to three thouſand pounds. You think yourſelf happy, ſaid he; but I am more ſo, in obliging the man I eſteem. The commons took advantage of his extravagance; and finding their aſſiſtance was abſolutely neceſſary, they made themſelves his maſters. In his youth, James gave ſeveral inſtances that he wanted neither ſpirit nor reſolution; but his political cowardice had every characteriſtic of meanneſs; for he trembled moſt when he boaſted loudeſt: but when reflection ſucceeded to fear, his good natural ſenſe convinced him, that his ſchemes were impracticable; though his pride always led him to drop them in ſuch a manner, that his crown and government were expoſed to as much danger as if he had purſued them. Hence it happened, that among all the conceſſions he made to his parliament, not one was received with thankfulneſs; they were always conſidered as the reſult of preſent convenience, or the effects of fear.

We cannot unite in ſentiment with the ingenious writer of the catalogue of Royal and noble authors, when he ſays, puns, ſcripture, witticiſms, oaths, prerogative, and vanity, are the ingredients of all his ſacred majeſty's performances. James, conſidered as an author, has made a figure as a ſcholar. He certainly had a more learned education than is commonly beſtowed on princes. His works, ſtill extant, are printed in one volume, folio. He wrote the Baſilicon Doron; The true Law of Free Monarchies; A Counterblaſt to Tobacco; A Treatiſe on Witches and Apparitions; A Commentary on the Revelations; An Encomium on Sir Philip Sidney; ſome Verſes prefixed to Tycho Brahe's Works; and he began a Tranſlation of the Pſalms. Several other pieces are aſcribed to him, and many of his letters are extant; ſeveral of them in the Cabala, others in manuſcript in the Britiſh Muſeum, and others in Howard's collection. Modern wits, and modern reviewers, may ſtile theſe productions the pedantic learning of James; but it is a pedantry which was peculiar to this reign, and which evidently appears, both in the choice of ſubjects and ſtile, of other eminent writers of that age. If the learning of James made him a caſuiſt, not a politician, a wrangling diſputant, but not a wiſe king, yet we cannot think it ſunk him into contempt as a man. Perhaps, in ſome future more political and ſolid age than the preſent, even the works of Mr. Walpole may appear equally ſingular, pedantic, and uſeleſs, with the immenſe erudition and ſcholaſtic writings of James. And we beg leave further to obſerve, in behalf of this monarch, that if his reign was ignoble to himſelf, rendered ſo by the flatterers of his age, it was undoubtedly happy for his people, who, by being bleſſed with peace, enriched by an extenſive commerce, and freed from the care of foreign affairs, had leiſure to attend to their own concerns, and to ſecure their liberties and privileges by many excellent regulations.

A.D. 1625. CHARLES I. ſon of James I. in the twenty-fifth year of his age, ſucceeded his father on the throne of Great-Britain. He began his reign by removing lord Baltimore from the office of ſecretary of ſtate; granting a pardon to the earl of Middleſex; recalling by proclamation all Britiſh ſubjects from the Imperial, Spaniſh, and Flemiſh ſervices; iſſuing commiſſions for granting letters of repriſals againſt the Spaniards, as well as raiſing ten thouſand men for a naval expedition, and for the recovery of the Palatinate. The marriage of the king being celebrated at Paris by proxy, the duke of Buckingham was employed in conducting the queen to England, where ſhe arrived on the twelfth of June, when the king received her at Dover, and the nuptials were celebrated at Canterbury. The king and queen, on the ſixteenth of the ſame month, made their public entry into London, and on the eighteenth the parliament was aſſembled. The commons, after mentioning ſome grievances not redreſſed, and demanding an account of the laſt money granted for the recovery of the Palatinate, being reſtrained from keeping together by the raging of the plague, and unwilling to give a total denial to their young king, granted him two ſubſidies, and petitioned for a receſs; on which account they were adjourned to meet on the firſt of Auguſt at Oxford. It appears very evident, from the ſmallneſs of this ſupply, that parliament had already entertained a ſtrong jealouſy of the preſent government. A trifling change had been made in the adminiſtration ſince the death of James: Charles had the ſame favourite, the ſame miniſters, and all the offices of the kingdom, continued in the hands of Buckingham's creatures. His influence over Charles exceeded even that which he had acquired over the weakneſs of James; and every public meaſure was conducted by his advice and direction. He engroſſed the entire confidence of his maſter, and was himſelf poſſeſſed of the moſt conſiderable offices of the crown. The hatred of the people had been ſuſpended, while the duke's conduct ſeemed to gratify their prejudices; but they now found that his zeal ſprang from a particular pique againſt Spain, and that an alliance had been contracted with a court no leſs hated. A chapel had been built at Somerſet-houſe for the queen and her family, with conveniences adjoining to it for the capuchin friars, who were permitted to walk abroad in their habits. Beſides, the extraordinary ſupplies granted to the crown by the laſt parliament, and the bad management of its firſt military attempt, convinced the commons that the miniſtry were not to be truſted with ſo important a buſineſs as war; and the ſpeech of the lord-keeper, which repreſented that the ſubſidies were not only ſpent, but the revenue in debt, did not a little contribute to confirm them in this opinion. But, before the meeting of parliament, an incident happened which inflamed the reſentment of the Engliſh. The French miniſtry had cajoled James into a promiſe to furniſh Lewis with one ſhip of war, and ſeven armed merchant ſhips, to be employed againſt the Genoeſe. Buckingham prevailed on Charles to lend theſe ſhips, to be uſed againſt the proteſtants at the ſiege of Rochelle, where they were to be filled with French ſoldiers and mariners, commanded by the duke de Montmorency. This was no ſooner known than the whole crew mutinied. Vice-admiral Pennington declared, that he would rather be hanged in England for diſobedience, than fight againſt his brother proteſtants in France; and notwithſtanding the repeated menaces and promiſes of the French, he refuſed to deliver up the ſhips, and ſailed back to the Downs. They there received new orders from Buckingham, lord admiral, to return to Dieppe. As the duke was ſenſible, that authority alone was not ſufficient to engage the commanders in an action ſo repugnant to conſcience and honour, a rumour was ſpread that a peace had been concluded between the French king and his proteſtant ſubjects. On their return to Dieppe, they found they had been deceived. The captains of the merchants now maintained, that the king had no right to diſpoſe of their property, and prepared to ſail away; but Pennington, who could no longer plead a miſunderſtanding of his orders, fired to bring them to; yet the brave Sir Ferdinando Gorges, who commanded one of the veſſels, broke through, and returned to England. The remaining ſhips were delivered to the French: but all the officers and ſeamen, notwithſtanding the great offers made them, immediately deſerted; and not one individual, except a gunner, would ſerve againſt their diſtreſſed brethren, the French proteſtants. This tranſaction entirely prevented that popularity which every Engliſh monarch ſhould endeavour to obtain at the commencement of his reign. No ſooner were theſe tranſactions known in parliament, than the commons ſhewed the ſame attachment with the ſailors for the proteſtant religion. They even carried their zeal to a height that rendered their deliberations at once ridiculous and unjuſt. Montague, one of the king's chaplains, publiſhed a book, which, contrary to the rigid tenets of the puritans, ſaved virtuous catholics, as well as other chriſtians, from eternal torments. It now became evident that thoſe great men, who reaſoned ſo forcibly on the danger of the conſtitution of their country, from the increaſing power of the crown, could not reaſon at all on the ſubject of religion. Montague was ordered to be proſecuted, a committee was appointed to conſider of the proceedings againſt him, and the eccleſiaſtic, for having done an important ſervice to the church of England, by exploding the adopted errors of her antagoniſts, was ordered into cuſtody of the ſerjeant, and to give bail of two thouſand pounds for his appearing at the next ſeſſion. It is no wonder that Charles was offended at theſe proceedings, and that he often put them in mind that they had buſineſs of far greater concern to engage their attention. But finding all attempts were in vain, the king diſſolved a parliament from which he had nothing to expect.

The favourite was now hated by Spain; he was feared by France; he was diſtruſted in Holland; he was unpopular in England. The affections of the king, and his own aſcendancy in the cabinet, were all he had to truſt to, and he therefore determined to increaſe his power, by putting more of his friends into places of conſequence. All the diſſimulation of Williams could not remove Buckingham's hatred. He was deprived of the ſeals, and retired to his biſhopric with great dejection. Charles had afterwards time ſufficient to regret the loſs of this able ſervant, when the heats that afterwards flamed out ſo fatally, and ſeemed to threaten the deſtruction of the kingdom. However, notwithſtanding Buckingham was an enemy to the perſon of Williams, he was in his heart a friend to his principles, and was daily more and more convinced how impracticable it was for the government to oppoſe the people's torrent of zeal againſt popery. The earl of Holland continued to be his faithful correſpondent at the French court, and gave him intelligence how deeply Blanville, the French ambaſſador, was engaged in plotting his deſtruction. The duke determined to return to France, in quality of ambaſſador; but the queen having been incautious in her expreſſions of her paſſion for that nobleman, Lewis abſolutely refuſed to admit him into his territories. This highly exaſperated Buckingham, eſpecially as the court of France refuſed to ſign a ſecret treaty againſt the houſe of Auſtria, unleſs Charles would employ his forces againſt the French proteſtants. Charles, deſerted by his parliament, was obliged to have recourſe to unconſtitutional methods of raiſing money. He iſſued privy-ſeals, in order to obtain the neceſſary ſum; but the advantages he gained by this temporary ſupply were more than balanced by the diſguſt it occaſioned. By means, however, of this ſupply he was enabled to fit out a fleet of eighty ſail, on board of which were ten thouſand ſoldiers. Buckingham was very unfortunate in his choice of the officers. Sir Horace Vere had been created a baron of England, and was endowed with every talent requiſite for the command of this armament; but he was no friend to the miniſter. Sir Edward Cecil, who had commanded under count Mansfeldt, was therefore choſen for that office, and immediately created viſcount Wimbledon. Buckingham could not have made a more unfortunate choice. Wimbledon, though a brave field officer, knew nothing of ſea affairs. The public complained loudly that Sir Robert Manſel was neglected; but they ſhould have remembered that he was engaged in the party formed againſt the miniſter. Nor was Buckingham more fortunate in his choice of the other officers. The earl of Eſſex was appointed to command under Wimbledon, though there actually ſubſiſted ſo great an antipathy between them, that they would have more readily fought with each other than againſt the enemy.

On the firſt of October the fleet ſailed, and a council of war was held off Cape St. Vincent, in order to form a plan for their future operations. The earl of Eſſex naturally gave his voice for attacking Cadiz, the ſcene of his father's glory, and his propoſal being accepted, the whole fleet ſtood towards that port. But by this time all Spain was alarmed, and ſo dreadful to the Spaniards was the remembrance of the Engliſh valour under queen Elizabeth, that their king was ready in perſon to march down at the head of a royal army to the defence of his coaſt.

The Engliſh reached Cadiz, and found every thing in readineſs to give them a warm reception, and the attack of fort Puntal was given to the earl of Eſſex. He advanced with twenty Engliſh and five Dutch ſhips with ſuch impetuoſity, that the Spaniſh ſhipping, which conſiſted of ſeventeen ſtout ſhips and eight or ten gallies, fearing the fatal conſequence of that fort's being taken, retired to Port Real. The fort, however, made a noble defence; and it was found impracticable to take it on the ſide where the attack was made. Upon this Sir John Burroughs, an old Engliſh officer, landed with his regiment, and driving ſome companies of Spaniſh infantry, who had oppoſed his landing, back to the fort, the Spaniſh governor thought proper to ſurrender. The taking of this fort was, however, of no other conſequence than as it opened a paſſage to Cadiz itſelf, and commanded a large extent of villages and country round; but the raw Engliſh ſoldiers could not reſiſt the temptation of the new Spaniſh wines; they drank to exceſs, and could not be brought to act with that ſpirit and reſolution neceſſary for rendering the expedition ſucceſsful. At the ſame time diſſentions prevailed among the officers, and diſeaſes among the ſoldiers; ſo that any farther ſtay appearing fruitleſs, the troops were re-embarked, and the fleet put to ſea, with a reſolution of waiting for the Spaniſh galleons. But the plague breaking out among the ſeamen and ſoldiers, Cecil was obliged to return to England with infected crews, ſickly companies, a broken reputation, diſheartened officers, and national diſhonour.

A. D. 1626. On the ſecond of February Charles was crowned, and four days after the new parliament met at Weſtminſter. The ſeſſion was opened by the new lord-keeper, Sir Thomas Finch, with a conciſe ſpeech, wherein he acquainted both houſes, that as his majeſty intended the ſeſſion ſhould be very ſhort, he hoped they would make all imaginable diſpatch in granting the ſupplies. But the commons, without paying any regard to the lord-keeper's ſpeech, began an enquiry into the national grievances, at the very point where they had left off the laſt ſeſſion, as if the ſame men had been every where elected, and no time had intervened between their laſt meeting. Charles, had he been left to himſelf, would probably have ſucceeded much better than he did with this parliament. For though he had loſt nothing of his arbitrary notions, yet the neceſſity of his affairs, and his cloſe engagements on the continent, where both his honour and reputation were at ſtake, would certainly have induced him to have made ſuch ſacrifices, as would have brought over to his intereſt that very ſmall number of members which gave the oppoſition the majority. But Charles was now governed in eccleſiaſtical affairs by Laud, a furious churchman, who, rather than give up one point of uſeleſs ceremony, or immaterial doctrine, was determined to hazard the rights of monarchy, and the tranquillity of his country. The commons indeed voted a ſupply of three ſubſidies and three fifteenths, and afterwards added another ſubſidy; but reſerved the paſſing that vote into a law till the end of the ſeſſion; ſo that if the king refuſed to grant them a ſufficient time to finiſh their enquiry into the national grievances, or refuſed to comply with their demands, he muſt expect no ſupply. Very ſoon it appeared, that the whole ſtorm was intended againſt Buckingham, who was conſidered as the ſource of all the national grievances. Charles foreſaw the conſequence, and endeavoured to ſoften the enquiries of the commons, by ordering Heath, the attorney-general, to ſend letters to the judges, enjoining them to proceed with more vigour than ever againſt the popiſh recuſants. But all orders of that kind were miſtruſted by the commons; and an embargo being at that time laid on all the Engliſh ſhipping in France, the commons ordered an enquiry to be made into the reaſon for ſuch ſtrange proceedings. In anſwer to this enquiry, it was ſaid that the French had impoſed it upon the Engliſh in order to indemnify themſelves for the illegal detention of a ſhip belonging to Havre-de-Grace, called the St. Peter, even after an order had been iſſued by the king for her releaſe. But, upon examination, it appeared that there was ſufficient reaſon for this detention, and the enquiry was laid aſide. At this time the earl of Briſtol, who had now taken his ſeat in parliament, impeached Buckingham, his inveterate enemy; and the commons ſent up another impeachment. But however odious the irregularities of the favourite had rendered him, they were not ſuch as would condemn him as a traitor. The commons, however, purſued their deſign with unwearied attention; but the members of the council of war declining to give any anſwers to the queſtions put to them by the commons, it was thought proper to put a ſtop, for ſome time, to the enquiry.

Charles, preſſed by his allies for fulfilling his engagements, was very urgent with the parliament to finiſh the ſupplies. The houſe of peers candidly declared, that it was neceſſary to put the nation in a poſture of defence both by ſea and land; and that count Mansfeldt's army, and the king's allies ought to be ſupported. Theſe reſolutions were communicated by the upper to the lower houſe; but the commons paid very little attention to them; the ſupporting their charge againſt Buckingham engroſſed all their attention. In the courſe of this debate, Mr. Coke, ſon to Sir Edward Coke, ſaid, "It was better to die by an enemy than to ſuffer at home;" and Dr. Turner, a phyſician, propoſed the following queſtions againſt Buckingham.

Whether the duke, being admiral of England, be not the cauſe of the king's loſs of his royalty in the narrow ſeas?

Whether the unreaſonable, exorbitant, and immenſe gifts of money and lands, beſtowed on the duke and his relations, be not the cauſe of impairing the king's revenue, and impoveriſhing the crown?

Whether the multiplicity of offices beſtowed on the duke and his dependents, be not the cauſe of the ill government of the kingdom?

Whether recuſants in general be not ſupported and encouraged by the duke's mother and father-in-law, being papiſts?

Whether the ſale of honours, offices, places of judicature, eccleſiaſtical livings, and promotions, be not carried on by the duke?

Whether the duke's ſtaying at home, though admiral of the fleet and general of the land army, was not the cauſe of the miſcarriage of the expedition to Cadiz; and whether he gave proper directions for executing the deſign?

In the midſt of this debate, the ſpeaker received the following letter from the king:

"Truſty and well-beloved, &c.

"Having aſſembled the parliament early in the beginning of the year, for the more timely help and advice of our people in our great and important affairs; and having of late, not only by meſſage, but alſo of ourſelf, put our houſe of commons in mind of our preſſing occaſions, and of the preſent ſtate of Chriſtendom, wherein they have equal intereſt with us, as well as in reſpect to their own former engagements, as of the common cauſe; we ſhall not need to tell them with what care and patience we have, in the midſt of our neceſſities, attended their reſolutions; but becauſe their unſeaſonable ſlowneſs may produce at home as ill effects as a denial, and hazard the whole eſtate of things abroad, we have thought fit, by you, the ſpeaker, to let them know, that, without more loſs of time, we look for a full and perfect anſwer to what they will give for our ſupply, according to our expectation and their promiſes; wherein, as we preſs for nothing beyond the preſent ſtate and condition of our ſubjects, ſo will we accept no leſs than is proportional to the greatneſs and goodneſs of the cauſe; neither do we preſs them to a preſent reſolution in this with a purpoſe to precipitate their counſels, much leſs to enter upon their privileges, but to ſhew that it is unfit to depend any longer upon uncertainties, whereby the whole weight of the affairs of Chriſtendom may break in ſuddenly upon us, to our diſhonour and the ſhame of this nation. And for the buſineſs at home, we command you to promiſe them, in our name, that after they have ſatisfied us in this reaſonable demand, we ſhall not only continue them together at this time ſo long as the ſeaſon will permit, but call them ſhortly again to perfect thoſe neceſſary buſineſſes which will be now left undone; and now we ſhall willingly apply fit and ſeaſonable remedies to ſuch juſt grievances which they ſhall preſent unto us in a dutiful and mannerly manner, without throwing an ill-odour upon our preſent government, or upon the government of our late bleſſed father; and if there be yet who deſire to find fault, we ſhall think him the wiſeſt reprehender of our errors paſt, who, without reflecting backward, can give us counſel how to ſettle the preſent ſtate of things, and to provide for the future ſafety and honour of the kingdom." To enforce the intention of this letter, Sir Edward Weſton, chancellor of the exchequer, delivered to the houſe the following meſſage.

"1. His majeſty's fleet being returned, and the victuals expended, the men muſt, of neceſſity, be diſcharged, and their wages paid; otherwiſe a mutiny will be the conſequence, which may, at this time, prove dangerous.

"2. His majeſty hath fitted out about forty ſhips, for a ſecond attempt againſt the enemy: theſe want only victuals and a few men, but without a preſent ſupply of money, cannot ſail, nor be kept together.

"3. The army aſſembled on the coaſts muſt ſoon be diſbanded, if they be not ſupplied with victuals and cloaths.

"4. If the companies lately ſent to Ireland be not provided for, inſtead of defending that country, they will become the authors of rebellion.

"5. The ſeaſon for providing healthful victuals will be paſt, if this month be neglected.

"His majeſty therefore commanded me to tell you, that he deſired to know, without farther delay, what ſupply you will give him for theſe his preſent occaſions, that he may frame his courſe and council accordingly." This meſſage contained ſuch ſtrong reaſons, that, notwithſtanding all the arts of the oppoſition, and the unbounded aſcendancy the leaders of it had acquired over the minds of the people, they thought proper to join very readily in the following anſwer to Weſton's meſſage:

"Moſt gracious ſovereign,

"Your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the commons, now aſſembled in parliament, in all humility, preſent unto your royal wiſdom this their loyal anſwer to the meſſage which your majeſty was pleaſed by the chancellor of your exchequer, to ſend unto them, deſiring to know, without any farther deferring of time, what ſupply they would give to your majeſty for your preſent and extraordinary occaſions, that you might form your courſes and counſels accordingly. Firſt of all, they moſt humbly beſeech your majeſty to know, and reſt aſſured, that no prince was ever dearer to his people than your majeſty; no people more zealous to maintain and advance the honour and greatneſs of their king than they, which, as upon all occaſions they will be ready to expreſs, ſo eſpecially in ſupport of that cauſe wherein your majeſty and your allies are juſtly engaged. And becauſe they cannot doubt but your majeſty, in your great wiſdom, even out of juſtice, and according to the example of your famous predeceſſors, will be pleaſed graciouſly to accept the faithful and neceſſary information and advice of your parliament, which can have no end but the ſervice of your majeſty, and the ſafety of your realm, in diſcovering the cauſes, and propoſing the remedies of thoſe great evils, which have occaſioned your majeſty's wants, and your people's grief. They therefore, in confidence and full aſſurance of redreſs therein, do, with one conſent, propoſe, though, in former time, ſuch courſe had been unuſed, that they really intend to aſſiſt and ſupply your majeſty in ſuch a way, and in ſo ample a manner, as may make you ſafe at home, and feared abroad; for the diſpatch whereof, they will uſe ſuch diligence as your majeſty's preſſing occaſions ſhall require."

But the commons, notwithſtanding this anſwer, inſtead of immediately applying themſelves to finiſh the bill relative to the ſubſidies, ſtill purſued their favourite project againſt Buckingham; and having voted, upon the queries of Dr. Turner, "that common fame was a ſufficient ground of accuſation by the commons," proceeded to frame regular articles againſt the miniſter. They accuſed him "of having united many offices in his perſon; of having bought two of them; of neglecting to guard the ſeas, ſo that many merchant-ſhips had fallen into the hands of the enemy; of delivering ſhips to the French king, in order to ſerve againſt the Hugonots; of being employed in the ſales of honours and offices; of accepting extenſive grants from the crown; of procuring many titles of honour for his kindred; of adminiſtering phyſic to the late king, without acquainting his phyſicians; of extorting a ſum of ten thouſand pounds from the Eaſt-India Company; and of confiſcating ſome goods belonging to ſome French merchants, under pretence of their being the property of the Spaniards." Among all theſe accuſations, the two laſt only could be regarded as of any importance; the reſt ſeem to be frivolous, or falſe, or both. But the duke's anſwer to theſe particulars was ſo clear and ſatisfactory, that it is impoſſible to refuſe our aſſent to it. Charles, perceiving that the commons were determined to purſue their own meaſures, ordered the lord-keeper to forbid the houſe meddling any farther with his miniſter and ſervant, Buckingham; and ordered them to finiſh, in a few days, the bill they had begun for the ſubſidies; and to make ſome addition to them, otherwiſe they muſt expect to ſit no longer.

This language, more proper for an eaſtern than an Engliſh monarch, tended to deſtroy the conſtitution, and to reduce Britons to that abject ſtate of ſlavery known only in the moſt deſpotic kingdoms. It deſtroyed all confidence between the king and his parliament. At the ſame time, he ſent to demand ſatisfaction of Mr. Coke, for the words he had ſpoken, and of Dr. Turner, for the queries he had preſented to the commons. The houſe was aſtoniſhed at ſuch proceedings; ſome were intimidated with fear; ſome were filled with indignation; ſome with true patriotic zeal, for a coalition between the king and his people; and others, inſtigated by a ſecret ambition, rejoiced at this language of the king, as it tended to throw every thing into confuſion. Theſe different paſſions produced different effects; and ſo many left the committee, that the ſpeaker was obliged to reſume the chair, and it was ordered that no member ſhould depart the houſe without leave.

Having taken the king's meſſage into conſideration, they preſented a ſpirited remonſtrance, in which they boldly juſtified their proceedings againſt Buckingham, as being founded upon precedents, and conſiſtent with every principle of natural liberty and ſafety: and concluded with putting the king in mind how readily they had agreed to grant him a ſupply, and requeſted his majeſty not to be prejudiced againſt their proceedings. But neither theſe meſſages nor remonſtrances had any power to withdraw the attention of the commons from their favourite project, that of ſupporting their articles of impeachment againſt Buckingham; though they muſt have known, that few of the articles exhibited againſt him contained real crimes, and that theſe were impoſſible to be proved. It is, indeed, ſurprizing, that men of ſuch remarkable abilities as the leaders of the houſe of commons were, inveterate in their hatred, and keen in their purſuit of a favourite miniſter, young and giddy at his entrance into power, bold and inſolent in its exerciſe, unfortunate and diſappointed in his meaſures, ſhould find ſo little real matter againſt him, during the ſpace of almoſt fourteen years. The truth is, that Buckingham had always been faithful to his maſters; and had been ſometimes, to gratify their arbitrary inclinations, forced upon meaſures his judgment diſapproved; and he had, for ſome years, been ſtruggling in vain againſt the tide of popular fury. The breath of the king, inſtead of diſſipating, ſwelled the ſtorm. It was now agreed to demand of the lords that Buckingham ſhould be committed to ſafe cuſtody. When this meſſage was delivered to the upper houſe, the duke addreſſed the lords in the following manner:

"My lords,

"If I hold my peace, it will argue guilt; if I ſpeak it will argue boldneſs, when accuſed of ſo many crimes. Your lordſhips ſee what complaints are made againſt me by the houſe of commons. How well I ſtood in their opinion not long ſince, your lordſhips well know: what I have done ſince, to loſe their good opinion, I proteſt I am entirely ignorant. I cannot ſo greatly diſtruſt my own innocency, and my heart, which abhors guilt, as to decline any courſe, or court of juſtice; and had they not brought my cauſe before your lordſhips, it would have been my own work: they have done me a favour, by delivering me out of their hands into thoſe of your lordſhips.

"I will not endeavour to throw any reflection on thoſe who have taken pains to repreſent me in ſo vile a light; it will be ſufficient for me to proteſt my innocence, which I hope to prove, as the cauſe is now before juſt judges: I deſire that my trial may be haſtened, that I may ſuffer no longer than is abſolutely neceſſary: and as my accuſers have not been content with my proceſs only, but to preſcribe to your lordſhips the manner of your judgment, and to puniſh me before I am heard, I ſhall not give way to any of their unjuſt demands."

About this time the earl of Suffolk, chancellor of the univerſity of Cambridge, died; and Buckingham, though then under impeachment, was choſen in his place. The commons reſented, and loudly complained of this affront; but the king was ſo far from regarding the cenſure of the commons, that he wrote a letter to the univerſity, extolling the duke, and giving them thanks for his election. Sir Dudley Digges, and Sir John Elliot, who had been employed as managers of the impeachment againſt Buckingham, were ſent to the Tower. This highly exaſperated the commons, who immediately declared, that they would proceed no farther upon buſineſs till they had received ſatiſfaction with regard to their privileges. Charles alledged, as a reaſon for this violent meaſure, certain ſeditious expreſſions, which, he ſaid, had dropped from thoſe members in their accuſation of the duke. Upon enquiry, it appeared that no ſuch expreſſions had been uſed: upon which the members were releaſed.

The example of the houſe of commons was now imitated by the peers. They claimed liberty for the earl of Arundel, who had been lately ſent to the Tower. The king made ſeveral attempts to elude the demand of the lords, but was at laſt obliged to comply, and the earl was accordingly releaſed from his confinement. The king having complied with the demand of the commons, with regard to the diſcharge of their members, and even declared that he had been impoſed upon, there were no plauſible reaſons for with-holding the ſupplies. A great majority of the houſe would readily have paſſed the bill, but were oppoſed by other turbulent members, who intimated that they had ſome doubts whether the money would be properly applied, and whether there was any real intention of ſending out the fleet that year. Theſe inſinuations were at once both groundleſs and malicious, yet many events concurred to render them poſſible. The king had as yet given them no ſatiſfaction, nor even an anſwer to their remonſtrance. The houſe of peers had refuſed to proceed againſt Buckingham, or even to admit that he might be criminal, by ſending him to the Tower. The French court had made peace with the Hugonots, by the mediation of the Engliſh ambaſſadors: they had paid off, and ſent home, the Engliſh ſhips employed in their ſervice; they had taken off the embargo laid on the Engliſh merchantmen; and, after renewing the treaty of 1610, ſeemed entirely diſpoſed to act with vigour againſt the houſe of Auſtria. For this purpoſe, Lewis had offered to make a diverſion, with twenty-five thouſand men, in Germany; and to continue the war, if neceſſary, for four years to come, provided England would enter into the ſame engagements; but refuſed to be concerned any farther againſt the houſe of Auſtria, than the reinſtating the Palatine, and other deprived German princes, in their dominions. From theſe circumſtances the diſcontented members took the opportunity of urging, that there would be no occaſion for the operations of the fleet, and that the houſe ought to be very careful how they granted money for that purpoſe. Theſe artful ſpeeches made a viſible impreſſion to the diſadvantage of the court, and the commons ſeemed perſuaded that the ſupply was not neceſſary. Charles endeavoured to quicken their proceedings by meſſages; and even proceeded ſo far as to threaten the commons, that if they did not furniſh him with the ſupplies, he ſhould be obliged to have recourſe to "new councils." This language could not be miſtaken; but leſt any of the members ſhould conſider it as ambiguous, Sir Dudley Carleton, vice-chamberlain, took ſome pains to explain it fully: "I pray you conſider, ſaid he, what theſe new councils are. I fear to declare thoſe that I conceive. In all Chriſtian kingdoms you know that parliaments were formerly in uſe, by which thoſe kingdoms were governed in a moſt flouriſhing manner; until the monarchs began to know their own ſtrength, and ſeeing the turbulent ſpirit of their parliaments, at length they, by little and little, began to ſtand on their prerogatives, and at laſt overthrew the parliaments throughout Chriſtendom, except here only with us.—Let us be careful, then, to preſerve the king's good opinion of parliaments, which bringeth ſuch happineſs to this nation, and makes us envied of all others, while there is this ſweetneſs between his majeſty and the commons; leſt we loſe the repute of a free people by our turbulence in parliament." Theſe imprudent ſuggeſtions rather gave the commons warning of the deſigns formed againſt them, than ſtruck them with terror. They conſidered a precarious liberty, or that preſerved by unlimited complaiſance, as no liberty at all. They were determined to preſerve the ſubſtance, or loſe the ſhadow. Inſtead, therefore, of paſſing the bill for the ſupplies, they renewed their enquiries into grievances; they ordered the houſe to be called over, and all abſent members to be puniſhed. They revived their attack on the revenues of the crown. They entered on a remonſtrance againſt the levying of tonnage and poundage without conſent of parliament. This article, together with the new impoſitions laid on merchandize by James, conſtituted near one half of the royal revenues. This attack, therefore, had it ſucceeded, muſt have proved deciſive; and as they were not able to fix any legal crime upon Buckingham, they intended to preſent a petition to his majeſty for removing him from his perſon and councils. To preſerve, however, the appearance of moderation, the ſubſidy bill was again read, but kept in ſuch ſuſpence as ſufficiently indicated, that if all the grievances preſented by the commons were not removed, the bill would never paſs into a law. The king, alarmed at theſe proceedings, determined to diſſolve the parliament. The lords endeavoured to diſſuade him from this reſolution, but in vain; and when they petitioned him, that he would allow the parliament to ſit ſome time longer, he anſwered, in a very haſty manner, " Not a moment longer." The commons had juſt finiſhed their remonſtrance, when the king carried his threats into execution, by diſſolving the parliament, before they had completed a ſingle act.

Their remonſtrance began with a kind of recapitulation of the reaſons why the preſent and former parliament had been in a manner abortive, and the whole blame thrown upon Buckingham. Among other things, they charged him with appointing Sir Edward Coke, and ſeveral other leading members againſt him, ſheriffs of counties, in order to diſqualify them from ſerving their country in parliament; and for ſending Mr. Glanvill abroad, as ſecretary of the fleet, for the ſame purpoſe. They afterwards declared, it was their firm reſolution to have ſignally ſupported his majeſty in the proſecution of the war, had not all their intention been blaſted by the enormities of Buckingham, whoſe crimes they ſum up in the following manner: " We found, ſay they, that the moſt preſſing and comprehenſive miſchief and grievance ſuffered by the late king, was fundamentally ſettled in the vaſt power and enormous actions of the ſaid duke, being ſuch by reaſon of his plurality of offices; ſome procured by ambition, and ſome by money, expreſsly againſt the laws of your majeſty's realm; his breach of truſt, in not guarding the ſeas; his high injuſtice in the admiralty; his extortion; his delivering over the ſhips of this kingdom into the hands of a foreign prince; his procuring the compulſory buying of honour, for his own gain; his unexampled exhauſting of the treaſures and revenues of the kingdom; his tranſcendent preſumption of that unhappy application of phyſic to your royal father of bleſſed memory, ſome few days before his death; of theſe, and ſome other of his offences, carefully examined by us, we made a parliamentary charge againſt him to the lords, by your majeſty aſſembled in parliament, there expecting ſome remedy, by a ſpeedy proceeding againſt him; but, may it pleaſe your moſt excellent majeſty, not only during the time of our examination of the matters and offences of the ſaid charge, we were often interrupted and diverted by meſſages, procured, through miſinformation, from your majeſty, which with moſt humble duty and reverence we did ever receive; whence it firſt fell out that ſo, not only much time was ſpent among us, before the ſaid charge was perfected, but alſo, within two days after the ſame charge was tranſmitted by us to the lords, two of our members, Sir Dudley Digges, and Sir John Elliot, upon untrue and malicious informations, privately and againſt the privilege of parliaments, given to your majeſty of certain words, were by your majeſty's command committed to cloſe impriſonment in the Tower of London, their lodgings preſently ſearched, and their papers taken away; by reaſon whereof not only our known privileges of parliament were infringed, but we ourſelves, who in full hopes of ſpeedy courſe of juſtice againſt the ſaid duke, were preparing with all dutiful affection to proceed to diſpatch the ſupply and other ſervices of your majeſty, were wholly, as the courſe and privilege of parliament bind us, employed for ſeveral days in taking into conſideration the proper methods to be purſued for the ratifying and preſerving the privileges ſo infringed." They next complain of the inſolence of lord Conway, ſecretary of ſtate, who had ordered the meſſengers, who, by their warrants, were to have apprehended the members at their lodgings, to ſeize them in the very houſe of commons. This outrage they alſo charged upon the duke, as they do all the interruptions they received, when they were well diſpoſed to grant the ſupply. They next attack that nobleman for procuring himſelf to be elected chancellor of the univerſity of Cambridge, becauſe, ſay they, the ſame univerſity, having two burgeſſes in parliament, did, by the ſame burgeſſes, a few weeks before, conſent with us in the charge againſt him, for his ambition in procuring ſuch a plurality of offices; ſuch was his ambition to ſue for it; ſuch was his power to make them give it him, contrary to what they had agreed in parliament with all the commons of England. They next charge him " with having ſcreened Montague, and deſpair of being able to do any thing for the public ſervice, while Buckingham remained in poſſeſſion of his power, continued to abuſe the confidence of his majeſty, and enjoyed the arbitrary diſpoſal of rewards and puniſhments to all ranks of people. They promiſe to reply to this anſwer to the articles they had exhibited againſt him. They tremble to think of the conſequences that muſt attend his majeſty's following new councils, as he had intimated, if, by new councils, he meant to govern and raiſe money without conſent of parliament. They added, that they had reaſon to fear that this was really his meaning, or perhaps that of his miniſter; the rather, ſay they, becauſe the ſubſidies of tonnage and poundage, which determined on the death of your moſt royal father, our late ſovereign, and were never payable to any of your majeſty's anceſtors, but only by a ſpecial act of parliament, and ought not to be levied without ſuch an act; yet, ever ſince the beginning of your majeſty's happy reign over us, the ſaid ſubſidies have been levied by ſome of your majeſty's miniſters, as if they were ſtill due; although one parliament had ſince that time been held and diſſolved, by procurement of the ſaid duke, wherein no act paſſed for the ſame ſubſidies. Which example is ſo much againſt the conſtant uſe of former times, and the known right and liberty of your ſubjects, that it is an apparent effect of ſome new counſels, given againſt the ancient ſettled courſe of government of this your majeſty's kingdom, and chiefly againſt the right of your commons, as if there might be any ſubſidy, tax, or aid levied upon them, without their conſent in parliament, or contrary to the ſettled laws of the kingdom. But if any ſuch do ſo ill uſe an office, as by the miſrepreſentation of the ſtate and right of your majeſty's loyal ſubjects, adviſe any ſuch new counſels, as the levying any aid, tax, or ſubſidy, among your people, contrary to the ſettled laws of your kingdom, we cannot, moſt gracious ſovereign, but eſteem thoſe who ſhall adviſe, not only as vipers, but peſts to their king and commonwealth, and alſo capital enemies, as well to your crown and dignity, as to the commonwealth. And we ſhall, for our parts, ſhew in parliament, as occaſion may require, and be ready to declare their offences of this kind ſuch as may be rewarded with the higheſt puniſhment your laws inflict on any offenders." In the concluſion of this remonſtrance, after laying before the king the dangers and miſeries which muſt attend his continuing to place his confidence in this ſingle miniſter, they proceed in the following manner: " Give us then leave, moſt dear ſovereign, in the name of all the commons of this your kingdom, proſtrate at the feet of your ſacred majeſty, moſt humbly to beſeech you, even for the honour of Almighty God, whoſe religion is directly undermined by the practice of that party whom this duke ſupports; for your honour, which will be much advanced, in the relieving your people in this their great and general grievance; for the honour, ſafety, and welfare of your kingdom, which by this means is threatened with almoſt unavoidable dangers; and for the love which your majeſty, as a good and loving father, bears unto your good people, to whom we profeſs, in the preſence of Almighty God, the ſearcher of all hearts, you are as highly eſteemed and beloved as ever any of your predeceſſors were, that you would be graciouſly pleaſed to remove this perſon from having acceſs to your ſacred preſence, and that you would not balance this one man with all theſe things, and with the affairs of the Chriſtian world, which do all ſuffer, ſo far as they have relation to this kingdom, chiefly by his means. For we proteſt to your majeſty, and to the whole world, that until this perſon be removed from intermeddling in the great affairs of ſtate, we are out of hope of any good ſucceſs; and do fear, that whatever money we can or ſhall give, will, through his miſmanagement, be turned rather to the hurt and prejudice of this your kingdom, than otherwiſe; as, by lamentable experience, we have found in thoſe large ſupplies we have formerly and lately given. But no ſooner ſhall we receive redreſs and relief in this, which, of all others, is the moſt inſupportable grievance, but we ſhall forthwith proceed to accompliſh your majeſty's own deſire for ſupply; and likewiſe, with all chearfulneſs, apply ourſelves to the perfecting of divers other great things, ſuch as we think no one parliament in one age can parallel, tending to the ſtability, wealth, ſtrength, and honour of this your kingdom, and the ſupport of your friends and allies abroad: and we doubt not but through God's bleſſing, as you are the beſt, ſo ſhall you be the beſt beloved, and the greateſt monarch that ever ſat on the royal throne of this famous kingdom."

The commons intended to have preſented this remonſtrance to the king; but being prevented from carrying their deſign into execution, they cauſed it to be diſperſed among the people, in juſtification of their conduct. Charles was no ſtranger to its contents, but determined not to make the ſacrifice requeſted of him. He thought that the great guilt of Buckingham conſiſted in being his friend and favourite. All the other complaints againſt him he conſidered as mere pretences. A few months before he was the idol of the people; and no new crime had ſince been pretended to be diſcovered. After the moſt diligent enquiry, prompted by the greateſt malice, the ſmalleſt appearance of guilt could not be fixed upon him. What idea, he aſked, muſt all mankind entertain of his honour, ſhould he ſacrifice his innocent friend to pecuniary conſiderations? What farther authority would he entertain in this nation, were he capable, in the very beginning of his reign, to give, in ſo ſignal an inſtance, ſuch matter of triumph to his enemies, and diſcouragement to his friends? Indeed, the whole charge againſt Buckingham was ſo general, that it might have been thrown out againſt a virtuous as well as a wicked miniſter. It was equally abſurd in them to ſuppoſe, that the act of the two members for the Univerſity of Cambridge, was the act of the Univerſity itſelf; nor did the repreſentatives of that body, by agreeing or not agreeing to the charge againſt the duke, make it more or leſs binding upon the Univerſity to approve or diſapprove of the ſame charge. The raiſing of tonnage and poundage, without conſent of parliament, was indeed a ſtrong and an alarming circumſtance, and laid, as it were, the axe to the root of liberty. An Engliſh houſe of commons could not, therefore, be too loud upon this head; they acted as true patriots, when, while ſuch an arbitrary meaſure was purſuing, they made the poſt of honour the place of danger, and poured out the vials of public indignation againſt any miniſter, guilty or not guilty, who ſhould dare to ſerve a prince that avowed ſuch dangerous principles. By way of anſwer, the government alſo diſperſed a declaration, ſhewing the reaſons which induced the king to diſſolve the two laſt parliaments; but it is one of the weakeſt pieces ever publiſhed by any miniſtry. It contains nothing in reply to thoſe ſtrong facts and principles which had been urged by the commons in their remonſtrances; it conſiſted of particulars which no body pretended to deny, namely, That the king, by the advice of his parliament, had been engaged in a war with the houſe of Auſtria; that this war had been attended with great expence; that he had called the two laſt parliaments for furniſhing him with ſupplies for carrying on the war; that he had preſſed them again and again for that purpoſe; and that being always diſappointed in his expectations, he had diſſolved them. Theſe were facts never diſputed; nor did the moſt violent oppoſers of the court ever deny, that the occaſions for ſtrengthening the hands of his majeſty were great and urgent. But the true queſtions were, whether the foreign war was of ſo much importance, as to interpoſe between them and every thing that ought to be dear to a free people? Whether they ought to ſupport a prince, who threw his favourite into one ſcale, as a counterpoiſe againſt his parliament in the other? Whether this favourite, ſole and ſupreme as he was, might not, when poſſeſſed of money granted by the parliament, make uſe of it to rivet thoſe chains he was then forging, and to eſtabliſh the principles his maſter had avowed? Charles, in all his papers and declarations, gave no conſtitutional ſatisfaction as to any one of thoſe doubts, and this ſilence admitted of the worſt conſtruction.

Had Charles immediately made peace with Spain, he might perhaps have found the neceſſary reſources to have ſupported the expences of his government. But, beſides the treaties and engagements which he had entered into with Holland and Denmark, the king's thoughts were at this time entirely averſe to pacific counſels. He was determined to carry on the war, and to feed it by opening the ſluices of prerogative. He was always perſuaded that he had much leſs to fear from the papiſts than the puritans; and to take away the great objection which the latter urged for exclaiming againſt the violent part of the church of England, he iſſued a proclamation againſt preaching or diſputing either for or againſt the religious tenets of Arminius. It was long before Buckingham could gain this point; and perhaps no prince ever committed more folly than James and Charles did, in ſo long ſupporting the principles of the Anti-Arminians, contrary to their own private opinions, and to the ſenſe of almoſt every man to whom they truſted for the advancement of their meaſures. The council was now entirely engaged in forming meaſures for raiſing the ſupplies neceſſary for carrying on the war; and it was reſolved that the king might continue to levy all thoſe duties upon goods and merchandize, called by the ſeveral names of cuſtoms, ſubſidies, and impoſts, in the ſame manner as they had been levied during the late reign. The other proceedings of the government were of the ſame kind. It was well known that nothing could be more diſagreeable to the people of England, than the leaſt attempt to favour popery; yet the king granted a commiſſion to the archbiſhop of York, Sir John Saville, and others, "To treat and make compoſitions with the ſaid recuſants for all forfeitures in not going to church, under ſuch conditions and immunities as they ſhall ſee meet and convenient, according to ſuch inſtructions as his majeſty hath or ſhall give for that purpoſe; his majeſty rather deſiring their converſion than deſtruction." The king imagined, that he could not effect a more popular action, than to increaſe the ſtrength of the royal navy; and in the commiſſion for compounding with the recuſants, he had aſſigned the neceſſity of guarding the northern ports, as the reaſon for his appropriating the compoſition-money to himſelf. Advantage was alſo taken of ſome precedents, by no means applicable to the preſent times, for charging the ſeaports with certain ſums of money for fitting out ſhips. This demand fell heavy upon the city of London, which was ordered to fit out twenty ſhips. But the king ſoon perceived that this meaſure would be attended with ſome difficulty. Not only the capital, but the deputy-lieutenants and juſtices of Dorſetſhire, remonſtrated ſtrongly againſt this impoſition, which they conceived to be without precedent. This ſufficiently ſhewed that they were little converſant in Engliſh hiſtory, as many precedents occur; though they were in themſelves either tyrannical, obſolete, or warranted by immediate neceſſity. They were, however, to be found; and the council, conſidering them as ſufficient for their purpoſe, rejected all petitions, and particularly that of the city of London, to have this impoſition abated. They alſo, to increaſe the appearances of neceſſity, augmented the wages of ſailors from fourteen to twenty ſhillings a month; and publiſhed ſeveral proclamations, giving them other encouragements. At the ſame time rigorous directions were iſſued for putting all the ſea-coaſts, and the principal fortreſſes of the kingdom, in a poſture of defence, as if an actual invaſion or rebellion had already taken place. Nothing was ſeen throughout the kingdom but muſters and arrays of forces; and the military law, with all its terrors, was ſuſpended over the heads of the aſtoniſhed people. Charles had ſoon occaſion for all theſe precautions, though the event was not, perhaps, foreſeen. He had paid the king of Denmark large ſubſidies; and that prince, by his encouragement, having for ſome time acted as the patron of the Germanic liberty, had marched his army towards the Weſer, where he took Minden and Hamelin; but upon the approach of count Tilly, at the head of an army of veteran Imperialiſts, he retired towards Ferden, to wait the arrival of Mansfeldt with twelve thouſand Engliſh and Dutch forces. While he remained in that ſituation, he had ſeveral ſkirmiſhes with the Imperialiſts, who were ordered to keep him fully employed, till the Emperor could place the crown of Hungary on the head of his eldeſt ſon. This coronation exaſperated the famous Bethlem Gabor, a prince of Tranſylvania, who aſpired to the throne of Hungary, and propoſed to enter into the league formed againſt the houſe of Auſtria. His offer was accepted; and it was agreed that he ſhould invade Hungary, and be joined by the troops under count Mansfeldt, as ſoon as he arrived in Sileſia. But, before this could be effected, the Emperor had aſſembled one army on the Weſer, another under the famous Wallenſtein on the frontiers of Sileſia, and a third under count Tilly in Lower Saxony. This obliged the king of Denmark to divide his army; which, by the junction of Mansfeldt and the German princes, was now increaſed to ſixty thouſand men, into three bodies. The firſt, commanded by duke Chriſtian of Brunſwick, was to act upon the Weſer: the ſecond, by Mansfeldt, was to oppoſe Wallenſtein, and, if poſſible, force a paſſage into Sileſia; and the third, commanded by the king of Denmark in perſon, was to act in the intermediate ſpace between the other two. The active count Mansfeldt, in his rout to Sileſia, made himſelf maſter of the whole province of Magdebourg, before Wallenſtein could come up to oppoſe him; but being ſtopped by general Altringer at Deſſau upon the Elbe, Wallenſtein had time to march to the relief of the place; and falling upon his army, obliged Mansfeldt to retire, with the loſs of the greater part of his infantry, baggage, and artillery, into the marquiſate of Brandenburgh. Mansfeldt did not, however, abandon his principal deſign, that of penetrating into Sileſia, and gaining ſome marches upon Wallenſtein. He was ſo induſtrious, that he ſoon recruited his army, which now conſiſted of twenty-five thouſand men, and advanced at their head to join Bethlem Gabor. But that prince, upon the firſt news of Mansfeldt's defeat, made peace with the Emperor. This behaviour ſo greatly diſguſted Mansfeldt, that he reſigned the command of his troops to duke Erneſt of Saxe Weimar, and retired to Buda, when he ſet out for Venice, but died on his journey in an obſcure village of Dalmatia. About the ſame time, the brave duke Chriſtian of Brunſwick, who commanded another diviſion of the confederate army, paid the debt of nature; and ſoon after the duke of Saxe Weimar, Mansfeldt's ſucceſſor. The loſs of thoſe three great generals was irreparable to the confederates, whoſe hopes now entirely centered in the king of Denmark. Tilly, who had all this time watched the motions of that prince, had now retaken Minden, and ſome other places; but was very near being ſurprized in his camp by the king of Denmark, at a time when he thought that prince was at thirty leagues diſtance. But Tilly, after making a maſterly retreat, was reinforced by ſo great a body of veterans, that the king of Denmark, who had no great opinion of his own new-raiſed troops, would in his turn have gladly declined a battle; but this was impoſſible. The conteſt was very bloody, but ended in favour of the Imperial general; and the king was obliged to retire, with the loſs of his baggage and artillery, towards Holſtein. Three thouſand men of the confederate army were ſlain on the field of battle, and three thouſand taken priſoners.

This defeat of the king of Denmark redoubled the endeavours of Charles to obtain ſupplies. He had ſent a ſquadron of ſhips to lie at the mouth of the Elbe, to prevent the Spaniards from furniſhing themſelves with naval ſtores from that country. But this not only exaſperated the Hamburghers, whoſe commerce was thereby greatly leſſened, but the attempt itſelf was ineffectual, becauſe the enemy was ſupplied from Lubec, and the paſſage of the Sound was left open. The ſquadron was therefore recalled, at the interceſſion of the Hamburgh merchants. The public did not fail to make their own reflections upon theſe inconſiſtent diſpoſitions of the court; for either the deſtination of the ſquadron had been improper, or the recalling of it impolitic. The truth is, the object of Buckingham's reſentment was changed. Beſides his paſſion for the young queen of France, and his reſentment at the refuſal of Lewis to receive him as ambaſſador, he had the greateſt reaſons to watch the conduct of cardinal Richelieu. The proteſtants of France had accepted the peace, under the guarantee of the king of England. By concluding this treaty, Charles committed a great political error. He gave peace to France, hoping that France would then join him againſt the Spaniards; but he was deceived. Inſtead of fulfilling their promiſes, they made uſe of this tranquillity as an argument for extorting advantageous terms from Spain. Richelieu, the better to conceal his real intentions from the allies during this negotiation, had procured the prince of Piedmont to be appointed lieutenant-general of the French armies in foreign parts: preparations were made in every province of France; and it was expected that the ſtorm, which had been ſo long gathering, would ſoon burſt upon the houſe of Auſtria. But no ſuch thing was intended; for, in a few days, it was publicly known, that a peace had been concluded between France and Spain. This perfidious conduct raiſed

Richelieu many enemies, particularly the duke of Savoy, and the duke of Orleans, brother to the king. The former was now left expoſed to the vengeance of the Spaniards; and the latter, for reaſons foreign to this hiſtory, was more exaſperated againſt the miniſter than ever. But Richelieu's fortune roſe ſuperior to all difficulties. Fearful of a correſpondence between England and the duke de Vendome, governor of Brittany, which lay ſo convenient for a deſcent from England, he prevailed upon Lewis to undertake a journey into that province, where he cauſed the duke of Vendome to be arreſted. But the moſt active agent againſt Richelieu was the abbot of Scaglia, ambaſſador in England from the duke of Savoy, a reſtleſs, intriguing miniſter, who hated Richelieu, and was now become very intimate with Buckingham. This produced a ſecret correſpondence between England, the court of Savoy, and the duke of Rohan, head of the French Hugonots, who were now convinced that all the great preparations in France were intended againſt Rochelle, the principal place in their poſſeſſion. It was eaſy for the abbot of Scaglia, by the aſſiſtance of Buckingham, and the duke of Soubiſe, who managed the affairs of the French Hugonots in England, to inſpire Charles with a contemptible opinion of the duplicity of the French court; and to perſuade him, that having now loſt all hopes of prevailing upon Lewis to join in the alliance againſt the houſe of Auſtria, he ought to revive the antient policy of England, in preventing the total ruin of the Hugonots. The abbot gave him the ſtrongeſt aſſurances of his maſter's friendſhip and aſſiſtance; and it was accordingly determined to ſupport the proteſtants of France. But how to effect this was the point. Supplies were wanting to pay both the fleet and the army; and the neceſſities of Charles increaſed, as his extenſive engagements were augmented. It was therefore determined to have recourſe to a general loan, in which every man was to be aſſeſſed according to the rolls of the laſt ſubſidy. But this expedient anſwered not the intentions of the miniſter: the people refuſed to ſubſcribe to the loan, and the whole country became a ſcene of confuſion. Among other articles of ſecret inſtruction, the commiſſioners appointed to levy theſe loans were enjoined, "If any man ſhall refuſe to lend, and ſhall make delays or excuſes, and perſiſt in his obſtinacy, that they examine him upon oath, whether he has been dealt with to deny or refuſe to lend, or make any excuſe for not lending? Who has dealt with him, and what ſpeeches or perſuaſions were uſed for that purpoſe? And that they alſo charge every ſuch perſon in his majeſty's name, upon his allegiance, not to diſcloſe to any one what his anſwer was." It is aſtoniſhing that the king could be prevailed upon to ſuffer ſo impracticable an attempt to be made by his officers. A very little reflection would have been abundantly ſufficient to have convinced him, that the ſecrecy he enjoined was impoſſible; and that ſo violent an inquiſitorial power could not fail of exciting the indignation of his ſubjects. The principal leaders in the late parliament, and others who had adopted their ſentiments, refuſed to ſubmit to an impoſition not agreed to by the legiſlature. Moſt of them were thrown into priſon; the gaols were filled with illuſtrious offenders. All who petitioned the clemency of the king were releaſed; but five gentlemen, Sir Thomas Darnel, Sir John Corbet, Sir Walter Earl, Sir John Heveningham, and Sir Edmund Hampden, not only refuſed to ſolicit the clemency of his majeſty, but boldly demanded their releaſement, not as a favour from the court, but as a right derived from the laws of their country. The queſtion was at laſt ſolemnly argued in the court of King's-bench, when it appeared, beyond contradiction, that the perſonal liberty of the ſubject had been ſecured againſt the arbitrary power of the crown by ſix ſeveral acts of parliament, beſides an article of the Great Charter itſelf, the moſt ſacred foundation of the laws and conſtitution of England. The judges, however, thought proper to remand the gentlemen to their priſons; though they refuſed to enter a general judgment, that no bail could be granted upon a commitment of the king or council. But liberty loſes not her nature by confinement; her voice was heard from all quarters of the kingdom.

Impriſonment was not the only engine employed by government to force the people to ſubmit to the arbitrary orders of the court: recourſe was alſo had to religious prejudices; the duty of unlimited obedience was preached from the pulpit. Manwaring, one of his majeſty's chaplains, diſtinguiſhed himſelf on this occaſion. Among other curious paſſages in his elaborate diſcourſes, the following are remarkable: "That the king is not bound to obſerve the laws of the realm, concerning the ſubjects rights and liberties; but that his royal will and command in impoſing loans and taxes, without the common conſent of parliament, is ſufficient to oblige the conſcience of the ſubject, under pain of eternal damnation. That thoſe who refuſed to pay this loan, offended againſt the law of God, and the king's ſupreme authority, and became guilty of impiety, diſloyalty, and rebellion. That the authority of parliament is not neceſſary for the raiſing of aids and ſubſidies; and that the ſlow proceedings of ſuch numerous aſſemblies are not fitted for the ſupply of the ſtate's urgent neceſſities, but would rather occaſion many impediments to the juſt deſigns of princes." Sibthorpe was another divine that exerted all his abilities in recommending the ſame ſlaviſh tenets. Abbot, archbiſhop of Canterbury, refuſed to licenſe theſe ſermons. This was conſidered as ſo heinous an offence, that the prelate was ſuſpended from the exerciſe of his office, and confined to one of his country-ſeats. This ſequeſtration and confinement of the firſt peer and prelate of England, were alarming monuments of Buckingham's power over the mind of his maſter. The archbiſhop had always acted with the greateſt moderation, and was conſidered by the public as a ſincere friend to the liberties of his country; but he could never be brought to offer incenſe to the favourite miniſter, and this marked him out as an object of diſgrace. Even indifference in the ſervice of deſpotic purpoſes, was now conſidered as criminal by the government. Sir Randal Carew was removed from his poſt of lord chief juſtice of the King's-bench, for his coldneſs in promoting the loan; and Williams, the late lord-keeper, whoſe great abilities had rendered him a favourite of the people, was not ſuffered to enjoy the retirement he had choſen. He was conſidered as an encourager of the puritans; for every perſon who favoured the cauſe of liberty, whatever his religious tenets might be, was branded with that epithet, and was conſidered by the miniſter as an enemy to the government.

A. D. 1627.

While the people were thus harraſſed with perſecutions with regard to the loan, vigorous preparations were making for covering the ſeas with armaments. The duke of Soubiſe, who was then in England, received a commiſſion from Charles for employing the ſhips fitted out by the Hugonots in his ſervice; and for cruiſing on the Spaniards. This occaſioned great confuſion in the buſineſs of the Engliſh admiralty, where it was difficult to diſtinguiſh between the prizes made by the Engliſh, and thoſe taken by the French proteſtants. The French were in a very bad condition to ſupport a war againſt England; but all the catholics in the kingdom were united, and deſirous of exerting all their power againſt the enemies of their religion. On the other hand, the unpopularity of Buckingham, the high exertion of the prerogative, and the impriſonment of ſome of the worthieſt men in England, rendered the ſincereſt intentions of Charles diſtruſted: nothing could be expected from the efforts of a nation divided within itſelf. A fleet of one hundred ſail, having on board an army of ſeven thouſand men, were fitted out for the invaſion of France; and both intruſted to the command of the duke of Buckingham, though he was wholly unacquainted both with the land and ſea ſervice. When the fleet appeared before Rochelle, the inhabitants of that city were divided into two factions, one for the court of France, and the other for the Engliſh. The former endeavoured to perſuade the people, that if the Engliſh were admitted into the town, they would, by their great ſuperiority at ſea, ſeize the government, and keep poſſeſſion of the place, in defiance of the whole power of France. The latter, which was headed by the mother and ſiſter of the dukes of Rohan and Soubiſe, oppoſed theſe aſſertions; declaring that the Engliſh were their friends, and were come to ſupport their religious privileges. The French party, however, prevailed, and it was determined not to admit the Engliſh. Buckingham, who was ſurprized that the gates were not opened, ſent Soubiſe and Sir William Beecher aſhore, but it was not without difficulty they were permitted to enter the gates. The council was immediately aſſembled, and Soubiſe did every thing in his power to perſuade them of the friendly intentions of the Engliſh monarch, and that he had fitted this large and expenſive armament purely for their ſervice. The council, however, thought proper to decline their proffered aſſiſtance, under pretence that they could not determine on an affair of ſuch importance without conſulting the whole body of the Hugonots. Exaſperated at this refuſal, Buckingham determined to make a deſcent on the iſland of Rhè. It had before been agreed between Soubiſe and Buckingham, that the Engliſh ſhould land on Oleron, a fertile, and then defenceleſs iſland, where refreſhments of every kind might eaſily be procured, and the troops in no danger of any attack from the enemy. But the Engliſh general thought proper to alter this plan of operations, and ſtood immediately for the iſland of Rhè, then well garriſoned and fortified. Had the military abilities of Buckingham been equal to his perſonal courage, he might have acquired immortal honour both to himſelf and his country. Thoyras, the French general, who commanded in the iſland, no ſooner perceived the Engliſh were preparing to land, than he drew out his forces to oppoſe them; but imagining the firſt debarkation was only a feint to draw his attention to that quarter, while the main body of the Engliſh army was landed at another, he thought it imprudent to attack them, till they were followed by greater numbers. Thoyras now perceived his miſtake, and marched immediately to give them battle; but the Engliſh volunteers jumping aſhore, and performing wonders in their own perſons, ſo animated the ſoldiers, that they preſſed forward with the utmoſt intrepidity, and put the enemy to flight, though far ſuperior in numbers. Soubiſe, who was an excellent ſoldier, adviſed Buckingham to purſue his victory, and immediately attack the caſtle of St. Martin's. Had this prudent advice been followed, there is the greateſt reaſon to think that the attempt would have ſucceeded; but Buckingham pretended that it would be imprudent to march his troops againſt that fortreſs, till intelligence could be procured of the ſtrength of the enemy. By this dilatory method of proceeding five days were loſt to the Engliſh, and that loſs was irretrievable. He alſo neglected to take fort Prie, which was then but meanly garriſoned, and being ſituated on the ſhore, would have afforded an excellent retreat, in caſe of accident, to the Engliſh.

On the twenty-ſeventh of July, he opened his trenches before St. Martin's, and was ſo confident of ſucceſs, that he aſſured the king by expreſs he would be maſter of the caſtle in eight days time. This occaſioned a ridiculous proclamation to be publiſhed in England, for encouraging people to tranſport themſelves and their families to the iſland of Rhè. But Buckingham was not born to ſhine in a camp. Though determined to ſtarve the garriſon into a ſurrender, he took ſo little care to guard the ſeas, that the French found means to throw ammunition and proviſions into the place. It was now perceived that the taking the caſtle would not be ſo eaſy a taſk as imagined; he endeavoured therefore to make himſelf maſter of fort Prie; but the garriſon had been reinforced, and the attempt miſcarried. The French had now in the iſland an army, under the command of marſhal Schomberg, ſuperior in numbers to that of the Engliſh; and Buckingham determined to make an attack upon the place, in order to put an end to the ſiege by one deſperate attempt. He had been informed by ſome French deſerters, that there were no more than eight hundred ſoldiers in the caſtle, and that the curtain towards the ſea was but poorly fortified. It was thereſore reſolved to ſtorm the curtain, without attempting to make any breach in the wall. The army was accordingly divided into two bodies, one of which was to attack the caſtle on the land ſide, and the other on the ſea. The latter was the principal attack; and it was propoſed to mount the curtain with their ſcaling ladders. But the meaſures were ſo improperly taken, that there were no hopes of ſucceſs. The French immediately perceived their intention, and ſuffered them to advance to the foot of the curtain, where the Engliſh ſoon perceived their ladders were too ſhort for ſcaling the wall. They behaved, however, in both attacks with amazing intrepidity, but were at laſt obliged to retreat, with the loſs of five hundred men killed, and fifty taken priſoners. The French were, however, convinced, by this ſpecimen of Britiſh valour, that it would be dangerous to attack them in the open field. Schomberg did not chuſe to preſs cloſely ſo brave an enemy. After this miſcarriage it was ſufficiently evident that any farther attack upon the caſtle would be the height of imprudence; and Buckingham accordingly began his march in excellent order towards his ſhips, intending to paſs through a hollow way, the only paſſage by which he could retreat. The French army under marſhal Schomberg followed him at a diſtance. Buckingham perceived it, and offered the marſhal battle, which he declined, and the Engliſh continued their march towards the hollow way, their rear, by ſome ſtrange neglect, conſiſting only of the inſignificant guard of eighty horſe. When the Engliſh had advanced a conſiderable diſtance in the hollow way, they were attacked by the French cavalry, who forced the Engliſh rear-guard to break the ranks of their own men; and there being no room for the foremoſt battalions to form, a general rout enſued. But they had no ſooner paſſed the hollow way, than they faced about, and once more offered the marſhal battle, notwithſtanding the great loſs they had ſuſtained. Schomberg was too prudent to venture a general engagement; he retired with his army, and Buckingham embarked his forces, after loſing near two-thirds of his army. Thus ended an expedition which totally diſcredited Buckingham, both as an admiral and a ſoldier; he acquired no praiſe but that vulgar one of courage and perſonal bravery. If he was unpopular before, he was now deteſted by the people; the enemy triumphed in the narrow ſeas, and inſulted the Engliſh in their own harbours. The inhabitants of Rochelle, who had declared for the Engliſh, were now in the moſt dreadful ſituation. They were threatened with an immediate ſiege from their enraged maſter, and had expended great part of their proviſions in ſubſiſting Buckingham's forces on the iſland of Rhè. The deputies from that city were loud in their complaints; but ſo greatly was Charles infatuated with Buckingham, that all their inſtances, joined with the general voice of his people, could not prevail upon him to cenſure his conduct. Something, however, muſt be done to ſilence the clamours of the people. They believed their liberties had been raviſhed from them, and illegal taxes extorted. They ſaw their commerce daily declining, and the military honours, tranſmitted to them by their anceſtors, ſhamefully ſtained, by two ill-concerted and unſucceſsful expeditions. They dreaded the calamities of a war carried on againſt two of the moſt powerful kingdoms in Europe, and feared for their domeſtic ſafety, from the general clamour excited in every part of the nation. Theſe evils were ſolely aſcribed to the obſtinacy of the king, in adhering to the counſels of Buckingham, whoſe abilities were far from deſerving ſuch implicit confidence. The only expedient that offered to relieve the government from this embarraſſing ſituation, was that of calling a parliament. It was expected that the miſcarriage of the attempt upon Rhè would be ſeverely cenſured, and the duke's conduct made the ſubject of the cloſeſt ſcrutiny. Sir Robert Cotton therefore adviſed his majeſty, that Buckingham ſhould make a motion in the council for aſſembling the parliament; hoping that, by his appearing to favour a meaſure ſo highly agreeable to the people, his former faults would be forgotten.

A.D. 1628. On the ſeventeenth of March, the parliament was opened by a ſpeech from the throne, in which the king very pathetically enumerated the neceſſities of the government, and required the aſſiſtance of his parliament; but concluded with fairly telling the commons, "that if they did not do their duty, in contributing to the neceſſities of the ſtate, he muſt, in diſcharge of his conſcience, uſe thoſe other means which God had put into his hands, in order to ſave that which the follies of a few particular men may otherwiſe endanger. Take not this as a threatening, added he, for I ſcorn to threaten any but my equals; but as an admonition from him, who, by nature and duty, has moſt care of your preſervation and proſperity." Having finiſhed his ſpeech, the lord-keeper, by the king's command, laid before the houſe the ſtate of affairs of Europe, and the motives which induced the king to attempt the reduction of the dangerous power of the houſe of Auſtria, and to interpoſe between the French king and his proteſtant ſubjects. He obſerved, that the powers which uſed to balance the alarming greatneſs of the houſe of Auſtria, were now otherwiſe employed; the Turk in an Aſiatic war, and the Swede in a war with Poland, fermented by Spain; that the king of Denmark was already ſtripped of great part of his dominions, and the houſe of Auſtria on the point of being maſters of all the ſea-coaſts between Dantzick and Embden: that they were arming all the ſhips they can procure in the Baltic ſeas, and endeavouring to engage the Hanſe Towns in their quarrel, in order to deprive the Engliſh of the Eaſtland trade, and make themſelves maſters of the ſea, without ſtriking a blow: that the fleets of France and Spain were preparing in conjunction to ruin our fiſhery, and to render it dangerous for our merchant ſhips to paſs from one part of the kingdom to another; that a large armament was fitting out at Liſbon, in order, as there is the greateſt reaſon to fear, to make a deſcent either in England or Ireland. He then ſtrongly recommended unity, as the only means of diſappointing the intentions of the enemy, and preſſed them in the moſt earneſt manner to aſſiſt the government, as the moſt conſtitutional method of impoſing the neceſſary taxes. "This way of parliamentary ſupplies, added he, as his majeſty told you, he hath choſen, not as the only way, but as the fitteſt; not becauſe he is deſtitute of others, but becauſe it is moſt agreeable to the goodneſs of his moſt gracious diſpoſition, and to the deſire and weal of his people. If this be deferred, neceſſity and the ſword of the enemy make way to others. Remember his majeſty's admonition, I ſay remember it." Notwithſtanding the members of this parliament were men of the ſame independent ſpirit with their predeceſſors, and poſſeſſed of ſuch large eſtates, that it was computed their riches ſurpaſſed three times that of the houſe of peers; though they were all inflamed with the love of liberty, and many of them had ſuffered by the violent meaſures of the government; yet they entered upon buſineſs with great temper and decorum. They feared that the king, diſguſted with popular aſſemblies, wanted only a fair pretence, offered by any incident or undutiful behaviour of the members, to govern alone with a deſpotic power; and ſhould that ever happen, no remedy could be hoped for, but from inſurrection and civil war, of which the event would be extremely uncertain, and muſt, at all events, prove infinitely diſtreſſing to the whole nation. Decency of conduct was therefore abſolutely neceſſary to carry on the great work of reformation in the government, and to paſs ſome laws which might ſecure the privileges of parliament, and the liberties of the people. At the ſame time they did not propoſe to ſuffer calmly the grievances under which the nation had lately groaned. They knew that the conſtitution of their country was at ſtake, and that every effort muſt be exerted in its defence. The cry of liberty was therefore ecchoed in the houſe of commons, as it had anciently been in the Roman ſenate. "We are called here by his majeſty, ſaid Sir Francis Seymour, to give him faithful counſel, ſuch as may conduce to his honour and dignity, and we ought to do it without flattery. We are ſent here by the people to deliver them from their grievances, and we ought to do it without fear. Not to be diſpoſed to part with life and fortune, when the intereſt of our king and country require the ſacrifice, were not to be good ſubjects; but, on the other hand, to ſuffer our property to be taken from us, inconſiſtently with liberty, our inclination, and the laws of our country, this were to be ſlaves. While we oppoſe ſuch encroachments, we tread only in the ſteps of our great anceſtors, who always preferred the public to their private intereſt, nay, even to their very lives. It will be the higheſt injury to ourſelves, to our poſterity, to our conſciences, if we forego this claim and pretenſion." "I can live, ſaid Sir Robert Philips, though another, who has no right, be joined with me; nay, I can live, though burthened with impoſitions, beyond what at preſent I labour under; but to have my liberty, which is the ſoul of my life, raviſhed from me; to have my perſon pent up in a gaol, without relief from law, and to be ſo adjudged,—O! improvident anceſtors! O! unwiſe forefathers! to be ſo careful in providing for the quiet poſſeſſion of our lands, and the liberties of parliament; and, at the ſame time, to neglect our perſonal liberty, and ſuffer us to lie in priſon during pleaſure, without redreſs or remedy! If this be law, why do we talk of liberties? Why trouble ourſelves with diſputes about a conſtitution, franchiſes, property of goods, and the like? What may any man call his own, if not the liberty of his perſon?" "The ſame evil, added Sir Thomas Wentworth, affects the king and the people, and the ſame remedy muſt heal it. We are to defend—what?—any new object?—no—our ancient, our legitimate, our vital liberties; we muſt confirm the laws eſtabliſhed by our anceſtors; we muſt put ſuch a ſeal to them as no licentious ſpirit ſhall dare to break." The whole houſe agreed in theſe noble and generous ſentiments; even the court party themſelves did not pretend to offer any thing but the plea of neceſſity in defence of the late meaſures purſued by the miniſtry, and to which the king had been reduced by the obſtinacy of the two laſt parliaments. No oppoſition was therefore made to a vote againſt arbitrary impriſonments and forced loans. This being paſſed, the houſe unanimouſly voted the king five ſubſidies. This ſupply, though not equal to his wants, ſatisfied his majeſty, and even the tears of affection ſtarted from his eyes, when he was informed of this conceſſion in the commons. Yet, though the ſupply was voted, the bill neceſſary to give it the force of a law was not yet paſſed, and the commons, in order to have time ſufficient to conſider the grievances of the nation, appointed a committee to prepare the model of ſo important a ſtatute, before any draught of it was laid before the houſe. Some of the commons were, indeed, for paſſing the ſubſidy bill with as much expedition as the nature of the ſubject would admit, before the grievances of the kingdom were taken into conſideration; but this was oppoſed by others with all the enthuſiaſtic warmth of true patriotic zeal. Mr. Creſwell, a young gentleman of the law, delivered his ſentiments in a very maſterly manner. "Give me leave, ſaid he, to reſemble juſtice to Nebuchadnezzar's tree; for ſhe is ſo great that ſhe ſhades at once the palace of the prince, the houſe of the noble, and the cottage of the beggar. If therefore either the blaſts of indignation, or neceſſity, the irreſiſtible violator of laws, hath ſo bruiſed any part of the branches of this tree, that either our perſons, goods, or poſſeſſions have not the ſame ſhelter as before, let us not for that reaſon neglect the root of this lovely plant; but rather uſe every poſſible endeavour to apply to it freſh and fertile mould, and to water it even with our tears, that theſe bruiſed branches may be recovered, and the whole tree once more proſper and flouriſh.

"I well know that kings, though they are only men before the Almighty, are gods among the people; and therefore to my gracious and dread ſovereign, whoſe virtues are ingenerate both in his judgment and nature, let my arm be cut off, nay, let not my ſoul ſurvive the day that I ſhall dare to lift up my hand to touch thoſe forbidden productions, thoſe flowers of his princely crown and diadem. But yet, in our Eden, in this garden of the commonwealth, as there are flowers of the ſun which are too glorious to be touched by any but the hands of royal majeſty; ſo are there alſo ſome daiſies and wholeſome herbs, which every common hand that lives and labours in this garden may pick and gather up, may take comfort and repoſe in them. Among all theſe, this eye of day, this lovely liberty, is, perhaps, the principal. This ſhould be cultivated with the utmoſt care; nor ſhould any conſideration, not even the frowns of power, prevail upon us to abandon its culture."

The ſpeeches of theſe patriots prevailed; and a committee was appointed to draw up the form of ſome ſtatute, which having obtained the force of a law, might form a ſufficient barrier to their rights and liberties, ſo lately violated. Forced loans, benevolences, taxes without conſent of parliament, arbitrary impriſonments, billetting ſoldiers in private houſes, and the impoſition of martial law, were the grievances complained of, and againſt theſe an eternal remedy was to be provided. At laſt the famous petition of right was drawn up, and preſented to the lords for their concurrence; that having thus obtained the ſanction of both houſes, it might have the force of an act of parliament, as ſoon as it received the royal aſſent. Charles uſed every art to divert this fatal blow to an unlimited prerogative. He repeated his meſſages to the commons; he endeavoured to gain over ſome by promiſes of favour, and to terrify others by threats. All the eloquence of the crown lawyers was exhauſted to deſtroy the principles upon which the petition was founded; and, as the laſt reſource, the king wrote a letter to the lords, informing them, that he could not give up the point of committing offenders to priſon in matters of ſtate, without expreſſing the cauſes, as that method muſt be often attended with the moſt dangerous conſequences, ſuch delinquents being generally beyond the reach of the ordinary courts of judicature. He promiſed, however, to be very tender of his people's privileges, and to commit none for the future for refuſing to lend money, and that the cauſes of all commitments ſhould be expreſſed, as ſoon as it could be done with ſafety. This letter, together with the influence of the court party in the houſe of peers, had great effect on their proceedings; and ſix weeks were ſpent in hearing the pleadings of the king's council againſt, and the arguments of the commons for, the petition of right. During the whole time of the dependence of this petition, the court party did every thing in their power to diſconcert the commons in their proceedings; and, in a conference between the two houſes, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was ſincerely deſirous of effecting an union between the king and the commons, propoſed, for the ſake of peace, to throw the ſubſtance of the petition into the form of propoſitions, to be preſented by both houſes to the king, for his conſent. Theſe propoſitions were the following:

"1. That his majeſty would be pleaſed graciouſly to declare, that the good old law called Magna Charta, and the ſix ſtatutes conceived to be declarations, or explanations of that law, continue ſtill in force to all intents and purpoſes.

"2. That his majeſty would be pleaſed graciouſly to declare, that according to Magna Charta, and the ſtatutes aforeſaid, as alſo according to the moſt ancient cuſtoms and laws of this land, every free ſubject of this realm hath a fundamental property in his goods, and a fundamental property in his perſon.

"3. That his majeſty would be pleaſed graciouſly to declare, that it is his royal pleaſure to ratify and confirm unto all, and every his faithful and loyal ſubjects, all their ancient, ſeveral juſt liberties, privileges and rights, in as ample and beneficial a manner, to all intents and purpoſes, as their anceſtors did enjoy the ſame, under the government of the beſt of his moſt noble progenitors.

"4. That his majeſty would be pleaſed moſt graciouſly to declare, for the good contentment of his loyal ſubjects, and for the ſecuring them from future fears, that in all cauſes within the cognizance of the common law, and concerning the liberties of his ſubjects, his majeſty would proceed according to the laws eſtabliſhed in the kingdom, and in no other manner.

"5. And as touching his majeſty's royal prerogative, intrinſical to his ſovereignty, and intruſted him from God ad communem totius populi ſalutem, et non ad deſtructionem, his majeſty would reſolve not to uſe or divert the ſame to the prejudice of any of his loyal people, in the property of their goods, or liberty of their perſons. And in caſe, for the ſecurity of his majeſty's perſon, the common ſafety of his people, or the peaceable government of his kingdom, his majeſty ſhall find juſt cauſe to impriſon or reſtrain any man's perſon, his majeſty would graciouſly declare, that, within a convenient time, he ſhall and will expreſs the cauſe of his commitment or reſtraint, either general or ſpecial; and, upon a cauſe ſo expreſſed, will leave him immediately to be tried, according to the common juſtice of the kingdom."

The commons made uſe of every reaſon in their power to convince the peers that theſe propoſitions were not ſufficient to ſucure the liberty of the ſubject; a poſitive law only, in which the rights of the people were fully defined and ſtrongly aſſerted, could anſwer the intended purpoſe. Their reaſons at laſt prevailed. The lords conſented to the petition of right, but propoſed to ſubjoin to it the following clauſe: "We humbly preſent this petition to your majeſty, not only with a care of preſerving our own liberties, but with due regard to leave entire that ſovereign power, with which your majeſty is entruſted for the protection, ſafety, and happineſs of your people." It required not the penetration of the leaders of the commons to perceive, that this clauſe, if ſuffered to be added to the petition of right, would be ſufficient to elude its whole force; and it was therefore unanimouſly rejected. "If, ſaid Sir Thomas Wentworth, we admit this addition, we ſhall leave the ſubject in a worſe ſtate than we found him, and receive little thanks for our labour when we return home. Let us leave all power to his majeſty to puniſh malefactors; but theſe laws are not acquainted with ſovereign power: we deſire no new thing, nor do we offer to trench upon his majeſty's prerogative; we may not recede from this petition, either in part or in whole." Another conference was therefore held with the lords, where theſe reaſons were thought ſatisfactory: the petition of right paſſed both houſes of parliament, and is as follows:

"To the king's moſt excellent majeſty,

I. "Humbly ſhew to our ſovereign lord the king, the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and commons, in parliament aſſembled, That whereas it is declared and enacted, by a ſtatute made in the reign of king Edward I. commonly called Statutem de tallagio non concedendo, that no tallage or aid ſhall be levied by the king, or his heirs, in this realm, without the good-will and aſſent of the archbiſhops, biſhops, earls, barons, knights, burgeſſes, and other the freemen of the commonalty of this realm: and by authority of parliament holden in the five and twentieth year of the reign of king Edward III. it is declared and enacted, That, from thenceforth, no perſon ſhall be compelled to make any loans to the king againſt his will, beauſe ſuch loans were againſt reaſon, and the franchiſe of the land: and, by other laws of this realm, it is provided, that none ſhould be charged by any charge or impoſition called a benevolence, or by ſuch like charge: by which the ſtatutes before mentioned, and other the good laws and ſtatutes of this realm, your ſubjects have inherited this freedom, that they ſhould not be compelled to any tax, tallage, aid, or other like charge, not ſet by common conſent in parliament.

II. "Yet, nevertheleſs, of late, divers commiſſions directed to ſundry commiſſioners in ſeveral counties, with inſtructions, have iſſued; by means whereof your people have been in divers places aſſembled, and required to lend certain ſums of money unto your majeſty; and many of them, upon their refuſal ſo to do, have had an oath adminiſtered to them not warrantable by the laws and ſtatutes of this realm; and have been conſtrained to become bound to make appearance before your privy council, and in other places; and others of them have been therefore impriſoned, confined, and ſundry other ways moleſted and diſquieted: and divers other charges have been laid and levied upon your people, in ſeveral counties, by lord-lieutenants, deputy-lieutenants, commiſſioners for muſters, juſtices of peace, and others, by command or direction from your majeſty, or your privy-council, againſt the laws and free cuſtoms of this realm.

III. "And whereas alſo, by the ſtatute called The Great Charter of the Liberties of England, it is declared and enacted, That no freeman may be taken or impriſoned, or be diſſeized of his freehold or liberties, or his free cuſtoms, to be outlawed or exiled, or in any manner deſtroyed, but by the lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land.

IV. "And in the eight and twentieth year of the reign of king Edward III. it was declared and enacted, by authority of parliament, That no man, of what ſtate or condition that he be, ſhould be put out of his lands or tenements, nor taken, nor impriſoned, nor diſherited, nor put to death, without being brought to anſwer by due proceſs of law.

V. "Nevertheleſs, againſt the tenor of the ſaid ſtatutes, and other the good laws and ſtatutes of your realm, to that end provided, divers of your ſubjects have of late been impriſoned, without any cauſe ſhewed; and when, for their deliverance, they were brought before juſtice, by your majeſty's writs of habeas corpus, there to undergo and receive as the court ſhould order, and their keepers commanded to certify the cauſes of their detainer, no cauſe was certified, but that they were detained by your majeſty's ſpecial command, ſignified by the lords of your privy-council; and yet were returned back to ſeveral priſons, without being charged with any thing to which they might make anſwer according to law.

VI. "And whereas, of late, great companies of ſoldiers and mariners have been diſperſed in divers counties of the realm, and the inhabitants, againſt their wills, have been compelled to receive them into their houſes, and there to ſuffer them to ſojourn, againſt the laws and cuſtoms of this realm, and to the great grievance and vexation of the people.

VII. "And whereas alſo, by authority of parliament, in the five and twentieth year of the reign of king Edward III. it is deſired and enacted, That no man ſhould be forejudged of life or limb againſt the form of the great charter and law of the land: and by the ſaid great charter, and other the laws and ſtatutes of this your realm, no man ought to be judged to death but by the laws eſtabliſhed in this your realm, either by the cuſtoms of the ſame realm, or by acts of parliament: and whereas no offender, of what kind ſoever, is exempted from the proceedings to be uſed, and puniſhments to be inflicted by the laws and ſtatutes of this your realm: nevertheleſs, of late, divers commiſſions, under your majeſty's great ſeal, have iſſued forth, by which certain perſons have been aſſigned and appointed commiſſioners, with power and authority, to proceed within the land, according to the juſtice of martial law, againſt ſuch ſoldiers and mariners, or other diſſolute perſons joining with them, as ſhould commit any murther, robbery, felony, mutiny, or other outrage or miſdemeanor whatſoever, and by ſuch ſummary courſe and order as is agreeable to martial law, and as is uſed in armies in time of war, to proceed to the trial and condemnation of ſuch offenders, and them to cauſe to be executed and put to death according to the law martial.

VIII. "By pretext whereof ſome of your majeſty's ſubjects have been, by ſome of the ſaid commiſſioners, put to death, when and where, if, by the laws and ſtatutes of the realm, they had deſerved death, by the ſame laws and ſtatutes alſo they might, and by no other ought, to have been judged and executed.

IX. " And alſo ſundry grievous offenders, by colour thereof claiming an exemption, have eſcaped the puniſhments due to them by the laws and ſtatutes of this your realm, by reaſon that divers of your officers and miniſters of juſtice have unjuſtly refuſed or forborn to proceed againſt ſuch offenders, according to the ſame laws and ſtatutes, upon pretence that the ſaid offenders were puniſhable only by martial law, and by authority of ſuch commiſſioners as aforeſaid; which commiſſions, and all other of like nature, were wholly and directly contrary to the ſaid laws and ſtatutes of your realm.

X. " They do therefore humbly pray your moſt excellent majeſty, that no man hereafter be compelled to make or yield any gift, loan, benevolence, tax, or ſuch like charge, without common conſent, by act of parliament; and that none be called to make anſwer, or take ſuch oath, or to give attendance, or be confined, or otherwiſe moleſted or diſquieted concerning the ſame, or for refuſal thereof: and that no freeman, in any ſuch manner as is before mentioned, be impriſoned or detained: and that your majeſty would be pleaſed to remove the ſaid ſoldiers and mariners, and that your people may not be ſo burthenſome in time to come: and that the aforeſaid commiſſions, for proceeding by martial law, may be revoked and annulled: and that hereafter no commiſſions of like nature may iſſue forth, to any perſon or perſons whatſoever, to be executed as aforeſaid, leſt, by colour of them, any of your majeſty's ſubjects be deſtroyed, or put to death, contrary to the laws and franchiſe of the land.

XI. " All which they moſt humbly pray of your moſt excellent majeſty, as their rights and liberties, according to the laws and ſtatutes of this realm: and that your majeſty would alſo vouchſafe to declare, That the awards, doings, and proceedings to the prejudice of your people, in any of the premiſſes, ſhall not be drawn hereafter into conſequence or example: and that your majeſty would alſo be pleaſed, for the further comfort and ſafety of your people, to declare your royal will and pleaſure, That, in the things aforeſaid, all your officers and miniſters ſhall ſerve you according to the laws and ſtatutes of this realm, as they tender the honour of your majeſty, and the proſperity of this kingdom."

The king's aſſent only was now wanting, to give this famous petition of right the force of a law. To this end Charles came to the houſe of peers, and ſent for the commons; when, being ſeated on his throne, the petition was read to him; but the king, inſtead of the uſual, conciſe, and clear form, by which a bill is either confirmed or rejected, gave this anſwer, " The king willeth that right be done, according to the laws and cuſtoms of the realm; and the ſtatutes be put into execution, that his ſubjects may have no cauſe to complain of any wrong or oppreſſion, contrary to their juſt rights and liberties, to the preſervation whereof he holds himſelf in conſcience as much obliged as of his own prerogative." It is ſtrange that the king, after having excited the jealouſy of the commons, by his frequent evaſive meſſages in relation to this bill, could imagine that they would be ſatisfied with an anſwer ſo vague and undetermined. The commons returned to the houſe in a very ill humour. A gloomy ſilence for ſome time prevailed. Several leading members burſt into tears. Their conſternation was increaſed, when Sir John Elliot delivering his ſentiments, in his uſual manner, againſt the miniſter, was ſtopped by the ſpeaker, who declared that he was ordered to ſuffer no ſuch ſpeeches to be continued. Upon this the houſe came to the following reſolution, " That every member of that houſe is free from any undutiful ſpeech from the beginning of parliament unto this day; and it was ordered, that no member preſume to leave the houſe, on pain of being ſent to the Tower." This reſolution being paſſed, the ſpeaker, at his own requeſt, was permitted to leave the houſe, and the debate re-commenced in the committee with greater vigour than ever. Sir Edward Coke, after an elaborate detail of the power and privileges of parliament, thus proceeded: " What ſhall we do? Let us palliate no longer; if we do, God will not proſper us. I think the duke of Buckingham is the cauſe of all our miſeries, and till the king be informed thereof we ſhall never go out with honour, or ſit with honour here: that man is the grievance of grievances; let us ſet down the cauſes of our diſaſters, and all will reflect on him." This ſpeech was received with loud applauſe, and every part of the houſe rang with approving acclamations. Mr. Selden adviſed, that a declaration ſhould be drawn up under four heads: 1. To expreſs the dutiful behaviour of the houſe towards his majeſty. 2. To repreſent that their liberties were violated. 3. To expreſs what was the real intention of the houſe. 4. That the duke of Buckingham, fearing leſt he might be queſtioned, interpoſed, and occaſioned this diſtraction. " All this time, continued he, we have caſt a mantle over what was done in the laſt parliament; but being forced now again to look upon that man, let us proceed with what was then well begun, and let the charge be renewed that was made againſt him laſt parliament." During theſe debates, the ſpeaker was with the king, informing him of the ſenſe and diſpoſition of the houſe. Charles was in the utmoſt perplexity how to behave in this alarming criſis; but underſtanding by another meſſenger, that the commons were upon the point of naming Buckingham as the author of all their grievances, he ſent back the ſpeaker, who obtained a reſpite of their proceedings till the next day. Charles ſpent the intermediate ſpace in meditating what anſwer he ſhould return to the joint addreſs of both houſes for a more ſatisfactory anſwer to their petition of right. Nothing can more effectually juſtify the ſteadineſs of this parliament, in the ſupport of their natural rights, than the king's open encouragement and avowal of ſuch general principles, as were entirely inconſiſtent with a limited government. Dr. Manwaring had preached a ſermon, which upon enquiry had been found to be printed by the king's ſpecial command, though it contained doctrines ſubverſive of all civil liberty; maintaining, that though property was commonly lodged with the ſubject, yet, whenever a ſupply was required, all property was transferred to the crown; that the conſent of parliament was not neceſſary for the impoſition of taxes; and that the divine laws required a compliance with every demand, how irregular ſoever, which the prince ſhould make upon his ſubjects. The commons impeached Manwaring for theſe doctrines; and the peers paſſed ſentence on that hireling, that he ſhould be impriſoned during the pleaſure of the houſe; be fined a thouſand pounds to the king; make acknowledgment and ſubmiſſion for his offence; be ſuſpended during three years; be incapable of holding any ſecular office; and that his book be called in and burned. Yet no ſooner was the ſeſſion ended, than this man, ſo juſtly obnoxious to both houſes, received a pardon, and was promoted to a living of conſiderable value.

When the commons met the next day, they proceeded to cenſure the conduct of Buckingham, whoſe name they had hitherto forborn to mention. In vain did the king ſend them a meſſage, to let them know that the ſeſſion was drawing near to a concluſion, and to deſire them not to enter upon new buſineſs, nor to caſt any aſperſions on his government and miniſtry. The commons reſumed their intended declaration; and the king, to prevent the ſtorm which was impending over the head of the duke, thought proper, upon a joint application of the lords and commons, to give them ſatisfaction with regard to the petition of right; and going to the houſe of peers, after the petition had been again read, the king confirmed it in due form, by ſaying, ſoit droit faite comme il eſt deſiré, "Let it be law as is deſired:" Upon which the commons gave a general and loud applauſe; and a univerſal joy was diffuſed throughout the whole nation. The ſubject of a ſupply was now entered upon, and a bill for five ſubſidies, which had been formerly voted, immediately paſſed the houſe; after which the commons continued their ſcrutiny into the many innovations which had been lately made on the liberties of the ſubject; and particularly of the illegal power the king had aſſumed of exacting tonnage and poundage, without having received that grant from parliament. A remonſtrance on this ſubject was prepared; and while it was reading in the lower houſe, Charles came ſuddenly to the upper, and ſending for the commons, ended the ſeſſion by a prorogation, with the following ſpeech from the throne. "It may ſeem ſtrange, that I came ſo ſuddenly to end this ſeſſion, before I give my aſſent to the bills; I will tell you the cauſe, though I muſt avow, that I owe the account of my actions to God alone. It is known to every one, that a while ago the houſe of commons gave me a remonſtrance, how acceptable every man may judge, and for the merit of it, I will not call that in queſtion; for I am ſure no wiſe man can juſtify it. Now, ſince I am informed a ſecond remonſtrance is preparing for me, to take away the profit of my tonnage and poundage, one of the chief maintenances of my crown, by alledging I have given away my right thereto, by my anſwer to your petition; this is ſo prejudicial to me, that I am forced to end this ſeſſion ſome few hours before I meant, being not willing to receive any more remonſtrances to which I muſt give an harſh anſwer. And ſince I ſee, that even the houſe of commons begin already to make falſe conſtructions of what I granted in your petition, leſt it be worſe interpreted in the country, I will now make a declaration concerning the true intent thereof. The profeſſion of both houſes, in the time of forming this petition, was no way to trench upon my prerogative, ſaying, they had neither intention nor power to hurt it. Therefore it muſt needs be conceived, that I have granted no new, but only confirmed the antient liberties of my ſubjects. Yet to ſhew the clearneſs of my intentions, that I neither repent, nor mean to recede from any thing I have promiſed you, I do here declare myſelf, that thoſe things which have been done, whereby many have had ſome cauſe to expect the liberties of the ſubject to be trenched upon, which was indeed the firſt and true ground of the petition, ſhall not hereafter be drawn into example for your prejudice; and from time to time, on the word of a king, ye ſhall not have the like cauſe to complain. But as for tonnage and poundage, it is a thing I cannot want, and was never intended by you to aſk, nor meant by me, I am ſure, to grant. To conclude, I command you all that are here to take notice of what I have ſpoken at this time, to be the true intent and meaning of what I granted you in your petition; but eſpecially you, my lords, the judges, for to you only, under me, belongs the interpretation of laws; for none of the houſes of parliament, either joint or ſeparate (what new doctrine ſoever may be raiſed) have any power either to make or declare a law, without my conſent."

The war carried on againſt France and Spain, afforded the nation a very melancholy proſpect. The firſt exploit in which the miniſtry engaged after the prorogation of the parliament, was an attempt to relieve Rochelle, which had for ſome time been inveſted; and it was apparent, by Richelieu's taking the ſiege upon himſelf, that he intended to exterminate the Hugonots, whoſe whole dependence was now upon the Engliſh. Lord Denbigh, brother-in-law to Buckingham, was ſent with a fleet, conſiſting of ten ſhips of the line, and ſixty ſmaller veſſels, to ſuccour the beſieged, with a recruit of men and proviſions. In the beginning of May the Engliſh fleet anchored in the road of Rochelle. On the 8th a ſhallop, by means of a high tide, and a ſtrong favourable wind, got ſafe into the harbour, and carried the news of their arrival. Immediately the inhabitants erected ſignals on the top of their towers, and diſcharged their cannon, to ſhew that they were ready to favour, by a diverſion, the entrance of the deſtined ſuccours. The Engliſh admiral found the harbour guarded by a great number of French ſhips; and promiſed the Rochellers that he would, upon the return of the tide, attack the fleet of the enemy. During the night, a battery of nine pieces of cannon was erected at the mouth of the harbour, and played furiouſly on the Engliſh; and, before noon the next day, the French ſhips were filled with troops; an army of land forces was drawn up on the ſhore to oppoſe their landing, and all the neceſſary diſpoſitions were made for a vigorous defence, in caſe any attack ſhould be made by the Engliſh. Theſe difficulties did not, however, intimidate Denbigh; he prepared to relieve the place, and to ſink the French ſhips that guarded the paſſage into the harbour; but the wind changing, he was obliged to lay aſide his deſign. Three days after he attacked the French ſhips on one ſide, while the Rochellers cannonaded their land forces on the other, and brought up four of their largeſt veſſels, which had been purpoſely built to draw as little water as poſſible, in order to paſs the bar; but found the attempt impracticable, not only for want of water, but alſo from the diſpoſitions the French had made to defend the paſſage. Upon this miſcarriage a council of war was held, in which the majority of Engliſh captains gave it as their opinion, that the Rochellers had deceived them in their account of the facility of the enterprize; but the vice-admiral, and another officer named Car, exclaimed againſt the backwardneſs of the reſt; and the French proteſtants in the fleet, whoſe whole force conſiſted only of twenty-two ſmall veſſels, offered, with the aſſiſtance of four merchant ſhips well armed, and three fire ſhips, to throw ſuccours into the place; and agreed to pay for all the Engliſh ſhips that might miſcarry in the attempt. Denbigh excuſed himſelf, by pretending that it was impracticable; and by inſiſting on the words of his commiſſion, which were not to fight, unleſs firſt attacked by the enemy: and notwithſtanding the tears and prayers of the deputies from Rochelle, he refuſed to give any relief to that diſtreſſed town, and returned to England, where he was loaded with diſgrace. Thus, by a complication of treachery, ignorance, and cowardice, the expedition was rendered abortive.

Buckingham, by this diſhonour, and the remonſtrances of the commons againſt him, perceived plainly his dreadful ſituation; and found the wings of royal authority not ſufficient to ſhelter him from the ſtorm which threatened to overwhelm him. He ſaw that no efforts of his own, no conceſſions of his maſter, could recover his credit, and that nothing leſs than his blood could ſatisfy his enemies. He therefore threw aſide all other conſiderations, and reſolved, if poſſible, to ſignalize himſelf, and recover the favour of the people, however he might ſtand with that of the parliament. He accordingly cauſed, for the relief of Rochelle, ten ſhips of a particular form, and peculiarly adapted to paſs the bar, to be got ready with the utmoſt expedition, and made the neceſſary diſpatches for ſailing to relieve that place, now reduced to the laſt extremity. But a fixed gloom was ſettled on his countenance: he appeared abroad with omens of miſfortune in his aſpect; his unſteady motions; his dark expreſſions; his earneſtly recommending his wiſe and children to Charles; his frequent ſolitary entertainments with his mother; his reflections on the tender ties of nature, and the ſoft endearments of life, which he was juſt going to leave behind him, ſufficiently declared that he preſaged his approaching fate. The fleet being ready to ſail, he repaired to Portſmouth, determined to relieve Rochelle, or periſh in the attempt. One Felton, a man of good family, but of a gloomy, enthuſiaſtic diſpoſition, had ſerved in the ſtation of lieutenant under the duke, in his late attempt upon Rhè. His captain being killed in the retreat, Felton applied to Buckingham for the company; but being refuſed, he threw up his commiſſion, and retired diſcontented from the army. The remonſtrance of the commons rouſed at once both his reſentment and enthuſiaſtic fury: he was now convinced, that it would be a meritorious ſervice in the ſight of heaven to murder Buckingham, whom the parliament had accuſed of all the miſfortunes of his country. Filled with theſe ideas he repaired to Portſmouth, fully determined to put his bloody deſign into execution. On the twenty-third of Auguſt, early in the morning, Buckingham received information, that a ſmall convoy of proviſions had got ſafe into Rochelle. This intelligence he communicated to the duke of Soubiſe, and other French gentlemen in his train, who inſiſted with great vehemence that the whole was falſe, and calculated only to retard the ſailing of the fleet. During this converſation, the duke drew towards the door; and turning his head to give directions to Sir Thomas Fryar, a colonel in the army, he received a mortal wound from an unſeen hand, which ſtruck a knife into his heart; and, without uttering any other words than, "The villain has killed me," he drew out the knife, and immediately expired in a deluge of his own blood. No one had ſeen the blow, nor the perſon who gave it; but in the confuſion every one made his own conjecture, and all agreed it was done by one of the French gentlemen, whoſe angry tone of voice had been heard, while their words were not underſtood. The duke's attendants inſtantly drew their ſwords, in order to diſpatch the foreigners; but were ſtopped by ſome of more temper and judgment; who though they had the ſame opinion of their guilt, thought proper to reſerve them for a judicial trial. In the midſt of this confuſion, a hat was found near the door, in the inſide of which was ſewed a paper, containing a few lines of that remonſtrance of the commons which declared Buckingham an enemy to the kingdom; under which was a ſhort ejaculation. It was concluded, that the owner of the hat muſt be the murderer; but the difficulty ſtill remained of knowing who that perſon was, and it was natural to believe that he had already fled too far to be found. While they were in this perplexity, a man without a hat was ſeen walking very compoſedly before the door; on which one cried, "Here is the fellow who killed the duke." Every one ran, aſking, which is he? Felton anſwered, "I am the perſon who committed the action; let not the innocent ſuffer." Immediately the moſt furious ruſhed upon him with drawn ſwords; others, more deliberate, defended him; while he himſelf, with open arms, calmly and chearfully expoſed his breaſt to the moſt enraged. Some gentlemen, deſirous of finding whether Felton had any accomplices, hinted, that Buckingham, though dangerouſly wounded, was not dead, and that there were great hopes of his recovery. Felton, ſmiling, replied to this, in words very expreſſive of his enthuſiaſm, "I know that he is dead, for I had the force of forty men when I ſtruck the blow." Being queſtioned with regard to the perſons by whoſe inſtigations he had performed the horrid deed, he told them, that their enquiries were uſeleſs, that no perſon on earth had credit ſufficient with him to have diſpoſed him to undertake ſuch an action; that no man living was privy to his purpoſe; that the reſolution proceeded wholly from the impulſe of his own conſcience; and that if his hat was found, his motives would ſufficiently appear; for, perſuaded that he ſhould die for, or might periſh in the attempt, he had taken care to explain them, that no innocent perſon might ſuffer on his account. Thus came to an untimely end George Villiers, duke of Buckingham, a nobleman of very ſlender abilities, conſidered either as a ſtateſman or a ſoldier, raiſed to the ſummit of miniſterial glory, to be the ſcourge of three kingdoms. A man, whoſe extraordinary influence over two ſucceſſive princes, will ſerve as an eternal monument of the contemptible government this nation muſt ſubmit to, who groan under the oppreſſive yoke of an arbitrary ſway, entruſted to the caprice of rapacious, weak, and ambitious individuals.

When the news was brought him of his favourite's death, Charles was at church; but he was ſo earneſt in his devotions, that no diſcompoſure appeared in his action, nor alteration in his countenance. The ſervice was, however, no ſooner concluded, than he retired to his chamber, and gave vent to his ſorrows in a flood of tears: and, during his whole life, expreſſed his regard for Buckingham by a ſeries of munificent acts towards his widow, his children, and his friends. Some of the council, and biſhop Laud in particular, threatened Felton with the rack, if he did not diſcover his accomplices. But this had no effect upon the aſſaſſin: he calmly replied, "That if he was put to the torture, he did not know whom he might name in the extremity of anguiſh, perhaps the biſhop himſelf." The judges, however, being conſulted, declared, that though that practice had been formerly common, no man, by the laws of England, could be put to the torture. Reflection and confinement had more effect on the enthuſiaſtic ſpirit of Felton than all their threatenings. He ſeemed, in ſome meaſure, to recover from his deluſion; expreſſed remorſe for what he had done; and ſuffered death with compoſure and reſignation.

Charles, notwithſtanding the death of his favourite, was very deſirous of relieving Rochelle. He gave the command of the armament to the earl of Lindſay, and repaired in perſon to Portſmouth, in order to haſten the ſailing of the fleet. His preſence had ſuch effect, that more was done in ten or twelve days, than in almoſt as many weeks before. It was, however, the eighth of September before the fleet ſailed from Portſmouth, when the vaſt genius of Richelieu had finiſhed a work thought impoſſible to be executed in ſo ſhort a ſpace of time: this was a mole of more than a mile in length, carried acroſs the mouth of the harbour, in that boiſterous ocean, and by means of which all relief by ſea was cut off. On the eighteenth of September the fleet reached the road of Rochelle; but a calm coming on, it was the twentieth before the ſhips approached the mole, when a furious cannonade began, and continued for two hours, without any great loſs on either ſide. Next day the cannonading continued, but with leſs vigour: though it was known, by a gentleman who had found means to eſcape from Rochelle, that the inhabitants, unleſs relieved in two days, muſt ſurrender. But even this intelligence produced no effect on the Engliſh captains, who appear to have been deſtitute of experience, and ſome of them of courage. The duke of Soubiſe offered to attempt the mole with the French ſhips, provided the Engliſh would promiſe to follow him; but this propoſal was rejected in a council of war, by a majority of the Engliſh captains. The count Laval next propoſed, with the help of artificial mines, contrived in three ſhips, to attempt to blow up the mole; but this was alſo rejected, and the time was ſpent in fruitleſs cannonading. At laſt it was determined, in a council of war, to make one general and deciſive attack upon the mole; but before the deſign could be carried into execution, the beſieged were obliged to capitulate. Of fifteen thouſand perſons who had been ſhut up in the town, four thouſand only ſurvived the fatigues and famine they had undergone. A more ſhocking ſcene of calamity was never beheld, than Rochelle preſented at the time of its ſurrender. The living were not ſufficient to bury the dead; ſo that vermin and birds of prey devoured the uninterred bodies in the ſtreets. Many carried their own coffins into the church-yards to lie down in them, never more to riſe; and the few inhabitants who ſurvived appeared rather as ſpectres and ſkeletons than men. This reduction of Rochelle was the firſt neceſſary ſtep towards the proſperity of France. Foreign enemies, as well as domeſtic factions, being deprived of that reſource, the kingdom began to ſhine out in its full ſplendor, and gradually to gain an aſcendant over the rival power of Spain. The French king, however, uſed his conqueſt with great moderation; the Hugonots ſtill enjoyed a toleration, though every order of the ſtate, and every ſect, were obliged to pay ſubmiſſion to the lawful authority of the ſovereign. On the other hand, in England, the failure of the enterprize to Rochelle tended greatly to diminiſh the king's authority in the parliament during the approaching ſeſſion. Nor did his meaſures at home tend to raiſe the character of his government. He again revived the iniquitous opinions of the judges, and ſome oppreſſive practices in former times, to juſtify the impoſition of twenty ſhillings a ton upon wines, and five ſhillings and ſix-pence a hundred upon currants; he even declared, in full council, that the tax ſhould be levied with rigour, and ſuch merchants as refuſed to pay it exemplarily puniſhed. He was not inſenſible of the ferment which theſe proceedings muſt occaſion in the kingdom, but took no pains to prevent it. His coffers were now full, and he could talk with his parliament upon more equal terms than before. It was therefore reſolved to juſtify the proceedings of the government upon this principle, that though his majeſty's predeceſſors had raiſed tonnage and poundage by act of parliament, yet they had, in fact, levied it in the late reigns when no ſuch act ſubſiſted: that if the parliament would agree to paſs ſuch an act, and make it commence from the beginning of the king's reign, his majeſty's proceeding would be juſtified under that act, and he would deſiſt from his claim of raiſing the tax by his prerogative; but if no ſuch bill paſſed, his majeſty would be juſtified, becauſe he did no more than had been done by his predeceſſors. Charles was confirmed in theſe reſolutions, by the late ſucceſs that had attended his endeavours to bring over the famous Sir Thomas Wentworth to his intereſt. This gentleman had been a principal leader in the oppoſition, and was conſidered by all parties as one of the moſt able members of the Britiſh ſenate. On his embracing the meaſures of the court, he was created viſcount Wentworth, and earl of Strafford, and placed at the head of the miniſtry. Aſhamed at what the party he had abandoned termed apoſtacy, Strafford, for ſome time, concealed his change of ſentiments; but at laſt boldly juſtified it, by ſaying, that he had gone as far in the oppoſition as was conſiſtent with his conſcience, or the conſtitution of his country; and that he had not left his party till he perceived they had views of a very different nature from the redreſs of grievances, or an alteration of meaſures. Theſe excuſes were treated as chimerical by the heads of the party he had forſaken; and Mr. Pym in particular deſired Wentworth not to take any pains in juſtifying his conduct; but added, "Though you have left us, we will not leave you, while your head is on your ſhoulders."

A. D. 1629.

On the tenth of January the parliament met, and immediately proceeded to take into conſideration every thing that had been tranſacted againſt the liberty of the ſubject, in direct oppoſition to the petition of right. Several complaints were immediately made to the houſe by merchants, whoſe goods had been ſeized in conſequence of their having refuſed to pay the duties of tonnage and poundage. While the members were employed in debating on this ſubject, the king ſent a meſſage to the commons, deſiring they would proceed no farther in that buſineſs, till he could ſpeak to both houſes in perſon at Whitehall. The lords and commons accordingly attended him the next day, when he endeavoured to juſtify his conduct on the principles already mentioned to have been laid down in his council. He blamed them for their general reſolution of enquiring into all the infractions of the petition of right, and recommended to their diſpatch the bill of tonnage and poundage, which, he ſaid, would have been paſſed laſt ſeſſion, had there been time ſufficient for that purpoſe, and it was upon that preſumption he had ordered his officers to act in the manner they had done. But inſtead of following his majeſty's directions, thoſe members, who were no ſtrangers to the effect of ſpeeches in popular aſſemblies, turned the attention of the houſe to matters of religion; poured out the moſt inveterate invectives againſt Arminianiſm, which they termed the ſpawn of popery; but in reality they meant nothing more by the term, than biſhop Laud and his party. An Arminian was ſaid to be as bad as a papiſt; and ſome declared, that they feared his ſucceſs more than a ſecond invaſion by a Spaniſh Armada. When the houſe was ſufficiently heated by declamatory ſpeeches, Mr. Pym moved to give religion the precedency of all other matters. The motion was agreed to, and a committee appointed accordingly. This was a great point gained, eſpecially as under the head of religion they voted, "An enquiry into all eccleſiaſtical preferments; into the ceſſation of the execution of the laws againſt papiſts; into the employments and encouragements they had obtained; into the growth of ſuperſtitious ceremonies, of which Couſins, a prebendary of Durham, was mentioned as the principal author; and into the growth of hereſies, falſe doctrines, and other opinions." The conſideration of ſo many ſubjects could not fail of employing the houſe for a great length of time. The king ſaw the intention of the commons, but thought it imprudent to break with them immediately, merely becauſe they refuſed to proceed to the bill of tonnage and poundage; he thought, and indeed very reaſonably, that he could better juſtify any violent meaſures he might afterwards be obliged to take, if he allowed them to carry to the utmoſt extremity their attacks upon his government and prerogative. He therefore contented himſelf for the preſent with ſoliciting the houſe by meſſages and ſpeeches. But the commons, inſtead of liſtening to his ſolicitations, proceeded to carry their cenſorial ſcrutiny into his management of religion, the only grievance to which they had not as yet applied a ſufficient remedy by the petition of right. Yet, while they pretended the utmoſt regard for religion, their principal deſign was to wreſt from the king the duties of tonnage and poundage, in order to render him abſolutely dependent on the parliament for ſupport. The right of tonnage and poundage on the importation and exportation of merchandize, though originally the mere gift of the people, had been ſo ſtrongly confirmed to the crown ſince the reign of Henry IV. that the kings of England had always claimed it from the moment of their acceſſion. This right, which had been granted for life to former princes, was allowed to Charles only for one year. Finding that the intention of the commons was to ſtrip him of it entirely, he ſent them a meſſage, importing, "That he had never pretended to look upon it as a branch of the prerogative; that neceſſity alone had compelled him to levy it till that time, and, in order to terminate all diſputes upon the ſubject, requeſted that the commons would paſs the bill, that he might receive it as a free gift from his people." This meſſage was diſregarded; they continued to give the preference to religion, and made ſome attempts to annul the conſecration of Montague, lately promoted to the ſee of Colcheſter, for certain complaints that had been offered againſt him by one Jones, an obſcure perſon: but failing in this unaccountable attempt, they attacked the pardons that had been granted to Montague, Mainwaring, Sibthorpe, and other divines of Laud's party, who had been cenſured by the commons. It was upon this occaſion that Oliver Cromwell, who had then a ſeat in the houſe, firſt diſtinguiſhed his zeal, by ſhewing how inſtrumental Neile, biſhop of Wincheſter, had been in procuring theſe pardons. Sir Robert Phillips called upon the attorney-general to give an account by what authority he drew theſe pardons, and a committee was appointed accordingly. Upon enquiry, it appeared that the warrants had been brought to the attorney-general by the earl of Dorſet and the lord Carleton, and that the biſhop of Wincheſter had corrected them with his own hand, and inſerted the names of Couſins, Mainwaring and Sibthorpe. It alſo appeared, upon farther enquiry, that an information had been given upon oath againſt Couſins, for denying the king's ſupremacy in matters of religion, and that the attorney-general had, from a hint given him by the biſhop of Wincheſter, diſregarded the information, becauſe it came from one king, whom the biſhop ſaid was a very empty fellow, and deſerved no credit. Elliot, upon this diſcovery, was very ſevere upon the attorney-general, whom he threatened with an impeachment for high treaſon for a neglect of duty. While the houſe was engaged in theſe religious diſputes, Mr. Rolls, one of the members, complained that he had the day before been ſerved with a ſubpœna to attend the court of ſtar-chamber, but that at night he received a letter from the attorney-general, intimating, that it had been done by miſtake of the meſſenger, and that the information ſhould be withdrawn. The houſe, however, voted the ſerving of Rolls with a ſubpœna to be a breach of privilege. They alſo proceeded to enquire into the grievances of other merchants, and to cenſure the officers who had ſeized their goods, for refuſing to pay the duties of tonnage and poundage. Theſe proceedings alarmed the king, and a council was ſummoned to conſider the moſt proper method to be purſued on this occaſion. And as the houſe of commons had founded their reſolution upon an opinion, that the cuſtom-houſe officers had ſeized the goods upon their own account, Charles thought proper to ſend a meſſage to the houſe, importing, "That what was formerly done by his farmers and officers of the cuſtoms, was done by his own direction and command, being himſelf for the moſt part preſent in council; and if he had at any time been abſent from the board, yet he was minutely acquainted with all their tranſactions, gave full directions in every particular, and therefore in this could not ſever the act of his officers from his own, nor could his officers ſuffer for it without the higheſt diſhonour to his majeſty." The houſe was ſo highly exaſperated at this meſſage, that after many bitter ſpeeches, the queſtion was propoſed to be put, that the ſeizing Mr. Rolls's goods was a breach of privilege; but the ſpeaker informed the houſe, that he was commanded by his majeſty not to put the queſtion. This threw the houſe into the utmoſt conſternation, and they adjourned themſelves for one day. When they met, the ſpeaker told them that he had the king's command for a farther adjournment, and to put no queſtion. Having made this declaration, he roſe and left the chair; but was puſhed back again into it, and detained there by force, by Mr. Holles and Mr. Valentine, while Sir John Elliot read the following remonſtrance:

1. "Whoever ſhall make any innovations in religion, or by favour or countenance ſeem to extend or introduce popery or Arminianiſm, or other opinions contrary to the truth and the orthodox church, ſhall be reputed a capital enemy to this kingdom and commonwealth.

2. "Whoever ſhall counſel or adviſe the taking and levying the ſubſidies of tonnage and poundage, not being granted by parliament, or ſhall be an actor or inſtrument therein, ſhall be likewiſe reputed an innovator in the government, and a capital enemy to the kingdom and commonwealth.

3. "If any merchant or other perſon whatſoever, ſhall voluntarily yield, or pay the ſaid ſubſidies of tonnage and poundage, not being granted by parliament, he ſhall likewiſe be reputed a betrayer of the liberties of England, and an enemy to the ſame."

This remonſtrance was paſſed by acclamation, rather than by vote, while many of the members, thinking the leaders had gone too far in their oppoſition, expreſſed their diſlike of the whole proceeding, and the greateſt indecencies, even to blows, were committed. The king ſent the gentleman-uſher of the houſe of lords, but the doors were locked, and he could obtain no admittance till the remonſtrance was finiſhed. As ſoon as the door was opened, he, by the king's order, took the mace from the table, which put an end to their proceedings; and a few days after the parliament was diſſolved.

This rupture between the king and his parliament alarmed the nation; but Charles took no care to make uſe of lenient meaſures, which might, perhaps, have effected a reconciliation. On the contrary he inflamed the diſcontents of the people, by a ſeverity which he wanted power, perhaps inclination, to carry to extremity. He committed Denzil Holles, Eſq; Sir John Elliot, Sir Miles Hobart, Sir Peter Hayman, John Selden, Eſq; William Coriton, Walter Long, William Shoude, and Benjamin Valentine, to priſon, on account of the late tumultuous proceedings in the houſe, which were termed ſeditious. Elliot, Holles, and Valentine, were brought to their trial in the court of king's bench: but refuſing to anſwer before an inferior court for their conduct as members of a ſuperior, they were condemned to be impriſoned during the king's pleaſure, to find ſureties for their good behaviour, and to be fined, the two former a thouſand pounds a-piece, and the latter five hundred. Sir John Elliot died in cuſtody, and was univerſally conſidered as a martyr for the liberties of England. The king, that he might no longer be harraſſed with the turbulence of the commons, made peace with France, abandoning the Hugonots to the mercy of Lewis XIII. and ſoon after concluded a treaty with the Spaniards, from whom he obtained nothing more than a general promiſe of their uſing their good offices in reſtoring the Elector Palatine. Being thus at peace with the neighbouring powers, eaſed of a burthen too heavy for him, inſtructed by experience, no longer a ſlave to the pernicious counſels of Buckingham, and bleſt with an able miniſter in Wentworth, earl of Stafford, it was natural to think that the troubles of his reign were over, and that a ſeries of tranquillity would ſucceed the ſtorms of popular contention. But this was not the caſe. New difficulties, new cauſes of diſtruſt, aroſe among the people, and the olive wand of peace diffuſed not domeſtic felicity over the kingdom.

A.D. 1630. Charles was as equally zealous to maintain his ſyſtem of religion, as to ſupport the prerogative of his crown. Unfortunately for him, and unfortunately for the peace of the kingdom, the king honoured with his confidence Laud, biſhop of London, a prelate whoſe ſuperſtitious prejudices, obſtinate zeal, enterpriſing ſpirit, and inflexible firmneſs, in oppoſition to the ſpirit of the nation, threatened the greateſt misfortunes to the ſtate. Laud was very deſirous of advancing the power of the prieſthood, and of multiplying church ceremonies; ſeveral of which he introduced, and moſt of them very ſimilar to thoſe of the Roman church. The puritans beheld with horror theſe preludes to popery. The communion-table railed in, the miniſters dreſſed in hoops to adminiſter the ſacrament, the communicants obliged to receive it kneeling, the crucifix and other images placed in the churches, were, in their eyes, ſo many ſcandalous attributes of Antichriſt. The court of Rome itſelf entertained hopes of regaining its authority in this iſland; and in order to forward Laud's good intentions, an offer was twice made him, in private, of a cardinal's hat, which he declined accepting. The general cry, however, was, that the biſhop of London was endeavouring to reſtore popery. One of the daughters of the earl of Devonſhire having turned catholic, was aſked by Laud the reaſon of her converſion. "It is principally, replied ſhe, becauſe I hate to travel in a crowd: for perceiving that you and numbers more are making preparations for Rome, I thought it more convenient to ſet out before you, that I might not be joſtled in the multitude." While the biſhops and their partizans carried the ſpiritual juriſdiction too high on one hand, and thereby incurred the hatred of the people, they did not fail on the other to preach up the moſt implicit obedience to the royal authority, the ſure means of obtaining the favour of his majeſty. Laud was accordingly advanced to the archiepiſcopal ſee of Canterbury, which empowered him to exerciſe a kind of deſpotiſm with vigour in the church. Diſtreſſed for money, notwithſtanding the ſtricteſt œconomy, Charles began to make a freer uſe of his authority. Illegal as the collection of tonnage and poundage was, the council preſſed it with the utmoſt violence. This induced the great merchants to enquire more than ever into its legality, and were ſoon convinced that the principle on which it was founded ſtruck at the root of liberty. This alarmed the whole fraternity of merchants; and their fears were greatly increaſed by the publication of the following reſolution of the council:

"That warrants ſhould be directed to the officers of the cuſtoms in the port of London, and elſewhere, to ſeize and detain the goods of any perſon, who ſhould attempt to land them without warrant, till the duties were paid.

"That ſuch merchants goods as remained on ſhip-board, ſhould be removed into ſtore-houſes on the cuſtom-houſe quay; and for want of room into the Tower, there to remain till his majeſty's duties, and the freight due to ſhip-maſters, were ſatisfied.

"And whereas attempts were made by replevin, directed to the ſheriff of London, to obtain thoſe goods out of the king's ſtore-houſes, the meſſengers of the council were ordered to detain them in their cuſtody, and to apprehend all perſons who ſhould preſume to make reſiſtance."

Strict orders were ſent to the officers and magiſtrates of the chief ports of the kingdom, to aſſiſt the officers of the cuſtoms, in caſe any oppoſition ſhould be made by refractory perſons. Sir Francis Cottingham was authorized to call before him ſuch merchants as had been truſted by the collectors for ſums now due by cuſtoms, and who had protracted the payment; and to require them to pay the ſeveral ſums they owed his majeſty without delay. Warrants were alſo iſſued from the council, empowering their meſſengers to enter any ſhip, veſſel, houſe, warehouſe, or cellar; to break any bulk whatever, and ſeize the goods, in default of paying the accuſtomed duties; and to apprehend all perſons who ſhall publiſh ſcandalous ſpeeches againſt his majeſty and his government, or cauſe any diſturbance.

Theſe were not the only methods taken by the king for raiſing money on his ſubjects without the conſent of parliament. He publiſhed a proclamation, "declaring his majeſty's royal pleaſure to confirm to his ſubjects their defective titles, eſtates and poſſeſſions, by his commiſſion lately granted and renewed for that purpoſe." But notwithſtanding the ſpecious title of this proclamation, the people in general conſidered it only as an expedient to raiſe money without the conſent of parliament; and this increaſed the alarming diſcontent already diſſeminated in every part of the nation. But this was trifling, when compared with the ſpirit raiſed by another proclamation, publiſhed on the thirteenth of July, "for the eaſe of the ſubjects, in making their compoſitions for not receiving the order of knighthood, according to law." The reader may recollect, that, in the former part of this hiſtory, many inſtances have been given of ſubjects veſted with a certain degree of property being obliged to take upon them the order of knighthood. This property was very fluctuating in different reigns; and there was an obſolete, though unrepealed ſtatute, called, Statutum de militibus, paſſed in the reign of Edward II. which obliged all ſubjects poſſeſſed of fifteen pounds a year in land to take upon them the order of knighthood, provided they were fit for that duty. The order was generally conferred at the coronation; and Charles, on account of the plague's raging in London at the time when he received the crown, had diſpenſed with the attendance of ſuch ſubjects as were qualified to be knights. But being now diſtreſſed for money, this diſpenſation was conſidered only as a matter of convenience. It was pretended, that the right of impoſing the honour, which was attended with a large expence of fees, remained ſtill with the crown; and that the king was at liberty to oblige all perſons, properly qualified, either to be knighted, or pay compoſition money to certain commiſſioners appointed to receive it: the qualification was fixed at forty pounds a year. It is not eaſy to conceive a project more abſurd, more unreaſonable, and more unjuſt, than this. As the whole ſyſtem of feudal ſervices in perſon, during war, was now aboliſhed, there was not the leaſt pretence of reviving this tax, but a ſtatute which had been made when theſe ſervices were in full force. Add to this, that if fifteen pounds a year was, in the time of Edward II. a proper qualification, two hundred pounds a year, at leaſt, ought to have been the qualification under Charles I. The king, while any hopes remained of obtaining ſupplies from his parliament, had deſiſted from collecting ſo invidious a tax; but it was now revived with ſo much rigour, that many were put to great expences in the exchequer and ſtar-chamber, for refuſing to pay the compoſition-money, which was required to be one third and a half of what the perſons ſo compounding were found rated in the ſubſidy. Theſe proceedings intimidated ſo many perſons, that the king received above one hundred thouſand pounds compoſition-money. Beſides theſe, Charles granted oppreſſive patents, and monopolies, among which thoſe on ſoap and ſtarch were particularly complained of as very burdenſome to the lower claſs of people. It is ſurpriſing with what patience theſe impoſitions were borne by the nation; they occaſioned no diſturbances in any part of the kingdom.

The king was much better pleaſed to govern by his prerogative alone, than in conjunction with his parliament; and leſt the hopes of relief or protection from the commons might encourage oppoſition, he iſſued a proclamation, in which he declared, "That whereas, for ſeveral ill ends, the calling again of a parliament is divulged; though his majeſty has ſhewn, by frequent meeting with his people, his love to the uſe of parliaments; yet the late abuſe having, for the preſent, driven him unwillingly out of that courſe; he will account it preſumption in any one to preſcribe to him any time for the calling that aſſembly." This was generally conſidered as a declaration, that, during this reign, no more parliaments were intended to be ſummoned.

The thoughts of the Engliſh were now turned towards the queen of Bohemia; and the king was very deſirous of procuring ſome relief for his unfortunate ſiſter, and her family. He joined his good offices with thoſe of France, and mediated a peace between the kings of Poland and Sweden, in hopes of engaging the latter to undertake the protection of the diſtreſſed proteſtants in the empire. This was the famous Guſtavus Adolphus, whoſe heroic genius, ſeconded by the wiſeſt policy, rendered him, in a few years, the moſt diſtinguiſhed monarch of the age. Charles, to encourage and aſſiſt him in his projected invaſion of Germany, agreed to furniſh him with ſix thouſand men; but in order to maintain the appearance of neutrality, he made uſe of the marquis of Hamilton's name, a nobleman nearly allied to the crown. Hamilton accordingly entered into an engagement with Guſtavus; and enliſting theſe troops in England and Scotland, at the king's expence, he landed them at the mouth of the Elbe. Guſtavus was greatly pleaſed when he heard the Engliſh were landed, and promiſed to join them as ſoon as poſſible, with the ſtipulated number of forces deſtined to conquer Sileſia. The appearance of ſo fine a body of men was of great ſervice to the proteſtant cauſe. Their numbers were greatly exaggerated by their enemies through fear, and by their friends through deſign; and ſo great was the reputation of their valour, that the celebrated victory gained a few weeks after by the Swediſh monarch over count Tilly at Leipſick, was, in a great meaſure, owing to their reputation. What remained of that hero's life, was one continued ſeries of victories, for which he was much leſs beholden to fortune than to thoſe perſonal endowments which he derived from nature, and from induſtry. The veteran troops of Ferdinand, commanded by the moſt celebrated generals of the age, were foiled in every encounter, and all Germany was over-run in an inſtant by the victorious Swede. But, by this extraordinary and unexpected ſucceſs of his ally, Charles failed of the purpoſe for which he framed the alliance. Elated by proſperity, and no ſtranger to ambition, Guſtavus began to form extenſive plans; and after freeing Germany from the yoke of Ferdinand, he intended to reduce it under ſubjection to his own. Full of theſe ideas, he refuſed to reſtore the Palatine to his principality, except on conditions that would have kept him in total dependence. And thus the negotiation was protracted till the battle of Lutzen, where the Swediſh hero periſhed in the midſt of a complete victory which he obtained over his enemies.

A. D. 1631. Wentworth was now made preſident of the council of York. This court had been erected, after a rebellion in the north, by a patent from Henry VIII. without any authority of parliament; and this exerciſe of power, like many others, was indulged by that arbitrary monarch. The council of York had long acted chiefly as a criminal court; but, beſides ſome innovations introduced by James, Charles thought proper, ſome time after Wentworth was made preſident, to extend its powers, and to give it a large civil juriſdiction, and, in ſome meaſure, a diſcretionary power. Poſſibly the king's intention in this, was nothing more than to free the inhabitants of the northern counties from the trouble, expence and fatigue of attending the courts at Weſtminſter; but it ſoon appeared, that the inhabitants were, by this means, deprived of the protection of the ordinary law, and ſubjected to an arbitrary authority. And accordingly, ſome irregular proceedings in that court were now complained of, and tended to exaſperate the people ſtill more againſt the government. Wentworth was gained over to the court party, Sir Dudley Digges was made maſter of the rolls, Noy attorney-general, and Littleton ſolicitor-general. All theſe were leading men in the houſe of commons. But the ſame abilities which are ſufficient to perplex a court by their oppoſition, are not capable of effectually ſerving it by their compliance. Charles flattered himſelf, that by engaging thoſe eminent leaders in his ſervice, his government would meet with no more oppoſition, and that a calm tranquillity would be eſtabliſhed in this kingdom during the remainder of his reign; but his miniſters fatally deceived him. Laud purſued the puritans with unremitting fury, and was fond of introducing new ceremonies into the church, and of carrying to the utmoſt height the power of prieſthood.

A. D. 1632. The furious conduct of this imperious churchman alarmed the moderate Engliſh, and ſtruck the Scottiſh preſbyterians with terror. They were, in general, men as violent for one extreme as Laud was for the other; and the dreadful ſhock, when both afterwards encountered, cruſhed the church, the monarchy, and the conſtitution. When Mary was driven from the throne of Scotland, the conſtitution of that kingdom became ſuch a confuſed mixture of monarchical, ariſtocratical, democratical, and eccleſiaſtical powers, that it hardly deſerved the name. The prudent government of James, while he continued in Scotland, and the unſucceſsful attempts of the bigotted zealots to eſtabliſh their favourite model of religion, gave the crown great advantages; ſo that about the year 1621 epiſcopacy was reſtored in Scotland. James had been wiſely cautious in the promotion of his biſhops; they were, in general, men of great moderation, and well acquainted with the genius of the people; for which reaſon they ſtrongly oppoſed every attempt to bring the diſcipline and worſhip of the church of Scotland to a nearer conformity with that of England. The truth is, nothing in the principles of the firſt reformers, either in Scotland or foreign parts, were againſt a ſubordination of eccleſiaſtical government. All of them, indeed, concurred, curred, that the popiſh biſhops ſhould be removed; but neither their plan of government, nor that of power, was ſo fixed as to enable them to agree who ſhould ſucceed them, though, in general, they ſuffered thoſe who embraced the tenets of the reformation to retain both their revenues and appellations. But what at firſt was no more than a matter of convenience, ſoon became a point of principle. The eſtates of their great men were chiefly compoſed out of the ſpoils of the church; and the misfortune was, that the power of the crown was not ſufficient to prevent theſe dilapidations. The acts of parliament in favour of the preſent poſſeſſors gave them infinite advantage; but the circumſtances under which theſe parliaments were held rendered their authority liable to many juſt exceptions. While the king touched not this jarring ſtring of eccleſiaſtical government, the parliament ſubmitted to the prerogative in as full a manner as it had ever been exerciſed; but the landholders of Scotland could not, without the utmoſt concern, ſee the leaſt increaſe of epiſcopal power, or any nearer conformity of their church with that of England. During the whole reign of James, the Scottiſh biſhops had been contented to act rather as preſidents in their eccleſiaſtical meetings, than the fathers of the church, in the common acceptation of their character. When a ſee happened to be vacant, James always ordered the biſhops to preſent him with the names of ſuch men as they thought moſt proper to fill it, and he generally pitched upon the beſt qualified. Hence the biſhops, in a manner, nominated one another, lived in harmony among themſelves, and acted ſo moderately, that the noblemen and great landholders in Scotland became pretty well reconciled both to their temper and their character. Happy would it have been for Charles, had he preſerved the ſame moderate conduct. But Laud deteſted all moderation in church government, and Charles would liſten to no advice but that of Laud. That imperious churchman repreſented, in the higheſt terms, the dignity of the epiſcopal character: he diſplayed an army of martyrs who had died in its defence: he called to his aid all the tyrants of the eaſtern empire who had favoured it: he poured forth a profuſion of quotations, from what he called the fathers of the church; and, upon the whole, ſucceeded in convincing Charles, that the leaſt defect of reverence, either to the government, the doctrine, or the worſhip of his church, ſtruck at the moſt ſacred rights of the crown. Nor was this all: Laud was of opinion, that the church of England, as left by James, was imperfect in its worſhip. To prove this, he produced ſome opinions, which in the twilight of reformation, when ſeveral prelates wavered between the old and the new religion, had been maintained in the convocation, and ſometimes in their writings. The authorities of the weakeſt of the fathers of the church were produced, to prove, that certain forms and ceremonies, things as indifferent in themſelves as Laud's own dreams, had been formerly practiſed, and hence he inferred that they were eſſentials in religion. Nevertheleſs Charles, however warm and ſerious in theſe matters, was perſuaded that theſe ceremonies had ſo near a reſemblance to popery, that it would be imprudent to attempt their introduction, all at once, among a people accuſtomed to think on the oppoſite extreme. It was therefore determined, previouſly to new model the hierarchy, by introducing gradually a ſet of men of very different principles from thoſe that now filled the ſees of Scotland, in order to reſtore authority and diſcipline to the church, and purity and ſplendor to her worſhip. The vacant biſhoprics were accordingly filled with ſuch men as had neither the virtues nor abilities neceſſary for filling their ſtations, in a country where the minuteſt parts of their conduct were ſeverely ſcrutinized. The Scots made not the leaſt oppoſition; but under the pretence of faſts, and other religious exerciſes, they formed many ſecret reſolutions for ſtrengthening their party. Charles was ſo much impoſed upon by theſe appearances of acquieſcence, that he thought he ſhould meet with nothing in that country to oppoſe his pleaſure; and imagined that his preſence, the ſplendid appearance of his court, and the weight of his authority, would bear down the ſmall remains of oppoſition.

A. D. 1633.

With theſe pleaſing ideas, and deſirous of being crowned in his ancient kingdom, he ſet out for Scotland, attended by the whole flower of the Engliſh nobility, who vied with each other in the ſplendor of their equipages. It was the fifteenth of June before Charles reached Edinburgh; and on the eighteenth he was crowned in that city, with the utmoſt pomp and magnificence. On the twentieth the parliament met, and gave the king every thing he deſired. Two acts, indeed, met with ſome oppoſition. The firſt, beſides eſtabliſhing the king's prerogative, gave him power to preſcribe what habits he pleaſed to the eccleſiaſtics of Scotland; and by the ſecond, the alienations formerly made of tythes, and other eſtates of the clergy, were revoked. Such of the Engliſh nobility who attended the king, and diſliked Laud and his principles, ſoon perceived the Scots were far from approving the bill that gave Charles the power of regulating the habits of the clergy. The dreadful ſurplice was before their eyes; and they apprehended, with ſome reaſon, that under the ſanction of this law, it would ſoon be introduced among them. This diſcovery prompted the Engliſh nobility to attempt another; namely, the real ſtrength of the royal party in Scotland. The courtiers had been at great pains to have believed that the Scots, who had been ennobled and enriched by Charles and his father, were men of the greateſt intereſt, as well as property, in their country. But the falſhood of theſe ſuggeſtions was eaſily perceived by Charles's attendants: they ſaw the Scots in general treat with great contempt the royal favourites of their own nation; and were ſoon convinced, that the perſons of the greateſt weight and property there were in the country intereſt. This diſcovery tended to leſſen the terror conceived by the Engliſh on account of the king's power in Scotland; and laid the foundation of a correſpondence between the principal perſons of the two kingdoms, and which was not broken off till both found themſelves engaged in a civil war. After the king's return from Scotland, Juxon was placed in the ſee of London, and alſo made lord high treaſurer. He was a perſon of great integrity, mildneſs, humanity, and underſtanding; but all his virtues could not procure him the friendſhip of the puritans. He was a lover of hunting, and other ſports of the field; a ſufficient reaſon, however eminent in virtue, to procure him the hatred of thoſe whoſe religion admitted not of the leaſt relaxation. Charles was in the other extreme, and very deſirous of introducing foppery into the national devotion. He renewed his father's edict, for allowing ſports and recreations on Sunday, after the ſervice was over, to ſuch as attended the public worſhip: and ordered his proclamation for that purpoſe to be publicly read by the clergy after divine ſervice. Thoſe who were ſeriouſly affected refuſed obedience, and were puniſhed by ſuſpenſion or deprivation. This tended greatly to widen the breach between the church and the diſſenters, and promote that ill humour and diſcontent already too predominant in the nation. The queen, though ſtrictly virtuous, was immoderately fond of pleaſure, particularly the entertainments of the ſtage; and her example was followed by the whole court, and the greateſt men in the nation. In the midſt of this inconſiderate diſſipation, William Prynne, a barriſter of Lincoln's-inn, publiſhed a quarto of a thouſand pages, intitled Hiſtorio-Maſtyx. Its profeſſed purpoſe was to decry ſtage-plays, comedies, interludes, muſic, dancing, and other diverſions of that kind; but he alſo took occaſion to declaim againſt hunting, public feſtivals, Chriſtmas-keeping, bonefires, and May-poles. The author tells us, in his preface, that he was excited to write againſt theſe enormities by obſerving that plays ſold better than the choiceſt ſermons, and that they were frequently printed on finer paper than even the Bible itſelf. He maintained that moſt of the players were papiſts, and all of them deſperately wicked; that the play-houſes were Satan's chapels, the frequenters of them little better than devils incarnate, and every ſtep in a dance was a ſtep to hell; that the principal crime of Nero was that of frequenting and acting of plays; and that thoſe who conſpired his death were chiefly excited to it by their indignation of that enormity. This publication gave ſo much offence to the court, that Prynne was indicted before the ſtar-chamber, where he was condemned to pay a fine of five thouſand pounds to the king, to be put from the bar, and rendered incapable of his profeſſion; to be excluded from the ſociety of Lincoln's-inn, and degraded in Oxford; to ſtand on the pillory in Weſtminſter and Cheapſide, to loſe an ear at each place, and to ſuffer perpetual impriſonment. The cruel ſeverity of this ſentence raiſed the government many enemies, and greatly augmented the numbers of the puritan party. It was thought extremely hard that an invective againſt plays ſhould merit a puniſhment proper only for the greateſt criminals. But it muſt be remembered, that this ſatire againſt the diverſions in vogue, though the pretended, was not the real crime for which Prynne was condemned. He had ſeverely cenſured the practices of the new hierarchy, and the ceremonies introduced by Laud; a crime not to be forgiven by that imperious prelate.

A. D. 1634. At this time the Dutch were great rivals in commerce to the Engliſh. A prince of Charles's principles was ſhocked at the independent pretenſions of that haughty republic, which had been nurſed by the blood, and fed by the bounty of England; nor had received any adequate ſatisfaction for the maſſacre of Amboyna. James had made ſeveral attempts for hindering the Dutch from fiſhing on the coaſt of England, but all his prohibitions were in vain; the Dutch, after various pretences, at laſt aſſerted they had a right to fiſh upon the Britiſh coaſts, founded on immemorial poſſeſſion. The States of Holland, however, diſavowed this plea of their commiſſioners; but at the ſame time declared, that however unjuſt, and however contrary to the rights of ſovereignty in the crown of England, their practice of fiſhing on the Britiſh coaſts might be, it was ſo abſolutely neceſſary to the very exiſtence of their ſtate, that they dared not either give it up, or pay any acknowledgment for it, leſt their people ſhould riſe in open rebellion againſt them. This was an argument not to be anſwered by reaſon, and Charles was determined to drive them by force from the Britiſh coaſts. To this end vigorous meaſures were begun in ſeveral parts of the kingdom; but theſe could not be carried on without proportional revenues, and thoſe of Charles were only barely ſufficient for maintaining the ſplendor of the court, performing his engagements with foreign princes, and defraying the neceſſary expences of his government. Noy, the attorney-general, was therefore commanded to diſcover ways and means for fitting out a fleet ſufficiently powerful to execute this purpoſe. Noy fell upon the expedient of ſhip-money; grounding it upon obſolete uſages and records, which juſtified a tax upon the people for furniſhing a certain number of ſhips for the defence of the ſeas; and writs were iſſued accordingly. Theſe writs were accompanied with inſtructions and directions from the lords of the council for the aſſeſſing and levying ſhip-money. Inſtructions were directed to the ſheriffs of the ſeveral counties; and by them it appears, that the ſhips aſſeſſed upon the counties of Middleſex and Hertford were to coſt three thouſand pounds; and that thoſe who refuſed to pay their proportion, were to be diſtreſſed and their goods ſold for payment, without any reſpect of perſons. The reſt of theſe inſtructions contain the particular manner of levying the tax, and gave very arbitrary powers to the officers of the peace. The writ being ſerved upon the lord-mayor of London, he immediately ſummoned a common council, where it was agreed to preſent the following petition to the king:

"To the king's moſt excellent majeſty,

"The humble petition of your faithful ſubjects, the mayor, commonalty, and citizens, of your city of London, moſt humbly ſheweth,

"That whereas your majeſty, by writ bearing teſte 20 Octobris laſt, commanded your petitioners, at their own charge, to provide ſeven ſhips of war, furniſhed with men, victuals, and all warlike proviſions; to be at Portſmouth by the firſt of March next, and to continue from that time during the ſpace of twenty-ſix weeks in your majeſty's ſervice, upon the defence of the ſeas, and other cauſes in the ſaid writ contained.

"Your petitioners do, in all ſubmiſſive humbleneſs, and with acknowledgments of your ſacred majeſty's favours unto your ſaid city, inform your majeſty, that they conceive, that by ancient privileges, grants, and acts of parliament, which they are ready humbly to produce, they are exempt and are to be freed from that charge.

"And do moſt humbly pray,

"That your majeſty would be graciouſly pleaſed, that the petitioners, with your princely grace and favour, may enjoy the ſaid privileges and exemptions, and be freed from providing of the ſaid ſhips and proviſions."

Notwithſtanding this oppoſition of the capital, Charles proceeded with as much violence as if ſhip-money had always been an eſtabliſhed tax, and as if he did not expect to meet with the leaſt attempt to oppoſe his arbitrary proceedings. Noy, the attorney-general, dying about this time, left the affair unfiniſhed; but the neceſſities of Charles increaſing, he reſolved that ſhip-money ſhould be extended to the inland as well as the maritime counties. But, in order to this, it was neceſſary to employ proper perſons, and to invent plauſible pretences. Sir Robert Heath, lord chief juſtice, had, in many reſpects, been found untractable, and was accordingly removed from his office, and his place ſupplied by Sir John Finch, a lawyer of great eloquence, and a firm friend to the court; and Sir John Banks was made attorney-general. It was, probably, owing to the opinion of thoſe lawyers, who were far inferior in abilities to Noy, that Charles made ſhip-money a general tax; but even this attempt did not alarm the nation ſo much as was expected. The merchants, who generally take the lead on theſe occaſions, were too well acquainted with the advantages of commerce, to riſque them by an oppoſition which might have given the court a pretence for impoſing heavier duties upon goods; and as the tax propoſed fell more heavy on the landed than the trading intereſt of the kingdom, they did not, for ſome time, conſider it as a ſtretch of arbitrary power. This acquieſcence gave the court a perfect ſecurity. Charles endeavoured to fill the kingdom with apprehenſions, that the Dutch and the French having entered into a new alliance, would certainly attempt to make themſelves maſters of the narrow ſeas; and a proclamation was accordingly publiſhed, commanding all Engliſh ſeamen and ſhipwrights, who were in foreign ſervices, to return home immediately. A deceitful and fatal calm this. The nation ſtill continued to have the higheſt opinion of thoſe patriots, who had, in a manner, forced the king to paſs the petition of right, and rather acquieſced in, than approved of the many breaches daily made in that famous act, eſpecially with regard to ſhip-money. It was about this time that Edward Coke, the eminent lawyer and patriot, paid the debt of nature, in the eighty-third year of his age. But there were not wanting men who trod in his paths, and endeavoured to rouze the public from their lethargy, by ſhewing that the continual encroachments of the prerogative would ſoon baniſh all law from the conſtitution.

Theſe alarming ſuggeſtions had their weight; they occaſioned ſuch diſputes with regard to the payment of ſhip-money, that no more than two hundred and thirty-ſix thouſand pounds were collected during the whole year. This oppoſition, however, produced no change in the conduct of Laud: he continued to exerciſe his eccleſiaſtical power with the greateſt ſeverity. He now attempted to oblige all foreigners ſettled in England to conform to the eſtabliſhed church, notwithſtanding the privileges and indulgencies that had been granted them by former princes, and the infinite advantages the nation acquired by their ſettling in this country. The French and Dutch churches, being joined by all the puritans in England, made a vigorous oppoſition, and refuſed, on account of the exemptions and privileges they had received from the crown, to pay any deference to Laud's authority. The primate, however, prevailed ſo far, that though all foreigners of the firſt deſcent were ſuffered to continue their own method of worſhip, yet thoſe of the ſecond deſcent, that is, thoſe who were born in England of foreign parents, were ordered by the king to repair to their own pariſh churches, under the penalty of being proceeded againſt in the ſpiritual courts.

A. D. 1636. A fleet of ſixty ſail of large ſhips was now fitted out, under the command of the earl of Northumberland; and a proclamation iſſued, ſtrictly forbidding all perſons, not the natural-born ſubjects of theſe kingdoms, from fiſhing on the Britiſh coaſt, without proper licences from the king; who farther declared, that he intended always to keep a ſtrong ſquadron at ſea, in order to prevent all ſuch encroachments for the future, and to protect thoſe ſhips of his friends and allies who ſhould take out licences. The earl of Northumberland ſailed in the month of May; and coming up with ſome of the Dutch ſhips, he ſunk all that refuſed to leave the coaſts, and diſcontinue their fiſhery. This ſpirited conduct ſtruck a terror into all the maritime powers of Europe; even the haughty Richelieu himſelf, who had formed a deſign of rendering the Dutch the rivals of the Engliſh on the ocean, was obliged to abandon his project. The Dutch themſelves applied to Charles in the moſt earneſt manner; and at laſt conſented to pay thirty thouſand pounds for a licence to fiſh during the remainder of the year, when it was hoped a proper regulation would be made for fixing an annual tribute for the neceſſary licences. But no advantages of commerce, reputation or ſafety could prevail upon the people to pay the odious tax of ſhip-money. The progreſs of the ſciences had increaſed their thirſt for knowledge; and the excellent writings and ſpeeches on the conſtitution of England, during the late reign, were now purchaſed and read with the greateſt avidity. But particularly the plain inconſiſtencies between the levying of that tax, and the petition of right, were evident to the moſt ſlender capacity; ſo that neither the ſermons of divines, the opinions of lawyers, the threats of power, nor the arts of courtiers, had any effect: they firmly adhered to the dictates of common ſenſe, and ſet all the ſophiſtical arguments of the artful and the eloquent at defiance. Such, however, was their veneration for the government, that many paid the tax, though they were perſuaded the law could not oblige them. They knew that the judges had taken great pains to recommend it from the bench, and doubted not but an attempt would ſoon be made to render it legal by a formal deciſion. Chambers, a merchant of London, abſolutely refuſed to pay, and was ſent to priſon by Sir Edward Bromfield, lord-mayor, one of the commiſſioners for levying ſhip-money. But Chambers was not to be intimidated by the hand of power: he brought his action againſt Bromfield for a treſpaſs and falſe impriſonment. Sir Robert Berkley, one of the judges of the court, would not, however, ſuffer Chambers's council to argue againſt the legality of ſhip-money, declaring openly in court, "That there was a rule of law, and a rule of government; and that many things which might not be done by the rule of law, might be done by the rule of government." This was the deteſtable doctrine which led Charles to thoſe dangerous precipices from whence he fell, to the ruin of himſelf, and the ruin of his people. A regular diſtribution was now drawn up of ſhips, adapted to the ſeveral ſhires of England and Wales, with their tonnage, number of men, and monthly expence; together with the ſums charged upon the reſpective corporate towns in each county. And Charles, that he might proceed with more ſafety, and remove the ſeveral objections that had been ſtarted againſt paying the tax, procured the opinion of the judges, "That when the good and ſafety of the kingdom in general is concerned, and the nation in danger, the king might lawfully levy a tax for fitting out ſuch a number of ſhips as ſhall be neceſſary for the defence of the nation; and that his majeſty is the ſole judge both of the danger, and when and how it is to be prevented." The king, though he now acted contrary to the laws, determined to puniſh, with the utmoſt ſeverity, all who ſhould, for the future, dare to oppoſe his royal pleaſure. It is amazing with what reluctance the people paid this tax, though they were no ſtrangers to this proſtitution and perverſion of the laws of their country: their uſual aſylum, the courts of law, were ſhut againſt them, and there was no medium; they muſt either ſubmit, or have recourſe to violence, an expedient which no wiſe man would chuſe. A choſen few, however, were ſtill in reſerve; men who dared to think with juſtice, and act with intrepidity; who, armed with the principles of civil and natural liberty, were determined to ſupport the cauſe of their country, and not tamely ſubmit to the arbitrary power of the crown. Strong reaſonings, bold elocution, deep learning, and upright intentions, were not, however, ſufficient to ſuſtain this dreadful combat; a leader muſt be found, who, beſides all theſe accompliſhments, had intrepidity ſufficient to ſtand forth in the cauſe of his country. Such a man was John Hampden, a gentleman poſſeſſed of a conſiderable eſtate, and deſcended from an ancient family in Buckinghamſhire; which, being an inland county, afforded him the better pretence for refuſing to pay the tax of ſhip-money. His ſhare did not amount to more than thirty ſhillings, yet he abſolutely refuſed payment, and determined to venture a trial, the event of which would clearly point out to the whole kingdom, whether arbitrary power was to prevail over juſtice.

A. D. 1637. The caſe was argued, during twelve days, in the Exchequer-chamber, before all the judges of England; and the nation regarded, with the utmoſt anxiety, every circumſtance of this celebrated trial. It will be eaſily conceived, from the opinion of the judges, that the great queſtion in this cauſe was, Whether the kingdom was in ſuch imminent danger, that the king had a right to aſſeſs his ſubjects, without waiting for the neceſſary forms of parliamentary proceedings? It was confeſſed on all hands, that both public and private dangers may be ſo great, that all property may ceaſe, while the parties are providing for their own ſafety. But none of the crown lawyers pretended, that the danger of the kingdom was then ſo preſſing, as to give the king a right to the property of the ſubject; and the ſmall portion of Mr. Hampden's aſſeſſment was no argument for his paying it, unleſs they could prove it to be according to law. Whether the king was, or was not, the ſole judge of the public neceſſity, was ſtrongly debated, but greatly to the diſadvantage of the court; ſince nothing could be more obvious than this, that when public danger becomes ſo preſſing as to confound all property, the caſe will be notorious, and ſelf-preſervation becomes the common principle with both prince and people. It is true, the king may have reaſons, unknown to his ſubjects, to fear the attempts of ſome public or private enemy, and make the neceſſary preparations to render the whole abortive; but nothing here occurred to convince any man of common underſtanding, that the danger, if indeed any was apprehended, might not have been prevented by regular parliamentary methods. With regard to the precedents brought by either ſide from former reigns, they were equally ſtrong for both parties, and therefore were of no weight in deciding this great national cauſe. The truth is, we have too many melancholy inſtances in the Engliſh hiſtory of iniquity being eſtabliſhed, not only by precedents, but by law; and that liberty often borrowed her gloom or luſtre from the vices or virtues that filled the throne. The lawyers, however, that pleaded the cauſe of Hampden, or rather that of their country, had infinite advantage over their antagoniſts, by unanſwerably proving the illegality of the tax from the poſitive and fundamental articles of the Great Charter, and other conſtitutional acts, which no practices, no precedents, ought to affect or deſtroy. And whoever examines with attention the inſtances produced on both ſides, will perceive that the current of precedents runs always ſtrongeſt for the people, in the moſt virtuous periods of government; while thoſe for the crown ſpring from the fear of arbitrary power, from ſlaviſh complaiſance, from immediate danger, from groſs ignorance, or from prevailing corruption. Yet, notwithſtanding the force of the arguments uſed by Hampden's counſel, the event was what had been long foreſeen. The prejudiced or proſtituted judges, four of them excepted, gave ſentence in favour of the crown. Hampden, however, obtained by the trial, the end for which he had ſo generouſly ſacrificed his ſafety and his quiet; the people were rouzed from their lethargy, and became fully ſenſible of the danger to which their liberty was expoſed. Theſe national queſtions were canvaſſed in every company; and the more they were examined, the more evidently it appeared to many that liberty was totally ſubverted, and an unuſual and arbitrary authority exerciſed over the kingdom. Slaviſh principles, it was ſaid, concurred with illegal practices; eccleſiaſtical tyranny lent aſſiſtance to civil uſurpations; iniquitous practices were ſupported by arbitrary puniſhments; and all the rights of the nation, tranſmitted through ſo many ages, ſecured by ſo many laws, and purchaſed by the blood of ſo many heroes and patriots, now lay proſtrate at the feet of the monarch.

Laud proceeded in the ſame imperious manner, and whoever refuſed to ſubmit to his arbitrary meaſures, was ſure to feel the weight of the hand of power. Among others, Williams, biſhop of Lincoln, was ſingled out as a perſon who oppoſed the meaſures of the government, and was a friend to the puritanical party. He was accordingly indicted in the ſtar-chamber, on very frivolous pretences; fined ten thouſand pounds; ſuſpended from his office, and committed to the Tower during the king's pleaſure. Williams, when deprived of his poſt of lord-keeper, retired to his biſhopric, joined the country party, and became one of the chief leaders of thoſe who oppoſed the government. This was a crime not to be forgiven by Laud, though the primate himſelf had been indebted to Williams for his firſt promotion. But to ſee a biſhop countenance puritans; a creature of the court become its obſtinate enemy, and oppoſe with great firmneſs and vigour all the meaſures of government; theſe were circumſtances that excited indignation, and engaged the miniſters to purſue him with the utmoſt vengeance. Men of more generous and more moderate principles beheld theſe tranſactions in a very different point of light; they conſidered the proſecution of Williams as one of the moſt iniquitous meaſures purſued by the court during the time that the uſe of parliaments were ſuſpended. Burton, a miniſter, and Beſtie, a phyſician, were alſo tried in the ſtar-chamber, for writing ſeditious and ſchiſmatical libels, and condemned to ſuffer the ſame puniſhment as had been inflicted on Prynne. Theſe writers had attacked with great ſeverity, and even intemperate zeal, the ceremonies, rites, and government of the church; crimes for which no pardon could be expected from the furious primate. The ſentence of the court was greatly condemned, as very unworthy men of their profeſſion; and the patience, or rather the alacrity, with which they ſuffered the puniſhments inflicted on them, ſtill farther increaſed the indignation of the public. But notwithſtanding all theſe meaſures, there would have been no danger of the government's being overturned, if religious zeal, ſtronger than all human paſſions, had not armed the people againſt their king. We have already ſeen how deſirous Charles was of eſtabliſhing in Scotland the diſcipline and worſhip of the church of England. He was fond of epiſcopacy, and inveſted the biſhops with an authority which he thought equally advantageous to religion and government. He loved church ceremonies, and wanted to have them received as eſſentials in divine ſervice; without reflecting how much all men are attached to their particular modes of worſhip. Charles, confident of his own power, now ſent down canons for the government of the church of Scotland, and a new liturgy for regulating the manner of worſhip. The people were far from being diſpoſed to receive them. The nobility, and the diſſenting clergy, were enemies to the hierarchy; and their univerſal hatred of the church of Rome made them abhor whatever had the leaſt reſemblance to the method of its worſhip. On the ſixteenth of July, public intimations were given from the pulpits, that on the following Sunday the new liturgy would be introduced into the principal churches. Both the biſhop and dean of Edinburgh attended, to give the greater ſolemnity to this new form of worſhip. The latter, dreſſed in a ſurplice, began the liturgy. But he had not proceeded far in the ſervice, before the people cried out, "A pope! a pope! ſtone him!" The biſhop, however, mounted the pulpit, and attempted to appeaſe the tumult. But his endeavours were in vain: they threw a ſtool at his head, and it was with the utmoſt difficulty that both him and the dean eſcaped with life. The contagion ſoon ſpread through the city. The magiſtrates ſuffered a thouſand inſults. The clergy declaimed with the utmoſt vehemence againſt innovations, and compared the populace to Balaam's aſs, whoſe mouth the Lord had opened. Yet, notwithſtanding theſe alarming tumults, no man of any conſequence joined the people. The laws in Scotland were very ſevere againſt treaſon, and men of property were cautious of truſting their lives and fortunes to the furious declarations of an inconſtant multitude. Charles was fatally deceived by this appearance of reſtraint, and attributed their ſilence to an approbation of his meaſures. He had long been deluded by pretenſions, and raiſed to the firſt poſts in the miniſtry thoſe men who hated his perſon, his family, and his religion; they flattered him the more abjectly, that they might ruin him the more ſecurely. The whole cabinet council, indeed, was compoſed of perſons who wiſhed well to the meaſures they ſeemed to oppoſe, and which they were ſometimes obliged to puniſh. The ſpirit againſt the new liturgy daily increaſed among the common people; and the repeated commands of the court to introduce it, proved at once ineffectual and dangerous to the biſhops. The magiſtrates of Edinburgh, where theſe diſturbances chiefly prevailed, were, in ſecret, enemies to the liturgy,; but, in public, they expreſſed the utmoſt abhorrence of the riotous proceedings of the populace, and frequently aſſembled, in order, as they pretended, to concert meaſures for putting a ſtop to theſe alarming attempts of the multitude. They even promiſed to aſſiſt the king to the utmoſt of their power to appeaſe the tumultuous populace, and introduce the new liturgy. But in the mean time a breach enſued between the biſhops and miniſters of Scotland; and ſoon after another between the biſhops and the nobility of that kingdom. The counſel of the moderate biſhops, who had always oppoſed the violent methods of introducing the liturgy, was diſregarded by the new prelates promoted by Laud, and who were perſuaded that the intereſt of their patron with the king was abundantly ſufficient to ſupport them. This induced them to diſregard, not only the advice of their more moderate brethren, but alſo that of the nobility, who took advantage of this neglect to withdraw their countenance entirely from the proceedings of the clergy. The people, animated by the countenance of their miniſters and the nobility, began to unite and to encourage one another to oppoſe the religious innovations introduced into the kingdom. Petitions to the council were ſigned and preſented by perſons of the higheſt quality; the women, as is common in every religious diſturbance, joined with great violence in the oppoſition; the puritan miniſters declaimed vehemently againſt popery; and the pulpits reſounded with the moſt violent invectives againſt antichriſt.

A.D. 1638. Charles, reſolving to perſevere, ſeemed to deſpiſe the threats of the vulgar, and even the defection of the nobility. The primate of Scotland, a man of great temper, wiſdom, and religion, always averſe to the introduction of the new liturgy, repreſented to his majeſty, in faithful colours, the ſtate of the nation. The earl of Traquair, lord-treaſurer, repaired to London, in order to lay the matter more fully before the king. But all their repreſentations were in vain: Charles was inflexible. He had, however, nothing to oppoſe to ſo violent a combination of the whole nation but a proclamation, wherein he promiſed pardon for all paſt offences, and exhorted the people to be more obedient for the future, and to ſubmit peaceably to the uſe of the liturgy. But this was ſo far from producing the deſired effect, that it was immediately oppoſed by a public proteſtation, preſented by the earl of Hume and lord Lindeſay. This was the criſis of the oppoſition: the inſurrection, which had been gathering by degrees, now broke out at once; the ſtandard of rebellion was diſplayed, and the ſword of civil diſcord on the point of being ſheathed in the bowels of that unhappy country. No diſorder, however, attended theſe dreadful appearances; on the contrary, a new order, or rather a new adminiſtration, immediately took place; a ſufficient indication that this diſturbance had been ſecretly fomented by perſons in a ſtation far exalted above the common people. Four tables, as they were called, were formed in Edinburgh: one conſiſted of nobility, another of gentry, a third of miniſters, and a fourth of burgeſſes; and in the hands of theſe four tables the whole authority of the government was placed. One of their firſt, and, at the ſame time, the greateſt act they performed, was that of the Solemn League and Covenant. This celebrated compact conſiſted firſt of a renunciation of popery, formerly ſigned by James in his youth. Then followed a bond of union, by which the ſubſcribers bound themſelves to reſiſt all religious innovations, and to defend each other againſt all oppoſition whatſoever: "and all this for the greater glory of God, and the greater honour and advantage of their king and country." It is aſtoniſhing with what eagerneſs all ranks of people flocked to ſign this covenant, conſidered by them as the bulwark of the Chriſtian religion, which, according to their way of thinking, was practiſed no where in its original purity but in Scotland.

Though a people connot be too jealous of their liberties, and though no government has a right to attack, much leſs to deſtroy them; yet this jealouſy ought to have its bounds in reaſon, in nature, and in duty. The firſt never warrants reſiſtance but under provocation; the ſecond makes ſelf-preſervation to be her primary law; and the latter, by ſupporting ſubordination in government, preſerves the peace, the happineſs, and the tranquillity of human ſociety. But the voice of enthuſiaſm liſtens not to the declarations of reaſon. The Scottiſh preachers, determined to carry their point, though they involved the government of their country in confuſion; and recommended the ſtrongeſt oppoſition to the people. Charles was alarmed, and offered to ſuſpend the introduction of the liturgy, provided they would retract the covenant. Their anſwer was, that they would ſooner renounce their baptiſm. He then relaxed in other matters, in order to preſerve epiſcopal government, and permitted a general aſſembly to be ſummoned at Glaſgow. By this unadviſed meaſure the whole deſign was finiſhed. The laity, whom the Preſbyterians admitted, and who formed the ſtrongeſt part, began with impeaching the biſhops, whom they charged indiſcriminately with all ſorts of crimes. They afterwards declared all acts, with regard to eccleſiaſtical matters, made ſince the advancement of James to the crown of England, null and void. Thus the canons, the liturgy, the court of high commiſſion, and even epiſcopacy itſelf, were aboliſhed in Scotland at one ſtroke. Meaſures like theſe could be ſupported only by arms. They accordingly prepared openly for a civil war; ſeized all places of ſtrength; fortified the town of Leith; and ſo remarkable was the deſire of completing the work, that women of quality mixed with the populace, and carried on their ſhoulders the materials neceſſary for the erecting the fortifications.

A. D. 1639. The king began to raiſe troops to reduce his rebellious ſubjects to reaſon, and ſubdue the refractory ſpirit of the Scots. By his œconomy, he had ſaved two hundred thouſand pounds; and the queen, by her influence with the catholics, engaged them to grant the king a conſiderable ſupply. The Engliſh fleet was very formidable; and well provided with every neceſſary. Five thouſand land forces were embarked on board this ſquadron, the command of which was given to the marquis of Hamilton, who had orders to ſail to the Frith of Forth, and cauſe a diverſion in the forces of the rebels. An army of near twenty thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe, was levied, and commanded by the earl of Arundel, a nobleman of great family, but famous neither as a ſoldier nor a ſtateſman. The earl of Eſſex, a nobleman extremely popular, and of great military abilities, was appointed lieutenant-general, and the earl of Holland general of the horſe. On the twenty-ninth of May the king himſelf joined the army, and ſummoned all the peers of England to attend him. Few diſregarded the ſummons; ſo that the Engliſh army reſembled rather the court of an eaſtern prince, than a military expedition againſt an enemy. The forces of the mal-contents were little inferior in numbers to that of the Engliſh, but almoſt deſtitute of cavalry. The infantry conſiſted, indeed, of an undiſciplined and ill-armed rabble, but animated with a religious fervour, which, in ſome meaſure, ſupplied the want of diſcipline, and rendered them very formidable. The declamations of the clergy had greatly aſſiſted the officers in gaining recruits, by thundering out anathemas againſt "All who went not out to help the Lord againſt the mighty." But the leaders of the mal-contents did not omit the more ſafe and prudent methods of negotiation. They knew that a defeat muſt be fatal; and however their troops might be inſpired with an enthuſiaſtic fury, they were unable to ſtand the regular attacks of diſciplined forces. They therefore immediately ſent very ſubmiſſive meſſages to the king; begged leave to be admitted to a treaty, in order to reſtore tranquillity to their native country, and ſheath the deſtructive ſword of civil diſcord. Several conferences were accordingly held; but ſo many difficulties occurred, that it was ſome time before even any preliminary articles could be eſtabliſhed. At laſt, however, a pacification was agreed to, on the following terms:

"1. The forces of Scotland to be diſbanded and diſſolved, within eight-and-forty hours after the publication of his majeſty's declaration being agreed upon.

"2. His majeſty's caſtles, forts, ammunition of all ſorts, and royal honours, to be delivered after the ſaid publication, ſo ſoon as his majeſty can ſend to receive them.

"3. His majeſty's ſhips to depart preſently after the delivery of the caſtles, with the firſt fair wind, and in the mean time to cauſe no interruption either to trade or fiſhing.

"4. His majeſty has been graciouſly pleaſed to cauſe to be reſtored all perſons, goods, and ſhips, detained and arreſted ſince the firſt of November laſt.

"5. That there ſhall be no meetings, treatings, conſultations, or convocations, of his majeſty's ſubjects, but ſuch as are warranted by act of parliament.

"6. The works on all fortifications to be abandoned, and the places themſelves to be delivered up to his majeſty.

"7. To reſtore to every one of his majeſty's ſubjects their liberties, lands, houſes, goods, and all other particulars whatſoever, taken or detained from them ſince the above term."

The Scottiſh deputies were at a loſs how to appeaſe their principals with regard to theſe articles, which fell far ſhort of what their ſanguine hopes had taught them to expect. Accordingly the earl of Caſſils, and ſeveral other noblemen and heads of the mal-contents, loudly exclaimed againſt a pacification, which was to diſarm them, and leave them, in that condition, to the mercy of the court. No abolition of epiſcopacy, nor acknowledgment of the aſſembly at Glaſgow, had been ſtipulated, as they had been made to believe; the reſtitution of ſhips taken ſince the firſt of November, was but a poor conſideration, in compariſon of the common cauſe; and the drawing off the Engliſh fleet from the coaſt was of little importance, becauſe the ſhips might return whenever his majeſty pleaſed. Add to theſe conſiderations, that Charles, in one of the anſwers he had given to the deputies, had actually diſowned the aſſembly at Glaſgow; nor would he conſent to any thing farther than to refer civil matters to a parliament, and eccleſiaſtical affairs to a general aſſembly; both of which he could call or diſſolve at pleaſure. Nor was the peace more agreeable to the Engliſh: they exclaimed againſt it as loudly as the Scots; and there ſeemed very little hopes that it would be of any long continuance: the ſeeds of diſaffection were ſown in Scotland, and it was no eaſy taſk to prevent their growth.

During theſe tranſactions, an incident happened on the coaſt of England, which ſeemed to threaten alarming conſequences. The firmneſs of Charles, in ſteadily preſerving his neutrality, diſconcerted Richelieu's plan for attacking the ſea-coaſt of Flanders; and the count d'Eſtrades was ſent to conclude a new treaty of ſubſidy with the prince of Orange, in order to enable the Dutch to attack Antwerp, while the French were to beſiege St. Omer's. The ſucceſs of thoſe attempts are foreign to this hiſtory. It will be ſufficient to obſerve, that theſe diſpoſitions induced the court of Spain to fit out a ſtrong ſquadron at Corunna, conſiſting of fifty ſhips, under the command of Don Antonio Doguendo, a celebrated ſea officer. Twelve thouſand foot were embarked on board this ſquadron, which was deſigned to join another fleet of Spaniſh ſhips at Dunkirk. Richelieu gave immediate notice of the ſailing of this fleet to the prince of Orange, who ſoon after diſcovered that the Spaniſh admiral was ordered not to fight, if he could poſſibly avoid it; but put himſelf under the protection of the Engliſh, and landed his men upon the coaſt of Flanders. This armament, and the fear of its being joined by the Engliſh fleet, greatly alarmed both the French and Dutch; and extraordinary efforts were made to put their fleets to ſea, in order, if poſſible, to render any attempt of the Spaniards abortive. A ſmall ſquadron of the Dutch, then at ſea, fell in with and attacked the Spaniſh fleet, but with conſiderable loſs to themſelves. Soon after, the Spaniſh admiral came to an anchor near Dover, where he thought himſelf ſafe under the protection of the Engliſh. But the ambitious Richelieu had no regard to the rights of neutrality, when they oppoſed his views. He ordered d'Etrades to lay before the prince of Orange, "The glory that would attend his defeating the meaſures of two great monarchs, and of crowning all his noble exploits in war, by a victory over the fleet of Spain, under the protection of the Engliſh, and, perhaps, actually aſſiſted by their ſhips." He added, "That ſuch an action would infallibly lay Flanders open to the united forces of France and Holland." The prince of Orange was ſtartled at the thoughts of committing ſo groſs an inſult on the Engliſh flag; and aſked d'Eſtrades, with ſome emotion, "Whether Richelieu was in earneſt?" D'ſtrades aſſuring him he was, the prince ſent orders to Van Tromp to haraſs the enemy with a kind of flying ſquadron; but not to venture a general engagement, till he was joined by admiral Evertſon. As ſoon as this junction was performed, Tromp was ordered to ſend a meſſage to the Engliſh admiral, acquainting him, that having received orders from his maſters to attack their enemies wherever he found them, he requeſted that the Engliſh ſhips might leave the Spaniſh ſquadron, becauſe he was commanded not to attack them, unleſs they aſſiſted the enemy, and in that caſe his orders were to attack both without diſtinction. Charles was in the utmoſt perplexity how to behave on this alarming occaſion. The haughty republicans were now at the height of their power: their fleet, when united, conſiſted of one hundred and fifty ſail of ſhips of war, commanded by the beſt ſea officers in the world; they were highly exaſperated againſt Charles, for refuſing them the liberty of fiſhing on the Britiſh coaſts, and wiſhed for an opportunity of revenging the affront, by deſtroying his fleet. At the ſame time, the public were perſuaded, that the Spaniſh fleet was either intended to conquer England, or aſſiſt the king in ſubduing his rebellious ſubjects. Charles therefore knew that he could not truſt to the fidelity of his ſeamen, even if the Dutch ſhould violate their neutrality. At the ſame time, he knew that the Spaniſh fleet, which conſiſted of ſixty-ſeven large ſhips, was in want both of cannon and ammunition; while the Dutch were liberally ſupplied with both from Calais, and other ſea-port towns in France. It was ſome time before the whole Dutch fleet appeared, and made the proper diſpoſitions for attacking the enemy. During this interval, the Spaniſh miniſter preſented repeated memorials to Charles, for his protecting the Spaniſh fleet, which was now riding at anchor under the guns of the Engliſh caſtles near the South Foreland; while the Dutch remonſtrated ſtrongly againſt any Engliſh ſhip being employed in the Spaniſh ſervice. Charles knew not how to behave in this critical conjuncture, but at laſt determined to obſerve a ſtrict neutrality; and immediately iſſued orders, that no Engliſh ſhip ſhould take any Spaniards on board, or paſs from London below Graveſend without a licence. At the ſame time, he acquainted the Dutch ambaſſador, that he could not, without the higheſt diſhonour, refuſe the Spaniards that protection on his coaſts they had a right to demand from the law of nations; and that he had ſent orders to Sir John Pennington, who lay in the Downs with thirty-four ſail of Engliſh men of war, to join that fleet which ſhould be firſt attacked. This declaration leſſened the ardour of the Dutch; and the Spaniſh admiral found means to ſend twelve large ſhips, and four thouſand men, to Dunkirk. Charles was, however, fearful of the conſequences; and ſent the earl of Arundel to perſuade the Spaniſh admiral to ſlip away the firſt fair wind, as he could not be anſwerable for the ſucceſs of an engagement, if the Spaniards were attacked by the Dutch. Doguendo would gladly have followed this advice, but could not, on account of contrary winds: and the Dutch fleet being now completely reinforced, Van Tromp ſent a letter to Pennington, demanding the benefit of his neutrality, under pretence of the Spaniards having violated their privilege of protection, by firing on the Dutch admiral's barge, and killing one of his men. Tromp accordingly attacked the Spaniſh fleet with the utmoſt fury, forced them to cut their cables, drove twenty-three ſhips a-ſhore, of which three were burnt, and two ſunk. The Thereſa, mounted with a hundred braſs guns, was burnt, ſixteen were taken, and ſent to Fluſhing, with four thouſand five hundred priſoners, and fourteen ſhips were loſt near Bologne; the Dunkirk ſquadron, under Doguendo, only eſcaping. The victory was complete on the ſide of the Dutch, though it was not obtained without ſome loſs, ten of their ſhips periſhing in the action. The king did not fail to repreſent this conduct of the Dutch as an inſult upon the Britiſh flag; and made uſe of it as an argument for enforcing the payment of ſhip-money, in order to be able to keep a ſufficient fleet at ſea to curb the inſolence of thoſe republicans. New writs were accordingly iſſued, and ſent to all the counties of England and Wales, for collecting the tax. About this time the lord-keeper Coventry, who had the good fortune to hold the great ſeal many years, died in poſſeſſion of that high office. Every day now increaſed the obſtinacy of Charles, when it ought rather to have increaſed his caution. He determined to ſeize by violence that power which would enable him to govern the nation without controul, and to exerciſe it with prudence and equity, or, at leaſt, with ſomething which Laud and his own conſcience termed equity. The great ſeal was given to Finch, a man fit for promoting every arbitrary purpoſe. Though the odious tax of ſhip-money was raiſed with great ſeverity, and other acts of deſpotic power were daily exerciſed, the people diſcovered no remarkable uneaſineſs at the neglect of parliaments, and the unconſtitutional meaſures of the government. Peace and plenty reigned in the kingdom, and the wars that raged in the other nations of Europe made England the repoſitory of riches from every part of the world. This greatly contributed to render the people almoſt paſſive in their preſent ſituation. They knew indeed their rights; they murmured at their being violated; they publicly proclaimed their grievances; they proteſted againſt illegal exactions; but a parliament was wanting to give their complaints ſtrength and conſiſtency.

The conduct of Charles in Scotland anſwered the moſt ſanguine hopes of the warmeſt patriots; and the diſpoſitions of the Scots were equally favourable for bringing matters to the criſis they deſired. The nobility, and perſons of conſequence in that kingdom, were perſuaded they had ſufficiently guarded againſt all reſumptions of church revenues, by exacting a promiſe from Charles to call a free parliament, and an aſſembly of the clergy. They would willingly have waited the reſult of both; and that great point, the only one they dreaded, being gained, they would willingly have concurred and acquieſced in every dutiful meaſure towards the crown. But they found the people untractable: they refuſed to ſtop till epiſcopacy was totally abrogated, and the principles of civil liberty founded on a more ſolid baſis than at preſent. This ſcheme might have anſwered the juſt expectations of men of property, and at the ſame time, if not have fully ſatisfied their wiſhes, have calmed the ſpirit of the people; but the whole was defeated through a want of moderation on the part of government. The marquis of Hamilton laid before Charles the deſtructive conſequences that muſt attend his not acting with ſincerity, by leaving the approaching parliament and aſſembly in Scotland at free liberty to gratify the people with regard to every thing that had been underſtood to have been granted by the late pacification. By this he meant the total abolition of the epiſcopal order, both in church and ſtate; but he perceived, by the manner in which the king received his repreſentations, that this would not be granted. He therefore reſigned the office of high-commiſſioner in Scotland, and that invidious poſt was given to the earl of Traquaire.

The moderate part of the Scottiſh nobility would have been content with ſome reſtraints being laid on epiſcopal power in parliament. The marquis of Hamilton was entirely of this opinion, and fairly laid all his reaſons before the king, who had continued ſome time at Berwick. Charles was aſtoniſhed, and ordered fourteen of the chief covenanting lords to attend him, in order to conſult the proper meaſures for ſettling the affairs of Scotland. The people were alarmed at this meſſage; and openly declared, that it had been propoſed by their own leaders, in order to elude the force of the covenant. This ſo greatly intimidated the noblemen, that three only of the fourteen lords could be prevailed upon to obey his majeſty's orders. Montroſe, Loudon, and Lothian, were the perſons who deſpiſed the fury of the populace, when it tended to prevent their obedience to the king. The buſineſs of Charles was ſerious and important: he was deſirous of learning the whole deſign of the covenanters, and what they intended to demand in the approaching parliament and aſſembly. Montroſe was one of thoſe noblemen who thought the king had done enough to ſatisfy all his Scottiſh ſubjects. His two companions, particularly the earl of Loudon, were of the ſame opinion; but wiſhed to have ſecurity for the performance; and this they thought could only be effected by ſome additional bulwarks to the liberties of their country, eſtabliſhed in a full and free parliament. They therefore laid fairly before Charles what they expected from the next parliament. In the firſt place, the currency of the coin in that country was not very large; but its value might be raiſed or lowered by the crown in ſo arbitrary a manner, that all property, in a great meaſure, depended upon the king, and, at beſt, was very uncertain. The ſame power had formerly been exerciſed in England, and proved an intolerable grievance; but it carried with it its own remedy, when commerce enlarged. For foreigners, without regarding the orders of the Engliſh government, always proportioned the price of their commodities to the intrinſic, not the nominal value of the coin. This conduct at laſt obliged the crown to lay aſide thoſe deſtructive practices, which could ſerve only ſome mercenary immediate ends, and the Engliſh mint had been, for ſome time, under excellent regulations. But Scotland had not the ſame remedy againſt this alarming oppreſſion, becauſe the commerce of that kingdom was more reſtrained, and money of much greater value than in England. It was therefore juſtly thought, that the ſubject ought to have ſome ſecurity againſt this grievance; and that the king ſhould declare, "that the coin ſhould not be meddled with, but by advice of parliament." The ſecond grievance enumerated by the Scots, was that of the command of their garriſons being given to ſtrangers. Both James and Charles had, indeed, to uſe their own expreſſions, broken down the partition-wall between the two kingdoms; and the Scots had poured by multitudes into England, where they enjoyed a great number of offices both eccleſiaſtical and military. But the wiſeſt men in both nations condemned this partiality in favour of the native country of their prince; and even the generality of the Scots themſelves were diſſatisfied with the encouragement many of their great men met with in England, which induced them to ſpend both their money and eſtates in that country. The Engliſh, a great and powerful people, had far leſs to apprehend from the Scots than the Scots from them. The caſtles of Edinburgh and Dumbarton were already garriſoned by the Engliſh; and it was always eaſy for their navy to deſtroy the commerce of Scotland. The Scots, therefore, thought it reaſonable, that no ſtranger ſhould be intruſted with the government of any of their caſtles, unleſs by the advice of the ſtates. The heritable juriſdictions of Scotland were thought, even by the natives themſelves, to be dangerous, becauſe they created too great a dependence of the inferior people on particular families. They demanded, therefore, that no commiſſion of juſticiary or lieutenancy might be granted, but for a limited time. Laſtly, they excepted againſt the precedency of the lord treaſurer and lord privy-ſeal, as not being warranted by any poſitive law. This exception was, probably, intended to prevent arbitrary promotions, which might eclipſe the luſtre of their antient nobility, and create too powerful an influence of the crown in parliament. Such were the demands intended by the Scots to be made in the enſuing parliament; and, poſſibly, if Charles had acted with ſincerity, they had ſtopped there; but he could not be prevailed upon to conſent to the abolition of epiſcopacy. The covenanters ſaw this, and were convinced that all conceſſions made by the king muſt be forced, and that he would retract them the firſt favourable opportunity. Their chiefs, therefore, thought they had no ſafety but in uniting more cloſely than ever, and openly oppoſing the power of the crown itſelf. Though their army had ſeparated on the concluſion of the late treaty, they continued ſtill in large bodies; the fortifications of Leith were continued; they iſſued commiſſions for purchaſing large quantities of arms and ammunition abroad; and Leſley ſtill kept up the character and title of general. When Traquaire had received his commiſſion, he returned to Edinburgh, where both a parliament and an aſſembly were held. They immediately paſſed a bill for aboliſhing epiſcopacy, and another for removing the grievances already mentioned. The king was greatly exaſperated at theſe precipitate proceedings, and Traquaire received orders to prorogue both the parliament and aſſembly; but his authority was diſregarded; they continued their ſeſſion, and ſent the bill they had paſſed to Charles for the royal aſſent, pretending that no prorogation ſhould take place without the conſent of the eſtates of the kingdom in parliament. The aſſembly proceeded with equal violence; and all that Charles could obtain was an explanation of the famous covenant, in the following terms: "We do ſwear, not only our mutual concurrence and aſſiſtance for the cauſe of religion, and to the utmoſt of our power, with our means and lives, to ſtand to the defence of our dread ſovereign, and his authority, in the preſervation and defence of the ſaid true religion, liberties, and laws of this kirk and kingdom; but alſo in every cauſe which may concern his majeſty's honour, we ſhall, according to the laws of this kingdom, and the duties of good ſubjects, concur with our friends and followers, in quiet manner, or in arms, as we ſhall be required of his majeſty's council, or any having his authority." Charles was not contented with this explanation, though it was more than could have been expected from perſons of their diſpoſition. The aſſembly paid not due deference to the king's prepoſſeſſions, though they gave the utmoſt indulgence to their own. They voted epiſcopacy to be unlawful in the church of Scotland: the king was willing to allow it, contrary to the conſtitutions of that church. They ſtigmatized the liturgy and canons as popiſh: he agreed ſimply to their being aboliſhed. They denominated the high-commiſſion tyranny: he was willing to ſet it aſide. Both were determined to perſevere; and on this account recourſe was again had to arms, and it was now ſuppoſed the ſword alone muſt decide the diſpute.

A. D. 1640.

On ſigning the late pacification, Charles had diſbanded his army; a very conſiderable ſum of money was neceſſary for raiſing another, and the council was greatly perplexed to diſcover neceſſary ways and means for that purpoſe. The only conſtitutional method, by ſummoning a parliament, was thought a dangerous experiment; but the neceſſities of the crown were ſo preſſing, that it was determined to ſummon that aſſembly. It was, however, thought that there was a neceſſity for ſtriking ſome bold, ſpeedy, and effectual blow, to intimidate the rebels; and that the parliamentary ſupplies would be too ſlow and uncertain to anſwer the purpoſe. The earl of Strafford therefore propoſed a ſubſcription, and generouſly opened it with twenty thouſand pounds. The young duke of Richmond followed his example, and ſubſcribed the ſame ſum. Their examples influenced many of the nobility and clergy; ſo that a large ſum was ſoon ſubſcribed, in order to enable the king to oppoſe his rebellious ſubjects.

The parliament met at Weſtminſter, on the thirteenth of April; and were informed by the lord keeper, Finch, that the king had been able to aſſemble and ſupport his army, not by any revenue he poſſeſſed, but by means of a large debt, amounting to three hundred thouſand pounds, which he had contracted, and for which he had given ſecurity upon the crown lands. He repreſented, that it was neceſſary to grant ſupplies for the urgent demands of his military armaments: that the ſeaſon was far advanced, the time precious, and that none of it muſt be loſt in deliberations: that though his coffers were empty, they had not been exhauſted by unneceſſary pomp, ſumptuous buildings, or any other kind of magnificence: that whatever ſupplies had been levied from his ſubjects, had been employed for their advantage and preſervation, and, like vapours ariſing out of the earth and gathered into a cloud, had fallen in ſweet and refreſhing ſhowers on the ſame fields from which they had at firſt been exhaled: that though the king deſired ſuch immediate aſſiſtance, as might, for the time, prevent a total diſorder in the government, he was far from any intention of precluding them of their right to enquire into the ſtate of the kingdom, and to offer him petitions for the relief of their grievances: that as much as was poſſible of this ſeaſon ſhould be allowed them for that purpoſe: that as he expected only ſuch ſupplies at preſent as the current ſervice abſolutely required, it would be neceſſary to aſſemble them again next winter, when they ſhould have full leiſure to conclude whatever buſineſs had been left imperfect and unfiniſhed: that the parliament of Ireland had twice put ſuch truſt in his good intentions, as to grant him, in the beginning of the ſeſſion, a very large ſupply, and had always experienced good effects from the confidence repoſed in him; and that in every circumſtance his people ſhould find his conduct ſuitable to a juſt, pious, and gracious king, and ſuch as was calculated to promote an entire harmony between prince and parliament.

Theſe topics, however plauſible, produced not the deſired effect. The leaders of the diſcontented party began to foreſee the conſequences of the Scottiſh inſurrection, and to hope that the time ſo long wiſhed for was at hand, when royal authority muſt become wholly ſubordinate to popular aſſemblies, and when public liberty muſt acquire the full aſcendant. A reaſonable compliance with the meaſures of the court, was now conſidered as ſlaviſh dependence; a regard for the king, ſervile flattery; a confidence in his promiſes, ſhameful proſtitution. It was hoped, that by reducing the crown to neceſſities, the king would be puſhed into violent meaſures, which could not fail of ſerving their purpoſes; and that, by multiplying theſe neceſſities, his prerogative, undermined on all ſides, muſt at laſt be overthrown, and rendered no longer dangerous to the privileges of the people. Full of theſe ſentiments, every meaſure that had a tendency to preſerve the government in its preſent form, was zealouſly oppoſed by the popular leaders; who, inſtead of noticing the king's complaints againſt his Scottiſh ſubjects, or his applications for a ſupply, entered immediately upon grievances, and a ſpeech made by Pym upon that ſubject was much more attended to than the harangue delivered by the lord-keeper in the name of their ſovereign. Nor were the Scottiſh covenanters idle. The noblemen and gentry of that party ſtripped themſelves of every luxury, the ladies of their jewels and ornaments, to ſupport the neceſſary expences of what they termed a holy war. Some of the fortifications of Edinburgh having fallen down, the covenanters not only refuſed to ſuffer them to be rebuilt, but openly oppoſed an order ſent by the king for throwing in ſtores, proviſions and ſoldiers, to reinforce that fortreſs: but men, women, and children worked with amazing alacrity on the fortifications of Leith; and the covenanters having demanded that the caſtle of Edinburgh ſhould be delivered into their hands, declared Ruthven, the governor, a traitor, for refuſing their demand. In the mean time the Engliſh houſe of commons had ordered, that the records and proceedings in the ſtar-chamber and king's-bench, concerning ſeveral members of the houſe, in the laſt parliament, ſhould be immediately ſent for, and a ſelect committee appointed on the violation of the privileges of parliament; and that the records, enrolments, judgments, and proceedings in the exchequer, and all other courts, concerning ſhip-money, ſhould alſo be ſent for: they then began with examining the behaviour of the ſpeaker, the laſt day of the former parliament, when he refuſed, on account of the king's command, to put the queſtion, and they declared it a breach of privilege.

They next proceeded to enquire into the impriſonment and proſecution of Sir John Elliot, Holles, and Valentine; after which, they regularly claſſed the grievances under three heads; innovations in religion, the property of the ſubject, and privileges of parliament. Each of theſe branches was referred to a ſeparate committee; and it was reſolved not to grant any ſupplies till theſe grievances ſhould be removed. This ſteady behaviour in the repreſentatives of the people excited the indignation of Charles. He came to the houſe of peers; and having ſent for the commons, told them; "That the cauſe of his coming was to put them in mind of what had been delivered, in his name, by the lord-keeper, at the opening of the ſeſſion. That, contrary to his expectations, the houſe of commons had held conſultations with regard to religion, property, and privileges: that they had voted ſome things on each of thoſe heads, and given them precedence to the matter of his ſupply: that his neceſſities were ſo preſſing as not to bear delay: but if his commons would truſt him, whatever had been promiſed in his name by the lord-keeper ſhould be faithfully performed. That, with regard to religion, his heart and conſcience went together with that eſtabliſhed in the church of England; and he would iſſue ſtrict orders to his archbiſhops and biſhops, that no innovations might be made. That as to ſhip-money, he never made, nor intended to make any profit of it himſelf, but had levied it merely to preſerve the dominion of the ſeas, which was neceſſary; that without it the kingdom would not ſubſiſt; that as for property of goods, and liberty of parliament, he always deſired his people ſhould enjoy them, and conſidered no monarch ſo great as he who governed a rich and free people; that if the commons refuſed to truſt him, the affairs of government muſt be diſordered, and the preſent opportunity of retrieving them irrecoverably loſt: that though they truſted him in part at firſt, yet before the concluſion of parliament he muſt totally truſt to them, and they, at laſt, wholly confide in him for the execution of every thing paſſed in the preſent aſſembly: that ſince there was nothing more than who ſhould be firſt truſted, and that the truſt in him was but a truſt in part, he deſired the lords to take into their ſerious conſideration his and their own honour, the ſafety and welfare of the kingdom, and the great danger with which it was now threatened; and that they would endeavour, by their advice, to diſpoſe the commons to give his ſupply the precedence to grievances. The peers voted, that the ſupply ſhould have the precedency, and that there ſhould be a conference with the commons to diſpoſe them to it. The commons had always claimed the granting of ſupplies, as their peculiar privilege; and the advice of the lords was no ſooner known, and reported to them, than they unanimouſly voted ſo unprecedented an interpoſition to be a high breach of privilege; and that they could not proceed upon any other matter, till they had firſt received ſatisfaction from the upper houſe. The lords ſeemed at firſt determined to reſent the free expoſtulations of the commons; but became at length ſenſible of their error, acknowledged the privileges of the commons, and deſired them to proceed on the important affairs of the kingdom after their own manner. Charles, with a view of bringing the matter of ſupply to a concluſion, ſent a meſſage to the houſe; and knowing that ſhip-money was the chief obſtacle, he offered to aboliſh it entirely, by any law which the commons ſhould afterwards think proper to preſent to him; but firſt demanded a ſupply of twelve ſubſidies, about ſix hundred thouſand pounds, payable in three years, demanding at the ſame time a poſitive anſwer, his affairs being in ſuch a ſtate as could endure no longer delay. The majority was againſt complying with this meaſure; yet the king had many friends in the houſe, and the debate was carried on for two days on both ſides with equal zeal and warmth. The partizans of the court urged, that the happieſt occaſion was now offered for removing all diſguſts and jealouſies between the king and people, and for reconciling the ſovereign for ever to the uſe of parliaments: that to repoſe a reaſonable confidence in the king, and generouſly to ſupply his preſent wants, would be an effectual means of gaining on his generous nature, and extorting, by a gentle violence, ſuch conceſſions as were requiſite for the eſtabliſhment of public order. On the other hand, it was urged, that the court had diſcovered but few ſymptoms of that mutual truſt and confidence to which they now ſo kindly invited the commons: that eleven years intermiſſion of parliaments, the longeſt that was to be found in the Engliſh annals, was a ſufficient indication of the jealouſy entertained againſt the people; or rather for deſigns formed for the ſuppreſſion of all their liberties and privileges; that if the ſame grievances, eccleſiaſtical and civil, under which this nation itſelf laboured, had puſhed the Scots to extremities, it was not neceſſary that the Engliſh ſhould forge their own chains, by impoſing them on their unhappy neighbours: that the antient practice of parliament was, to give grievances the precedency of ſupplies; and that this order, ſo carefully obſerved by their anceſtors, was founded on a jealouſy inherent in the conſtitution, and was never interpreted as any peculiar diffidence of the preſent ſovereign: that ſcarcely any argument more unfavourable could be pleaded for a ſupply, than an offer to aboliſh ſhip-money; a taxation the moſt illegal, and the moſt dangerous, that had ever been impoſed on the nation: and that by bargaining for the remiſſion of that duty, the commons would, in a manner, ratify the authority by which it had been levied; or, at leaſt, give encouragement for advancing new pretenſions of a like nature, in hopes of reſigning them on like advantageous conditions. While the houſe was thus divided in opinions, Sir Henry Vane ſtood up, and told them, that he was authorized to ſay, that the king would accept of nothing leſs than twelve ſubſidies, as a compenſation for the abolition of ſhip-money. Upon this the houſe aroſe. This ill-timed ſpeech threw the whole houſe into a flame, and they immediately adjourned to the next day. Charles was highly provoked, eſpecially when Vane informed him, that the commons intended to aboliſh not only ſhip-money, and other illegal branches of the revenue, but likewiſe to declare their diſapprobation of the intended war againſt the Scots. Determined, therefore, to prevent any attempts of this kind, the king came to the houſe next morning, and having ſent for the commons, diſſolved the parliament.

The reſentment of the people was naturally excited by this haſty meaſure, who ſaw all their hopes blaſted, while none of their grievances had been redreſſed; and the king, as if they had no real grounds of complaint, perſevered obſtinately in thoſe dangerous, unpopular councils, which, from experience, he muſt have known, could only ſerve to inflame their minds. The ſtudies, and even the pockets of the earl of Warwick and lord Broke, were ſearched before the expiration of privilege, in expectation of finding treaſonable papers. Henry Bellaſis, knight of the ſhire for the county of York, and Sir John Hotham, were ſummoned before the council; and not making ſatisfactory anſwers to interrogatives, concerning paſſages in the late parliament, were committed to the Fleet. All the petitions and complaints, which had been ſent to the committee of religion, were demanded from Carew, chairman of that committee, and on his refuſing to deliver them, and thus ſcreening from diſcovery the names of thoſe who complained of innovations in religion, and the proceedings of the high-commiſſion court, he was committed cloſe priſoner to the Tower: which acts of arbitrary power were juſtly interpreted by the people as invaſions of the privileges of parliament. Contrary to undeniable cuſtom, the convocation continued to ſit, and not only exerciſed a very dangerous independency, by granting the king a benevolence, without the ſanction of parliament, of four ſhillings in the pound for ſix years; but made canons, in which all ſectaries were made ſubject to the ſame penalties as thoſe againſt popiſh recuſants; approved the new ceremonies of placing the communion-table, and bowing, towards the eaſt; rendered thoſe ſubject to excommunication who ſhould write, import, print, publiſh, or diſperſe any book or writing againſt the diſcipline and government of the church; and framed an oath, by which the clergy and graduates in the univerſities were to ſwear, that they approved the doctrine and diſcipline of the church of England, and would maintain its government by archbiſhops, biſhops, &c. All theſe canons were eſteemed illegal, becauſe not ratified by conſent of parliament; while the oath was looked upon with abhorrence, by thoſe who did not approve of the doctrine and diſcipline of the church; and beſides, nothing could afford a more apt ſubject for ridicule, than an oath which contained an et cætera in the middle of it. The convocation being generally as much deteſted by the people as the parliament was revered, they could ſcarcely be reſtrained from inſulting and abuſing that aſſembly; whereupon, the king appointed them guards for their protection: nevertheleſs, a body of two thouſand people forced their way into St. Paul's cathedral, where the high-commiſſion court then ſat, crying, No biſhops! No high-commiſſion court! and pulled down the benches. Alſo a great number of apprentices, with others of the loweſt claſs, beſet the archbiſhop's houſe at Lambeth, when one of them being taken, was tried for treaſon, and being condemned, was drawn and quartered, and his limbs ſet up on London-bridge.

As ſoon as his majeſty had diſſolved the parliament, he became convinced of his error. He ſaw his precipitate conduct, and was deſirous, when too late, to retrieve it; he therefore was obliged to have recourſe to his able counſellor Strafford, for ways and means adequate to the exigencies of the ſtate. Strafford had for ſome time been made lord-deputy of Ireland, and in that capacity experienced the misfortune, which attends every prince or miniſter, who attempts to humanize a ferocious people, that of being forced to employ ſeverities, which in a well regulated government would be unjuſtifiable. Many great men in Ireland, friends to the Engliſh adminiſtration, could not bear that impartial rigour which Strafford continually exerted. But his ſervices for his maſter were very conſpicuous. Charles drew upwards of an hundred thouſand pounds a year, clear revenue, from that kingdom. Its manufactures flouriſhed, the people proſpered, the parliament was pleaſed, the army regular and powerful. Strafford imagined theſe particulars ſpoke ſo ſtrongly in his favour, that the voice of calumny would not be heard: he thought his public conduct ſtood in no need of private management, either to vindicate or recommend it. He had alſo the merit of adviſing Charles to call the laſt parliament, a fact not only publicly known, but mentioned with applauſe by both houſes; yet, it muſt be confeſſed he complied too much with the tyrannical principles and practices of his maſter, which in the end terminated in the deſtruction of both. But, notwithſtanding all the efforts of Charles and his miniſter in raiſing neceſſary ſupplies, ſhip-money was now every where diſputed; and the ſheriffs were not only threatened by the council; but the attorney-general was required to ſend for the ſheriffs of the counties of London, Middleſex, Eſſex, Surry, York, Berks, Northampton, and Leiceſter; and was ordered to proceed againſt them as he ſhould find cauſe. The eccleſiaſtical ſubſidies amounted to an hundred and twenty thouſand pounds; and three hundred thouſand pounds were raiſed by ſubſcriptions; but theſe ſums not being ſufficient to defray the expence of the great preparations which were making againſt the Scots, Charles attempted to compel the city of London to lend him two hundred thouſand pounds. The riſing ſpirit of liberty, however, repelled this attack, and he was obliged to be ſatisfied with the dangerous revenge of impriſoning three aldermen, for refuſing to collect the names of thoſe who were able to contribute towards raiſing this ſum; and with proſecuting in the ſtar-chamber, the lord mayor and aldermen, for not diſtraining citizens, who had not paid ſhip-money. At the ſame time, the bullion in the Tower was ſeized, and forty thouſand pounds extorted from the merchants to redeem the reſt. All the pepper was bought of the Eaſt India Company upon credit, and ſold at a great diſcount for ready money: coat and conduct money for the ſoldiery, were again levied, and a ſcheme for coining two or three hundred thouſand pounds of baſe money, in which was to be only a fourth part of ſilver, and the reſt of copper; but this laſt expedient, was, with difficulty, ſet aſide, by a ſpirited diſcourſe of Sir Thomas Rowe, in which he ſtrongly repreſented the many fatal conſequences which ſuch proceedings would naturally occaſion.

Thus while the king and his miniſters were employed, the Scots in the mean time raiſed a more numerous body of troops than they were able to bring into the field the laſt year; for which purpoſe they exacted a tenth penny throughout that kingdom; borrowed large ſums; and the Scotch women, imitating the Roman matrons, gave up their jewels and ornaments to ſupply the neceſſities of their country. Their army was ſooner ready than the king's, and after having taken Edinburgh caſtle, marched towards the borders of England, under the command of general Leſley. The royal army conſiſted of twenty thouſand foot, and two thouſand horſe. The earl of Northumberland was appointed general, the earl of Strafford (who was now recalled from Ireland) lieutenant-general, and lord Conway general of the horſe. According to the original plan of this campaign, an army of twenty thouſand foot, with the two thouſand horſe, was deſigned to act on the borders of Scotland; near Berwick; ten thouſand foot and five hundred horſe were to be landed from Ireland, and to take poſſeſſion of the town of Aire in Scotland; ten thouſand foot and five hundred horſe were to be ſent into the Frith of Forth; but the ſums of money raiſed by the king, were not ſufficient to execute this well laid plan. The Scots ſtill preſerved the moſt ſubmiſſive language, and declared, in their manifeſtos, that they entered England with no other view, than to obtain acceſs to the king's preſence, and to lay their humble petitions at his feet. At Newburn upon Tyne, they were oppoſed by a detachment of five thouſand foot, and two hundred horſe, under Conway, who ſeemed reſolved to diſpute the paſſage of the river. The Scots firſt intreated them in a civil manner, not to ſtop their march; but meeting with a refuſal, attacked them with great bravery, killed ſeveral, and chaſed the reſt from their ground. Such a panic ſeized the whole Engliſh army, that the forces at Newcaſtle fled to Durham; yet not thinking themſelves ſafe, they deſerted that town, and retreated into Yorkſhire.

The Scots took poſſeſſion of Newcaſtle, with the king's magazines of powder, ammunition, and proviſion; but preſerved an exact diſcipline, paid for every thing they had, and diſpatched meſſengers to the king, who was arrived at York, redoubling their expreſſions of loyalty, and deploring the neceſſity of their being obliged to ſhed the blood of their Engliſh brethren. At the ſame time, they treated the priſoners they had taken with ſuch civility, that they brought them over to their ſide; and their reports were afterwards of infinite ſervice to them. Charles was now in the utmoſt diſtreſs: his army was diſcouraged and diſcontented; he was ſerved by officers whom he could not employ; ſurrounded by counſellors whom he dared not truſt: his treaſury was exhauſted; his ſpirits were low, his general diſliked, and his cauſe reprobated by the public. When he mentioned war and chaſtiſing the Scots, he met with coldneſs in every look of his peers, more expreſſive of diſapprobation than the moſt violent debate. He aſked counſel of Strafford. Strafford confeſſed frankly he was for fighting; but the marquis of Hamilton ſtill retained his pacific ſentiments. He recommended, earneſtly this opinion, and was ſo well ſeconded by the reſt of the council, that the king agreeing to a treaty, appointed ſixteen Engliſh noblemen to meet eleven Scotch commiſſioners at Ripon. This was followed by the arrival of a petition of the city of London for a parliament; and by another to the ſame purpoſe, preſented by twelve noblemen; but the king thought fit to ſummon a great council of the peers at York; a meaſure which had formerly been taken on a ſudden emergency, but which could be of little ſervice in the preſent circumſtances of the ſtate.

The parliament met on the third of November, and ſuch was the ſpirit of the times, that the houſe of commons was almoſt full at the very opening of the ſeſſion. The king, in his ſpeech to both houſes, recommended, with ſome warmth, the chaſing the Scots out of the kingdom; ſaid, he was reſolved to confide in the love and affection of his Engliſh ſubjects, promiſed heartily to concur in redreſſing their juſt grievances; and recommended to them to provide for the payment of his army, which muſt otherwiſe be diſbanded, while that of the rebels was kept on foot; but when the commons entered upon buſineſs, committees were appointed for privileges, elections, religion, grievances, courts of juſtice, trade, and Iriſh affairs. Such a multiplicity of complaints now poured upon them, that theſe large committees were ſubdivided into forty leſſer ones. Every hour brought freſh proofs of the diſcontent of the nation; beſides petitions in favour of Leighton, Prynne, Burton, Baſtwick, Lilbowin, and other private ſufferers; and there was not a county which did not ſend up a long liſt of grievances by their ſeveral repreſentatives. Theſe were diſplayed by eminent ſpeakers with great ſpirit and eloquence; and an Iriſh gentleman drew ſuch a lively picture of the tyrannical adminiſtration of the kingdom of Ireland, as increaſed the prejudice of the houſe againſt Strafford, who by his behaviour in every other reſpect had rendered himſelf extremely unpopular. When his arrival in London was known, Mr. Pym enumerated, in a long ſpeech, all the grievances under which the nation laboured; and inferred from a complication of ſuch oppreſſions, that a deliberate plan had been laid for changing entirely the form of government, and ſubverting the ancient laws and liberties of the kingdom. "Could any thing, ſaid he, increaſe our indignation againſt ſo enormous and criminal a project, it would be to find, that, during the reign of the beſt of princes, the conſtitution has been endangered by the worſt of miniſters; and that the virtues of the king have been ſeduced by wicked and pernicious councils. We muſt enquire from what fountains theſe waters of bitterneſs flow; and though, doubtleſs, many evil counſellors will be found to contribute their endeavours, yet there is one who challenges the infamous pre-eminence, and who, by his courage, enterprizes, and capacity, is entitled to the firſt place among the betrayers of his country: I mean the earl of Strafford, lieutenant of Ireland, and preſident of the council of York, who, in both places, and in all other provinces, where he has been intruſted with authority, has raiſed ample monuments of tyranny, and will appear, from a ſurvey of his actions, to have been the chief promoter of every arbitrary meaſure." He proceeded to enumerate ſome particulars, and then entered on a perſonal attack on that miniſter, and endeavoured to expoſe his whole character and manners. He concluded with obſerving, "that it belonged to that houſe to provide a remedy proportioned to the diſeaſe, and to prevent further miſchiefs; which might otherwiſe be juſtly apprehended, from the influence he had acquired over the counſels of their ſovereign." Sir John Hotham, and others, ſpoke to the ſame effect; and after many hours ſpent on the ſame ſubject, while the doors were previouſly locked, to prevent a diſcovery of their purpoſe, it was ſuddenly moved, that the earl of Strafford ſhould be immediately impeached of high treaſon. This motion was received with univerſal applauſe; nor was there a ſingle perſon who ſpoke in his favour. Lord Falkland alone, though known to be his enemy, deſired the houſe to conſider, whether it would not be more conformable to the gravity of their proceedings, firſt to digeſt by a committee, many of thoſe particulars that had been mentioned, before they ventured to ſend an accuſation againſt him to the lords; but this was over-ruled, and after ſome debate, the impeachment was voted, and Mr. Pym choſen to carry it up to the lords; and to ſhew their unanimity on this ſubject, moſt of the houſe accompanied him.

Strafford was now in the houſe of peers, and it is conjectured, that he intended that day to accuſe the lord Say, and other members of both houſes, who were thought to have held a correſpondence with the Scots. He found the lords in a debate, which took them up a conſiderable time; and while he was waiting for an opportunity to addreſs them, Mr. Pym appeared at the bar, and in the names of all the commons of England, impeached him of high treaſon, and deſired that he might be ſequeſtered from all councils, and put into ſafe cuſtody. Mr. Pym then retiring, Strafford was committed to the uſher of the black rod, to remain under his care, until the charges againſt him were ſpecified.

Thus ſucceſsful, the Houſe of Commons proceeded to conſider more particularly public grievances, which they reduced under the heads, privilege of parliament; prejudice of religion; liberty of the ſubject. Under the firſt general head were reckoned, reſtraining the members of parliament from ſpeaking; forbidding the ſpeaker to put the queſtion; impriſoning divers members for matters done in parliament; proceeding againſt them in inferior courts; enjoining their good behaviour, and continuing them in priſon even until death; and abrupt diſſolutions of parliament. Under the ſecond general head of religion were placed, the ſuſpenſion of the laws againſt perſons profeſſing the popiſh religion; their places of truſt and honour; their free reſort to London, and to the court; and their being permitted to have a nuncio, to execute the orders of the pope. Under innovations of religion were enumerated, maintenance of popiſh tenets in books, ſermons, and diſputes; practices of popiſh ceremonies countenanced and enjoined, as altars, crucifixes, and images; diſcouragements of proteſtants by rigid proſecutions of the ſcrupulous, for things indifferent; and encroachment of eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction. Under the third general head was an enumeration of grievances. 1. Tonnage and poundage unduly taken. 2. Compoſition for knighthood. 3. The unparalleled one of ſhip-money. 4. Enlargement of the foreſts beyond due bounds. 5. Selling of nuiſanees by compounding for them. 6. Commiſſion for building. 7. The commiſſion for deputation. 8. Unlawful military charges, by warrant of the king, letters of the council, and orders of the lieutenants of the counties, and their deputies. 9. Extra-judicial declarations of the judges, without hearing counſel or arguments. 10. Monopoliſts countenanced by the council-board, and juſtices of the peace required to aſſiſt them. 11. The ſtar-chamber court. 12. The king's edicts and proclamations lately uſed for maintaining monopolies. 13. The ambitious and corrupt clergy preaching divine authority and abſolute power in kings to act as they pleaſe. 14. The intermiſſion of parliament. Theſe heads of enquiry ſufficiently indicated, that a total alteration of the conſtitution was intended, and this intention was ſupported by ſpeeches enforced by all the eloquence and learning of that age. The houſe of lords were not backward in encouraging this ſpirit of the commons.

Sir Thomas Rowe having made a report concerning the treaty with the Scots, it appeared, that a contribution of eight hundred and fifty pounds a day had, for a conſiderable time, been levied on the inhabitants of the north, and that they had petitioned his majeſty for relief in the moſt affecting terms; and it was known that the Scots had declared, they ſhould conſider the ceſſation of payment as an infraction of the treaty; and ſhould be at liberty to paſs the river Tees, and advance farther into the heart of England. The lord keeper, in a conference between the two houſes endeavoured to prove, that as the lord commiſſioners were the firſt who adviſed a ceſſation of arms, the miſeries of the country, in conſequence of that meaſure, could not be attributed to the king. This being premiſed, he admitted the neceſſity of providing for the Scotiſh army; but at the ſame time enlarged on the abſurdity of ſuffering that of the king's to ſtarve, or be diſbanded. The Scottiſh commiſſioners were by this time arrived in London, where they were received as the guardian angels of the rights and liberties of the people. It ſoon appeared, that the buſineſs of the Scotch commiſſioners was rather to concert meaſures with their friends, than to finiſh the treaty. The great aim of the popular leaders was to protract it; though that could not be effected, but at the enormous expence of maintaining at leaſt forty thouſand men in a country which was now in the utmoſt want.

The Commons, however, thought it highly improper that the ſpirit of oppoſition ſhould loſe any of its vigour, till the parliament had teſtified, in the ſtrongeſt terms, its diſapprobation of the late arbitrary meaſures, and inflicted ſome ſignal infamy or puniſhment upon the principal authors. A committee was choſen to conſider of the ſtate of the nation; and the members were to be directed in their proceedings by the petitions againſt grievances, ſent up by different counties. Religion was one of the principal ingredients in the compoſition of the remonſtrance intended to be drawn up by this committee, and it was reſolved to accuſe Windebank of high-treaſon, for the many ſervices and favours which he, as ſecretary of ſtate, had conferred on prieſts and papiſts. Windebank ſaw their intention; but affected ſuch a firmneſs of reſolution, that the commons imagined he would make a ſtand againſt all the power of their indignation; but being interrupted by a meſſage from the lords, when they were on the point of declaring him a traitor to his country, he took the opportunity of leaving the houſe and fled to France for ſhelter.

The uſurpations of the clergy were now bitterly railed at; and it was reſolved to purge the army of papiſts, to preſent the names of recuſants, to examine the high commiſſion courts of Canterbury and York, and to enquire into the proceedings of the late convocation, or as the clergy themſelves had termed it, the holy and ſacred ſynod. Theſe reſolutions were hardly finiſhed, when alderman Pennington preſented to the houſe, a petition ſubſcribed by above fifteen hundred perſons in the city of London, againſt the hierarchy and government of the church of England, by archbiſhops, biſhops, deans, and archdeacons, praying the houſe, " That the ſaid government, with all its dependencies, roots, and branches, might be aboliſhed; and all laws in their behalf made null and void." A ſchedule was annexed to this petition, conſiſting of twenty-eight articles, in which were contained all the common-place objections to the epiſcopal hierarchy, whether founded on the pretended unlawfulneſs of the order itſelf, or the abuſes and vices of thoſe who compoſed it. Thus was launched the bolt which had been long preparing againſt the church, and which, at laſt, together with the church, deſtroyed the conſtitution of England. The length of the ſchedule annexed to this petition, required time for deliberation; and it was ordered that members only ſhould have a copy of either. Four days after the petition was delivered, the houſe came to the following reſolution: That the clergy of England, convened in any convocation, or ſynod, or otherwiſe, have no power to make any conſtitutions, canons, or acts whatſoever, in matter of doctrine, diſcipline, or otherwiſe, to bind the clergy or laity of this land, without the common conſent of parliament. That the ſeveral conſtitutions and canons eccleſiaſtical, paſſed with the conſent and approbation of his majeſty in the laſt ſynod, do not bind either the clergy or laity of this kingdom. That theſe canons and conſtitutions, eccleſiaſtical, eſtabliſhed with the king's conſent in the laſt ſynod, contain in them many matters contrary to the king's prerogative, to the fundamental laws and ſtatutes of this realm, to the rights of parliaments, and to the property and liberty of the ſubject; and alſo matters tending to ſeditious and dangerous conſequence. That the ſeveral grants of the benevolence, or contribution, granted by his majeſty by the laſt ſynod, are contrary to the laws, and ought not to bind the clergy." Theſe reſolutions were followed by ſeveral bitter ſpeeches againſt Laud, archbiſhop of Canterbury, particularly one by Mr. Grimſtone. He accuſed the primate of having introduced the earl of Strafford to his majeſty, and of procuring the poſt of ſecretary for Windebank, whom he termed " The very broker and pander of the whore of Babylon." He upbraided him for having advanced Montague, Manwaring, and other prelates, ſuſpected of popery; and laſtly, he accuſed him of being the main ſpring and promoter of all the deteſtable projects and monopolies, that had proved ſo oppreſſive to the ſubject. Several others ſpoke nearly to the ſame purpoſe; and it was at laſt voted, that Mr. Hollis ſhould go up to the lords with a meſſage, " To accuſe William Laud, archbiſhop of Canterbury, of high-treaſon, in the name of the commons of England, and to deſire he might be immediately ſequeſtered from parliament, and committed; and that the houſe in a convenient time, will offer particular accuſations againſt him." The primate was ordered to withdraw, but he requeſted to be heard a few words in his place. This being complied with, he began with proteſting his innocency; and added, that he was perſuaded there was not a member in the houſe of commons, who believed in his heart that he was a traitor. He was called to order for that expreſſion by the earl of Eſſex, who obſerved, that the primate had ſeverely reflected on the houſe of commons, by affirming they had brought him in guilty of a charge, which they themſelves did not believe. Laud was deſirous of retracting this indiſcretion, which had eſcaped him without mature deliberation; but the peers were ſo little favourable to his cauſe, that they refuſed to grant him even this ſmall indulgence. He was immediately ſequeſtered from parliament, and committed to cuſtody.

This commitment of Laud was accompanied with the releaſe of biſhop Williams from the Tower. The maxims and conduct of that able prelate were remembered to his honour by all parties. His ſufferings had rendered him popular; and every wiſe and moderate Engliſhman, thought him the only perſon whoſe counſels and prudence could give ſuch weight to the epiſcopal character, as would enable it to ſtem the torrent by which it was now oppoſed. During all his ſufferings he had behaved towards his country like a genuine patriot, and towards the church as a worthy prelate. Thoſe who formed the oppoſition to the king were perſuaded, that the many provocations he had received could not fail of having rendered him an implacable enemy to the court; but the friends of Charles knew too much of his private character to believe, that his reſentments would ever influence him to join with thoſe who aimed at the deſtruction both of church and ſtate. He had made ſeveral dutiful applications to the king to be reſtored to his ſeat in parliament; but all his attempts were defeated by the violent oppoſition of Laud, notwithſtanding the queen herſelf had interpoſed in his favour. This was now publicly known, and a motion was made and carried in the houſe of peers, for reſtoring Williams to his ſeat in parliament. The king readily gave his conſent, and he was, with great pomp, introduced into the houſe of lords, where he omitted nothing conſiſtent with his duty as a churchman, to conciliate the friendſhip and good opinion of the houſe of commons.

The grand cauſe of ſhip-money now came to be heard before the commons, and ſeveral animated ſpeeches were made on the occaſion; and it was reſolved, "That the charge impoſed upon the ſubjects of this kingdom, for the providing and furniſhing of ſhips, and the aſſeſſments for raiſing of money for that purpoſe, commonly called ſhip-money, are againſt the laws of the realm, the ſubjects right of property, and contrary to former reſolutions in parliament, and to the petition of right." This reſolution was followed by others which condemned the extra-judicial determination of the judges upon ſhip-money, publiſhed in the ſtar-chamber; all writs iſſued for levying it; and the judgment in the Exchequer againſt Mr. Hampden. It ſhould be remembered, that all theſe reſolutions paſſed in the houſe without one diſſenting voice; though the members conſiſted of ſeveral gentlemen, who afterwards ruined their families, and loſt their lives in defence of his majeſty.

Notwithſtanding theſe precautions, it was feared that ſome rapacious miniſter might prevail upon the king to diſſolve the parliament, cruſh their proceedings in the bud, and attempt to reduce England to a deſpotic government. To prevent ſo dreadful a calamity, no meaſure was thought ſo proper as ſome poſitive, conſtitutional act, which might render the calling of parliaments leſs precarious, and more frequent. Many ſpecious arguments, beſides thoſe drawn from the circumſtances of this important criſis, were urged with great force and eloquence. Parliaments, in former times, regularly met once a year; and it could not be any unreaſonable conceſſion in the crown to bring the conſtitution ſo far back to its firſt principles, as to paſs an act for triennial parliaments. This bill was ſtrongly ſupported by lord Digby, ſon to the earl of Briſtol. He appealed for the truth of what he urged to the violations of the petition of right, which had happened through the diſcontinuance of parliaments. "Let his majeſty (ſaid he) hear our complaints ever ſo compaſſionately; let him purge away our grievances ever ſo efficaciouſly; let him puniſh and expel ill miniſters ever ſo exemplarily; let him make choice of good ones ever ſo exactly; if there be not a way ſettled to preſerve and keep them good, the miſchiefs will all grow again like Sampſon's locks, and pull down the houſe upon our heads. The people of England cannot open their ears, their hearts, their mouths, or their purſes, to his majeſty, but in parliament. We can neither hear him, acknowledge, nor give, but there. This bill, Mr. Speaker, is the ſole key that can open the way to thoſe reciprocal endearments, which muſt make and perpetuate the happineſs of the king and kingdom. Let no man object any derogation from the king's prerogative by it: we only preſent the bill; it muſt be made a law by our ſovereign; his honour and his power will be as conſpicuous in commanding at once that a parliament ſhall aſſemble every third year, as in commanding a parliament to aſſemble this or that year: there is more of majeſty in ordaining primary and univerſal cauſes, than in the actuating of ſubordinate effects. I do not doubt but that the glorious king Edward III. when he made thoſe laws for the yearly calling of parliaments, did it with a right ſenſe of his dignity and honour: the truth is, the kings of England are never in their glory, their ſplendor, their majeſtic ſovereignty, but in parliament. Where is the power of impoſing taxes? Where is the power of reſtoring from incapacities? Where is the legiſlative authority? In the king, Mr. Speaker, but how? In the king, encircled and environed by his parliament. Out of parliament the king has only a limited power, a circumſcribed juriſdiction; but, waited on by his parliament, no monarch of the eaſt is ſo abſolute in diſpelling grievances. In chaſing away bad miniſters, we do nothing more than diſſipate clouds that may gather again; but in voting this bill, we ſhall contribute, as far as is in our power, to the perpetuating our ſun, our ſovereign, in his vertical, in his noonday luſtre." Such were the ſentiments of a man, who afterwards loſt his life and fortune in the royal cauſe. He thought the ſentiments of liberty were not all incompatible with thoſe of loyalty; that a king of England could be great only by ruling over a free people; and that the people could be no longer free than the king was great. But he believed, and believed with reaſon, that Charles had imbibed falſe notions of royal greatneſs, and that he ſought to make that perſonal, which was only political. That a king of England can do no ill, was an allowed maxim in the conſtitution; but that his miniſters may, and that they may be puniſhed for it, was equally allowed. Charles, while he was able to keep the ſeat of power, ſupported the firſt of theſe maxims, but was willing to evade the latter. He endeavoured to ſcreen his miniſters; and by this prepoſterous conduct he at laſt received, in his own breaſt, thoſe darts of popular reſentment, which were originally aimed only at them. Charles ordered both houſes of parliament to attend him at Whitehall, where he complained ſtrongly of their ſlow proceedings, and recommended to them the better ſupport of the two armies, the forts and the navy. He profeſſed, in very earneſt terms, his deſire of their perfecting the reformation they had begun; but, at the ſame time, wiſhed them not to make any alteration in the eſtabliſhed government. "You have (ſaid he) taken the whole machine of government in pieces; a practice frequent with ſkilful artiſts, when they deſire to clear the wheels from any ruſt which may have grown upon them. The engine may again be reſtored to its former uſe and motions, provided it be put up entire, ſo that not a pin be wanting." But this was far from the intention of the commons; they were perſuaded that the machine was incumbered with many wheels and ſprings which both croſſed its operations, and retaided its utility. Happy would it have been for themſelves, and happy for the kingdom, had they proceeded with more moderation and leſs eagerneſs.

One Can, a Scotchman, and afterwards Roſetti, an Italian, had for ſome years openly reſided at London, and frequented the court, as perſons veſted with a commiſſion from the pope. The queen's zeal and authority with her huſband had been the cauſe of this imprudence, ſo offenſive to the nation. But the ſpirit of bigotry now roſe too high to permit any longer ſuch indulgencies. Informed that the commons were greatly exaſperated at theſe proceedings, and deſirous of removing every cauſe of complaint, the queen ſent a meſſage to the houſe of commons, in which ſhe obſerved, "That ſhe had been always ready to uſe her beſt endeavours for removing all miſunderſtandings between the king and his ſubjects; that, at the requeſt of the lords, who petitioned the king for calling a parliament, ſhe wrote expreſly to his majeſty, conjuring him to have recourſe to ſo ſalutary a method; that ſhe had ſince been moſt willing to do every good office in her power between the king and his people, a circumſtance not unknown to ſeveral in the houſe of lords; and that ſhe would continue to purſue the ſame intention, from a full perſuaſion of it's being the only method of procuring happineſs to the king, to herſelf, and to the kingdom; that it was her earneſt deſire that all things might be juſtly ſettled between the king and his people, and all cauſes of miſunderſtanding taken away and removed: that her majeſty, being informed that the perſon ſent to her from the pope is obnoxious to the kingdom, ſhe is deſirous of giving all the ſatisfaction in her power, and will, within a convenient time, remove him out of England: that underſtanding exception has alſo been taken at the great reſort of people to her chapel at Denmark-houſe, her majeſty will be careful not to exceed what is convenient and neceſſary for the exerciſe of her religion: that as the parliament is not ſatisfied with the method ſhe purſued for raiſing money on the catholics for aſſiſting the king in his late journey to the north, ſhe deſires it may be obſerved, that ſhe was moved to it merely by her dear and tender affection for the king, and the example of many others among his majeſty's ſubjects. If, therefore, any thing in her proceedings be illegal, ſhe hopes it will be remembered, that ſhe was ignorant of any laws to the contrary, and carried away by her great deſire of aſſiſting the king on ſo preſſing an occaſion; but promiſes to be more cautious for the future, not to do any thing contrary to the eſtabliſhed laws of the kingdom: that being deſirous of employing her own power to unite the king and his people, ſhe wiſhes the parliament would look forward, and paſs over ſuch errors and miſtakes as her ſervants may formerly have committed; and promiſes to repay this inſtance of reſpect with all the good offices ſhe can do the houſe; and that they ſhall experience the real good effects of her interpoſition, whenever required.

They now brought in a bill for giving the king the duties of tonnage and poundage for a limited time; but the utmoſt care was taken by the commons, in the preamble, to aſſert their own right of beſtowing this gift, and to diveſt the crown of all independent title of aſſuming it. And that they might increaſe, or rather finally fix, the entire dependence and ſubjection of the king, they voted theſe duties only for two months; and afterwards renewed their grant from time to time, by very ſhort periods. Charles paſſed this important bill without any heſitation; probably with an intention to ſhew, that he entertained not the leaſt intention of ever attempting to govern without a parliament again.

A. D. 1641. At this time, the triennial bill was offered to the king, under the title of “An act for preventing the inconveniencies happening from the long intermiſſion of parliaments;” and, at the ſame time, the commons preſented a bill for the relief of his majeſty's army, and the northern parts of the kingdom, and both received the royal aſſent. No act that had ever paſſed, ſeemed better calculated for preſerving the liberties of the ſubject, than the bill for triennial parliaments; for it provided, “That in caſe the king ſhould refuſe to ſummon a parliament at the time therein limited, the chancellor or keeper of the great ſeal might iſſue writs for ſummoning the peers, and for the election of the commons; and if the chancellor or keeper ſhould neglect to do it, any twelve of the peers might ſummon the parliament; and if the peers ſhould neglect to iſſue the neceſſary ſummonſes, the ſheriffs of the counties, and other magiſtrates reſpectively, were empowered to proceed to the election; and ſhould the ſheriffs refuſe, the freeholders of each county might elect their members; and the members ſo choſen were obliged to attend under ſevere penalties.” Charles ſeems to have been by this time ſenſible of the many miſchiefs ariſing from the too long intermiſſion of parliaments, and to have reſolved to communicate his ſentiments by that method, more freely to his ſubjects; and his giving ſo readily his aſſent to this bill, was highly pleaſing to the people in general, who every where expreſſed their ſatiſfaction by bonfires and other marks of public rejoicings: both houſes alſo waited on the king at Whitehall, with an addreſs of thanks on the occaſion. The king ſeems now to have had nothing elſe in view than the regaining the confidence of his people, by endeavouring to ſatisfy his parliament, and ſmooth his meaſures. In order to this, he agreed to make ſeveral conſiderable alterations in his court. He admitted into his council the earls of Hertford, Eſſex, Bedford, Briſtol and Warwick, the lords Say, Seville, and Kimbolton. Juxon, biſhop of London, who had never deſired the treaſurer's ſtaff, now requeſted to reſign it, that he might apply himſelf entirely to the government of that turbulent dioceſe committed to his care. The king gave his aſſent; and it is remarkable, that, during all the ſevere enquiries carried on againſt miniſters and prelates, the mild and prudent virtues of this man, who bore both theſe invidious characters, remained unmoleſted. The earl of Bedford, a popular nobleman of great authority, wiſdom, and moderation, was intended to ſucceed Juxon; but unfortunately both for king and people, he died about this very time. The king alſo intended to make ſeveral other promotions: St. John was created ſolicitor-general; Hollis was to be made ſecretary of ſtate, in the room of Windebank, who had fled the kingdom; Pym chancellor of the Exchequer, in the place of lord Cottington, who had reſigned; Lord Say, maſter of the wards, in the place of the ſame nobleman; the earl of Eſſex governor, and Hampden tutor to the prince. Charles at firſt imagined, that by making this remarkable conceſſion, he ſhould be able to ſave Strafford's life; but he was greatly miſtaken. His impeachment was puſhed on with the utmoſt vigour; and after long and ſolemn preparations, it was brought to a final iſſue. On this occaſion, Weſtminſter-hall was formed into a ſpacious court of judicature. The earl of Arundel preſided as high-ſteward; the peers ſat in their robes as judges; the commons appeared as accuſers; and therefore it was determined that the impeachment ſhould be managed by commoners. Accordingly, George lord Digby, an Iriſh Peer, John Hampden, John Pym, Oliver St. John, Sir Walter Earle, Geoffrey Palmer, John Maynard, and John Glynn, were appointed a committee for this important office, and Whitlock was choſen their chairman. The biſhops, agreeable to the precepts of the canon law, which forbid their aſſiſting at any trial for life, withdrew. At the upper end of the hall was a chair and cloth of ſtate for the king; and on each ſide a cloſe gallery, in which the king and queen ſat in private during the whole trial.

The trial began on the twenty-ſecond of March, when the accuſations were inforced, ſupported by the united efforts of the three kingdoms. The accuſation and defence laſted eighteen days; and Strafford, in his replies, was obliged to preſerve a reſpect for his moſt implacable enemies, the Scotiſh nation, and the Iriſh parliament. Nothing had hitherto appeared againſt him to juſtify the charge of treaſon. Indeed, the charge itſelf was founded on a kind of accumulative or conſtructive evidence, by which many actions, either totally innocent in themſelves, or criminal in a leſs inferior degree, ſhould, when united, ſubject the perſon to the higheſt penalties inflicted by the law. "Where," ſaid Strafford, in the concluſion of his ſpeech, "has this ſpecies of guilt lain ſo long buried during ſo many centuries, that no ſmoke ſhould appear, till it burſt out at once to conſume me and my children? Better it were to live under no law at all, and by maxims of cautious prudence, to conform ourſelves, the beſt we can, to the arbitrary will of a maſter; than fancy we have a law on which we can rely, and find, at laſt, that this law ſhall inflict a puniſhment precedent to the promulgation, and try us by maxims unheard of, till the very moment of the proſecution. If I ſail on the Thames, and ſplit my veſſel on an anchor, in caſe there be no buoy to give me warning, the party ſhall pay me damages; but if the anchor be marked out, then is the ſtriking on it at my own peril. Where is the mark ſet upon this crime? Where is the token by which I ſhould diſcover it? It has lain concealed under water, and no human prudence, no human innocence, could ſave me from the deſtruction with which I am at preſent threatened. It is now full two hundred and forty years ſince treaſons were defined; and ſo long has it been ſince any man was touched to this extent, upon this crime, before myſelf. We have lived, my lords, happily to ourſelves at home; we have lived glorious abroad to the world: let us be content with what our fathers have left us; let not our ambition carry us to be more learned than they were, in theſe killing and deſtructive arts. Great wiſdom it will be in your lordſhips, and juſt providence for yourſelves, for your poſterities, for the whole kingdom, to caſt from you into the fire theſe bloody and myſterious volumes of arbitrary and conſtructive treaſons, as the primitive Chriſtians did their books of curious arts; and betake yourſelves to the plain letter of the ſtatute, which tells you where the crime is, and points out to you the path by which you may avoid it. Let us not, to our own deſtruction, awake thoſe ſleeping lions, by raking up a company of old records, which have lain for ſo many ages by the wall, neglected and forgotten. To all my afflictions add not this, my lords, the moſt ſevere of any; that I, for my other ſins, not for my treaſons, be the means of introducing a precedent ſo pernicious to the laws and liberties of my native country. However, theſe gentlemen at the bar ſay, they ſpeak for the common-wealth, and they believe ſo; yet, under favour, it is I, who in this particular, ſpeak for the common-wealth. Precedents like thoſe endeavoured to be eſtabliſhed againſt me, muſt draw along with them ſuch inconveniencies and miſeries, that in a few years the kingdom will be in the condition expreſſed in a ſtatute of Henry IV. and no man ſhall know by what rule to govern his words and actions. Impoſe not, my lords, difficulties unſurmountable on miniſters of ſtate; nor diſable them for ſerving, with cheerfulneſs, their king and country. If you examine them, and under ſuch ſevere penalties, by every grain, by every little weight, the ſcrutiny will be intolerable; and no wiſe man, who has any honour or fortune to loſe, will ever engage himſelf in ſuch dreadful, ſuch unknown perils. My lords, I have now troubled your lordſhips much longer than I ſhould have done. Were it not for the intereſt of theſe pledges, which a ſaint in heaven left me, I ſhould be loth."—Here he pointed to his children, and his tears ſtopt him.—"What I forfeit for myſelf is nothing; but I confeſs, that my indiſcretions ſhould forfeit for them, it wounds me very greatly. You will be pleaſed to pardon my infirmities. Something I ſhould have ſaid, but I ſee I ſhall not be able; and therefore I ſhall leave it. And now, my lords, I thank God I have been, by his bleſſing, ſufficiently inſtructed in the extreme vanity of all temporary enjoyments, compared to the importance of our eternal duration. And ſo, my lords, even ſo, with all tranquillity of mind, I ſubmit clearly and freely to your judgment; and whether that righteous doom ſhall be to life or death, I ſhall repoſe myſelf, full of gratitude and confidence, in the arms of the great Author of my exiſtence."

The death of Strafford was conſidered of too great importance to be left unaccompliſhed. A bill of attainder was therefore introduced into the lower houſe, immediately after the concluſion of this pleading, which paſſed the houſe on the twenty-firſt of April, after very warm debates, fifty nine votes only diſſenting, and was immediately ſent up to the lords. On the firſt of May the king went to the houſe of peers, and in a ſpeech, earneſtly requeſted both houſes that they would not carry their proſecutions againſt the earl of Strafford to the utmoſt extremity; declaring upon his conſcience, that he could not condemn him of high treaſon; but aſſured them, that for his miſdemeanors he ſhould never ſerve him, or the kingdom, in any place of truſt, "no not ſo much as a conſtable." This ſpeech was highly offenſive; and the commons voted it a breach of privilege for the king to take notice of any bill depending before the houſe.

At the ſame time emiſſaries were employed without doors, to diſperſe, in different parts of London, papers, containing the names of the fifty-nine members who voted againſt the bill of attainder. Thoſe names were alſo fixed up at public places, under the denomination of Straffordians and betrayers of their country; and thus expoſed to the fury of the multitude, who were arrived to ſuch a pitch of madneſs, that, on the third of May, great numbers from the city appeared at Weſtminſter, armed with ſwords and cudgels, crying out for juſtice againſt the earl of Strafford; and ſuch as were ſuppoſed to be the friends of that unfortunate nobleman, were afraid to appear in public. Eighty peers had conſtantly attended the trial of Strafford; but ſo much were they intimidated by the popular tumults, that only forty-nine were in the houſe of lords when the bill of attainder was introduced; yet even nineteen of theſe had the courage to vote againſt it. About this time a diſcovery was made which heightened the fury of the people, and haſtened the fate of the devoted Strafford. Some principal officers of the king's army, partly from their attachment to the crown, and partly from an averſion to the parliament, had formed a plan for engaging in the king's ſervice the troops under their command. With this view they entered into an aſſociation, bound themſelves by an oath ot ſecrecy, and maintained a cloſe correſpondence with the king's ſervants. The form of a petition to the king and parliament was drawn up, to which they reſolved to procure the ſubſcription of the army. In this petition, after repreſenting the great danger to which the ancient conſtitution of the kingdom was ſubject, by the inſolent proceedings of certain factious and turbulent ſpirits, the army offered to come up and protect his majeſty and the parliament. "So ſhall the nation," as they expreſs themſelves in the concluſion, "not only be vindicated from precedent innovations, but be ſecured from the future which are threatened, and which are likely to produce more dangerous effects than the former." The draught of this petition being conveyed to the king, he was, unhappily, prevailed on to counterſign it, as a mark of his approbation. One of the aſſociation, named Goring, imagining the affair could not long remain a ſecret, diſcovered the whole to the lords Newport and Dungarvon, and they to Pym, who immediately imparted it to the houſe. This diſcovery could not fail to excite the moſt violent indignation among the people. It was now reported, that a ſcheme was concerted between the court and the army, to cut the throats of the parliament, and of all thoſe who ſtood up for their liberties. To convey more ſpeedily their terror and indignation at this plot, the commons voted, that a proteſtation ſhould be ſigned by all the members, to maintain the proteſtant religion againſt popery, to defend the king's perſon, the power of parliament, and the rights and liberties of the ſubject. This proteſtation was ſent up to the lords, and ſigned by all of them, except Southampton and Roberts; and then the commons, by their ſole authority, iſſued orders that it ſhould be ſigned by the whole nation. Alarms were every day given of new conſpiracies, and theſe of ſuch a nature as to keep up the rage of the miſguided multitude, and animate them in their demands of juſtice againſt the unfortunate Strafford.

On the fifth of May a bill was brought into the houſe for continuing the parliament, which ſhould not be prorogued, adjourned or diſſolved, without the conſent of both houſes, until the grievances ſhould be redreſſed. The ſame day the commons ſent to the king, deſiring acceſs to him, which being granted, they attended in the banquetting-houſe, where they preſented to him the bill of attainder againſt Strafford, and that for the continuance of parliament. Charles told them they might expect his anſwer on the Monday following, and ſo diſmiſſed them. He came to the houſe of lords according to his promiſe, and aſſured them of his firm reſolution, for which he offered them any ſecurity, never again to employ Strafford in any public affairs; but at the ſame time owned himſelf entirely diſſatisfied with regard to the circumſtances of treaſon, and on that account declared his difficulty in giving his aſſent to the bill of attainder. The commons, not content with this declaration of the king's, voted it a breach of privilege for him to take notice of any bill depending before the houſe. The nation was now in ſuch a ferment as threatened ſome great and violent convulſion. Wherever the king turned his eyes he ſaw no remedy or relief. He had not a ſervant about him, Juxon excepted, who would ſpeak his mind, or interpoſe, by his advice, between him and parliament. The queen, terrified with the appearance of ſo great a danger, with tears conjured him to ſatisfy his people in this demand, which ſhe flattered herſelf would appeaſe them. But Juxon, whoſe courage was equal to his other virtues, adviſed the king, if in his conſcience he thought the bill unjuſt, by no means to give his aſſent to it. The devoted Strafford, informed of the great perplexity his royal maſter ſuffered, carried his loyalty to an extraordinary height. He wrote a letter to him, wherein he beſought him, for the ſake of public peace, to put an end to his unfortunate, however innocent, life, and to quiet the tumultuous people, by granting them a requeſt for which they were ſo anxious. "In this, ſaid he, my conſent will more acquit you to God than all the world can do beſides. To a willing man there is no injury. And as for God's grace, I forgive all the world with a calmneſs and meekneſs, of infinite contentment to my diſlodging ſoul; ſo, Sir, to you, I can reſign the life of this world with all imaginable cheerfulneſs, in the juſt acknowledgement of your many and exceeding favours." After the moſt violent doubt and anxiety, the king at laſt granted a commiſſion to four noblemen to give the royal aſſent, in his name, to the bill, and likewiſe to that which rendered the parliament perpetual. Charles ſent ſecretary Carlton to inform Strafford of the final reſolution which neceſſity had extorted from him. The earl was at firſt ſomewhat moved, but ſoon recollecting himſelf, he with courage and reſignation prepared to ſuffer the fatal ſentence. Charles paſſed this bill contrary to his conſcience, and ſtill continued to be very unhappy about it. On the tenth of May, he ſent the Prince of Wales to the houſe of peers with a letter, in which he enjoined them to interpoſe their good offices with the commons, in order to procure a mitigation of Strafford's ſentence, or at leaſt a ſhort delay; but both theſe requeſts were refuſed, and a committee of twelve lords was appointed to ſatisfy the king, that even a delay of the death of this noble criminal would endanger both his ſafety, and his family's.

The ſcaffold was erected on Tower-hill, where the earl of Strafford was brought on the twelfth of May. In his way, he ſtopped under Laud's windows, with whom he had long lived in the ſtricteſt friendſhip, and intreated the aſſiſtance of his prayers, in thoſe awful moments which were approaching. The aged primate, diſſolved in tears, and having, with a broken voice, pronounced a tender bleſſing on his departing friend, ſunk into the arms of his attendants. Strafford, ſtill ſuperior to his fate, walked on with an elated countenance, and with an air of even greater dignity than what uſually attended him. His diſcourſe on the ſcaffold was full of decency and courage. He ſaid, "he feared that the omen was bad for the intended reformation of the ſtate, when it commenced with the ſhedding of innocent blood." After bidding adieu to his brother and friends, who attended him, and ſending a bleſſing to his wife and children, who were abſent, he ſaid, "I have now almoſt done. One ſtroke will make my wife a widow, and my dear children fatherleſs, deprive my poor ſervants of an indulgent maſter, and ſeparate me from my affectionate brother and all my friends! But let God be to you and them, all in all." As he was laying his head upon the block, he ſaid, "I thank God, I am not afraid of death, nor am I daunted with any terrors; but do as cheerfully lay down my head at this time, as ever I did when going to repoſe." After finiſhing this ſhort declaration, the executioner, with one blow, put a final period to his life. The parliament, ſoon after his death, remitted to his children the moſt ſevere part of the ſentence, as if conſcious of the violence with which the proſecution had been conducted.

Thus by the death of the earl of Strafford, the great obſtacle to the reformation of the ſtate being removed, the commons proceeded to proſecute the projected plan, with the utmoſt induſtry and vigour. All the taxes which the king had impoſed, the ſtar-chamber, and high-commiſſion court, the extenſion of the foreſts, and the practice of impriſoning thoſe who refuſed to comply with ſuch impoſitions, were voted contrary to law; and the greater part of the monopolies were ſuppreſſed. The judges had hitherto enjoyed their patents only during his majeſty's pleaſure: the commons now petitioned the king to grant them patents during their good behaviour; and Charles was perſuaded to comply with their requeſt. The marſhal's court which took cognizance of offenſive words, and was extremely arbitrary in its proceedings, was ſuppreſſed. The ſtannary court, which exerciſed juriſdiction over the miners of Cornwall, being liable to a like objection, ſuffered the ſame fate. The council in the north, and that in Wales, were both aboliſhed from ſimilar reaſons. The authority of the clerk of the market, who had a right to inſpect the weights and meaſures throughout the kingdom, was transferred to the mayors, ſheriffs, and ordinary magiſtrates. In a word, if we examine the proceedings of this memorable parliament during the firſt period of its operations, we ſhall find, that it was not only productive of many advantages at that time, but of future bleſſings and valuable privileges.

When the treaty with the Scots was brought to a concluſion, Charles allowed the parliament of that kingdom to aſſemble, and declared his intention of aſſiſting at it in perſon. The commons ſuſpecting that he deſigned to put himſelf at the head of his army in the north, under pretence of viſiting his kingdom of Scotland, demanded a conference with the lords; and propoſed that both armies ſhould be diſbanded before his departure, which the king, at their requeſt, poſtponed till the twenty-fifth of Auguſt. Both armies were accordingly diſbanded at the ſame time, and the Scots returned to their own country, very well ſatisfied with their expedition. This being finiſhed, the king ſet out on his journey; but their diſtruſt ſtill ſubſiſting, the parliament propoſed that a committee of both houſes ſhould attend the king into Scotland, under pretence of conferring with the Scotiſh parliament, but in reality of being ſpies upon his majeſty's conduct. Lord Howard of Eſcrick was, however, the only member of the upper houſe, who undertook that journey: but the committee of the commons conſiſted of Nathaniel Fiennes, Sir William Armye, Sir Philip Stapleton, and John Hampden. The commons ſtill continued ſitting, and took ſeveral grievances into conſideration; after which an adjournment from the ninth of September to the twentieth of October was reſolved.

Several members of both houſes now retired into the country; and ſome of the more rigid preſbyterians took this opportunity to propoſe an alteration in the book of common prayer; but the liturgy was ſo vigorouſly defended by Mr. Hyde, afterwards earl of Clarendon, that no ſtep was taken with regard to this ſubject. During this diſpute in the lower houſe, the lords voted, that the book of common-prayer ſhould ſtill be uſed without any alteration. This vote produced a conference between the houſes. The commons deſired the lords to concur with them in publiſhing a declaration for ſuppreſſing all the late innovations in the church, and all diverſions on the Lord's day. On the other hand, the lords demanded the concurrence of the commons in publiſhing an order of their houſe, prohibiting all change in divine worſhip, as eſtabliſhed by law. The lower houſe abſolutely rejected this propoſal, and ordered their declaration to be printed, and diſperſed through the whole kingdom. At the ſame time they appointed a committee of forty-three members to manage all affairs of importance during the interval of their adjournment. The lords eſtabliſhed another for their houſe; and then the adjournment took place.

On the eighth of Auguſt, the king attended by the duke of Lenox, lately honoured with the additional title of duke of Richmond, the marquis of Hamilton, and lord Willoughby, ſet out for Scotland. He was received at Edinburgh with great demonſtrations of affection by the people; and in return for this reception, he not only confirmed the articles of the treaty between the two kingdoms by act of parliament, but likewiſe all his former conceſſions, together with all the particulars that had been tranſacted in their general aſſembly. At the ſame time, to gain more effectually their eſteem, he conferred titles of honour and dignity on ſome, and places of truſt and profit on others. Among the former, the marquis of Hamilton was created a duke; and general Leſley, earl of Leven. While the king was thus aſſiduouſly employed in compoſing the troubles in Scotland, he received intelligence, that a rebellion was broke out in Ireland. The catholics of that kingdom were perſuaded, that they had now the faireſt opportunity of ſhaking off the Engliſh yoke; and religion and liberty, thoſe two ſources of the greateſt actions, hurried them into the moſt barbarous attempt. They agreed to riſe throughout all the provinces in one day, and after ſurprizing the caſtle of Dublin, to murder every proteſtant in the kingdom. The execution of this ſavage conſpiracy was delayed, till the approach of winter, that the ſending troops from England might be attended with greater difficulty. Cardinal Richelieu had promiſed the conſpirators a conſiderable ſupply of men and money; and many Iriſh officers had given the ſtrongeſt aſſurances, that they would heartily concur with their catholic brethren as ſoon as any inſurrection appeared. The deſign upon the caſtle of Dublin, which was to have been carried into execution on the twenty-third of October, was prevented by a timely diſcovery of the plot to two of the lords juſtices the very night before; and thus the capital was preſerved. The bloody part of the conſpiracy was however paſt prevention, for the conſpirators were in arms early in the morning of the day appointed, and actually maſſacred forty thouſand defenceleſs proteſtants. No age, no ſex, no condition was ſpared. The wife weeping for her butchered huſband, and embracing her helpleſs children, was pierced with them and periſhed by the ſame ſtroke. The old, the young, the vigorous and the infirm, underwent the ſame fate, and were blended in one common ruin. In vain did flight ſave from the firſt aſſault: deſtruction was every where let looſe, and met the hunted victims at every turn. In vain was recourſe had to relations, to companions, to friends: all connections were diſſolved, and death was dealt by that hand, from which protection was implored and expected. Without provocation, without oppoſition, the aſtoniſhed Engliſh, living in profound peace, and full ſecurity, were maſſacred by their neareſt neighbours, with whom they had long maintained a continued intercourſe of kindneſs and good offices. Nay even death was the ſlighteſt puniſhment inflicted by theſe monſters in human form: all the tortures which wanton cruelty could invent, all the lingering pains of body, the anguiſh of mind, the agonies of deſpair, could not ſatiate revenge excited without injury, and cruelty derived from no cauſe. Humanity forbids a particular enumeration. Such enormities, though atteſted by undoubted evidence, appear almoſt incredible. Depraved nature, even perverted religion, though encouraged by the utmoſt licence, cannot reach to ſuch a pitch of ferocity. Even the weaker ſex themſelves, naturally tender to their own ſufferings, and compaſſionate to thoſe of others, here emulated their robuſt companions, in the practice of every cruelty. The very children, taught by example, and encouraged by the exhortations of their parents, dealt their feeble blows on the dead carcaſes or defenceleſs children of the Engliſh. Nor was the avarice of the Iriſh a ſufficient reſtraint to their cruelty. Such was their frenzy, that the cattle they had ſeized, and by rapine had made their own, were, becauſe they bore the name of Engliſh, wantonly ſlaughtered, or, when covered with wounds, turned looſe into the woods, there to periſh by ſlow and lingering torments. The commodious habitations of the planters, as if upbraiding the ſloth and ignorance of the natives, were laid in aſhes, or levelled with the ground; and where theſe wretched owners had ſhut themſelves up in houſes, and were preparing for defence, they, together with their wives and children, periſhed in the flames.

The king received intelligence of this inhuman inſurrection by a meſſenger ſent from the north of Ireland, and immediately laid the diſpatches before the Scotiſh parliament, demanding immediate ſuccours for the ſuppreſſion of the rebels. But the Scots referred the buſineſs to the Engliſh parliament, alledging that Ireland depended upon England, and not upon Scotland. Diſappointed in this attempt to procure aſſiſtance, Charles haſtened to London; and, after communicating the account he had received of this ſavage maſſacre, preſſed to ſend immediate relief to the wretched Engliſh ſettled in Ireland. He added, that the inſurrection was not in his opinion, the reſult of any raſh enterprize, but of a conſpiracy long formed againſt the crown of England. "To your care and wiſdom," continued he, "I commit the conduct and proſecution of the war, which, in a cauſe ſo important to national and religious intereſts, muſt of neceſſity be immediately entered upon and vigorouſly purſued." But the commons determined to make this event contribute to the attainment of their favourite purpoſe, and therefore to proceed in a very cautious manner. They had conſtantly encouraged a horror againſt the papiſts, however innocent; they had endeavoured to excite a terror againſt the conſpiracies of that ſect, however improbable. It is therefore no wonder that the whole nation was aſtoniſhed to hear of a rebellion, at once both dreadful and unexpected: a rebellion attended with the moſt deteſtable circumſtances ever recorded. The guilt peculiar to the Iriſh papiſts was eaſily, in the preſent diſpoſition of men's minds, attributed to that whole ſect, who were ſo much already the object of general abhorrence. Accuſtomed to join the prelatical party with the papiſts, the people immediately ſuppoſed this inſurrection to be the reſult of their united councils; and ſeveral artful aſſertions by the Iriſh rebels ſeemed to confirm this unjuſt ſuſpicion.

It being ſuppoſed, that Charles was concerned in the Iriſh rebellion, the Houſe of Commons ſent but very ſlender ſupplies of men and money to that kingdom; and, at the ſame time reſuming their former diſpoſitions, they ſufficiently ſhewed, in every vote, their determined reſolution of extending their own authority, and proportionally abridging the power of the ſovereign. In order to this they embraced every opportunity of exaſperating the people againſt the government. Accordingly, they preſented to him, at Hampton-Court, that famous remonſtrance, which was ſoon productive of the moſt important conſequences. It was not addreſſed to the king, but plainly declared to be an appeal to the people; and the ſeverity of the matter was exceeded only by the ſeverity of the ſtyle. It was indeed a recapitulation of all the wrong meaſures which Charles had purſued ever ſince the commencement of his reign, and for which he had ſo ſeverely atoned by the conceſſions he had undergone. In many other particulars they were remarkably ſevere againſt the popiſh lords and the Engliſh prelates in the houſe of peers, to whom they attributed all the oppoſition they had met with from the upper houſe in all their popular meaſures. They concluded with petitioning the king, for laying on the papiſts and their favourers farther reſtraints and puniſhments; and concluded with declaring, that unleſs he made uſe of ſuch miniſters, both at home and abroad, as they could confide in, they would give him no ſupport. They even let his majeſty know, that he might eaſily gueſs their meaning, though they neither named or impeached perſons; and that it was ſufficient to diſqualify any perſon if they diſtruſted him, or if he had ever been known to countenance or defend any who had been queſtioned in parliament. Had the oppreſſions here complained of ſtill exiſted, this remonſtrance had been a wiſe meaſure: but as all thoſe grievances had been already redreſſed: as the land-marks of the conſtitution had now been refixed; as Charles had been as liberal in granting as his ſubjects had been in aſking: what could any unprejudiced perſon imagine the parliament meant by this remonſtrance? the anſwer is obvious. They intended to inflame the people againſt the government, and throw the whole ſtate into confuſion. It is therefore no wonder that an appeal of ſuch an invidious and malignant nature ſhould meet with a ſtrong oppoſition in the houſe of commons, where it paſſed by only a majority of eleven. One hundred and fifty-nine being for, and one hundred and forty-eight againſt the motion. It was indeed now too evident that thoſe who only deſired the reformation of the government, muſt now divide from thoſe, who were determined to aboliſh monarchy itſelf. The proceedings of the oppoſition were very diſagreeable to many of their own friends in the houſe, who began more and more to diſtruſt their intentions. Mr. Capel, member for Hertfordſhire, a perſon of great integrity and authority in parliament, had been very warm in the oppoſition, and as forward as any member in the houſe for removing the real grievances of his country. The ſame may be ſaid of the lords Falkland and Digby, Sir John Culpepper, Mr. Hyde and many others, whoſe concurrence againſt the meaſures purſued by the court, had given great credit to the oppoſition. But they now thought the king had gone as far as in prudence, and perhaps farther than in duty they could require, and that therefore oppoſition ought to ceaſe. They made no ſecret of theſe ſentiments, and Mr. Capel had been called up to the houſe of peers. Treaties were alſo now begun with many other gentlemen, who were quite wearied out by the encroachment of the puritanical party in the lower houſe, though none had yet the courage to break with the violent party among the commons, lord Digby excepted.

The king received the remonſtrance with ſome impatience, but great civility and politeneſs; and it is remarkable, that it was carried to the king by Sir Ralph Hopton, who afterwards became ſo ſtrenuous an advocate for that prince. In the mean time the leaders of the oppoſition took care to ſtir up the populace againſt the biſhops, who were ſo odious to the puritan party. The whole city was filled with ſedition, and the populace aſſembling in great multitudes before the houſe of lords, exclaimed, "No biſhops! No biſhops!" Twelve prelates, intimidated by theſe riotous proceedings, reſolved to retire, and proteſted againſt all laws, votes, and reſolutions which ſhould be made in their abſence. The lords, upon receiving this proteſt, ſent them to the Tower; and the reſt of the biſhops, dreading the ſame fate, retired from the houſe. Tumults now became every day more outrageous; and ſome reduced officers and gentlemen of the inns of court, offered their ſervices to guard his majeſty's perſon. They accordingly appeared as guards at Whitehall, and frequent ſkirmiſhes happened between them and the people. By way of reproach, thoſe gentlemen who ſupported the royal cauſe, ſtigmatized their antagoniſts with the appellation of roundheads, on account of their having their hair round and ſhort; and theſe, in return gave the others the name of cavaliers. Thus the nation was provided with party names, under which the oppoſite leaders might range their adherents, and ſignalize their mutual hatred and reſentments. The countenance given by the king to the cavaliers proved fatal to that prince, as it furniſhed the commons with the plauſible reaſon for demanding of the king a guard for defending the parliament; and on his refuſal, a committee was appointed, under protection of the citizens, to ſit at Guildhall.

Some ſhort time after, the king committed a more fatal indiſcretion. Lord Digby, who was of a warm paſſionate diſpoſition, repreſented to Charles, that if he exerted the authority of a monarch, his inſolent ſubjects would ſhrink from him. The queen and ſeveral of the courtiers enforced this advice, and the king, who was weak and haſty, yielded to the importunity of his raſh counſellors. It was propoſed to give a finiſhing ſtroke, at one blow, to the oppoſition, by producing undeniable proofs of their having invited the Scots to invade England. Herbert, the attorney-general, with this view, appeared in the houſe of peers, on the third of January, and in his majeſty's name, entered an accuſation of high treaſon againſt lord Kimbolton, a member of that houſe, and five commoners, namely, Mr. John Pym, Sir Arthur Haſlerig, Denzil Holles, John Hampden, and Mr. William Strode. The following extraordinary articles of high treaſon were exhibited againſt them. 1. That they had traiterouſly endeavoured to ſubvert the fundamental laws and government of the kingdom; to deprive the king of his royal power; and to place in the ſubjects an arbitrary and tyrannical power over the laws and liberties of his majeſty's liege people. 2. That they had traiterouſly endeavoured, by many foul aſperſions upon his majeſty and his government, to alienate the affections of his people, and to make his majeſty odious to them. 3. That they had endeavoured to draw his majeſty's late army to diſobedience, and to ſide with them in their traiterous deſigns. 4. That they had invited and encouraged a foreign power to invade his majeſty's kingdom of England. 5. That they had endeavoured to ſubvert the rights, and very being of parliament. 6. That for completing their deſigns, they had endeavoured, ſo far as in them lay, by force and terror, to compel the parliament to join with them, and to that end had actually levied war againſt the king. The lords were ſeized with amazement, on hearing both houſes accuſed of high treaſon; every act which had been made to ſecure the people from any future attempt, condemned, as extorted by violence; and themſelves requeſted to perform ſo unconſtitutional an act, as to commit five members of the lower houſe, over whom they had no power. But their aſtoniſhment was beyond deſcription, when informed, that a meſſenger had been ſent to the houſe of commons, and in his majeſty's name, demanded the perſons of the five members; but was ſent back without any poſitive anſwer. In the mean time, Sir William Fleming, Sir William Killigrew, and others, were at Mr. Holles's and Mr. Pym's, ſealing up their trunks, papers, chambers, and doors. Theſe proceedings being reported to the commons, they came to the following reſolutions: "That the ſerjeant at arms be ordered to apprehend and bring hither, as delinquents, the perſons who have ſealed up the trunks or doors, or ſeized the keys of Mr. Pym, Mr. Holles, or any other member of this houſe; and that the ſerjeant ſhall have power to break open the doors, and to break the ſeals off from the trunks. That if any perſon whatſoever ſhall go to the lodgings of any members of this houſe, and there offer to ſeal the trunks, papers, &c. of any members, or to ſeize upon their perſons, that ſuch members ſhall require the aid of the conſtable, to keep ſuch offenders in ſafe cuſtody, till this houſe give farther order; and this houſe doth declare, that if any perſon whatſoever ſhall offer to arreſt, or detain, the perſon of any member, without firſt acquainting this houſe therewith, and receiving farther order, that it is lawful for ſuch member, or any one aſſiſting him, to ſtand upon his or their defence, and to make reſiſtance according to the proteſtation taken to defend the privilege of parliament."

Exaſperated at theſe proceedings, the king had recourſe to the moſt extravagant reſolution ever formed by any monarch of England: he determined by the advice of his ſycophants, to ſupport what he had begun by one vigorous ſtroke of authority; forgetting that this was a juncture in which he ought not to have expoſed that authority to any new affront. But the king's deſign was not kept ſufficiently ſecret to anſwer his majeſty's intention. The counteſs of Carliſle, ſiſter to the earl of Northumberland, diſcovered it, and ſent intelligence to the five members, ſo that they had time to withdraw a few minutes before Charles arrived. He went the next day, attended by his ordinary retinue, and a train of five hundred followers, to the houſe of commons, in order to ſeize the perſons he had accuſed. Leaving his retinue in the lobby, and the door being immediately thrown open, he advanced to the chair, while all the members roſe up to receive him. Charles looked carefully round, but not ſeeing the accuſed members, he made the following ſpeech:

"Gentlemen,

"I am ſorry for this occaſion of coming to you. Yeſterday I ſent a meſſage to demand ſome, who, by my order, were accuſed of high treaſon. Inſtead of obedience, I received a meſſage. I muſt here declare to you, that though no king that ever was in England could be more careful of your privileges than I ſhall be, yet, in caſes of treaſon, no perſon has privilege. Therefore I am come to tell you, that I muſt have theſe men whereſoever I can find them. Well, ſince I ſee all the birds are flown, I do expect you will ſend them to me as ſoon as they return. But I aſſure you, on the word of a king, I never did intend any force, but ſhall proceed againſt them in a fair and legal way; for I never want any other. And now, ſince I ſee I cannot do what I came for, I think this no unfit occaſion to repeat what I have ſaid formerly, that whatever I have done in favour, and to the good of my ſubjects, I do intend to maintain it." The fury into which the houſe was thrown by this unguarded action of the king, is impoſſible to be deſcribed. Before the king reached the door, ſome of the members called aloud, "Privilege! Privilege!" Immediately after his departure the houſe adjourned till the next day; and the five accuſed members retired for protection into the city. The guards at the gates were immediately doubled, and the greater part of the citizens continued the whole night under arms, while reports of various kinds were raiſed, that the cavaliers and papiſts were coming to fire the city, with the king at their head. The next morning Charles diſpatched a meſſenger to the lord mayor, ordering him to call a common-council immediately. His commands were obeyed; and about ten o'clock, the king, attended only by three or four lords, repaired to Guildhall, where he delivered the following ſpeech to the common-council:

"Gentlemen,

"I am come to demand ſuch perſons as I have already accuſed of high treaſon, and do believe are concealed in the city. I hope no good man will keep them from me: their offences being treaſons and miſdemeanors of a very high nature. I deſire your loving aſſiſtance herein, that they may be brought to a legal trial. And whereas divers ſuſpicions are raiſed, that I am a favourer of the popiſh religion, I do profeſs in the name of a king, that I did, and ever will, to the utmoſt of my power, be a proſecutor of all ſuch as ſhall in any ways oppoſe the laws and ſtatutes of this kingdom, either papiſts or ſeparatiſts; and not only ſo, but I will maintain and defend the true proteſtant religion which my father profeſſed, and will continue in it during life." The lord mayor and aldermen behaved with great civility, and attended the king to Temple-bar; but he could not eſcape the inſults of the populace; the cry of "privilege of parliament!" reſounded from all quarters; and one of the mob, more daring than the reſt, advanced near to the coach door, and called aloud, "To your tents, O Iſrael," words uſed by the Iſraelites, when they abandoned the tyrannical Rehoboam.

The next day a proclamation was iſſued for apprehending the five members, forbidding all perſons to harbour them; and the articles againſt them were printed and diſperſed. The houſe of commons only met to vote, that the king had violated the privileges of parliament, and adjourning themſelves for ſome days, appointed a committee to ſit at Guildhall, to conſider of every thing for the good and ſafety of the city and kingdom, and how to ſecure the privileges of parliament. This committee had alſo the direction of the Iriſh affairs; and the king had ſcarcely left the city, when they drew up a declaration, with regard to the late attempt on the privilege of parliament, which was afterwards confirmed to the houſe. It was conceived in the following terms: "Whereas his majeſty, in his royal perſon, came yeſterday to the houſe of commons, with a great multitude of men, armed in a warlike manner, with halberts, ſwords, and piſtols, who came up to the very door of this houſe, and placed themſelves there, and in other places and paſſages near to the houſe, to the great terror and diſturbance of the members thereof then ſitting, and, according to their duty, in an orderly manner, treating of the great affairs of both kingdoms of England and Ireland; and his majeſty having placed himſelf in the ſpeaker's chair, did demand the perſons of divers members of that houſe to be delivered to him:—It is this day declared by the houſe of commons, that the ſame is a high breach of the rights and liberties of parliament, and inconſiſtent with the freedom thereof; and therefore the houſe doth conceive, that they cannot, with ſafety of their own perſons, or the indemnities of the rights and privileges of parliament, ſit here any longer, without a full vindication of ſo high a breach of privilege, and a ſufficient guard wherein they may confide, for which both houſes jointly, and this houſe by itſelf, have been humble ſuitors to his majeſty, and cannot yet obtain." This committee was treated in the city with the greateſt reſpect, having a guard of ſubſtantial citizens to attend them. Nothing was now talked of but declarations, votes and remonſtrances, againſt the late flagrant breach of privilege; and ſeveral addreſſes were preſented to the king, requeſting him to name the perſons who had adviſed him to purſue ſuch alarming meaſures. Petitions were alſo ſent up from different parts of the kingdom, and among others, the lord mayor, aldermen, and common-council of London, repreſented to his majeſty, "That trade was decayed, to the ruin of the proteſtant religion, and the lives and liberties of the ſubjects, by the deſigns of papiſts; more particularly by their fomenting the Iriſh rebellion, by changing the conſtable of the Tower, by fortifying Whitehall, and his majeſty's late invaſion of the houſe of commons. They therefore prayed, that by the parliament's advice, the proteſtants of Ireland might be relieved; the Tower put into the hands of perſons of truſt; a guard appointed for the ſafety of parliament; and that the five members might not be reſtrained, nor proceeded againſt, but by the privilege of parliament." Charles thought proper to return an anſwer to this petition, in which he obſerved; "that merely to ſatisfy the city, he had removed a very worthy perſon from his command in the Tower; and that the late tumults had rendered it abſolutely neceſſary for him to fortify Whitehall for the ſecurity of his own perſon: that his going to the houſe of commons was to apprehend thoſe five members for high treaſon, to which the privilege of parliament could not extend; but that he never intended to proceed againſt them any otherwiſe than by legal methods only."

Charles, either apprehenſive of danger from the enraged multitude, or unable to bear the triumph of his enemies, contrary to the advice of his friends, retired to Hampton-court before the meeting of parliament. The committee, with the accuſed members, were now conducted to Weſtminſter, with great ſtate and ſolemnity, in a triumphant proceſſion of the city trainbands: the Thames was, at the ſame time, covered with boats and other veſſels, adorned with flags and ſtreamers, in which were ſmall pieces of ordnance; alſo drums, trumpets, and all other kinds of martial muſic. When the news of the parliament being aſſembled was declared to the multitude, they expreſſed their joy by the ſound of trumpets, the beat of drum, the diſcharge of ordnance on the water, and muſketry on the land, intermixed with loud ſhouts and congratulations. The houſe of commons now confirmed all the acts of their committee. The lord Kimbolton entreated the lords not to permit him to lie under a charge, in which his life, his eſtate, and his honour were concerned: but to allow the attorney-general to proſecute the accuſation againſt him: but the next day his majeſty ſent to inform the lords, that he was pleaſed to wave his former proceedings; and that when the minds of people were compoſed, he intended to proceed in an unqueſtionable manner; and aſſured his parliament, that he would be as careful of their privileges as his own. He afterwards, by ſucceſſive meſſages, offered a pardon to the members; propoſed to concur in any law that ſhould acquit or ſecure them, and to make reparation for the breach of privilege, of which he acknowledged they had reaſon to complain. They, however, reſolved not to accept of any ſatisfaction, unleſs the king would diſcover his adviſers in that illegal meaſure; but this he poſitively refuſed. Diſtruſt, fear, and jealouſy, not only poſſeſſed the minds of both houſes, but of all the people. A petition from the county of Buckingham was preſented to the houſe of commons by ſix thouſand men, who promiſed to live and die in defence of the privileges of parliament. The city of London, the counties of Eſſex, Surry, Hertford, and Berks, did the like. A petition from the apprentices was alſo received; and the porters, whoſe number, they ſaid, amounted to fifteen thouſand, preſented theirs, containing the ſame articles with all the others: the privileges of parliament, the danger of religion, the rebellion in Ireland, and the decay of trade. Another petition was preſented in the name of many thouſands of the poor. The very women petitioned; and a brewer's wife, attended by ſeveral thouſands of her ſex, preſented a petition to the houſe, in which they expreſſed their terror of the papiſts and prelates, and their dread of the like maſſacres, rapes, and outrages which their ſex had ſuffered in Ireland. It was now ſufficiently evident from the proceedings of both ſides in this remarkable conteſt for power, that the ſword alone could decide it. Charles, ſeemingly deſirous of averting the horrors of a civil war, ſent a meſſage to the parliament, deſiring, "that they would digeſt into one body all the grievances of the kingdom, and to ſend them to him, promiſing his favourable aſſent to thoſe means which ſhould be thought moſt effectual for redreſs." This requeſt was refuſed; the commons being engaged in matters of far greater conſequence. In ſhort, their leaders had ſo invincible a diſtruſt of Charles, that they put no confidence in his promiſes: and were perſuaded that nothing leſs than wreſting all power from his hand would be ſufficient for their ſafety. By the deſpondency of the king's party, their opponents every where obtained an undiſputed authority; and the bills ſent up by the commons, which had hitherto ſtopped with the peers, now paſſed, and were preſented for the royal aſſent. Theſe were the preſſing bills, and the bill againſt the votes of the biſhops in parliament. The king's power was, by his miſconduct, reduced to the loweſt ebb; and the queen being threatened with an impeachment, and finding no reſource in his protection, was preparing to retire into Holland: the rage of the people being levelled at her, on account of the advice ſhe gave the king; and ſhe being deſirous to facilitate her eſcape from England, prevailed on his majeſty to paſs theſe bills, in hopes of appeaſing for a time the rage of the people.

The commons knowing well that the king would take every opportunity to regain the power of which they had deprived him, reſolved to prevent him by every method their wiſdom could ſuggeſt. The arms and ammunition of the late army had been, by the king's command, laid up in the town of Hull. Previous to the attempt of ſeizing the five members, he had ſent the earl of Newcaſtle to be governor, and to draw into the town as many of the militia as he could. This alarming the commons, they diſpatched thither Sir John Hotham, a gentleman of conſiderable fortune in the neighbourhood, and gave him the authority of governor. They ſent orders to Goring, governor of Portſmouth, to obey no commands, without the king's authority, ſignified to him by the lords and commons; and never ceaſed ſoliciting the king, till he had given the command of the Tower to Sir John Conyers, in whom alone they ſaid they could confide. At the ſame time both houſes preſented a petition, that the forts and militia of the kingdom might be put into their hands. To this the king anſwered, that when he ſhould be informed of the extent of the power intended to be eſtabliſhed in thoſe perſons to whom the parliament deſired to entruſt the command of the militia, and how long he was to be debarred from exerciſing his power over it without the advice of parliament, he would then put in ſuch perſons as the parliament ſhould approve, provided he had no objections to them. The parliament, perceiving that the king's ſole deſign was to gain time, paſſed an ordinance, which reſtored to the lieutenants and deputies the ſame authority they had formerly exerciſed, with power to employ the militia in England and Wales, for the ſuppreſſion of inſurrections and invaſions. The names of the perſons who had been inveſted with this authority, were inſerted in the ordinance; they were to be accountable to parliament, and their authority to continue during the pleaſure of that aſſembly. When this demand was made, the king was at Dover, attending the queen and the princeſs Mary in their embarkation; and he replied, that he had not now leiſure to conſider a matter of ſuch importance, and muſt, therefore, defer his anſwer till his return. The parliament inſtantly diſpatched another meſſage to him, expreſſing their grief at his majeſty's anſwer to their juſt and neceſſary petition; repreſenting, that any delay during ſuch preſſing dangers and diſtractions, was not leſs unſatisfactory and deſtructive, than an abſolute denial. In return, he deſired, if the military authority was defective, it ſhould firſt be conferred on the crown; and promiſed to beſtow commiſſions, but revokable at pleaſure, on the ſame perſons the parliament had mentioned in the bill. To this they inſtantly replied, that the dangers and diſorders of the nation could endure no longer delay; and unleſs the king ſpeedily complied with their requeſt, they ſhould be forced, for the ſafety of the prince and people, to diſpoſe of the militia by the authority of the two houſes, and were reſolved to do it without delay; at the ſame time they invited him to fix his reſidence in London. On the receipt of this meſſage, Charles peremptorily replied, that, for the militia, he was ſo aſſured that his anſwer was agreeable to what in juſtice or reaſon they ſhould aſk, or he, in honour, grant, that he ſhould not alter it in any point; as touching his reſidence near the parliament, he wiſhed it might be ſafe and honourable, and that he had no cauſe to abſent himſelf from Whitehall. "What would you have?" (ſaid the king in his reply.) "Have I violated your laws? Have I denied to paſs any bill for the eaſe and ſecurity of my ſubjects? I do not aſk what you have done for me. Have any of my people been tranſported with fears and apprehenſions? I offer as free and generous a pardon as you yourſelves can deviſe. All this conſidered, there is a judgment of heaven upon this nation, if theſe diſtractions continue. God ſo deal with me and mine, as all my thoughts and intentions are upright for the maintenance of the proteſtant religion, and for the obſervance and preſervation of the laws; and I hope God will bleſs and aſſiſt thoſe laws for my preſervation." This poſitive refuſal produced in the commons the following reſolutions: "That the kingdom ſhould be forthwith put in a poſture of defence, in the way already agreed on by both houſes; and that a committee ſhould be appointed to prepare a declaration to free the houſe from ſuſpicions, and to lay down the juſt cauſes of the fears and jealouſies on which they proceeded."

It was ſuppoſed by the earl of Clarendon, that if the king had returned to the parliament immediately after the queen's departure, and the two houſes had been convinced that he was no longer governed by her dictates, matters would have been compoſed by very moderate conceſſions on his part: but when it was known that his majeſty intended to viſit the northern parts of his kingdom, and to make the city of York the place of his reſidence, and to take the prince with him, they fell into their uſual heats and debates on their juſt cauſes of jealouſy and diſtruſt. When the king reached Huntingdon, he ſent a meſſage to the commons, upbraiding them for their conduct with regard to the affairs of Ireland, and informing them, "That he expected an equal tenderneſs in them with regard to his known privileges, among which he is ſure it is a fundamental one, that his ſubjects cannot be obliged to obey any act, order, or injunction, to which his majeſty had not given his conſent; and therefore he thinks it neceſſary to publiſh, that he expects and hereby requires obedience from all his loving ſubjects to the laws eſtabliſhed, and that they preſume not, on any pretence of order or ordinance, to which his majeſty is no party, concerning the militia, or any other things, to do or execute what is not warranted by thoſe laws, his majeſty being reſolved to keep the laws himſelf, and to require obedience to them from all his ſubjects." Many were the declarations and meſſages which paſſed between the king and parliament during his journey. The king endeavoured to perſuade the people, that, to give the parliament ſatisfaction, he had granted every thing he ought; while the parliament, by commenting on his conduct, ſtrove to convince the nation, that at the very time when they, in a manner, forced his aſſent to their neceſſary demands, he had been, and was now, contriving the means to invalidate thoſe conceſſions. When Charles reached York, he at firſt found the people cautious in offering their ſervice; and the diſpoſitions of men in general not ſo favourable as he expected in the counties more remote from the capital; this induced him to inform the parliament, that he was reſolved to go in perſon to ſuppreſs the rebellion in Ireland, and intended to raiſe in the counties near Cheſter a guard, conſiſting of two thouſand foot, and two hundred horſe, to be armed from his magazine at Hull; and that the officers and common ſoldiers ſhould all take the oath of allegiance and ſupremacy. But both houſes were unanimouſly of opinion, that it would be dangerous and unſafe to conſent to his majeſty's going into Ireland; for their fears were alarmed at the apprehenſions, that he would place himſelf at the head of the two oppoſite armies, that under Ormond, and that of the rebels, who pretended that he allowed of their proceedings. They therefore drew up a petition againſt it; to which they added a reſolution, declaring thoſe enemies to the ſtate, who ſhould endeavour to raiſe forces for Ireland without the conſent of parliament. Manifeſtoes, and all the forerunners of a civil war, were now publiſhed on both ſides. Several papers were publiſhed in defence of the king. In theſe, the Engliſh conſtitution was defined with great preciſion; the three ſpecies of government, monarchical, ariſtocratical, and democratical, were diſtinguiſhed; and the government of England ſhewn to be a compound of the whole, each tempering the other. The authors of theſe papers were Lord Falkland, ſecretary of ſtate, and Mr. Hyde, afterwards Lord Clarendon.

The king, diſappointed in his Iriſh ſcheme, now turned his thoughts towards getting poſſeſſion of the important fortreſs of Hull, where the arms of all the forces levied againſt the Scots had been depoſited. The parliament, jealous of his near neighbourhood to this place, had ſent orders to Sir John Hotham to introduce into the town eight hundred of the Yorkſhire militia; and though this reinforcement was ſufficient to repel any force the king could bring againſt it, yet fearing treachery, they petitioned the king to permit the removal of the magazine to the Tower of London, where the ſtores were much exhauſted. This being denied, the parliament ſent orders to prepare ſhips, and removed the magazine to London. But Charles hoped before this order could be executed, to be himſelf maſter of Hull. To this end he ſent his ſon, the duke of York, the elector Palatine, and ſome of thoſe nobles who had followed his fortune to the town, where they were received with great civility. The next day, which was the twenty-ſecond of April, he advanced with three hundred horſe, and ſent a meſſenger to Sir John Hotham, with a letter, to inform him, he intended to viſit his town of Hull, and the magazine; and ordered him to provide for himſelf and train. Sir John, in great confuſion, called the chief magiſtrates of the town, and officers of the garriſon, to a council, in which it being reſolved not to admit the king, a reſpectful meſſage was ſent, entreating him to forbear his intended viſit; and on his nearer approach the bridge was drawn up, and the garriſon ſtood to their arms. Charles, with a loud voice, demanded entrance; when Sir John kneeling, pleaded his having received his truſt from parliament, and with much civility of language, gave the king an abſolute refuſal. Charles then repeated his demand, and offered to reduce his train to twenty perſons. This was alſo denied. He then deſired the governor to come out to him, promiſing that he ſhould return in ſafety. The governor excuſed his non-obedience; but readily conſented to the demand, that the king's ſon, and the reſt of his friends, ſhould leave the town. Charles enraged at this diſappointment, proclaimed Hotham a traitor, by two heralds at arms, and then returned to Beverley, having ſtaid but five hours before Hull.

The parliament were greatly alarmed at the increaſing inclinations of the inhabitants of Yorkſhire for the royal cauſe, who had raiſed a guard of ſix hundred men for his perſon, and ſeemed determined to aſſiſt him to the utmoſt of their power. The parliament, though they had already levied a guard for themſelves, had attempted to ſeize the whole military power, the navy, and all the forts of the kingdom; yet they immediately voted, "That the king, ſeduced by wicked counſels, intended to make war againſt his parliament, who, in all their conſultations and actions, had propoſed no other end but the care of his kingdoms, and the performance of all duty and loyalty to his perſon: that this attempt was a breach of the truſt repoſed in him by his people, contrary to his oath, and tending to a diſſolution of the government; and that whoever ſhould aſſiſt him in ſuch a war, were traitors by the fundamental laws of the kingdom."

The parliament appointed the earl of Eſſex general of their forces; and the ardour was ſo great among the people in the capital, that no leſs than four thouſand men inliſted in one day. At the ſame time the parliament voted a declaration, which they required every member to ſubſcribe, that they would live and die with their general. Orders were iſſued for bringing in loans of money, in order to maintain the forces levied to defend the parliament: and the zeal of the people was, in this particular, more remarkable, than their enliſting under Eſſex; for during ten days the throng was ſo great, that the perſons appointed to receive the offerings of the populace, had neither time nor room ſufficient for the purpoſe; many of them were therefore obliged to carry back their treaſures till a more convenient opportunity, when the commiſſioners would be at leiſure to receive them.

The parliament, however, were totally eclipſed by the ſplendid appearance of the nobility, who flocked to the king at York. Above forty peers of the higheſt rank in the kingdom attended upon Charles, among whom was the lord-keeper Littelton; while the houſe of lords at Weſtminſter ſeldom conſiſted of more than ſixteen members, and even ſome of thoſe were of the royal party, and conſtantly oppoſed the meaſures of the commons. The king iſſued commiſſions of array all over the kingdom; but the execution of them was voted treaſonable by the parliament. They were, however, greatly aſtoniſhed and alarmed, when they perceived ſo large and reſpectable a part of the kingdom had declared for the king. This produced a new ſet of propoſitions, on which they were willing to come to an agreement. Their demands were,

"1. That the officers of the crown, the miniſters of ſtate, and the governors of all the ports and forts of the kingdom, ſhould be choſen and approved of by the two houſes, or by the council in the intervals of parliament. 2. That no places ſhall be given for life; but that thoſe on whom they ſhould be beſtowed, may hold them no longer than they diſcharge their duty well. 3. That the two houſes, and the council, ſhall name the perſon unto whom the government and education of the king's children ſhall be committed. 4. That no marriage ſhall be concluded, or treated, for any of the king's children, without the conſent of parliament. 5. That the laws againſt jeſuits, and other ſecular prieſts, and in general againſt all papiſts, ſhall be ſtrictly put in execution, without any toleration or diſpenſation whatſoever. 6. That the popiſh lords be expelled from the houſe of peers, and their children taken from them, in order to their being brought up in the proteſtant religion. 7. That ſuch a reformation be made of the liturgy and church government, as both houſes of parliament, with the advice of divines, ſhall adviſe. 8. That the king ſhall reſt ſatisfied with the method taken by the parliament for ſettling the militia. 9. That a ſtrict alliance be entered into with the ſtates of the United Provinces, and other neighbouring princes and ſtates of the proteſtant religion, againſt the pope and his adherents. 10. That the five impeached members be cleared by act of parliament, and reſtored to their rights, that future parliaments may be ſecured from the conſequence of that bad example. 11. That peers made hereafter be reſtrained from ſitting and voting in parliament, without the conſent of both houſes. 12. That the military forces now attending the king be diſcharged. 13. That the lords and others of the privy council, and others in offices and employments, be removed, except ſuch only as ſhall be approved of by both houſes of parliament; and that the perſons made choice of to fill their places and employments, may be approved of by both houſes of parliament; and that the privy counſellors ſhall take an oath for the due execution of their places, in ſuch form as ſhall be approved of by the parliament. 14. That the great affairs of the kingdom ſhall not be concluded nor tranſacted by the advice of private men, or by any unknown or unſworn counſellors; but that ſuch matters as concern the public, and are proper for the high court of parliament, ſhall be debated, reſolved, and tranſacted only in parliament; and ſuch as ſhall preſume to do any thing to the contrary, ſhall be reſerved to the cenſure and judgment of parliament; and ſuch other matters of ſtate as are proper for the privy council, ſhall be debated and concluded by ſuch of the nobility and others as ſhall, from time to time, be choſen to fill that board, by approbation of both houſes of parliament; and that no public act, concerning the affairs of the kingdom, which is proper for the privy council, ſhall be eſteemed of any validity, as proceeding from the royal authority, unleſs it be done with the advice and conſent of the major part of the council, atteſted under their hands; that the council ſhall be limited to a certain number, not exceeding twenty-five, nor under fifteen; and if any counſellor's place happen to be vacant, it ſhall not be ſupplied without the aſſent of the major part of the council, which choice ſhall be confirmed at the next ſitting of parliament, or elſe be void. 15. That the lord high ſteward of England, the lord high conſtable, the lord chancellor, or keeper of the great ſeal, the lord treaſurer, the lord privy ſeal, the earl marſhal, the lord admiral, the warden of the cinque ports, the chief governor of Ireland, the chancellor of the exchequer, the maſter of the wards, the ſeveral ſecretaries of ſtate, the two chief juſtices and chief baron, ſhall always be choſen with the approbation of both houſes of parliament; and in the intervals of parliament, by the aſſent of the major part of the council, in the ſame manner as is before expreſſed in the choice of counſellors. 16. That ſuch members of either houſe of parliament, as, during this preſent parliament, have been put out of any place or office, ſhall either be reſtored, or otherwiſe have ſatisfaction, upon the petition of ſuch houſe of which they are members. 17. That all privy-counſellors and judges ſhall take an oath, the form whereof ſhall be agreed upon and ſettled by act of parliament, for maintaining the petition of right, and of certain ſtatutes made by this parliament, which ſhall be mentioned by both houſes; and that an enquiry of all breaches and violations of thoſe laws ſhall be given in charge by the juſtices of the king's-bench every term, and by the judges of aſſize in their circuits, and juſtices of the peace at the ſeſſions, to be preſented and puniſhed according to law. 18. That the juſtice of parliament ſhall paſs upon all delinquents, whether they be within the kingdom or in foreign parts; and that all perſons, cited by either houſe of parliament, ſhall appear, and abide the cenſure of parliament. 19. That a general pardon ſhall be granted, with ſuch exceptions as ſhall be adviſed by both houſes of parliament." It muſt be acknowledged that theſe propoſitions new modelled the conſtitution, and would have infuſed ſo much of a republican ſpirit into it, as to have left the king little more than the ſhadow of royalty, and deprived him of every prerogative pernicious to good government; but in his preſent circumſtances, he was not in a diſpoſition to conſent to ſuch an abridgment of his royal privileges. "Should I grant theſe demands," ſaid he, in his reply, "I may be waited on bare-headed; I may have my hand kiſſed; the title of majeſty continued to me; and the king's authority ſignified by both houſes of parliament, may be ſtill the ſtile of your commands: I may have ſwords and maces carried before me, and pleaſe myſelf with the ſight of a crown and ſceptre; but even theſe twigs would not long flouriſh, when the ſtock upon which they grew was dead; but as to true and real power, I ſhould remain but the outſide, but the picture, but the ſign of a king."

About this time the queen, by diſpoſing of the crown jewels in Holland, had been enabled to purchaſe a conſiderable quantity of arms and ammunition; and a ſmall veſſel laden with part of theſe, after having eſcaped many dangers, arrived ſafely to the king, who now prevailed with the nobility of York to ſign a paper, in which they engaged to defend his perſon, crown, and dignity, and to iſſue out commiſſions of array; at the ſame time declaring, that his intentions were not to make war againſt the parliament, but againſt a few malignant ſpirits whom he was determined to bring to juſtice. The commiſſion of array was an antiquated prerogative, founded on a ſtatute of Henry IV. which had been repealed, and therefore gave great offence.

The parliament having received advice from Holland, that veſſels had ſailed from thence laden with arms, with prince Rupert, prince Maurice, and other officers on board, who intended to ſerve in the royal army, that ſome of the troops raiſed by the commiſſion of array had begun hoſtilities on the militia, and had attempted to ſeize a magazine of arms in Leiceſterſhire, guarded by the earl of Stamford; that the earl and his followers were declared traitors; that troops were ſent into Lincolnſhire, and horſes ſeized by force; that a garriſon was put into Newcaſtle; that fortifications were erected on the river Tyne, to interrupt the conveyance of coal; that ſeveral commiſſions had been delivered out to raiſe volunteers for the king's ſervice; and that a threatening declaration was made againſt the proceedings of both houſes; they reſolved to put themſelves in a poſture of defence, and paſſed a vote for raiſing an army, of which the earl of Eſſex ſhould be general, and the earl of Bedford commander of the horſe. At the ſame time a vote was paſſed for petitioning the king to come to an agreement with his parliament. Their propoſals, however, were rejected. Charles proceeded to attempt the reduction of Hull; but the earl of Lindſey, after making a few impotent attacks with a ſmall body of raw, undiſciplined troops, amounting to two thouſand five hundred horſe and foot, was obliged to draw off his forces. However, this repulſe was fully compenſated by the conduct of Goring, governor of Portſmouth, who, notwithſtanding his having profeſſed the moſt ſtrict attachment to the parliament, declared for the king. The acquiſition of ſuch an important ſea-port town elated Charles to ſuch a degree, that he immediately publiſhed a declaration, in which he recapitulated all thoſe actions, which he termed inſolent and rebellious in the two houſes; and at the ſame time publiſhed a proclamation, requiring all men who could bear arms to repair to his ſtandard, which was to be erected at Nottingham, on the twenty-fifth of Auguſt following. It ſhould be remembered, as a proper clue to the tranſactions of this reign, by all thoſe who would candidly inveſtigate cauſes and motives, that the nation had at that time the higheſt veneration for parliaments. The cuſtom of reviling thoſe aſſemblies for corruption was then unknown; and the houſe of commons was conſidered in no other light than as the repreſentatives of the people, whoſe intereſt was the ſame with that of the public, who were the eternal guardians of law and liberty, and whom no motive could ever engage but the neceſſary defence of the nation, in an oppoſition to the crown. Hence the torrent of general affection ran to the parliament, who, actuated by a generous love of freedom, and incited by the fear of again falling into that ſlavery from which they had gloriouſly redeemed themſelves and their country, were now excited by every conſideration of public and private intereſt, to defend themſelves againſt a prince, who for the ſpace of twelve years had levelled the boundaries of law, and thrown down the bulwarks of civil and religious liberty: that ſuch a prince, in his adverſe ſtate, ſhould find a party to eſpouſe his broken fortunes; that he ſhould be able to perſuade men to lift their impious hands againſt the authors of freedom, and drench their country in blood, to ſupport a power he had abuſed, are circumſtances which exhibit a melancholy proof of the extreme weakneſs and depravity of the human mind. The injuries which the Engliſh had ſuffered under the family of the Stuarts, had, in appearance, rouſed an univerſal ſpirit of oppoſition; yet, when the indefeaſible power of the people was oppoſed to the claims of monarchy, the king found among men of fortune and family a numerous party, who priding themſelves on their deſcent from opulent anceſtors, fancied they had a right to tyrannize over their fellow citizens; and growing ſick of the new broached doctrines, which aſſerted, that all men had a right to equal liberty, deſerted the cauſe which oppreſſion had engaged them to abet, and ranged themſelves on the ſide of the crown. Thus the greater weight of the landed intereſt fell on the ſide of the king, who had alſo all the catholics, and thoſe who were ſuperſtitiouſly attached to the hierarchy. But theſe advantages were more than balanced by the popularity of the parliament; and by the love of liberty, which was diffuſed among the active, the induſtrious, and the commercial part of the nation. The king had a particular diſadvantage ariſing from the duplicity of his conduct: he had frequently violated his engagements with his people; and now, notwithſtanding all his aſſertions to the contrary, they in general believed, that he had an averſion to the free government of the country; that he had conſented to all the laws in favour of liberty with reluctance; that neither his oaths nor promiſes could be depended on; and that he would reſume all his former arbitrary meaſures as ſoon as he had obtained ſufficient power and a proper opportunity.

The royal ſtandard was erected at Nottingham on the day appointed; but to the ſurprize and mortification of the king, the people did not at firſt reſort to it, in obedience to his proclamation. His artillery, far from numerous, had been left at York, for want of horſes; and, beſides the trained bands of the country, raiſed by Sir John Digby, the ſheriff, he had not got together above three hundred infantry. His cavalry, which did not exceed eight hundred, and were very ill provided with arms, was commanded by prince Rupert, and lay at Leiceſter; and his force was ſo much inferior to what the parliament had now in the field, that Sir Jacob Aſtley, ſerjeant-major-general of his army, told him, that he could not give him any aſſurance that he might not be taken out of his bed, ſhould the rebels attempt it. While the king and his friends were ruminating on the danger of their ſituation, they received the mortifying advice, that Portſmouth being beſieged both by ſea and land by the parliament's forces, would be reduced in a few days. Charles, in his way to Nottingham, had propoſed to enter Coventry; but the citizens ſhut their gates, fired at his men, and obliged him to retire. The anxiety of mind occaſioned by theſe alarming circumſtances, was heightened by ſuperſtitious apprehenſions, ariſing from his ſtandard having been blown down by a high wind. Theſe incidents induced the nobility to preſs the king to ſend an immediate meſſage to the parliament with overtures of peace; but this he abſolutely refuſed, and haſtily broke up the council. However, the earl of Southampton the next day urging the ſame advice, it was liſtened to with more coolneſs and deliberation; and, by the unanimous deſire of the counſellors, he was prevailed with to embrace Southampton's advice; and that nobleman, with Sir John Colepepper, and Sir William Uvedale, were diſpatched to London, with offers of a treaty to the following purport: that the king had, with unſpeakable grief of heart, beheld the diſtractions of the kingdom; and to prevent the miſeries ready to overwhelm the nation by a civil war, propoſed to the parliament to appoint perſons to treat with a like number authoriſed by him; and he concluded with aſſuring them, that this motion was ſolely owing to his Chriſtian and pious care to prevent the effuſion of blood; his proviſion of men, arms, and money, being ſufficient to ſecure him from violence, till it pleaſed God to open the eyes of his people. The parliament waſted no time in unneceſſary diſputes; but two days after they had received this propoſal, diſpatched a meſſage to the king, in which they told him, that till he ſhould recall his proclamations, by which the earl of Eſſex and both houſes of parliament, with thoſe who obeyed their commands, were declared traitors; and till his ſtandard was taken down, they could not, conſiſtently with the public truſt repoſed in them, or the good and ſafety of the kingdom, give any anſwer to his propoſal. This ſudden determination ſo alarmed the royaliſts, that they adviſed the king to lay aſide all thoughts of conqueſt, to haſte to London, and appear in parliament before they had any item of his intention. This ſeaſonable advice was rejected with diſdain: but the parliament having ſent their principal officers to their army, which lay at Northampton, with orders to prepare for their march, it was thought neceſſary to amuſe them with another meſſage, in which the king promiſed to recall his proclamations, provided they would recall theirs, in which his adherents were declared traitors. The parliament perceiving the king's aim, immediately diſpatched the meſſenger with an anſwer, in which they charged the king with duplicity of conduct, in ſending hoſtile inſtructions to his commiſſioners of array, ſince his pacific profeſſions; and entreated him to diſband his forces and return to his parliament, where, they ſaid, he would find ſuch expreſſions of their fidelity and duty, as ſhould aſſure him that his ſafety, honour, and greatneſs, could only be found in the affections of his people, and in their ſincere councils. From this period the king's levies, and other warlike preparations, were carried on with great expedition. When the earl of Eſſex joined the army, it amounted to fifteen thouſand men; and the king found it neceſſary to decamp from Nottingham, and retire into the weſt. It would have been extremely eaſy, while he lay at Nottingham, or in his retreat from thence, for the parliament's forces to have diſperſed the ſmall handful of his followers, and either to have taken him priſoner, or obliged him to quit the kingdom: but this opportunity was miſſed, by the too cautious diſpoſition of the earl of Eſſex, who had not yet received his inſtructions. A neglect, occaſioned by the ſanguine hopes of the parliamentary leaders, who, depending on the king's unpopular character, and judging the ſentiments of the fickle vulgar by the liberal warmth of their own feelings, conſidered it as impoſſible for him to raiſe a force ſufficient to encounter their army; they thought that the nobility and gentry would ſoon be weary of maintaining the troops already on foot, and that they ſhould thus accompliſh their deſigns, without ſpilling the blood of their countrymen. Charles was therefore permitted to retreat to Shrewſbury without moleſtation.

At Wellington, Charles made a rendezvous of all his forces, and cauſed his military orders to be read at the head of each regiment, and that he might bind himſelf by reciprocal ties, he ſolemnly made the following proteſtation before the whole army.

"I do promiſe in the preſence of Almighty God, that as I hope for his bleſſing and protection, that I will, to the utmoſt of my power defend and maintain the true reformed proteſtant religion, eſtabliſhed in the church of England, and, by the grace of God, in the ſame will live and die.

"I deſire that the laws may ever be the meaſure of my government, and that the liberty and property of the ſubject may be preſerved by them with the ſame care as my own juſt rights. And if it pleaſe God, by his bleſſing on this army, raiſed for my neceſſary defence, to preſerve me from the preſent rebellion, I do ſolemnly and faithfully promiſe, in the ſight of God, to maintain the juſt privileges and freedom of parliament, and to govern to the utmoſt of my power, by the known ſtatutes and cuſtoms of the kingdom, and particularly, to obſerve inviolably the laws to which I have given my conſent this parliament. Meanwhile, if this emergence, and the great neceſſity to which I am driven, beget any violation of law, I hope it ſhall be imputed by God and man to the authors of this war; not to me, who have ſo earneſtly laboured to preſerve the peace of the kingdom. When I willingly fail in theſe particulars, I ſhall expect no aid or relief from man, nor any protection from above. But in this reſolution, I hope for the cheerful aſſiſtance of all good men, and am confident of the bleſſing of heaven."

At the commencement of the troubles in England, the princes Rupert and Maurice, ſons to the unhappy Palatine, had made a tender of their ſervice to the king, and the former at this time commanded a body of horſe, which had been ſent to Worceſter, in order to watch the motions of Eſſex, who was marching towards that city. No ſooner had the prince arrived, than he ſaw ſome cavalry of the enemy, commanded by colonel Sandys, approaching the gates. He, and his company, with admirable courage and preſence of mind, attacked and totally routed them. Sandys and thirty of his men were killed on the ſpot, and a number of the officers taken priſoners. This trifling ſkirmiſh greatly elated the ſpirits of the royaliſts, and impreſſed the enemy with a terror of prince Rupert, who had given ſuch an early proof of his extraordinary courage and promptitude. After this engagement the prince threw himſelf into Worceſter; but hearing that Eſſex was marching thither with his whole army, he quitted it, and retired to Ludlow. Charles, on muſtering his army, found he had about ten thouſand men. The earl of Lindſey was general; prince Rupert commanded the horſe; Sir Jacob Aſtley the foot; Sir Arthur Aſton the dragoons; and Sir John Heydon the artillery. The lord Bernard Stuart was at the head of a troop of guards, and their ſervants, under the command of Sir William Killigrew, made another troop, and always marched with their maſters. About the middle of October the king left Shrewſbury, and directed his march towards London. Two days after his departure Eſſex quitted Worceſter, and on the twenty-ſecond of October the two armies were within ſix miles of each other. The king having received intelligence that Eſſex had advanced to Kempton, on the borders of Warwickſhire, drew up his army on Edge-hill, about two miles from the enemy, and on Sunday the twenty-third gave the earl battle. This engagement, which was carried on with great bravery on both ſides, laſted till night, when both parties claimed the victory. They lay under arms all night, but in the morning neither ſide ſeemed inclined to renew the battle. Eſſex firſt drew off, and retired to Warwick, and the king returned to his former quarters. Five thouſand men are ſaid to have been found dead on the field of battle; and the loſs of the two armies was ſuppoſed to be nearly equal. The earl of Lindſey was carried to a barn, and expired before his wounds could be dreſſed. The lord Aubigney, brother to the duke of Richmond, and Sir Edward Verney, the king's ſtandard-bearer, were likewiſe killed, as were ſeveral other officers, but none of diſtinction. Lord Willoughby, ſon to the earl of Lindſey, Sir Thomas Lundsford, Sir Edward Stradling, and Sir William Vavaſer, were taken priſoners. On the ſide of the parliament the lord St. John and colonel Eſſex were killed; and Sir William Eſſex, father to the colonel was taken priſoner. A party of Eſſex's horſe, who had been drove off the field in the beginning of the action, alarmed the city and parliament with the news of a total defeat; but ſoon after expreſſes arriving from the army, aſſured them that their cauſe had received but a ſlight check; upon which they aſſumed the merit of a victory, and ordered public thankſgivings for the ſame. Charles alſo, on his part, took care to diſplay his advantages; though he had few marks of victory to boaſt, except the taking of Banbury ſome days after; from whence he continued his march, and took poſſeſſion of Oxford. The royal army was again put into motion, and a party of horſe advanced to Reading, of which Martin had been appointed governor by the parliament; at their approach the governor was ſeized with a ſudden panic, and the garriſon following his example, they fled to London. Charles, imagining that every thing would now yield to him, conducted his whole army to Reading, and in a few days advanced to Colnbrook. The parliament were alarmed at the near approach of the royaliſts, while their own forces lay at a diſtance; and voted an addreſs for a treaty. They diſpatched the earls of Northumberland and Pembroke, with three commoners, requeſting his majeſty to fix on ſome convenient place for his reſidence near London, till commiſſioners ſhould attend him, with propoſals for healing the preſent unhappy breach between him and his parliament. The king named Windſor, and demanded that the garriſon ſhould be withdrawn, and his own troops received into the caſtle. In the mean time Eſſex, advancing by haſty marches, had poſſeſſed himſelf of Windſor, Hampton, and Acton, and Charles received intelligence that he was fortifying himſelf at Brentford. A council of war being called, it was agreed that prince Rupert ſhould attack the parliament's army and works at Brentford, which he did with ſuch irreſiſtible fury, that notwithſtanding the noble reſiſtance that was made by the regiment of Holles, they were all either drowned, wounded, or taken priſoners, and prince Rupert remained maſter of the town. The parliament had ſent orders to forbear all hoſtilities, and had expected the ſame compliance from the king; though no ſtipulations to that purpoſe had been mentioned by their commiſſioners. Loud complaints therefore were raiſed againſt this attack, as being an inſtance of the utmoſt perfidy, and a breach of the treaty then negociating on both ſides. Inflamed with reſentment, and anxious for its own defence, the city marched the trained bands, in excellent order, to reinforce the army under Eſſex; who drew up his forces, now amounting to upwards of twenty-four thouſand men, at Turnham-green. Charles was at this time preparing to march towards London; but finding the number of the enemy ſo vaſtly ſuperior to his own, he thought it moſt prudent to retire over the bridge at Kingſton to Oatlands, and from thence to Reading, where he left a good garriſon, and then marched with his army to Oxford. The royaliſts in the north, were, by this time, become very conſiderable. The earls of Newcaſtle and Cumberland having joined each other with their troops, compoſed a ſmall army of eight thouſand horſe and foot, which were daily increaſing: ſo that thoſe who commanded for the parliament in thoſe parts were unable to cope with them, eſpecially after the arrival of colonel Goring at Newcaſtle, who brought a ſupply of two hundred men, and a quantity of ammunition from Holland. The parliament now found means to engage the counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Eſſex, Cambridge, and the city of Norwich, in an aſſociation, to ſtand by them with their lives and fortunes; and the lord Grey of Werk, received a commiſſion from Eſſex, and being authorized to raiſe forces, was appointed commander in chief in thoſe parts.

A.D. 1643. The queen having procured a conſiderable ſupply of artillery, arms and ammunition, landed at Burlington-bay from Holland in February, and very ſoon after ſet out again in queſt of new ſuccours. About this time Sir Hugh Cholmley, who had the government of Scarborough for the parliament, declared for the king, with three hundred men of his garriſon; and prince Rupert took the town of Cirenceſter by ſtorm; cut in pieces a whole regiment of the parliament's forces, took eleven hundred priſoners, about four thouſand ſtand of arms, and the whole magazine of the enemy. The king now hoped to relieve the calamities of his people, and recover his own diſtreſſed fortune by an equitable peace: for this purpoſe he propoſed a treaty to the parliament; to which they conſented; and the earl of Northumberland, with four members of the lower houſe came, as commiſſioners, to Oxford. But the propoſitions of peace were dictated in ſuch ſtile, that Charles, finding nothing could be done to compoſe the reigning diſorders, without abſolutely ſacrificing his kingly character, diſmiſſed the commiſſioners; upon which the earl of Eſſex was ordered to advance with his army to beſiege Reading, the garriſon of the king which lay neareſt London, and at that time eſteemed a place of conſiderable ſtrength. He accordingly ſat down before this place, on the fifteenth of April, with an army of eighteen thouſand men. The engineers ſeemed very little acquainted with the buſineſs of ſieges. They had, however, ſuch advantages by the ſituation of the place, that their cannon played directly into the town. Sir Arthur Aſton, the governor, being wounded, colonel Fielding ſucceeded to the command, and ſoon after the town was found to be no longer in a condition of defence, and though Charles approached with an intention of obliging Eſſex to raiſe the ſiege, the diſpoſition of the enemy was ſo ſtrong, as rendered the deſign abortive; and on the twenty-ſeventh of April, Fielding was obliged to ſurrender; but on condition that he ſhould bring off all the garriſon with the honours of war, and in return he was to deliver up all the deſerters. This laſt condition was thought ſo ignominious and of ſuch prejudice to the king's intereſt, that Fielding was tried by a council of war, and condemned to death for conſenting to it; the king however remitted this ſentence which was judged too ſevere.

Excluſive of the operations between the principal armies, which lay in the centre of England; each county, each town, nay almoſt each family, was divided within itſelf, and the moſt violent commotions agitated the whole kingdom. Throughout the winter continual efforts had been made, by each party, to ſurmount its antagoniſt, and the royaliſts were in moſt parts victorious. In the north the lord Fairfax commanded for the parliament, and the earl of Newcaſtle for the king. The latter united in a league for Charles the counties of Northumberland, Cumberland, Weſtmoreland, and Durham, and ſome time after engaged other counties in the ſame aſſociation. Finding that Fairfax and Hotham were making great progreſs in the ſouthern parts of Yorkſhire, he advanced with a body of four thouſand men, and took poſſeſſion of York. He attacked the parliament's forces at Tadcaſter, and diſlodged them;, but his victory was not deciſive. He obtained ſeveral other inconſiderable advantages; the chief benefit reſulting from which was the eſtabliſhment of the king's authority in all the northern provinces. All this time the two capital armies lay inactive, that under the king about Oxford and Abington, and that under Eſſex about Reading. The latter was about this time joined by Sir William Waller; who had taken Wincheſter and Chicheſter, after which he advanced towards Glouceſter, which was in a manner blockaded by lord Herbert, who had levied conſiderable forces in Wales for the royal party. While Waller attacked the Welſh on one ſide, a ſally from Glouceſter made impreſſion on the other. Herbert was defeated, five hundred of his men killed, a thouſand taken priſoners, and he himſelf, with great difficulty, eſcaped to Oxford. Hereford, which was a ſtrong place, and defended by a conſiderable garriſon, through the cowardice of Price, the governor, ſurrendered to Waller. Tewkſbury ſhared the ſame fate; and after theſe victories he made an attempt upon Worceſter, which proved unſucceſsful. Buckinghamſhire being diſpoſed in favour of the king, Eſſex fixed his head quarters at Thame, as he could from thence over-awe that county. While he lay here, colonel Urrey, a Scotſman, deſerted from the parliament's army to the king. He informed prince Rupert of the diſpoſition of the enemy, and perſuaded him to beat up their quarters. To convince him of the practicability of this exploit, he offered to go firſt with a detachment; which being conſented to, he conducted the men to part of theſe quarters, where he defeated ſome regiments, and brought a great number of priſoners to Oxford. The prince, encouraged by his ſucceſs, complied with his advice in attacking that part of the army which lay at Thame. They took a ſtrong body of horſe with them from Oxford, and marching all night, by break of day arrived at Wickham, where they cut in pieces two regiments of the enemy; and attacked another quarter with the ſame ſucceſs. By this time Eſſex had taken the alarm, and detached part of his cavalry to engage the prince till he could come up with the infantry. On their arrival, the prince charged them with ſuch impetuoſity, that they betook themſelves to flight, after having loſt ſome of their beſt officers, among whom was the celebrated John Hampden, who, from the commencement of the war, had acted as colonel of a regiment, and proved in many encounters, that his courage was equal to his other extraordinary endowments. After this victory prince Rupert returned in triumph to Oxford, and ſpoke in ſuch high terms of the conduct and courage of Urrey, that the king immediately conferred the honour of knighthood on that gentleman, and gave him the command of a regiment. The king's affairs alſo wore a very favourable aſpect in the weſtern counties. In Cornwall, Sir Bevil Granville, Sir Ralph Hopton, Sir Nicholas Slanning, Arundel, and Trevannion, undertook, at their own charges, to raiſe an army for Charles; and their great intereſts in the country, enabled them to effect their purpoſe. Alarmed at theſe proceedings, the parliament ordered Ruthven, governor of Plymouth, to march with all the forces of Dorſet, Somerſet, and Devon, and make an entire conqueſt of Cornwall. The earl of Stamford followed him at ſome diſtance with a conſiderable ſupply. Ruthven having entered Cornwall by bridges thrown over the Tamar, haſtened to an action; leſt Stamford ſhould join him, and obtain the honour of a victory, of which he had already aſſured himſelf. The royaliſts were alſo impatient to bring the affair to a deciſion, before Ruthven ſhould receive ſo conſiderable a reinforcement. The armies met at Bradock-down: where Ruthven was totally defeated. With a few broken troops he fled to Saltaſh, and when that town was taken, he, with great difficulty, and almoſt alone, eſcaped to Plymouth. Stamford retired, and diſtributed his forces into Plymouth and Exeter; till about the middle of May, when having aſſembled a ſtrong body of near ſeven thouſand men, well ſupplied with money, proviſions, and ammunition, he advanced upon the royaliſts, who were not half his number, and were oppreſſed by every kind of neceſſity. He encamped on the top of a hill near Stratton, and detached Sir George Chudleigh, with twelve hundred cavalry, to ſurprize the ſheriff of the county at Bodmin. The Corniſh loyaliſts reſolved to attack the camp in four diviſions. One was commanded by lord Mohun and Sir Ralph Hopton; another by Sir Bevil Granville and Sir John Berkley; a third by Slanning and Trevannion; and the fourth by Baſſet and Godolphin. They preſſed as many different ways up the hill with the utmoſt vigour, which their enemies as obſtinately defended. The battle continued with very doubtful ſucceſs, till word was brought to the chief officers of the Corniſh army, that their ammunition was ſpent to four barrels of powder. They then agreed to advance without firing till they ſhould reach the top of the hill. The courage of the officers was ſo well ſeconded by the ſoldiers, that they forced the enemy on all ſides to give way; and major general Chudleigh being taken priſoner, the parliamentarians were ſoon put to the rout, and the royaliſts took poſſeſſion of their cannon and camp. The earl of Stamford retired with precipitation to Exeter, and Sir George Chudleigh took the ſame route from Bodmin, as ſoon as he was informed of the earl's defeat.

The weſt being the moſt important ſcene of action, now drew the attention of both Charles and the parliament. The marquis of Hertford and prince Maurice, were ſent by the king with a reinforcement of cavalry, who having joined the Corniſh army, the two bodies, united, amounted to about ſeven thouſand men. They ſoon ſubdued the county of Devon, and advancing into that of Somerſet, began to reduce it to obedience. The parliament now put Sir William Waller, in whom they placed great confidence, at the head of their new army, and ſent him into the weſt in order to check the progreſs of the royaliſts. After ſome ſkirmiſhes the two armies met on the fifth of July at Lanſdown near Bath, and fought a pitched battle, with great loſs on both ſides, but deciſive on neither. It was now reſolved that Hertford and prince Maurice ſhould march to Oxford with the cavalry, procure a reinforcement from the king, and return immediately to the relief of his friends, by which means they would be enabled to make head againſt Waller, who having received ſeveral additions to his army, much ſurpaſſed the royaliſts in number. No ſooner were they gone, than Waller, confident of taking their infantry, wrote to the parliament, that their work was done, and that his next letter ſhould inform them of the number and quality of the priſoners. But before Hertford and the prince could reach Oxford, the king had received intelligence of the great difficulties to which his army in the weſt was reduced, and diſpatched a conſiderable body of horſe, under the command of lord Wilmot, to their aſſiſtance. Waller drew up on Roundway-down, and advanced with his horſe to engage Wilmot, and prevent his joining the infantry. He was received with great valour by the royaliſts, who, after a ſharp engagement, put the parliamentarians to the rout; and Waller, with a few horſe, eſcaped to Briſtol. Wilmot then, ſeizing their cannon, joined the friends whom he came to relieve, attacked Waller's infantry with redoubled courage, and obtained a complete victory. At this time the queen returned to England with a freſh ſupply of men and money; of which Eſſex received intelligence, left Thame and Ayleſbury, where he had hitherto lain, and marched to London. The king, freed from this enemy, ſent his army, under prince Rupert, weſtward; and by its conjunction with the Corniſh troops, a very formidable force, for numbers, as well as reputation and valour was compoſed. Having reduced Bath, they now marched to form the ſiege of Briſtol, of which Fiennes, ſon to lord Say, was governor, and the garriſon conſiſted of two thouſand five hundred foot, one regiment of horſe, and another of dragoons. It was reſolved by prince Rupert to ſtorm the city. Accordingly the Corniſh men, in three diviſions, attacked the weſt-ſide with amazing reſolution. The middle diviſion had already mounted the wall, but ſo great was the diſadvantage of the ground, and ſo brave the reſiſtance of the beſieged, that the aſſailants were repulſed with conſiderable loſs both of officers and private men. The aſſault on the prince's ſide, was conducted with equal courage and loſs, but with better ſucceſs. At length Waſhington, with a ſmall party, finding a place in the curtin weaker than the reſt, broke in, and ſoon made way for the horſe to follow. The ſuburbs was now gained; but the entrance to the town was ſtill more difficult, and by the loſs already ſuſtained, as well as by the proſpect of farther danger, every one was extremely diſcouraged; when to the great ſurprize and joy of the royaliſts, the city beat a parley, and ſurrendered, after obtaining leave to march out with their arms and baggage; but their cannon, ammunition, and colours, they were obliged to leave behind them. Fiennes was afterwards tried by a court martial, found guilty of cowardice, and condemned to loſe his head: this ſentence was, however, remitted.

As yet the king had ſubſiſted his forces by contributions and aſſeſſments, or by loans, and voluntary preſents from all parts of England; but the ſupplies, including thoſe brought him by the queen, were ſtill very diſproportionable to his preſſing neceſſities. The acquiſition of Briſtol therefore was of the utmoſt advantage to him, for prince Rupert ſeized all the ſhips in which the moſt wealthy citizens of that place had embarked their riches, with a view of conveying them to London. The king went to Briſtol, where he received the news of the ſurrender of Dorcheſter to the earl of Caernarvon: and a day or two after, Portland, Weymouth, and Melcombe, likewiſe ſubmitted; ſo that the royal party, before the concluſion of the ſummer, were in poſſeſſion of all the weſtern counties, from the Land's-end, the moſt weſtern point of Cornwall, except a few garriſoned places which were cloſely blocked up. Nor was there any army in the field, in any of the northern counties, even to the borders of Scotland, to oppoſe that of the king.

London was at this time greatly divided between the two parties; many of the wealthier and more creditable citizens favoured the king's cauſe; and many of the gentry, in the aſſociated counties, were ready on the firſt appearance of the royal army, to ſecure theſe counties for the king. Theſe favourable appearances indicated that the moſt ſpeedy method of putting an end to the civil war, was for Charles to march at the head of his army directly to London, and detach the earl of Newcaſtle to ſecure the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk. But this favourable opportunity was loſt, from a reſolution of a council of war held at Briſtol, where it was determined, that the weſtern army ſhould be ſent back to protect the loyaliſts in their reſpective counties, and the ſiege of Glouceſter ſhould be undertaken immediately. Nothing could be more fatal to the king's affairs, than this reſolution. A few days after the earl of Newcaſtle ſat down before Hull, where the lord Fairfax, after ſeveral repeated defeats, had taken refuge. He defended the place with great bravery and conduct for ſeveral weeks, though attacked with the greateſt vigour. At laſt the beſieged made a furious ſally, and after a very obſtinate diſpute, drove the beſiegers from their trenches, and ſeized all their artillery. The ſame day another part of Newcaſtle's army, under the command of lord Widdrington, was routed at Horncaſtle, by the earl of Mancheſter, aſſiſted by Sir Thomas Fairfax and Oliver Cromwell. In the mean time the king marched to the fatal ſiege of Glouceſter, and on the tenth of Auguſt ſat down before that city with an army of eight thouſand horſe and foot. As ſoon as intelligence of this ſiege arrived in London, the conſternation of the inhabitants was as great as if the enemy was already at their gates. The rapid progreſs of the royaliſts threatened the parliament with immediate ſubjection: the factions and diſcontents among themſelves in the city, and throughout the neighbouring counties, prognoſticated ſome dangerous diviſion, or inſurrection. A cry for peace was renewed, and with more violence than ever. Crowds of women, with a petition for that purpoſe, flocked about the houſe, and were ſo clamorous and importunate, that orders were given to diſperſe them; and ſome females were killed in the fray. Bedford, Holland, and Conway, had deſerted the parliament, and retired to Oxford: Clare and Lovelace had followed them. Northumberland had retired to his country ſeat; Eſſex himſelf ſhewed extreme diſſatisfaction, and exhorted the parliament to make peace. The upper houſe accordingly ſent down terms of accommodation more moderate than had hitherto been inſiſted on. It even paſſed by a majority among the commons, that theſe propoſals ſhould be tranſmitted to the king. The zealots were now alarmed: a petition againſt peace was framed in the city, and preſented by Pennington the mayor. Multitudes attended him, and renewed all their former menaces againſt the moderate party. The pulpits thundered out anathemas againſt all who deſerted the good cauſe; and rumours were ſpread, that twenty thouſand Iriſh had landed and deſigned to murder every proteſtant. The majority was again turned for war; and all thoughts of pacification being laid aſide, every preparation was made for reſiſtance, and for the immediate relief of Glouceſter, on which all the hopes of parliament were now placed.

In the mean time Maſſey, governor of Glouceſter, reſolute to make a vigorous defence, and having under his command the citizens and garriſon, all of them ambitious of acquiring the crown of martyrdom, baffled every attempt of the royaliſts with courage and capacity. By continued ſallies he attacked them in their trenches, and gained ſudden advantages over them. By diſputing every inch of ground, he repreſſed the vigour and alacrity of their courage, elated by former ſucceſſes. His garriſon, however, was reduced to the laſt extremity, and he conſtantly, from time to time, informed the parliament, that unleſs ſpeedily relieved, it would be impoſſible for him in his extreme want of proviſions and ammunition, to defend the place for any conſiderable time longer againſt the enemy. The parliament, in order to repair their declining condition, and put themſelves in a poſture of defence, now exerted their whole power and authority. They voted that an army ſhould be levied under Sir William Waller, whom, notwithſtanding his misfortunes, they loaded with extraordinary careſſes. Having aſſociated in their cauſe the counties of Hertford, Eſſex, Cambridge, Norfolk, Suffolk, Lincoln, and Huntingdon, they gave the earl of Mancheſter a commiſſion to be general of the aſſociation, and appointed an army to be levied under his command. But they were principally ſolicitous that the army of Eſſex, on whom their whole fortune depended, ſhould be put in a condition of marching againſt the king. They engaged the city to ſend four regiments of its militia to the relief of Glouceſter. In the mean time all the ſhops were ordered to be ſhut, and every man expected, with the utmoſt anxiety, the event of that important enterprize. On the twenty-ſixth of Auguſt, Eſſex began his march from Hounſlow-heath to Ayleſbury, where the general rendezvous was appointed; and being there joined by the lord Grey, and reinforcements from the aſſociated counties, he found himſelf at the head of eight thouſand infantry, and about half that number of horſe. With this army he continued his march by Brackley, though conſiderably incommoded by a party of the king's horſe, detached on purpoſe to harraſs him with ſlight ſkirmiſhes. He, however, proceeded with great expedition, and the king's forces abandoning their works at his approach, he entered Glouceſter in triumph, when the garriſon was reduced to the laſt extremity. After ſupplying the city with proviſions and ammunition, and reinforcing the garriſon, he marched to Tewkſbury, whence he made a ſudden motion to Cirenceſter, where he ſurprized two regiments of loyaliſts, and ſeized a large quantity of proviſions prepared for the king's army. He then took his route through the northern parts of Wiltſhire, and marched twenty miles before the king was informed of his motions. Prince Rupert was immediately detached after him in order to intercept his march, till the king ſhould come up with the reſt of the army. This general overtook the earl as he was marching over Aubourn-chaſe, with an intention of reaching Newbury. A ſharp ſkirmiſh enſued. Prince Rupert charged Eſſex with ſuch fury, that his army was put into great diſorder. Eſſex took up his quarters at Hungerford: the marquis de la Vieuville, a French officer, who ſerved as a volunteer, being killed in this action.

Prince Rupert continued his march towards Newbury, but found the king had prevented him by two hours, and poſted himſelf near the town; where he joined him the ſame day. In conſequence of the advantages enjoyed by Charles, he muſt, had he known how to preſerve them, have been victorious; but his officers had ſo great a contempt for the London apprentices, who compoſed the greater part of the parliament's army, that they abandoned all their advantages, and regarded nothing but how to bring the enemy to a battle. This was now indeed unavoidable, and Eſſex prepared for it, with great preſence of mind, and not without military conduct. On both ſides the battle was fought with deſperate valour, and ſteady bravery. Eſſex's horſe was ſeveral times broke by that of the king; but his infantry ſtood firm; and beſides a continued fire, they preſented an invincible rampart of pikes againſt the furious impulſe of prince Rupert, and thoſe gallant troops of gentry, of whom the royal cavalry was chiefly compoſed. The London militia, eſpecially, though before the battle deſpiſed by the king's officers, and totally unacquainted with action, yet being animated with unconquerable zeal for the cauſe they had undertaken to ſupport, equalled, on this occaſion, every thing that could be expected from the moſt veteran forces. Both armies continued cloſely engaged with the utmoſt ardour, till night put an end to the action, and left the event undecided. Next morning Eſſex proceeded on his march, and though his rear was once put into diſorder by an incurſion of the king's horſe, he reached London in ſafety, and received the applauſe his conduct and ſucceſs in the whole enterprize deſerved. The king followed him to Reading, where he eſtabliſhed a garriſon, which greatly ſtraitened the quarters of the parliament's army. This ſmall advantage over Eſſex was dearly purchaſed by the deaths of Ralph Dormer, earl of Caernarvon, Henry Spencer, earl of Sunderland, Lucius Carey, viſcount Falkland, ſecretary of ſtate, and twenty other officers of note. Falkland was beloved by every perſon of ingenuity and virtue in the kingdom. This nobleman ſtood foremoſt in the defence of public liberty, till the civil convulſions proceeded to extremity, when he joined the party who had embarked in the defence of thoſe limited powers which then remained to monarchy, and which he deemed neceſſary for ſupporting the Engliſh conſtitution. Still, however, anxious for his country, he ſeems to have dreaded the proſperous ſucceſs of his own party as much as of the enemy; and among his intimate friends, often after a deep ſilence, and frequent ſighs, he would, with a ſad accent reiterate the word peace. In excuſe for the too free expoſing his perſon, which ſeemed incompatible with the office of ſecretary of ſtate, he alledged, that it became him to be more active than other men in all hazardous enterprizes, leſt his impatience for peace might be ſtigmatized with the name of cowardice or puſillanimity. He fell a victim to the cauſe he had undertaken to defend in the thirty-fifth year of his age. Their troops were now put into winter-quarters on account of the advanced ſeaſon of the year, and particularly the loſs ſuſtained by both parties in the battle of Newbury.

At this time count d' Harcourt, a prince of the houſe of Lorraine, and one of the greateſt generals of the age, was ſent by the court of France, penetrated by the helpleſs ſituation of Charles, as ambaſſador to England, to offer the mediation of France, for compoſing the differences between the king and the parliament. He came firſt to London and addreſſed himſelf to both houſes for a ſafe conduct to the king, which was readily granted. On the eighteenth of October, they entered the city of Oxford, where the king then reſided, and three days after had a public audience in the great hall at Chriſt church, where the king and queen received him with great ſtate and magnificence. But finding himſelf unable to effect a reconciliation, after ſtaying a few months in England, he returned to France.

It was now that the puritans, who had acquired a majority in both houſes, entered into a league with Scotland, and ſigned the famous covenant of that people. By this covenant, the ſubſcribers bound themſelves to ſupport the reformed religion in the three kingdoms; to eſtabliſh an uniformity of doctrine and diſcipline; to extirpate popery and prelacy; to maintain the privileges of the parliament and people; to defend his majeſty's perſon and authority, in the preſervation and defence of the true religion and liberty of the kingdom; to diſcover and puniſh incendiaries and malignants; and to eſtabliſh a firm peace and union to all poſterity: to renounce neutrality and reſiſt temptation: to repent of their ſins, amend their lives, and to vie with each other in the great work of reformation. The covenant itſelf was read in St. Margaret's church at Weſtminſter, in preſence of both houſes, by whom it was ſubſcribed, and the commons ordered it ſhould be acknowledged by all perſons living under their juriſdiction. An hundred thouſand pounds were borrowed of the city, and ſent to Edinburgh, according to an agreement made with the Scots, who after the firſt three months ſervice were alſo to be allowed thirty thouſand pounds per month, while they were aſſiſting the parliament.

While theſe were induced by their diſtreſſes to ſeek aſſiſtance from the preſbyterians of Scotland, Charles had recourſe to the papiſts in Ireland, where the rebellion ſtill continued. In many rencounters the Engliſh, under lord More, Sir William St. Leger, Sir Frederic Hamilton, and others, had routed the Iriſh, and returned in triumph to Dublin. The rebels raiſed the ſiege of Drogheda, after the garriſon had made an obſtinate defence. Ormond had obtained two complete victories at Kilruſh and Roſs, and had brought relief to all the forts that were beſieged in different parts of the kingdom. Yet the moſt common neceſſaries of life were wanted by the victorious army; for the Iriſh, in their rage againſt the Britiſh planters, had laid waſte the whole kingdom; and even moſt of the inhabitants of Dublin had come to England, to eſcape ſtarving there. By the intereſt and authority of Ormond, the juſtices and council of Ireland were fallen into an entire dependence on the king. Parſons, Temple, Loftus, and Meredith, who appeared to be of the oppoſite party, had been removed, and Charles had ſupplied their places by others better affected to his ſervice. In obedience to orders tranſmitted from the king, a committee of the Engliſh houſe of commons, which had been ſent over to Ireland, in order to conduct the affairs of that kingdom, had been excluded the council. This, with the great difficulty under which the parliament themſelves laboured, rendered themſelves unwilling to ſend ſupplies to an army, which, though engaged in a cauſe much favoured by them, was commanded by their declared enemies. Charles, in order to obtain ſupplies of men from that kingdom, ſent orders to Ormond and the juſtices, to conclude, for a year, a ceſſation of hoſtilities with the council of Kilkenny, by whom the Iriſh papiſts were governed, and to leave both ſides in poſſeſſion of their preſent advantages. Thus the Iriſh rebels, who, on all ſides, had retreated before the Engliſh troops, obtained free liberty to enjoy, with impunity, the habitations and ſpoils of the exiled proteſtants, to ſtrengthen themſelves by confederacies abroad, and to increaſe their forces at home, while the proteſtant inhabitants were at full leiſure to repine at their fruitleſs victories. After the ceſſation of hoſtilities, there being little occaſion for the army in Ireland, the king ordered Ormond, who was entirely devoted to him, to ſend over conſiderable bodies of troops to England; but ſome of them having imbibed while in Ireland a reſentment againſt the catholics, ſoon after deſerted to the parliament. At the ſame time many Iriſh papiſts being alſo brought over, joined the royal army in England, where they continued to commit the ſame cruelties and diſorders to which they had been accuſtomed. This, ſome time after, induced the parliament to paſs a vote, that no quarter ſhould be given them in battle. But prince Rupert, by making ſome repriſals, ſoon put a ſtop to this. Charles, in order to prepare for the enſuing campaign, ſummoned all the members of each houſe, who adhered to his intereſt, and thus endeavoured to take advantage of the name of a parliament. His houſe of peers was pretty full, and contained twice as many members as voted at Weſtminſter: but his houſe of commons did not conſiſt of above one hundred and forty, which did not exceed half of the other houſe of commons. Among the other evils ariſing from theſe domeſtic wars, was the introduction of an exciſe. The parliament at Weſtminſter having voted an exciſe on wine, beer, and other commodities; that at Oxford followed their example, and conferred a like revenue on the king. The parliament at Weſtminſter paſſed an ordinance, commanding all the inhabitants of London, and its vicinity, to retrench a meal a week, and to pay the value of it for the ſupport of the public cauſe. On the other hand, the parliament at Oxford granted the king a hundred thouſand pounds, to be raiſed by loans from ſuch perſons as lived within his quarters.

A. D. 1644. The Earl of Eſſex having received a letter ſubſcribed by the prince of Wales, the duke of York, and forty-three noblemen, wherein he was intreated to uſe his beſt endeavours for reſtoring peace to the kingdom, and to promote that happy end with thoſe by whom he was employed: this gentleman, though much diſſatisfied with the conduct of the parliament; though apprehenſive of the extremes to which they were labouring to extend their meaſures; though willing to agree to any reaſonable accommodation; was yet more anxious to diſcharge the truſt repoſed in him. He therefore replied, that as the paper ſent to him was neither addreſſed to the houſes of parliament, nor acknowledged the authority of that aſſembly, he could not, by any means, lay it before them. Like propoſals were repeated by the king during the ſeaſon of inaction; but always met with the ſame denial from Eſſex. In order to make another attempt towards a treaty, the king ſent a letter to the lords and commons of parliament convened at Weſtminſter; but as he alſo mentioned in it, the lords and commons convened at Oxford, and expreſſed his deſire, that all the members of both houſes might ſafely meet in a free and full aſſembly; the parliament, perceiving the concluſion he intended to draw from this diſtinction, refuſed to treat upon ſuch terms. While the king, who indeed deſpaired of all hopes of accommodation, would not acknowledge the two houſes as a free parliament. During theſe overtures for peace, the celebrated Pym paid the debt of nature. He was a perſon as much hated by one party, as reſpected by the other. He was conſidered at London as a victim to national liberty; while at Oxford he was repreſented as the principal author of all the miſeries the nation had ſuffered from the civil war: it was added, that his death was a mark of the divine vengeance for his multiplied crimes. The parliament thought themſelves obliged by gratitude to pay the debts he had contracted, for let his ſuppoſed crimes be what they may, it is certain that he never once ſtudied to improve his own private fortune.

On the nineteenth of January the Scots entered England with an army of eighteen thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe, and between five and ſix hundred dragoons. On the twenty-ſecond of February, they advanced to Newcaſtle, and having in vain ſummoned the town which was defended by a ſtrong garriſon, they croſſed the Tyne in order to force the camp of the earl of Newcaſtle, who lay at Durham, with an army of fourteen thouſand men. Newcaſtle fearing to be ſhut up between two armies, retired at their approach, and Leven, the Scotch general, joined his troops to thoſe of lord Fairfax. This junction being completed, they inveſted York, where the royal army had taken ſhelter. But the Scotiſh and parliamentary forces not being ſufficient to beſiege in form ſo large a city, divided by a river, they contented themſelves with forming a kind of blockade; and affairs remained for ſome time in a kind of ſuſpence between theſe oppoſite armies. Nor were the other parts of the kingdom free from the calamities of civil war; lord Hopton was defeated by general Waller, at Alresford, in Kent; and, on the other hand, prince Rupert gained a ſignal victory over the parliamentary forces who had formed the ſiege of Newark, under the command of lord Willoughby and Sir John Meldrum. By this victory the prince preſerved a free communication between the northern and ſouthern counties. After this the prince attacked Liverpool, and ſoon reduced the town. Here he received a letter from the king, preſſing him to relieve York, the ſiege of which was now began by the united forces of Leven, Fairfax, and Mancheſter. On the approach of prince Rupert the parliamentary generals raiſed the ſiege, and drew up their forces on Marſton-moor, reſolving to prevent the junction of the royaliſts. But prince Rupert approached the town, by marching on the other ſide of the Ouſe, and joined the troops under the command of the earl, now created marquis of Newcaſtle. Having completed this junction, the marquis endeavoured to perſuade him, that he ought to be ſatisfied with the preſent advantage, and leave the enemy, now greatly diminiſhed by their loſſes, and diſcouraged by their ill ſucceſs, to diſſolve by thoſe mutual diſſentions which had taken place among them. But the prince, whoſe martial diſpoſition was not ſufficiently tempered with prudence, nor ſoftened by politeneſs, pretending a poſitive order from the king, without deigning to conſult with Newcaſtle, whoſe great merit and ſervices deſerved much better treatment, gave immediate orders for a general battle, and drew out the army to Marſton-moor. The victory was obſtinately diſputed between the moſt numerous armies that were ever engaged during the whole courſe of theſe wars; nor were the forces greatly different in their numbers. Fifty thouſand Britiſh troops were led to mutual ſlaughter, and the battle was long carried on with the utmoſt fury. Rupert, who commanded the right wing of the royaliſts, was oppoſed to Cromwell, who conducted the choice troops of the parliament, inured to danger under that determined leader, animated by zeal, and confirmed by the moſt rigid diſcipline. After an obſtinate conteſt the cavalry of the royaliſts gave way, and the infantry that ſtood next to them were borne down, and put to flight. Newcaſtle's regiment alone, reſolute to conquer or periſh, obſtinately kept their ground, and maintained, by the dead bodies of their fellow ſoldiers, the ſame order into which they had at firſt been ranged. In the other wing, Sir Thomas Fairfax and colonel Lambert, with ſome troops broke through the royaliſts, and tranſported by the fury of purſuit, ſoon reached their victorious friends, and alſo engaged in the purſuit of the enemy. But this furious attack being over, Lucas, who commanded the royaliſts in the ſame wing, reſtoring order to his broken forces, made a gallant attack on the parliament's cavalry, threw them into diſorder, puſhed them upon their own infantry, and routed the whole wing. But when ready to ſeize on their carriages and baggage he perceived Cromwell, who was now returned from the purſuit of the other wing. Both ſides were not a little ſurprized to find that they muſt again renew the combat for that victory, which each of them thought they had already obtained. The front of the battle was directly changed, each army occupying the very ground which had been poſſeſſed by the other at the beginning of the day. This ſecond onſet was equally deſperate and furious at the beginning; but after the utmoſt efforts of courage exerted by both parties, victory declared in favour of the parliament. The prince's train of artillery was taken, and his whole army drove off the field of battle. The royaliſts loſt ſix thouſand men, half of whom fell in the battle. But this was not the only misfortune. The marquis of Newcaſtle ſtill reſenting the haughty behaviour of prince Rupert, took ſhipping at Scarborough, and retired to the continent, where he continued till the reſtoration. Confounded at his late defeat, prince Rupert, with the remains of his army, retired into Lancaſhire, abandoning York to its fate, which was, a few days after, delivered up to the parliament's forces by Glenham the deputy governor. Fairfax immediately entered the place, ſupplied it with a ſtrong garriſon, and detached a thouſand horſe into Lancaſhire, to reinforce the parliament's army in that quarter, then watching the motions of prince Rupert. At the ſame time the Scotch army marched to the northward to meet the earl of Calender, then coming to join them with ten thouſand additional forces. As ſoon as this junction was finiſhed, they attacked and took by ſtorm the town of Newcaſtle.

The king's affairs wore a different aſpect in the ſouth. The two armies under Eſſex and Waller being compleated, the generals were ordered to march with their combined forces towards Oxford, and if the king ſhould have taken refuge in that city, to inveſt it immediately, that they might finiſh the war at a ſingle blow. The king, apprized of his danger, left the place, paſſed the parliament's forces unnoticed, and directed his march towards Worceſter. The condition of Charles was now conſidered as deſperate, and would certainly have been ſo, had he not been preſerved by the differences, which, fortunately for him, ſubſiſted between Eſſex and Waller; the former taking upon himſelf the expedition into the weſt, which had been allotted to the latter. Waller complained loudly of Eſſex, for having thus uſurped his command, and produced his orders from the committee of the parliament. But Eſſex was abſolute, and even threatened to try Waller, by a council of war, if he did not obey his orders, and purſue the king immediately. While this debate continued, Charles gained two days march, and reached Worceſter: but fearing to be ſhut up in that city by Waller, who was now advanced to Eveſham, he retreated with his army to Bewdly, under pretence of reaching Shrewſbury, where it was practicable for him to have joined prince Rupert. Waller, who expected a conſiderable reinforcement, moved towards Broomſgrove and Kidderminſter, extending his quarters to the eaſtward till he got between Charles and Shrewſbury. This was the very thing the king deſired; he immediately returned to Worceſter, and thence to Eveſham, breaking down all the bridges as he paſſed. By this means he left Waller two days march behind him, in a heavy country. Upon his coming to Eveſham, he puniſhed ſome of the magiſtrates for their ſo readily admitting Waller into that place; and marched the ſame day towards Cambden. From this town he wrote to his friends at Oxford, for a reinforcement, and immediately marched in queſt of Waller, hoping to be ſoon in a condition of meeting him in the open field; and was accordingly joined in a few hours, by his infantry and artillery from Oxford. June the twenty-ninth, the two armies approached each other at Cropedy-bridge, and were divided only by the narrow channel of the Charwell. The next day the king marched towards Daventry; and Waller ordered a large detachment to croſs the bridge, and attack the rear of the royaliſts; but they were repulſed, routed, and chaſed to a conſiderable diſtance. Diſcouraged by this blow, Waller's troops began to deſert in great numbers; and the king thought he might ſafely leave them, and in order to attack Eſſex, march to the weſtward.

The engagement at Cropedy-bridge being over, the king drew up a meſſage for peace, addreſſed to both houſes of parliament, and cauſed a copy of it to be ſent to the earl of Eſſex, by the marquis of Hertford, in order to be communicated to the parliament, with an intimation that the French agent had the original to deliver, if required. This meſſage, directed to the lords and commons at Weſtminſter, contained a general offer to treat of peace, and if commiſſioners ſhould be appointed to repair to the king, he would ſend them a ſafe conduct. But the two houſes, ever jealous of the king, thought there was ſome artifice concealed in ſending them only a copy of his meſſage, and that his aim was to engage them to demand the original from the French agent. Nor did they conceive themſelves to be acknowledged by the meſſage, as the two houſes of parliament; and therefore imagined, that the king had reſerved to himſelf the power of declaring, he did not acknowledge them for the true parliament of England. Indeed he ought not to have made this acknowledgment, according to his principles declared in the proclamation he had publiſhed againſt it. They therefore reſolved not to take the leaſt notice of the meſſage, nor make any reply.

Prince Maurice, who commanded the royal army in the weſt, being compelled by Eſſex to raiſe the ſiege of Lime; he reduced Weymouth and Taunton, and proceeded ſtill in his conqueſts without meeting with any interruption. But hearing that the king was marching into the weſt againſt him, he retired into Cornwall, and ſent a meſſage to the parliament, deſiring them to diſpatch an army to attack the king in his rear. Accordingly general Middleton was ſent with a conſiderable body of troops for that purpoſe; but arrived too late to do any effectual ſervice. Charles entered Cornwall on the firſt of Auguſt, where he was joined by prince Maurice at the head of his army; and Eſſex had now the mortification to find himſelf cooped up in a narrow corner at Leſtwithiel. And being deſtitute of forage and proviſions, and deſpairing of all hopes of relief, he was ſoon reduced to the laſt extremity. The king preſſed him on one ſide, prince Maurice on another, and Sir Richard Grenville on a third. When expecting every moment to be attacked from all quarters, Eſſex, Roberts, and ſome others of the principal officers, found means to get on board a boat, and to reach Plymouth. Belfour, at the head of his cavalry, eſcaped the king's guard in a thick miſt, and reached the garriſons of their own party. But the infantry under the command of major-general Skipton, were obliged to ſurrender their arms, artillery, baggage, and ammunition; and being led to the parliamentary quarters, were ſet at liberty. By this time the earl, now created marquis of Montroſe, was very ſucceſsful for the king in Scotland; having obtained a remarkable victory over the covenanters at Newbiggen-moor; and taken Perth. About fourteen days after he gained another victory near Aberdeen, took that city, and marched directly into Argyle's country, which he waſted with fire and ſword. Beſides theſe he performed ſeveral other important ſervices, with a mere handful of men, and very little aſſiſtance from England. But the good fortune of the parliament in other parts, more than balanced this ſucceſs of the royal party.

Monmouth was taken by colonel Maſſey, and Liverpool was ſurrendered to Sir John Meldrum. The parliament having armed again the forces of Eſſex, ordered Mancheſter and Cromwell to march with their recruited forces from the eaſtern aſſociation; and after joining their armies to thoſe of Waller and Middleton, to offer the king battle. Accordingly, after joining theſe different corps, they vigorouſly attacked the king at Newbury, where Charles had poſted his forces; and by that means rendered Newbury a ſecond time the ſcene of the bloody animoſities of the Engliſh. Eſſex's ſoldiers, exhorting one another to repair their broken honour, and revenge their diſgrace at Leſtwithiel, made an impetuous aſſault upon the royaliſts; and having recovered ſome of their cannon loſt in Cornwall, he embraced them with tears of joy. Though the king's troops defended themſelves with great valour, they were overpowered; and the night came very ſeaſonably to their relief, and prevented a total overthrow. The king perceiving himſelf unable to renew the battle, left his cannon in Dennington caſtle, near Newbury, and retreated immediately to Wallingford, and from thence to Oxford. There prince Rupert, and the earl of Northampton, joined him with conſiderable bodies of cavalry. Strengthened by this reinforcement, he ventured to advance towards the enemy, now employed in the ſiege of Dennington caſtle. Eſſex, who had been detained by ſickneſs, had not joined the army ſince his misfortune in Cornwall. Mancheſter, who had now the command, though his forces were much ſuperior to thoſe of the king, declined an engagement, and rejected Cromwell's advice, who earneſtly preſſed him not to neglect ſo favourable an opportunity of finiſhing the war. The king's army therefore brought off their cannon from Dennington caſtle, in the face of the enemy; while Charles enjoyed the ſatisfaction of exciting between Mancheſter and Cromwell the ſame animoſities which before exiſted between Waller and Eſſex.

This winter, Laud, archbiſhop of Canterbury, was condemned and brought to the ſcaffold. The houſe of commons, engaged in enterprizes of greater importance, had for three years found no leiſure to finiſh his impeachment. He was accuſed of high treaſon in endeavouring to ſubvert the fundamental laws, and of other high crimes and miſdemeanors. Prynne, the lawyer, who had been proſecuted by Laud with ſuch tyranny and cruelty, was a member in this parliament, and carried on the proſecution with great animoſity and bitterneſs; and Laud now experienced from this exaſperated ſufferer, the ſame rigour with which he had treated others; the ſame unjuſt ſeizing of papers, not only to prove the fact of which he was already accuſed, but to frame others, and deprive him of the neceſſary materials of defence. His behaviour through this tedious trial, which laſted twenty days, did great honour to his temper, and his maſterly defence gave ſufficient proof of his great abilities. Laud in vain pleaded the king's pardon ſent from Oxford. Both houſes declared it of no effect. Being condemned to ſuffer as a common felon, he pleaded the ſanctity of his character, his former ſituation in life, the offices he had held, and hoped he ſhould not be ſubjected to the ignominious puniſhment denounced againſt him. But ſuch was the reſentment of the commons againſt his paſt conduct, that his petition was with great reluctance granted. He was ſentenced to ſuffer death on the tenth of January, 1644-5, without any other favour than to have one of his chaplains to attend him, in the company of two divines appointed by parliament, and to have his ſentence altered from hanging and quartering, into beheading. In his preparations for death he diſcovered great magnanimity; and on the ſcaffold made a long ſpeech, or rather ſermon, to vindicate the king and himſelf from intending to introduce popery, and to perſuade the people to ſubmit to the ancient diſcipline of the church. He declared in the moſt ſolemn terms, that he had never been an enemy to the inſtitution of parliament, though he could by no means give his approbation to every meaſure they purſued. He fervently called upon heaven for forgiveneſs to his enemies, and then gave a ſignal to the executioner, who at one ſtroke ſevered his head from his body. Thus fell archbiſhop Laud, a prelate of ſound learning, and poſſeſſing ſome virtues, but who had unfortunately imbibed principles, by no means favourable to the liberty of his country. He ſhewed himſelf unacquainted with the ſimplicity, charity, and meekneſs of the Goſpel; nor had he any other rule to judge of mens deſerts, but as they were more or leſs attached to the power of the church. Upon the whole, his character ſerves, as an eminent example, to ſhew, that extenſive learning and abilities are not incompatible with a narrow judgment; and that in all the catalogue of human frailties, there are none which more corrupt the heart, or deprave the underſtanding, than the follies of mingled pride and ſuperſtition. This prelate is the only individual of that high office in the church, except Cranmer the martyr, who ever ſuffered death by the hands of the executioner. On the ſame day, when the lords concurred with the commons in the attainder of the archbiſhop, they paſſed an ordinance that the Common Prayer Book ſhould be laid aſide; and for eſtabliſhing a directory of worſhip, which an aſſembly of divines ſhould frame.

London being now divided into ſeveral factions, iſſued forth many bitter complaints, that the parliament had loaded the capital with the whole burden of the war, and at the ſame time greatly neglected the intereſt of the city. This circumſtance occaſioned warm debates in the houſe of commons; and Cromwell took the opportunity of expoſing, with great freedom, the licentiouſneſs and ill government of the army, the officers of which, he ſaid, could not eaſily be called to an account, as many of them were members of the houſe of commons. He then made a motion for taking into conſideration the new modelling the army; in which he was warmly ſeconded by Sir Harry Vane, Mr. Nathaniel Fiennes, and Oliver St. John, ſolicitor-general, all of them furious independents. In order to effect this ſcheme, it was propoſed, that the members of both houſes ſhould reſign all their employments, civil and military. The greater part of the places of profit were poſſeſſed by the members of one or the other houſe. The three generals of the parliament's army, the earls of Mancheſter and Eſſex, and lord Fairfax, were peers. The principal part of the colonels, majors, treaſurers, purveyors, and commiſſioners of all departments, were members of the lower houſe. How improbable then did it appear, that ſo many perſons in power could be prevailed upon by the ſoothings of a religious cant, to reſign at once their poſts, their power, and their income. This was, however, effected in a very ſhort ſpace of time. The commons, in particular, dazzled with the proſpect of gaining an aſcendancy over the minds of the people by this ſingular example of diſintereſtedneſs, paſſed the bill. The lords, indeed, at firſt refuſed to concur, but were ſoon overpowered by the commons: ſo that on the nineteenth of December, the famous act, called "The ſelf-denying ordinance," paſſed both houſes; whereby the members of parliament were excluded from all civil and military employment, a few officers excepted, who were ſpecified in the bill.

In conſequence of this act, Eſſex, Warwick, Mancheſter, Denbigh, Waller, Brereton, and ſeveral others, reſigned their commands, and received the thanks of the parliament for their good ſervices: the former received a penſion of ten thouſand pounds a year.

A. D. 1645. Both parties having ſuffered much by the calamities of the war, it was mutually deemed neceſſary to make a treaty of peace. The deputies on both ſides accordingly met at Uxbridge. Charles's commiſſioners were the duke of Richmond, the marquis of Hertford, the earls of Southampton, Kingſton, and Chicheſter, and eleven commoners; among whom was Sir Edward Hyde, chancellor of the Exchequer, and afterwards earl of Clarendon. The parliament appointed twelve deputies, the principal of whom were the earls of Northumberland and Pembroke, Saliſbury and Denbigh; lord Louden, the marquis of Argyle, and others, being commiſſioned on part of the Scots. But however willing each party might be to obtain peace, nothing like it could be effected. The parliament, on their part, claimed a right, not only to inſpect all public affairs, but even of taking particular cognizance of all the king's private and domeſtic concerns, which was no ſooner propoſed than rejected. Charles's deputies made the following propoſitions: that every perſon ſhould enjoy liberty of conſcience; that no biſhop ſhould exerciſe any kind of juriſdiction; that the management of the militia ſhould be veſted in the hands of twenty commiſſioners, ten to be appointed by the king, and ten by parliament; but theſe propoſitions met with the diſapprobation of both parties, and thus ended the commiſſion. At this time two powerful parties began to break forth, the Preſbyterian and the Independent. The object of the Preſbyterians was the reſtriction of regal prerogative; the Independents aimed at the abolition of monarchy, and to introduce the democratic form of government. The former renounced hierarchy, and the latter rejected all forms of the church government, totally condemning epiſcopal ordination; granting to all perſons, without exemption, the liberty to teach, preach, and expound the ſcriptures, as directed by divine inſpiration. Cromwell, Vane, Tate, and Haſlerig, were at the head of the Independent party; who ſtooped to every art for the attainment of popular applauſe. Cromwell exhibited a complaint againſt the earl of Mancheſter, accuſing him of miſmanagement at the battle of Newbury. The earl retorted, by declaring, that Cromwell had, in a private conference, hinted to him, that if he would adhere to honeſt men, he might command an army that would give law to both the parliament and king. Aſtoniſhed at this declaration, both houſes debated on the propriety of putting Cromwell under an arreſt; but a further diſcuſſion of this point was poſtponed, as matters of greater importance now claimed their attention.

Fairfax was choſen by the Preſbyterian party for their general; but it being diſcovered that he had all along diſſembled, and was in reality attached to the intereſt of Cromwell, they altered their intentions. The army belonging to the parliament was new modelled, agreeable to the plan deviſed by Cromwell; and all the members of parliament being excluded, and their adherents having thrown up their commiſſions, the vacant places were filled up with thoſe of Cromwell's party, who appeared in the double capacity of chaplains and military officers. The wildeſt enthuſiaſm was now to be ſeen in both officers and common men, who proceeded to battle chaunting divine hymns. Cromwell, who was at the head of this enthuſiaſtic army, and from whoſe example the contagion ſpread, marched with them to Windſor on the twenty-fourth of April; and in the neighbourhood of Iſlip, beat and cut to pieces four regiments of the king's cavalry. Bletchington was ſurrendered to him on a ſingle ſummons by colonel Windebank, who was tried by a court-martial, and ſhot for cowardice. Having taken the town of Leiceſter by aſſault, Charles continued his march towards Wales, in expectation of receiving a reinforcement of three thouſand cavalry, under the command of Goring, and two thouſand recruits lately raiſed in Wales by colonel Gerard. A letter written by Goring from Taunton, to inform the king of the little difficulty that would occur in reducing that place, and to repreſent the expediency of his majeſty's acting upon the defenſive, falling into the hands of Fairfax, that general reſolved to hazard a battle before a junction could be effected. Fairfax followed the royaliſts; and Charles apprehending that he ſhould not be able to reach Leiceſter, without expoſing his rear to great danger, he reſolved to meet the enemy, and abide the iſſue of an engagement. The king leading his forces back, the contending armies came within ſight of each other near the ſmall village of Naſeby. Charles commanded a body of reſerve; the right wing was headed by prince Rupert; the left wing was under Sir Marmaduke Langdale; and the main body was commanded by lord Aſhley. The enemy were arranged in the order of battle on a hill of gentle aſcent, Skipton and Fairfax commanding the main body; Cromwell the right; and Ireton the left wing of the army. With his uſual intrepidity and ſucceſs, prince Rupert aſſaulted the left wing, whom he routed, and purſued to the village: but on his return, the prince waſted ſome time in unſucceſsful endeavours to poſſeſs himſelf of the enemy's artillery. In the interim, Cromwell engaged Sir Marmaduke Langdale, and after an obſtinate conteſt, threw his cavalry into diſorder; but the infantry on both ſides maintained the battle with aſtoniſhing vigour. At length, however, the battalions commanded by Fairfax and Skipton retreating, Cromwell returned, and ſo furiouſly charged the king's infantry in flank, that, unable to reſiſt ſo powerful an attack, they were thrown into confuſion, and in a ſhort time completly routed. Notwithſtanding the ſucceſs of prince Rupert in the firſt aſſault, his utmoſt endeavours were not ſufficient to animate them to a ſecond attack; ſo intimidated were they by the formidable appearance of the enemy, who were now marſhalled in ſuch exact order as to be equally prepared for attack or defence. The king was anxious to aſſail the enemy at the head of his reſerve; but he was prevented by the earl of Carnwath, who ſeizing the bridle of his majeſty's horſe, and turning the creature round, exclaimed, "Will you ruſh on certain deſtruction?" This being obſerved by the royaliſts, they wheeled to the right, and were preſently in ſuch a ſtate of confuſion, that all efforts to rally them proved ineffectual. This afforded an advantage too favourabe to be diſregarded by the parliamentarians, who exerted themſelves with ſuch vigour, that they took upwards of five thouſand priſoners, and a large quantity of ammunition and artillery.

Charles and prince Rupert retreated with the cavalry to Aſhby de la Zouch; whence the king purſued his route to Wales, with a view of raiſing an army in that country; and the prince directed his courſe towards Briſtol, in order to put that place in a ſtate of defence. Fairfax proceeded to Leiceſter, which town ſurrendered to him on capitulation; and he then ſubdued Bridgewater, Sherborn, and Bath. After theſe ſucceſſes, he vanquiſhed Lord Goring at Lamport, and proceeded to lay ſiege to Briſtol, which place was ſtrongly fortified and plentifully ſupplied with military ſtores and proviſions. It was univerſally imagined, that on this occaſion prince Rupert would diſplay his uſual proweſs, and defend ſo important a poſt as Briſtol even to the laſt extremity; but on the firſt ſummons of the enemy, he offered to ſurrender the place on terms of capitulation, to the extreme aſtoniſhment of the public. The king was ſo exaſperated againſt Rupert for his ſhameful ſurrender of Briſtol, that he diveſted that prince of his commiſſions, and commanded him to evacuate the kingdom. Having ſtationed a ſtrong garriſon in Briſtol, Fairfax marched into the weſtern counties, committing great depredations in his way. Having ſubdued the Devizes, and ſeveral other places, he made himſelf maſter of Tiverton, and blocked up the city of Exeter. Fairfax, upon gaining information that the prince of Wales, at the head of a powerful army, was marching from the county of Cornwall in order to give him battle, proceeded with all poſſible expedition to meet his royal highneſs; and he attacked a part of his cavalry by ſurprize, and ſo diſcomfited them, that the prince was under the neceſſity of returning to Cornwall. Lord Goring having fled to France, the prince of Wales promoted Hopton to the command that nobleman had held in the army. Upon his march to the relief of Exeter, Hopton was attacked by the enemy and routed; and upon his troops being ſurrounded, he capitulated, on condition that his army ſhould be allowed to croſs the ſea, or return to their reſpective habitations. Their horſes and arms were ſurrendered to Fairfax, who granted paſſports to ſuch as expreſſed a deſire of abandoning the kingdom; but he previouſly bound them by an oath never again to appear in arms, in oppoſition to the parliamentary intereſt. The treaty being concluded, the lords Hopton and Colepepper ſet out to join the prince of Wales, who, from an apprehenſion of falling into the power of Fairfax, had retired to the iſle of Scilly. By the month of April the city of Exeter had ſurrendered to Fairfax; and the king's troops had been ſo frequently routed, and were ſo diſpirited by a ſucceſſion of misfortunes, that his majeſty's ſituation appeared to be truly deſperate. Yet, notwithſtanding the great and repeated inſtances of ill ſucceſs he had experienced, the king's fortitude and courage ſuffered no relaxation. To ſo terrible a dilemma was he now reduced, that he reſolved to join Montroſe in Scotland, as the only probable means of retrieving his affairs. While in this diſpoſition of mind, his majeſty received information, that the enemy had ſtationed a ſtrong detachment of cavalry, under the command of Poyntz, between Hereford and Worceſter; and therefore he determined to go to Cheſter by the way of Wales, and to paſs to Scotland through Lancaſhire and Cumberland.

Underſtanding that the enemy had attacked Cheſter by ſurprize, and that they had gained poſſeſſion of the outworks and ſuburbs of that city, he detached Sir Marmaduke Langdale over Holtbridge, with orders to make an aſſault upon the rear of the beſiegers, intending, in the interim, to attempt a forcible entry into the city: Poyntz, who had followed the king with great expedition, appeared the next day; but Sir Marmaduke Langdale compelled him to retire. The aſſailants now abandoned the ſuburbs, in order to join Poyntz, who being thus conſiderably reinforced, attacked the royaliſts, and drove them to the very gates of the city. The earl of Litchfield, and lord Gerard, who commanded the king's guards and cavalry, advanced to the charge, and compelled the enemy to retire; but their muſqueteers diſcharged ſuch repeated vollies upon the king's new raiſed forces, that they were thrown into diſorder, routed and diſperſed, many brave officers being among the number of the ſlain. His majeſty retreated to Denbigh caſtle, where he was preſently joined by prince Maurice, with eight hundred cavalry; and after being reinforced by ſeveral ſmaller parties, he croſſed the river Dee, and, gaining a march upon the enemy, arrived at Bridgnorth, where intelligence was communicated to him, that Berkeley caſtle and the Devizes had fallen into the power of the parliamentarians. Lord Digby was now appointed lieutenant-general of all the troops raiſed or to be raiſed on the other ſide the river Trent, for the ſervice of his majeſty; who ordered him, in conjunction with Sir Marmaduke Langdale, to haſten to Scotland with a body of fifteen hundred cavalry, to join Montroſe, whoſe army had lately been defeated by Leſley. The march was begun without delay, and this body of troops attacked and diſperſed a thouſand infantry raiſed in the neighbourhood of Doncaſter for the ſervice of parliament. They afterwards encountered a body at Sherborn, under the command of colonel Copley, who having completely routed them, they fled to join Skippon. This party then proceeded to Dumfries; but gaining no intelligence there relating to Montroſe, they, after being joined by ſeveral Scotiſh noblemen, embarked for Ireland. When Charles returned to Newark, prince Rupert ſolicited an audience, that he might vindicate his conduct with reſpect to the ſurrender of Briſtol. His requeſt was granted, and the king publicly declared himſelf perfectly ſatisfied, that the prince had been guilty of no diſloyalty in any one inſtance.

Charles's ſituation now appeared to be truly deplorable: his moſt faithful friends and able counſellors had either ſacrificed their lives in his ſervice, or been compelled to fly their country; his queen had ſought a ſanctuary from the horrors of civil war in Holland; the prince of Wales was a wretched exile among the rocks of Scilly; and his other children were continually in the moſt imminent danger of falling into the power of his moſt inveterate enemies: his military ſtrength was exhauſted; his ungrateful nephews, whom he had reared with the utmoſt tenderneſs of paternal affection, had vilely deſerted his cauſe; and he was ſo embarraſſed by the contrivances of his enemies, that there appeared but little probability of his being able to elude the effects of their implacable reſentment: but though reduced to this deſperate and perplexing ſituation, he ſtill preſerved a calmneſs of mind, a clearneſs of recollection, a quickneſs of diſcernment, and an unremitting fortitude truly aſtoniſhing. Having diſpatched orders to the governor of Oxford, to ſtation the horſe of the garriſon at a ſtated time between Banbury and Daventry, he departed from Newark late in the evening, accompanied by three hundred horſe, and rode to Belvoir caſtle, at which place he arrived at three in the morning. Sir Gervas Lucas was there ready to attend him further on the way; towards the evening, the king, very much fatigued, retired to reſt at a village near Northampton. The next morning early he proceeded on his march, and arrived at Banbury about noon, from whence he was conducted with ſafety to Oxford, after having been greatly haraſſed, and eſcaped much danger in his march. Not thinking his ſituation ſecure, he held it expedient to treat again with his enemies; he therefore demanded of parliament a ſafe conduct for the duke of Richmond, the earl of Southampton, and others, whom he deſigned to charge with offers of accommodation. Having ſignified his intentions to grant the nonconformiſts liberty of conſcience, he propoſed, upon the diſmiſſion of the armies, to join the two houſes; to adopt meaſures for the ſettling the debts of the public, and to place the militia in a ſtate that ſhould prove to the ſatisfaction of all parties; he demanded a perſonal treaty, in which he manifeſted his ardent inclination to ſtop the progreſs of the deſtructive war. But parliament, having grown arrogant in conſequence of their ſucceſs and power, wanted to impoſe ſuch conditions, as would have been degrading in royalty to have accepted: they imputed to him the crime of having employed the forces of the nation in defence of arbitrary power, and with an intention to make peace with the revolted catholics of Ireland. While theſe important concerns agitated the mind of the unfortunate king, France ſent over Montreuil, apparently to mediate a peace between Charles and the parliament; but his real errand was to effect, if practicable, a ſecret accommodation between his majeſty and the Scotiſh army. The ambaſſadors met the Scottiſh commiſſioners in London, and found them diſpoſed to effect a compromiſe: but they inſiſting, as the moſt indiſpenſible condition of the treaty, that the epiſcopacy ſhould be aboliſhed, Charles declined the negociation. While the French miniſter went to the Scotiſh army, to expoſtulate with them on the intemperance of their zeal, Fairfax led his troops towards Oxford, and the king was in great danger of being ſurrounded. Lord Aſhley, with about a thouſand men, marched to ſuccour his majeſty; but being apprized of this deſign, Fairfax attacked Aſhley's troops, who were greatly fatigued, completely routed them, and made priſoners Aſhley, Sir Charles Lucas, and many other officers of diſtinction. After this, Charles made no efforts to oppoſe his enemies by dint of arms; but he reſolved to put himſelf under the protection of the Scots, hoping, that the implacable enmity they entertained againſt the Independents, would urge them to exert their beſt endeavours in ſecuring his perſonal ſafety.

A. D. 1646. Thus determined, the king departed from Oxford on the twenty-ſeventh of April under the conduct of Sir John Aſhburnham and Dr. Hudſon, who had undertaken to guide him to a retreat by unfrequented ways. On the king's diſcovering himſelf to the earl of Leven, that general expreſſed great aſtoniſhment, but treated him with the reſpect due to his exalted ſtation. The parliament had no ſooner gained information of the king's eſcape, than they publiſhed a proclamation, denouncing the ſentence of high treaſon againſt any perſons who ſhould ſhelter, or in any manner protect the ſovereign. They determined, that Fairfax ſhould abandon his enterprize againſt Oxford, and march to Newark, where the king had thrown himſelf under the protection of the Scotiſh army; but this reſolution was declined in conſequence of a declaration by the Scotch commiſſioners, that the king's arrival was entirely unexpected by the general. Being informed that Fairfax had received orders to direct his march northwards, the Scots retired with the king to Newcaſtle, where his majeſty was denied the liberty of holding any communication with Montreuil; and Aſhburnham, fearing he ſhould be taken into cuſtody, fled the kingdom. The Scotiſh preachers expreſſed themſelves in the pulpit in language groſly affronting to his majeſty, who was treated with coolneſs, reſerve, and ſometimes with the moſt mortifying diſreſpect, by the officers of the Scotiſh army: he was adviſed to ſurrender all his garriſons to the parliament, and he complied, ſeemingly with great compoſure. Diſpatches were tranſmitted to Dublin, commanding Ormond to ſurrender that city, and the other forts of Ireland, to the officers appointed by parliament; and after laying down his arms at the command of the king, Montroſe retired to the continent. Charles now ſent a meſſage to the houſes of parliament, requeſting, that the religious controverſy might be ſubmitted to the arbitration of able divines: he ſignified in a letter to the city of London, an earneſt deſire to give the parliament every ſatisfaction they could reaſonably deſire; and in ſhort, manifeſted every poſſible proof of an earneſt wiſh to effect an accommodation with parliament. The Scots ſtill rigidly adhered to their covenant; proteſting that they abhorred all ſecret proceedings that might tend to create an animoſity between the two kingdoms. Their general aſſembly wrote to the parliament of England, the city of London, and the eccleſiaſtical aſſembly, entreating them to forward the work of reformation, according to the tenor of the covenant. The parliament now cauſed propoſals to be preſented to the king, wherein they arrogated to themſelves the whole powers of the adminiſtration of the government. To theſe the king replied, that he could not diveſt himſelf of that which he inherited by birth, and the laws of the realm, yet, regardleſs of his own private intereſt, he would willingly comply with any meaſures that might tend to promote the general welfare of his ſubjects. It being ſtipulated, that the Scotiſh army ſhould be withdrawn immediately after the payment of their arrears, commiſſioners were nominated to inſpect the accounts of the deputies; who, after many warm debates, conſented to receive four hundred thouſand pounds in acquittal of all demands. In the beginning of September, the duke of Hamilton had been removed to St. Michael's Mount, in Cornwall; but upon the ſurrender of that place to the parliament, he recovered his liberty, and immediately repairing to the king at Newcaſtle, earneſtly intreated him to conſent to the propoſitions made by the two houſes. Deſirous of putting a period to the horrid devaſtations of civil war, Charles propoſed, that the hierarchy ſhould be limited to ſome particular dioceſe, and that preſbytery ſhould be eſtabliſhed in all other parts of the kingdom; obſerving, that the liberty of acting according to the dictates of conſcience, he entertained the reaſonable hope would not be denied to himſelf, ſeeing he was willing to grant it to others.

The parliament nominated a committee about the middle of the ſame month, to hold a conference with the Scotiſh commiſſioners, as to the manner of diſpoſing of the perſon of the king. Equal pretenſions were ſet up by the Scots and the Engliſh; but the controverſy at length terminated in favour of the latter. Charles repeatedly ſolicited, that he might be allowed to treat with the parliament in perſon, reminding them that it was their lawful ſovereign who pleaded for this privilege; and intimating, that had he denied the meaneſt of his ſubjects, the right he then demanded in his own behalf, he ſhould have juſtly incurred the reproach of being unworthy to govern a free people. A vote was now paſſed in parliament, purporting, that his majeſty ſhould reſide at Holmby, in Northamptonſhire, and be treated with the reſpect and deference due to the ſovereign dignity. Parliament then appointed a committee to receive the king from the Scotiſh army, who ſurrendered his majeſty on the thirteenth of April, and the ſame day they marched on their return to Scotland. On his way to Holmby, the king was attended by an immenſe concourſe of people, whom curioſity had brought together to behold their ſovereign, reduced to a ſtate of the moſt abject humiliation; and theſe people expreſſed great concern for his unhappy fate, and fervently prayed to heaven for his protection.

A. D. 1647. Several contentions now aroſe between the independents and preſbyterians deſtructive of the union they had ſo long maintained. The operations of the independents were principally directed by Cromwell, a man of great courage, boundleſs ambition, and deeply verſed in the arts of diſſimulation. Having obtained an entire intereſt over general Fairfax, Cromwell procured appointments in the army for Rainſborough, Fleetwood, Lambert, Harriſon, and a vaſt number of his other dependents and creatures. Perceiving, that a majority of the perſons who compoſed the parliament, from an apprehenſion of the increaſing power of the general officers, were deſirous of diſbanding the army, Cromwell affected to approve the plan, profeſſed himſelf attached to the doctrine of preſbyterianiſm, frequently introduced quotations from ſcripture, and declared, that the glory of God, and the advancement of true religion, were the grand motives that influenced his conduct. But at the ſame time emiſſaries were employed by Cromwell to ſtir up a ſpirit of mutiny among the ſoldiery. The thought of returning to their former employments was exceedingly diſagreeable to the officers, who, from long uſe, had become enamoured of a military life: however, the commons voted that the army ſhould be diſbanded, each ſoldier to receive ſix weeks pay on his diſcharge: but the vote for ſuch a ſudden diſſolution, cauſed great murmurings among the troops. Directions were given to Cromwell, Ireton, Fleetwood, and Skippon, to acquaint the army, that the parliament intended to paſs votes in its favour; whereupon the private ſoldiers deputed perſons to deliberate on their concerns, and communicate their reſolution to a council of the principal officers. By theſe tools, whoſe recommendation conſiſted in their reputed ſanctity, and their talents in preaching and praying, Cromwell and his partizans effected their purpoſes. However the parliament continued its intentions of diſbanding all the troops except thoſe intended for Ireland, and deliberated on what ſteps ſhould be taken in the affair. A petition was now preſented to the general by the ſoldiers, ſtating the injuſtice of this deſign, and praying that the diviſions of the army might be aſſembled, to deliberate on the mode of redreſſing the grievance; and hinting that diſagreeable conſequences to parliament might enſue, if their petition was not attended to. Whereupon a council of war was ſummoned, in which it was reſolved to repreſent to parliament, that meaſures muſt be immediately taken to appeaſe the army, or the worſt conſequences might be expected. To avert the impending danger, the parliament reſolved, if poſſible, to divide the collective body of the troops; they made conceſſions to the army; but thoſe who had the direction of its operations, took effectual care that it ſhould not be diſbanded; and the army now ſomewhat reſembled a republic, in which the vote of a private man was as valied as that of an officer. Indeed, almoſt every one thought himſelf at liberty to carry his own ſchemes into execution. Some of the regiments of horſe having formed the reſolution of ſeizing the perſon of the king, one Joyce, a cornet, who had formerly been a taylor, was fixed on to carry their plan into execution. On the third of June at break of day, the cornet arrived at Holmby, with a detachment of fifty horſe; and he and three ſoldiers going up ſtairs, knocked at the door of the king's apartment. The door being opened, Joyce and the others advanced uncovered, but with piſtols in their hands, and told the king he muſt attend them to the army. Charles enquiring by what authority, Joyce pointed to his piſtols, and ſaid, "By this;" and deſired that he would be expeditious. Charles now directed one of his attendants to call the committee of the two houſes, who had taken charge of his perſon; and theſe aſking Joyce, if the parliament had commiſſioned him to act as he was now doing, he owned they had not, at the ſame time holding up his piſtol. They then ſaid they would write, to demand the pleaſure of parliament: he ſaid they might do ſo, but the king muſt go with him inſtantly; and Charles was obliged to ſubmit, as his guards ſeemed unwilling to reſiſt, and he departed with Joyce, though under the apprehenſion of being aſſaſſinated on the road.

The king lodged at colonel Montague's, near Cambridge; and on the following day reached Newmarket, where the officers of the army ſhewed him much reſpect. The regiments preſented a petition to the general, exhibiting complaints of the parliament; and then ſubſcribed a writing which they called "the engagement," by which they had conſented to be diſbanded, on the redreſs of ſuch of their grievances as ſhould be deemed worthy of redreſs by a council to be compoſed of the generals, two officers, and two ſoldiers of each regiment; and reſolved that they would adhere to the terms of this engagement. The army had now advanced to St. Alban's, when the general ſent a meſſage to both houſes, requeſting that the demands of the troops might be inſtantly ſatisfied.

About this time the city of London was empowered by parliament to raiſe a body of cavalry; and ten thouſand pounds were ordered to be paid to ſuch of the ſoldiers as ſhould quit the army, and engage in the expedition to Ireland. The army preſented a remonſtrance to both houſes, demanding the diſmiſſion of ſuch members as had been unduly elected, or had been guilty of corrupt practices; that the public accounts ſhould be ſettled; that juſtice ſhould be done on delinquents, and then an act of general amneſty ſhould be paſſed; they likewiſe impeached eleven members of the preſbyterian party, requiring that they ſhould be removed from the houſe, alledging that they had obſtructed the uſual courſe of juſtice. They then retreated from the metropolis to their head quarters at Reading, taking the king with them; and his majeſty was now treated with greater kindneſs than he had experienced at Holmby; his friends were permitted to viſit him, nor was he denied the liberty of correſponding with his queen; his children being no longer denied acceſs to him, they paſſed ſome days at Caverſham, where the king then reſided; his chaplains were reſtored, and he was allowed the uſe of the liturgy. Before they had obtained a complete victory over the parliament, Cromwell, Ireton, and other leading men of the independent party, continued to amuſe the king with vain hopes: but they afterwards treated him with the utmoſt harſhneſs and arrogance, abridging him of the liberty of holding any private converſation with either his friends or domeſtics, and ordered him to be ſtrictly guarded, and the moſt exact obſervation to be made upon the whole tenor of his conduct. This treatment convinced the king, that he had been made a dupe to the conſummate art of Cromwell; and he was alarmed by the ſuſpicion, that meaſures were concerting for depriving him of life. Theſe ſuſpicions were confirmed to him by major Huntington, whom Cromwell had employed in carrying private meſſages to the king; for he informed his majeſty, that if meaſures were not ſpeedily purſued for counteracting the machinations of Oliver, he would certainly ſucceed in the plot he had projected for depriving the king of his crown and life. Charles was now confined at Hampton-court, under a very ſtrong guard: but having formed a plan for effecting an eſcape from this place, he retired to his apartment at an early hour in the evening, under the pretence of indiſpoſition; and an hour after midnight, his majeſty, accompanied by Aſhburnham and Legge, two of the gentlemen of his bed-chamber, deſcended by the back ſtairs, and proceeded to the garden, at the gate whereof Sir John Berkeley was waiting with horſes. The king and his attendants directed their courſe towards Hampſhire, and riding all night through the foreſt, they, on the following day, arrived at Titchfield, the ſeat of the counteſs dowager of Southampton, where his majeſty took up his reſidence, being firmly perſuaded that he could ſafely rely on the fidelity of the counteſs. Before his arrival at the above place, the king had gone to the ſea-coaſt in ſearch of a veſſel which he expected to be waiting to receive him; but being diſappointed of the ſhip, his companions adviſed him to ſeek refuge in the Iſle of Wight, nothwithſtanding that place was under the government of Hammond, a known creature of the aſpiring Cromwell. Accordingly Charles diſpatched Aſhburnham and Berkeley to the Iſle of Wight, under a ſtrict injunction not to reveal to Hammond the place of his retreat, till he ſhould have given a ſolemn promiſe that he would not betray his majeſty to his enemies; but Aſhburnham violated the confidence Charles had repoſed in him, and brought Hammond to Titchfield; in conſequence of which, the king was under the neceſſity of ſurrendering himſelf to the governor, and of accompanying him to Cariſbrook-caſtle in the Iſle of Wight. The king was at firſt inclined to ſuſpect the fidelity of Aſhburnham: but being convinced that raſhneſs and preſumption had led him to apprize Hammond of the place of his reſidence, he fully acquitted him of any treaſonable deſign, and reſtored him to favour. The king's perſon being ſecured, and the parliament entirely ſubjected to the will of Cromwell, that aſpiring adventurer privately ſummoned a meeting of ſome of the principal officers under government, to be held at Windſor, for the purpoſe of forming a reſolution as to the mode of ſettling the nation, and what meaſures ſhould be purſued with regard to his Majeſty.

As ſoon as the king retired from the camp, he intended to carry on, in ſome place of ſecurity, two oppoſite treaties, into which he had entered, the one with his Scotch ſubjects, and the other with the general officers of the army. In purſuance of this plan, letters were ſent by Sir John Berkeley to Fairfax, Cromwell, and Ireton. Hammond, who had treated his priſoner with the utmoſt courteſy and humanity, accompanied the king's diſpatches with others of his own, to Ireton and Cromwell, in which he uſed many arguments and entreaties to perſuade them to agree ſpeedily with the king. Berkeley, on his way to the camp, heard that the agitators had dropped ſomething concerning bringing the king to a trial. When he arrived at the general's quarters and had delivered his compliments and letters, he had the mortification to be told by Fairfax, with a ſtern look, in the midſt of a full aſſembly of officers, that the army was the parliament's, and therefore they muſt refer the king's motion for peace to their principals, to whom they would ſend the letters. Berkeley looked round for comfort on his old friends, Cromwell and Ireton, who not only treated him coldly, but appeared diſpleaſed at the letters delivered them from Hammond. Berkeley, filled with melancholy apprehenſions, retired to his lodging; and at twelve at night met, in an unſuſpected place, Watſon, the ſcout-maſter general, who told him, that the army had reſolved to bring the king to a trial; that the officers were obliged to ſubmit to the ſenſe of the mutineers; that Cromwell being fully informed that this was the reſolution of the majority, had laid aſide his former oppoſition; and acknowledged that his eyes had been ſo dazzled with the glories of the world, as not to ſee clearly the great works the Lord was doing; and declared his reſolution to humble himſelf, and to deſire the prayers of the ſaints, that God would be pleaſed to forgive him his ſelf-ſeeking; and that with theſe hypocritical arts, and the aſſiſtance of Hugh Peters, a famous independent miniſter, he had made a full peace with the party he had offended. Berkeley loſt no time in acquainting the king of his danger, and earneſtly intreated him to lay aſide all ſchemes, but that of his immediate eſcape; but Charles thinking the danger not ſo great as he repreſented it, renewed his offers to the two houſes for a perſonal treaty, and accompanied them with propoſals for a peace. Notwithſtanding the king's former denial, the parliament had, before his removal from the army, voted to addreſs him once more on this ſubject; and it was now reſolved to addreſs the king to a perſonal treaty, on condition of his giving his aſſent to four preliminary articles: firſt, that the parliament ſhould have the militia under their power during twenty years; the ſecond, that the king ſhould recal all his proclamations againſt his parliament; and acknowledge that they had taken arms for their juſt and neceſſary defence: the third, that he ſhould annul all the acts and patents of peerage, which had paſſed the great ſeal, ſince its being conveyed from London by chancellor Lyttleton; and the fourth, that he ſhould give the houſes power to adjourn when they thought fit. This reſolution of the parliament to renew their offers of agreement with the king, was diſagreeable to the majority of the republicans; both as it diſappointed their ſchemes, and as they juſtly concluded, that if Charles was reſtored to any part of his former power, it would enable him to recover the remainder, whereby he would be enabled to gratify his own party, and to take revenge on them. The Scotch commiſſioners, for different reaſons, proteſted againſt the four preliminary articles: but both houſes adhering to the reſolution, the Scotch commiſſioners attended the committee appointed to wait upon the king, and were ſo ſucceſsful in their private inſinuations and promiſes, that the unhappy Charles returned a refuſal to the offers of parliament; and thus rejected his laſt opportunity of providing for his ſafety and ſecurity. The king had been told by Sir John Berkeley, that his ſending an abſolute negative, would occaſion his being ſo ſtrictly confined, as to render it impoſſible for him to eſcape. To this Charles aſſented; yet depended on the ſucceſs of delivering his anſwer ſealed up to the parliament's commiſſioners. But they, on receiving it, refuſed to take it ſealed, and on their opening it, and peruſing the contents, abruptly departed. Hammond, who, till now, had indulged the king in riding about the iſland at his pleaſure, and had been ſo ſucceſsful in his expoſtulations to the parliament, as to procure him the attendance of his own ſervants, with the company of his friends, now perceiving that he had cloſed with the Scots, in oppoſition to the intereſts of England, doubled the guards round the caſtle, the gates were double barred, and the king's attendants being ſent out of the iſland, every poſſible means of eſcape were prevented.

A. D. 1648. Both houſes were put into a flame on receiving the king's denial; and the republicans now advanced thoſe opinions which had hitherto only tranſpired in their private councils. Sir Thomas Wroth propoſed, that articles of impeachment ſhould be drawn up againſt him; that he ſhould be ſet aſide, and the kingdom ſettled without him. Commiſſary Ireton aſſerted, that the king, by rejecting the four bills, had denied ſafety and protection to his people. Subjection to a ſovereign, he obſerved, was but a return for protection; tection; and that being denied by the king, ſubjection ought to be with-held. Cromwell, who ſpoke laſt in the debate, after declaiming ſome time on the valour, good affections and godlineſs of the army, ſaid, it was now expected, that the parliament ſhould govern and defend the kingdom by their own power, and not teach the people to expect ſafety and protection from a man whoſe heart God had hardened; obſerving, that thoſe who had defended them from ſo many dangers, at the expence of their blood, would defend them in this with fidelity and courage, againſt all oppoſition. On calling the queſtion, That the lords and commons declare, that they will make no farther application to the king, the vote paſſed in the affirmative, by a hundred and forty-one voices againſt ninety-two: and the parliament to refreſh the memory of the public, with reſpect to the provocations and reaſons which had excited them to make uſe of theſe ſeverities, publiſhed a long declaration, in which all the errors of the king's adminiſtration were carefully enumerated.

There were three political parties at this time in Scotland. One party was diſtinguiſhed by the appellation of the royaliſts; and theſe contended for a full re-eſtabliſhment of the king's authority, without regard to the opinions entertained by the different religious ſects; though he was abſent, Montroſe was conſidered as the head of this party. The rigid preſbyterians were reſolved to introduce an exact uniformity in religious worſhip, and were averſe to affording the king any kind of aſſiſtance till he ſhould ſubſcribe the covenant: and Argyle was the chief of this faction. The third party, under the direction of the two brothers Hamilton and Laneric, was compoſed of the moderate preſbyterians, and their view was to reconcile the contending intereſts of religion and the crown; and, with the followers of preſbyterianiſm in England, to obtain an aſcendancy over the independent army, and re-eſtabliſh both the king and parliament in their conſtitutional authority, privileges and freedom. Upon an enquiry into the ſtate of the nation, the committee appointed to conduct that buſineſs declared, that there was a neceſſity for levying an army of forty thouſand men, for the public defence. The duke of Hamilton was appointed general, but he was not able to raiſe fourteen thouſand recruits; and theſe, being wholly ignorant of military diſcipline, were not in a condition to march for England till the beginning of July. While theſe preparations were making in Scotland, Langhorne, Poyer, and Powell, officers who had ſerved in the parliamentary army, revolted to the royaliſts, ſecured the caſtle of Pembroke, and influenced a majority of the inhabitants of South Wales to declare in favour of the king. In the mean time young Hales, and the earl of Norwich, excited commotions in the county of Kent; Sir Charles Lucas, Sir George Liſle, Sir Bernard Gaſcoyne, in conjunction with colonel Farr, who had been in the ſervice of parliament, collected an army of three thouſand men, and made themſelves maſters of Colcheſter; where they intended to remain till they ſhould have an opportunity of joining the Scotiſh army: but Fairfax inveſted the town, and deprived the inhabitants of all relief. And a fleet, under the command of the earl of Warwick, was ordered to oppoſe the ſeventeen ſhips that had revolted to the prince of Wales. The army being removed from the metropolis, the ſpirit and independency of parliament gradually revived; and, in a ſhort time, they ſent commiſſioners to the Iſle of Wight, to propoſe the terms of a treaty with the king. The appearance of his majeſty greatly affected the commiſſioners, ſo melancholy an alteration had been wrought in his figure; having been long excluded from ſocial intercourſe, he had entirely neglected his perſon; time, aſſiſted by a conſtant ſucceſſion of misfortunes, had changed his hair grey, and in a diſhevelled ſtate it ſhaded his face, which was ſtrongly expreſſive of adverſity and deſpair. But, notwithſtanding this unfavourable change in the appearance of the king, his mental powers retained their former vigour. His diſpaſſionate and nervous arguments gave the earl of Saliſbury occaſion to obſerve, that "the king's faculties had greatly improved." Upon which Sir Philip Warwick replied, "No, he was always thus; but you are now convinced of the ſtrength of his majeſty's mind." Hereupon Sir Henry Vane obſerved, that ſince the king poſſeſſed ſuch ſtrong faculties, it became neceſſary to be more cautious and rigid in the terms of accommodation. Charles, now, without any appearance of reluctance, conſented that his proclamations againſt the parliament ſhould be reſcinded; and he agreed to relinquiſh in favour of the two houſes the power of regulating the militia during the ſpace of twenty years, or for a longer term, if that conceſſion ſhould be judged neceſſary for the welfare of the public. But he declared, that he could not, conſiſtently with the dictates of his conſcience, conſent to the abolition of the epiſcopacy; and with reſpect to the ſale of the church lands, his majeſty ſaid, he conceived that he could not give his ſanction to that meaſure without committing ſacrilege, and violating his coronation oath, by which he was ſolemnly bound to maintain the rights and privileges of the clergy; but to manifeſt the ſincerity of his deſires for terminating thoſe diſſatisfactions which had ſo fatally diſturbed the peace of his reign, he was willing that the epiſcopacy ſhould be reduced to its original eſtabliſhment; that archbiſhops, deans and chapters ſhould be aboliſhed; that the preſbyterian mode of worſhip ſhould be authorized for the ſpace of three years, in the courſe of which time the king and parliament, with the advice and concurrence of the eccleſiaſtical aſſembly, and other divines, nominated by his majeſty, ſhould adopt ſome ſalutary plan of church government. In ſhort, Charles made ſuch conceſſions, as, had they been accepted, would have proved ſubverſive of the conſtitution. Though the king thus far ſubmitted to the terms of parliament, both houſes, after deliberating on his propoſitions, rejected them as inſufficient and unſatisfactory, with reſpect to the ſale of church lands and the epiſcopacy.

An incurſion into England being now made by Hamilton at the head of a numerous but irregular body of forces, a junction was intended to be formed with the troops under the command of Langdale; but the duke was fearful of attempting to effect this, becauſe the Engliſh royaliſts declined a ſubſcription to the covenant, and the Scotiſh preſbyterians could not be prevailed on to incorporate with them on any other conditions. The two armies, amounting together to about twenty thouſand men, began their march at the ſame time, but they kept regularly a little ſpace apart. Cromwell's army was not half ſo numerous as that of the enemy; but notwithſtanding this diſadvantage, he boldly advanced to give them battle. He attacked Langdale by ſurprize, near Preſton in Lancaſhire, and put him to the rout with great ſlaughter, though the royaliſts fought with ſingular bravery. He then attacked Hamilton, and having defeated the troops under his command, and chaced them to Utoxeter, he directed his march to Scotland, and being reinforced by Argyle, he ſubdued Laneric and Munro, and then returned to England. At the ſame time, after maintaining a vigorous defence, the garriſon of Colcheſter was reduced to the neceſſity of capitulating; and Fairfax, yielding to the perſuaſions of Ireton, reſolved to ſacrifice the lives of Sir Charles Lucas, and Sir George Liſle, whom he had made priſoners, to the reſentment of the army. The priſoners unanimouſly cenſured the determination with reſpect to Lucas and Liſle; and lord Capel, regardleſs of his perſonal ſafety, ſeverely reproached Ireton, at the ſame time challenging him to inflict a ſimilar puniſhment upon all the priſoners. Sir Charles Lucas was firſt ſhot; and he gave the word "fire," with as firm a reſolution, as if he had been pronouncing the word of command at the head of his troops. Having embraced the body of his deceaſed friend, Sir George Liſle deſired the ſoldiers appointed to fire at him to approach nearer; upon which one of the men ſaid, "Doubt not, Sir, but our balls will ſtrike you;" to which Sir George, with a ſmile upon his countenance, replied, "I have been nearer you, my friends, when you have miſſed me." Immediately after pronouncing theſe words, he received their ſhot and fell breathleſs upon the earth. A remonſtrance was now drawn up by a general council of officers, and preſented to the parliament, wherein they condemned the treaty with the king, inſiſted on the neceſſity of ſubjecting him to exemplary puniſhment, on account of the great effuſion of blood during the war; demanding a diſſolution of the parliament; repreſenting, that though they were ſervants, they had a right to interfere in theſe important concerns, and to remonſtrate to their employers, who were no more than ſervants to the public. The military commanders led their forces to Windſor, whence they diſpatched colonel Ewer with orders to ſeize the king, and conduct him to Hurſt-caſtle. The commons voted that the king's removal had been effected without their conſent, and then came to a reſolution, that the conceſſions made by his majeſty were ſufficient to ſerve as the ground of an accommodation. On the following day, colonel Pride ſurrounded the houſe with two regiments, and with the aſſiſtance of lord Grey of Groby, arreſted forty-one of the members, as they were paſſing through the avenues, and put them into confinement in the neighbourhood. The moſt deſperate of the Independent party, amounting to near ſixty, ware alone permitted to enter the houſe, about an hundred and ſixty members being excluded. This remnant of the commons paſſed a vote of thanks to Cromwell, for the great public ſervices he had performed. A committee was then appointed to draw up a charge againſt the king; and colonel Harriſon received orders from the houſe, to conduct Charles to London under a ſtrong guard. At Windſor, the duke of Hamilton, who had been ſome time a priſoner there, was admitted into the preſence of his majeſty; and falling upon his knees, he pathetically exclaimed, "My dear maſter!" and then grief choaked his voice. Hereupon the king tenderly embraced him, and while tears guſhed from his eyes, ſaid, "I have, indeed, been a dear maſter to you." His majeſty was then abruptly hurried away; and the duke, diſſolved in tears, predicted, that he ſhould never more behold his ſovereign. Soon after the king's arrival at Windſor, an order was iſſued from the council of war, that he ſhould no longer be conſidered in the character of a ſovereign; and in conſequence hereof, he was diveſted of the externals of royalty, and treated without the leaſt reſpect or ceremony.

A. D. 1648-9.

Throughout the whole courſe of the civil war, the lords had poſſeſſed very little authority or influence; ſince the king's impriſonment, the upper houſe had been wholly inſignificant, and moſt of the members, aſhamed of the public proceedings, declined giving their attendance. It however happened that day, to be more full than uſual, and they were aſſembled to the number of ſixteen, when the ordnance was preſented. They, without the leaſt heſitation, unanimouſly rejected the vote of the commons, and immediately adjourned themſelves for ten days; hoping, by this means, to reſtrain the furious proceedings of the commons. So ſmall an obſtacle was very inſufficient to divert the Independents from their purpoſe. They voted to proceed in trying the king, and eſtabliſhing all other meaſures, without the concurrence of the lords: and accordingly paſſed the following votes, which ſufficiently indicate the purpoſes for which they were intended.

"Reſolved, that the commons of England in parliament aſſembled, are, under God, the original of all juſt power.

Alſo, "That the commons of England, in parliament aſſembled, being choſen by, and repreſenting the people, have the ſupreme power in this nation.

Alſo, "That whatever is enacted or declared, for them by the commons, in parliament aſſembled, has the force of a law; and all the people of this nation, are included thereby, although the conſent or concurrence of the houſe of peers be not had thereunto.

Alſo, "That all members, and others, appointed to act in any ordinance with the peers, were empowered and enjoined to ſit, act, and execute, notwithſtanding the peers joined not therein."

They now changed the ordinance for the king's trial into an act of the commons, which was ordered to be engroſſed. Two days after, proclamation was made in Weſtminſter-hall, Cheapſide, and the Old Exchange, for witneſſes to come in againſt him: while commiſſioners were appointed for trying him at the ſame time.

One hundred and thirty-three perſons, as named by the commons, formed this court, but there never met above ſeventy; ſo difficult was it found, notwithſtanding the blindneſs of prejudice, and the allurements of intereſt, to engage perſons of any name or character, in a meaſure ſo criminal and repugnant to all forms of law and juſtice. Cromwell, Ireton, Harriſon, and a few more of the principal officers of the army, moſt of them of very mean birth, together with ſome of the lower houſe, and a few citizens of London, were the members.

The twelve judges were among the parties inrolled to form the court; but upon their declaring the king could not, according to the laws and conſtitution of England, be tried for treaſon, as all proſecutions for offences of that nature muſt be conducted under the ſanction of the royal authority, their names were expunged. The court aſſembled in Weſtminſter-hall, Bradſhaw, a lawyer, being elected preſident; Coke acting in the capacity of ſolicitor general, and Doriſlaus, Steele, and Aſke, attending as aſſiſtants in the proſecution. When, among the names of the perſons who were to compoſe the court, the criers pronounced that of lord Fairfax, a female voice was heard to exclaim from the gallery, "he has more wit than to be here." And upon theſe words of the impeachment being read, "In the name of all the good people of England," the ſame voice ſaid, "No, nor the twentieth part of them; where are all the people, or their repreſentatives? Oliver Cromwell is a villain and a traitor." One of the officers ordered a file of muſqueteers to fire towards that part from whence the voice proceeded; but it was preſently diſcovered, that the ſpeaker was the wife of Fairfax; and it was with the utmoſt difficulty, that the lady was prevailed upon to withdraw.

The king was brought before this high-court of juſtice, on the 20th of January, 1649, having been guarded from St. James's thither by colonel Hacket, with thirty officers armed. The deportment of the king, though long uſed to be a priſoner, was before this court, very majeſtic. He looked undauntedly on the array of troops that attended him, and the pageantry of the court; and without moving his hat, or ſhewing the ſmalleſt mark of reverence, he ſeated himſelf in a chair of crimſon velvet, prepared for him within the bar. The ſolicitor-general, in the name of the commons, mons, opened the proſecution; repreſenting that Charles Stuart, admitted king of England, and intruſted with limited powers of ſovereignty, from the wicked deſign of introducing an arbitrary and tyrannical form of government, had traiterouſly and maliciouſly levied war upon the parliament and the people; and that he was therefore accuſed as a traitor, a tyrant, a murderer, and an enemy to the commonwealth.

The impeachment being concluded, the preſident of the court informed the king, that it was expected that he would then declare what he had to offer in juſtification of his proceeding. Charles diſavowed the authority of the court, declaring that he would not ſubmit to their uſurped juriſdictions: and his whole deportment and behaviour on this ſolemn occaſion, were expreſſive of calmneſs of temper, ſtrong preſence of mind, fortitude, and dignity. The preſident aſſerted, that the dignity of the court was ſuperior to that of the priſoner, as it derived its authority from that community of which even kings were no more than the ſervants; and therefore he inſiſted, that the priſoner was not juſtifiable in refuſing to acknowledge the authority of his judges. Charles objected, that both the king and houſe of lords, were neceſſary to conſtitute a parliament: that he had a truſt committed to him by God, by old and lawful deſcent; and that there was no juriſdiction on earth could try a king; the authority of obedience to kings being clearly and ſtrictly commanded in the Old and New Teſtament: this, if denied, he was ready inſtantly to prove; "where the word of a king is, there is power, and who may ſay unto him, What doſt thou?" He owned, that a ſacred truſt had been committed to him by God, the liberty of his people, which he would not betray, by acknowledging a power founded on violence and uſurpation. He had taken arms, and frequently expoſed his life in defence of public liberty, of the conſtitution, of the fundamental laws of the kingdom, and was now willing to ſeal with his blood, thoſe precious rights for which he had ſo long, in vain, contended. To this the preſident anſwered, How great a friend, Sir, you have been to the laws and liberties of the people, let all England, and the world judge: your actions have ſufficiently declared it, and your meaning has been written in bloody characters throughout the kingdom. Charles returned, that the laws of England determine, that "The king can do no wrong;" he was however able, he added, to juſtify his conduct by the moſt ſatisfactory reaſons: but he muſt forego his reaſons, leſt he ſhould ratify an authority, no better founded than that of pirates and robbers. Having been thrice called before the court, Charles perſiſted in denying their right of juriſdiction; but on his fourth appearance, finding it impoſſible to ſhake his conſtancy, the court having conſtrued his ſilence into confeſſion, the preſident pronounced the following ſentence:

"That he Charles Stuart, king of England, having been convicted and attainted as a tyrant, traitor, murderer, and public enemy, ſhould be put to death, by ſevering his head from his body." This ſentence was ſigned by the whole court, nine members excepted.

The king upon his return to Whitehall, deſired that his children might be permitted to viſit him, and that he might be attended in his private devotions by Dr. Juxon, the late biſhop of London: theſe requeſts were complied with.

The different European princes were now inſpired with horror and aſtoniſhment at a king's being thus ſubjected to trial before a court of judicature, conſtituted of his own ſubjects: accordingly the French and Dutch miniſters intereſted themſelves in the king's behalf; the Scots remonſtrated on the indignity and injuſtice offered to his majeſty, and the queen repeatedly wrote to the parliament, in the moſt pathetic ſtyle, in favour of her royal conſort. But the duke of Richmond, the earls of Hertford, Southampton, and Lindſay, voluntarily offered to yield their lives as a ſacrifice to his preſervation. Only three days were allowed this royal ſufferer between his ſentence and execution, during which the following authentic warrant was ſigned for the latter by parliamentary Independents, &c.

"At the high court of juſtice for the tryinge and judginge of Charles Steuart, king of England, on January 29, Anno Dom. 1648-9.

"Whereas Charles Steuart, king of England, is, and ſtandeth convicted, attaynted, and condemned of high treaſon, and other high crimes: and ſentence, upon Saturday laſt, was pronounced againſt him by this court, to be put to death, by the ſeveringe of his head from his body; of which ſentence execution remaineth yet to be done: Theſe are therefore to will and require you to ſee the ſaid ſentence executed in the open ſtreets, before Whitehall, upon the morrow, being the thirtieth day of this inſtante month of January, between the hours of tenn in the morninge, and five in the afternoone of the ſame day, with full effect: and for ſo doing this ſhall be your ſufficient warrant. And theſe are to require all officers, and ſoldiers, and other the good people of this nation of England, to be aſiſtynge unto you in the ſervice. Given under our hands and ſeals.

The now humbled and wretched monarch employed the ſhort and awful interval between his ſentence and execution, in reading and devotion; and from the time when his intended fate was made known to him, to his laſt moment, he preſerved a perfect tranquillity and compoſure; nor can his bittereſt enemies deny, that he demeaned his character, either as a prince or as a man. Even under the dreadful apprehenſions of death, his ſoul without effort or affectation, maintained a calm heroical frame, and ſeemed to look down with contempt on the triumph of his conquerors. All his family that remained in England were allowed acceſs to him. Theſe only conſiſted of the princeſs Elizabeth, and the duke of Glouceſter, who was little more than an infant. The princeſs Elizabeth, notwithſtanding her tender years, deeply felt the calamities of her family. The king, after giving her his advice and conſolation, charged her to tell the queen, that during the whole courſe of his life he had never once, even in thought, failed in his fidelity towards her. Then taking the young duke of Glouceſter on his knee, he ſaid, "Now they will cut off thy father's head." At this the child looked very ſtedfaſtly on him; and he added, "Mark, child, what I ſay, they will cut off my head, and perhaps make thee a king; but thou muſt not be a king as long as thy brothers Charles or James are alive. They will cut off thy brothers heads when they can catch them; and thy head they will cut off at laſt; and therefore I charge thee, do not be made a king by them!" The duke ſighing, replied, "I will be torn in pieces firſt." This anſwer, from one of ſuch tender years, is ſaid to have filled the king's eyes with tears of joy and admiration. Fairfax, overwhelmed with grief, uſed all the intereſt which he yet retained, to prevent the execution of the fatal ſentence; and even employed perſuaſion with his own regiment, though none elſe ſhould follow him, to reſcue the king. Cromwell and Ireton being informed of this intention, endeavoured to convince him, that God had rejected the king; and exhorted him to ſeek by prayer ſome direction from heaven on this important occaſion. Harriſon was appointed to join in prayer with the unſuſpecting general, who was ignorant that the death warrant had been ſigned: this man prolonged his ſpiritual exerciſes, till intelligence arrived, that the finiſhing period was put to the awful tragedy; then, riſing from his knees, he told Fairfax, that this event was certainly a miraculous and providential anſwer, which their devout ſupplications received from heaven.

The thirtieth of January being the day appointed in conſequence of the above warrant for his execution, the king roſe early in the morning, and calling Herbert, ordered him to employ more than uſual care in dreſſing him, for what he thought a joyful ſolemnity. He then received the ſacrament from the hands of biſhop Juxon, and continued in his devotions till noon, at which time he drank a glaſs of wine, and ate a bit of bread, when, having walked from St. James's, where he lay (therefore could not have had his reſt diſturbed by the noiſe of the workmen employed in erecting his ſcaffold, as ſome aſſert) acroſs the Park, he was carried from thence in a coach to the ſtreet before the Banqueting-houſe, Whitehall, the place deſtined for exhibiting this his laſt tragic ſcene. On his coming upon the ſcaffold, he found it ſurrounded with ſoldiers, ſo that he could not hope to be heard. He eyed the apparatus of death with great compoſure, and aſked if there was not a higher block; then addreſſing himſelf to the colonels Tomlinſon, Hacket, and ſome other perſons who were on the ſcaffold, he attempted to juſtify his innocence with reſpect to the civil war, and averred, that he had no other object in his military operations, than to preſerve entire that authority which had been tranſmitted to him by his anceſtors. He inſiſted on his perfect innocence towards his people, but acknowledged the equity of his execution in the eye of his Maker; obſerving, that the unjuſt ſentence now inflicted on him, was an equitable return for that which he had ſuffered to be inflicted on Strafford. He expreſſed his forgiveneſs of his enemies; and exhorted the people to return to the paths of obedience, by ſubmitting to the government of their lawful ſovereign, his ſon and ſucceſſor. He threw not the leaſt blame upon the parliament; but was more inclined to think, that ill inſtruments had interpoſed, and excited in them fears and jealouſies (we muſt confeſs too juſtly founded) with regard to his intentions. When he was preparing for the block, biſhop Juxon ſaid to him, "There is, Sir, but one ſtage more, which, though turbulent and troubleſome, is yet very ſhort. Conſider, it will ſoon carry you a great way; it will carry you from earth to heaven; and there you ſhall find, to your great joy, the prize to which you haſten, a crown of glory." "Yes," replied the king, "I go from a corruptible to an incorruptible crown, where no diſturbance can have place." Then delivering his George to the prelate, he ſaid, "Remember;" and laying his head on the block, he ſtretched out his hands as a ſignal, when at one blow his head was ſevered from his body. A man in a vizor performed the office of executioner. Another, in like diſguiſe, held up the head, and cried aloud, "This is the head of a traitor." Thus fell, after an unhappy reign of twenty-three years, ten months, and three days, in the forty-ninth year of his age, Charles Stuart, king of England, on the thirtieth of January, 1649: a prince whoſe principles, conduct, and death, by working powerfully on oppoſite factions, according to their different intereſts and views, have given riſe to a bitter and irreconcilable conteſt. He was repreſented by a conſiderable party as a martyr to the church, a patron to the clergy, and the ſupport of nobility; and theſe have adorned his memory with a chaplet of panegyric. On the other hand, bigots of a different perſuaſion have applauded his fate, and held his memory in the higheſt deteſtation: but the liberal minded and humane, however zealous in the cauſe of freedom, both civil and religious, will equally condemn and pity him. Indeed, the melancholy tranſition from royal pomp to a priſon, from a life of eaſe and luxury, to a premature and violent death, are puniſhments ſo ſharp and affecting, that they naturally excite the tendereſt ſympathy for the ſuffering prince: we are apt to overlook the tyrant, to dwell on his hardſhips, and forget his crimes. Compaſſion is inherent in Engliſhmen; and the commiſeration of this king's unfortunate fate, but for the violence of his partizans, would have inclined ſuch to have thrown the mantle of oblivion over the dark parts of his character, and only to have remembered, that he bore his ſufferings in a manner which would have done honour to the beſt cauſe. But the impartiality required in hiſtory, renders it neceſſary to ſcrutinize, with exactneſs, his principles, conduct, and character; ſince, from the falſe colourings which have been thrown on theſe, many pernicious ideas have been entertained deſtructive to liberty, and the welfare of ſociety.

Charles being now executed, the duke of Richmond, the marquis of Hertford, and the earls of Southampton and Lindſay, were, at their expreſs deſire, permitted to pay their laſt duty to their maſter, who, by the appointment of parliament, was decently, but without pomp, interred at Windſor. His body was put into a coffin, covered with black velvet, and removed to an apartment in Whitehall, where it was embalmed, and then expoſed for ſeveral days at St. James's. But colonel Witchcot, governor of Windſor caſtle, had the narrowneſs of ſpirit to deny the uſe of the burial ſervice of the church of England, as ordained.

The king had, by his queen Henrietta, nine children; four ſons and five daughters; namely, Charles James, who died an infant; Charles, prince of Wales, born in 1630, who ſucceeded to the throne of England; land; James, duke of York, born 1633, who alſo aſcended the throne; and Henry, duke of Glouceſter, born 1641; who died after the reſtoration. The princeſs Mary, born 1631, who married William of Naſſau, prince of Orange; Elizabeth, born 1635, who died in Cariſbrook caſtle; Anna and Catharine, who died in their infancy; and Henrietta Maria, married to Philip, duke of Anjou and Orleans, born in 1644.

PRINCIPLES, CONDUCT, and CHARACTER of KING CHARLES the FIRST.

King Charles the Firſt, as to his perſon, was of a middle ſtature, robuſt and well proportioned. His features were regular; his face handſome; but his countenance was naturally of a melancholic caſt, yet expreſſive of a benevolent mind. His intellectual powers were naturally good, and ſo improved by continual exerciſe, that though, in the beginning of his reign he ſpoke with heſitation, towards the cloſe of his life, he diſcovered in his diſcourſe elocution, and quickneſs of conception. He excelled in horſemanſhip; had a good taſte, particularly in painting, and was even ſkilled in ſeveral of the polite arts: but though a proficient in ſome branches of literature, he was far from encouraging uſeful learning, and patronized none but thoſe who endeavoured to prove the divine right of kings and biſhops.

He was undeniably poſſeſſed, not only of good natural talents, but alſo of many excellent qualities, ſuch as temperance, fortitude, and perſonal bravery: but his diſſimulation or want of integrity, is manifeſt in every part of his conduct; and this loſing him the faireſt opportunities of reinſtating him in the throne, appears to have been the principal vice for which he paid the tribute of his life. Yet, there have been thoſe who tell us, Charles was the worthieſt gentleman, the beſt friend, the beſt maſter, the beſt father, the beſt huſband, and the beſt Chriſtian of the age in which he lived. But theſe ſtrokes conſtitute no part of the outlines of the preſent ſubject, which we wiſh faithfully to pourtray. A prince may govern his own family well; he may have ſome perſonal excellencies; yet he may be poſſeſſed of neither abilities nor virtues ſufficient to govern a nation; and he may be the contrary. Oliver Cromwell was a conſummate ſtateſman; but, if we judge right, a very bad man: and the reverſe will hold good with reſpect to a king. We have had many examples, in the courſe of this hiſtory, of princes whoſe private virtues have been very ſplendid, but ſhaded with that ambition and thirſt of power, which have fixed an intolerable load of miſery on the people. To form a right judgment of the characters of princes, it will be abſolutely neceſſary to ſeparate, in our ideas, the king from the man. It is a difficult matter for ſubjects to gain a true knowledge of the private virtues of a prince; but his public actions ſpeak plainly to the underſtanding of every one: and people of the loweſt capacities can know, whether, under the reign of their ſovereign, they are well or ill governed; or, in other words, happy or miſerable: and happy had it been both for Charles and his people, had his public conduct deſerved as much commendation, as his private character.

It has been a queſtion, productive of violent debates, whether the people have, in any caſe, a right to depoſe and puniſh kings. On the one ſide, the ſufferings of Charles, ſtiled the royal martyr, have been compared to thoſe of Chriſt; and the crucifiers of their God were, in the works and ſermons of ſeveral churchmen, regarded as leſs worthy of deteſtation, than the murderers of their king. Monarchy has been repreſented as a form of government of God's immediate appointment; kings, as his ſacred vicegerents, whom to reſiſt is impious, to depoſe damnable, and to puniſh atrociouſly criminal, beyond the hope of mercy. It has been alledged, that a parliament from which moſt of it's members are detained by force, can perform no conſtitutional act; nor can even the joint powers of both houſes extend to the making war againſt, or dethroning their king, much leſs putting him to death. On the other hand, the partizans of liberty maintain, that kings are appointed for the good of the people; and when they degenerate into tyrants, forfeit their right to government; that oaths of allegiance are to be underſtood as conſtitutionally binding, according to the obſervance of the oaths kings make to their people: that to ſay a king is accountable to none but God, is neither founded on reaſon nor precept: that to ſay a king has as good a right to his crown, as another man has to his inheritance, is to make his ſubjects no better than ſlaves; and that weak and wicked princes may be reſiſted, depoſed, and ſlain. Theſe and many other arguments have been uſed both for and againſt this extraordinary tranſaction; but we will venture to affirm, moſt of them have very little to do with the preſent ſubject.

To form juſt ſentiments of the real character of Charles, and the legality of the parliament's proceedings, we ought to go not one ſtep farther than the commencement of the civil war. What will it avail, ſaid Pompey, talking of laws to me, who have a ſword in my hand? And, when this is once drawn, law and conſtitution depend entirely on the will of the conqueror. The character of Charles is ſtrongly marked in the firſt part of his reign; and every impartial judge will allow, that aiming at more power than the conſtitution allowed, was the firſt cauſe of his miſfortunes. Paſſion for power, and a ſtrong attachment to his regal prerogative, were his governing principle. The prelates of the church paid him the groſſeſt flattery, inculcating a ſlaviſh dependence on his authority alone; and his ſuffering the cruel rigours of the ſtar-chamber ſhew, that neither clemency, humanity, nor equity, made any part of his public character. He ſubmitted to the guidance of counſellors, who were not only inferior to himſelf in experience and judgment, but, generally, proud, partial, and obſtinate: and from an exceſs of conjugal affection, he paid too much deference to the advice of his queen, who was ſuperſtitiouſly devoted to the Roman church, and importuned him inceſſantly in favour of it's votaries. The exerciſe of arbitrary power, and the genius of an incenſed people, which ran ſtrongly in favour of liberty, were the prime cauſes which brought him to an unexampled end: yet, though dead, he ſtill may be ſaid to ſpeak to his ſucceſſors on a throne, warning them not to endeavour to ſubſtitute their own wills in the place of law, nor to act as if the people were only made to be ſubſervient to their caprice, humour, and perhaps, ungoverned paſſions: for they may be aſſured, when the cord of tyranny is ſtretched to it's utmoſt length, a time ſhall come, when the oppreſſed will reſiſt and try their ſtrength. Inſtances of this abound not only in free ſtates, but in the moſt arbitrary forms of government. In Aſia, the head of a grand viſier has often been ſtruck off to appeaſe a popular inſurrection; in Holland, a prime miniſter has been torn in pieces by an enraged multitude; and in England, a king has loſt his crown, and, in one melancholy inſtance, his life, for attempts to overturn the conſtitution. Indeed, when a king, by enlarging the limits of that power with which he is inveſted for the protection of the people, weakens the authority of laws, and conſequently, ſequently, the ſecurity of the people, when, by breach of truſt, he acts in oppoſition to the juſt ends for which government was inſtituted, his truſt and right to government from that period are forfeited, the tie of allegiance is diſſolved, and the law and conſtitution being rendered incapable of affording the ſubject protection, they may juſtly, by the right of ſelf preſervation, take every probable means to ſecure themſelves from the lawleſs power and enterprizes of a tyrant. On theſe grounds the parliament are to be defended in their proceedings againſt Charles, and on theſe grounds even the army (if we may credit their declarations) endeavoured to ſupport their pretenſions: till in the end, conſtitutional forms being laid aſide, the monarch fell a ſacrifice at the ſhrine of liberty, for the ſecurity of the contending parties. May ſimilar circumſtances never happen, at leaſt in England; but may the king enjoy his prerogatives, and the people their legal rights; may liberty and loyalty (uninterrupted on either ſide) flouriſh long among us, and be productive of mutual tranquillity and encreaſing proſperity.

THE INTERREGNUM OF TEN YEARS,

OLIVER CROMWELL,

LORD PROTECTOR of the COMMON-WEALTH,

AND OF THE UNITED REALMS OF ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, and IRELAND.

AFTER the untimely death of Charles, the throne being rendered vacant, the commons proceeded to ſettle the government; and, under the title of the parliament, iſſued a proclamation, forbidding all perſons, on pain of high treaſon, to acknowledge or declare, Charles Stuart, commonly called prince of Wales, to be king of England. They afterwards decreed, that the nation ſhould be governed by the repreſentatives of the people ſitting in the houſe of commons, under the form of a republic. In conſequence of their proceedings, the royal titles were eraſed out of the public writings; the royal arms were taken down from all public offices and courts of juſtice; the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy were aboliſhed; and a new great ſeal was made, bearing this inſcription, The Great Seal of England. On one ſide were engraven the arms of England, and on the reverſe the houſe of commons, with theſe words, In the firſt Year of Freedom, by God's Bleſſing reſtored, 1648. The impreſſion of the national coin had, on one ſide, the Engliſh arms, with the inſcription, The Commonwealth of England; and on the reverſe, the croſs and harp, with this motto, God with us. That there might remain no objects to excite ambition, not only the crown and fee-farm rents were put up to ſale, but alſo the regalia, the rich furniture of the royal palaces, the jewels and paintings belonging to the late king, with all the expenſive magnificence of royalty. The houſe of peers was aboliſhed; and the commons taking both the legiſlative and the executive powers of government into their own hands, altered their ſtile from that of the houſe of commons, to the parliament of the common-wealth of England; and conferred the whole executive power of government on a council of ſtate, who were to act and proceed according to the inſtructions they ſhould, from time to time, give them. This council was compoſed of thirty-nine perſons; and the commons, who at firſt poſſeſſed the ſupreme authority of the nation, amounted only to ninety; but their number was ſoon after increaſed. Another high court of juſtice was now erected, to try ſome noblemen who remained in cuſtody, and Bradſhaw was again choſen preſident. The perſons whoſe fate was to be decided by this tribunal, were the duke of Hamilton, the earl of Holland, the lord Goring, lately created earl of Norwich, lord Capel, and Sir John Owen; all of them accuſed of having carried arms againſt the parliament. After a ſhort trial, they were all convicted and condemned to the block. The duke of Hamilton, on his trial, complained bitterly of the ſentence by which he ſuffered death, alledging, that he acted by virtue of a commiſſion from the parliament of his own country. The earl of Holland, being oppreſſed with age and infirmities, made little or no defence. Sir John Owen, on hearing the ſentence, thanked the court for adjudging him to ſo honourable a death; and ſwore he was afraid they would have cauſed him to be hanged as a felon. This gentleman, however, and the earl of Norwich, were reprieved; the other three were immediately executed. Lord Capel, in his laſt moments, behaved with great dignity and reſolution, reſolution, extolling the virtues of his late ſovereign, and exhorting the people to acknowledge his ſon, the prince of Wales. This nobleman diſplayed great magnanimity at his death.

The prince, helpleſs and forlorn, living ſometimes in Holland, ſometimes in France, and ſometimes in Jerſey, conſoled himſelf, amidſt all his diſtreſſes, with the hopes of better fortune. The marquis of Ormond no ſooner heard of the tragical death of his ſovereign, than he inſtantly went over to Ireland, levied an army of ſixteen thouſand men, with which he retook from the parliament the towns of Dundalk, Newry, Trim, and Drogheda, and was reſolved to undertake the ſiege of Dublin. To this kingdom Charles determined to repair; but his deſign was ſuſpended in conſequence of the intelligence he received from Scotland. The parliament of that kingdom iſſued a proclamation, acknowledging Charles II. as their lawful and hereditary ſovereign, on the following conditions; that he ſhould give proper ſatisfaction to the kingdom touching the ſecurity of religion, the union between the two nations, and the peace of Scotland, according to the national and ſolemn league of the covenant. For this purpoſe deputies were ſent to the Hague, to ſignify their intentions to the young prince, who in a few days after their arrival was viſited by the marquis of Montroſe, and the earls of Lanerk and Lauderdale. Montroſe having laid down his arms at the command of the late king, had engaged in the ſervice of the emperor; but hearing of his maſter's death repaired to the Hague, and received from the young king a renewal of his commiſſion as captain-general of Scotland. Charles had no ſolid foundation of joy from his being proclaimed under ſuch reſtrictions. Remembering that the ruin of his father was in a great meaſure owing to the Scotiſh Preſbyterians, he was diffident of their power and unanimity, averſe to their auſterity, and therefore waved their invitation. Inſtead of ſubſcribing to their conditions, he perſiſted in his reſolution of viſiting Ireland; at the ſame time ordering Montroſe to make a deſcent upon Scotland. The king's friends in that kingdom, underſtanding that he was averſe to the conditions propoſed by the parliament, determined to excite an inſurrection, and if they ſucceeded, to receive him upon his own terms. About this time Charles ſent the lord Collington, and chancellor Hyde, his plenipotentiaries to the court of Madrid, to ſolicit ſuccours from his catholic majeſty. Such was the ſituation of affairs in Ireland, that the young prince could not go thither without expoſing himſelf to imminent danger; as the Engliſh parliament, alarmed at the union between the catholics and the royaliſts, had voted a ſtrong army for that ſervice, and appointed Cromwell lord lieutenant of that kingdom. Cromwell having defeated Ormond, and entirely ſubdued the ſpirit of the Iriſh, Charles had no hopes of reſource from that country; and was therefore under a neceſſity of liſtening to the Scotiſh treaty. Accordingly the parliament and general aſſembly of the kirk, who were influenced by the marquis of Argyle, in order to open the conferences at Breda, prepared propoſitions, and appointed deputies.

A. D. 1650. The deputies met Charles, at the time and place appointed, and preſented him with four articles of peace, which he could not really approve; but not being in condition to ſhew his reſentment, he carefully diſſembled, offering to confirm the Preſbyterian diſcipline in Scotland, by act of parliament; but thought it unreaſonable to expect that he ſhould renounce the form of religion in which he had been educated. He aſked them, if they had power to relax in any demand, or to treat about the aſſiſtance he might expect from the Scots towards reſtoring him to the crown of England; they anſwered him in the negative. Prince Charles, though highly diſpleaſed at their impoſition, found it neceſſary to temporize and protract the negotiation, until he ſhould receive ſome intelligence from Montroſe, on whoſe ſucceſs all his hopes were founded. That intrepid nobleman, having reinforced his handful of men with a few recruits which he raiſed in the Orkneys, paſſed over to Caithneſs, hoping the general affection to the royal cauſe, and the fame of his former atchievements, would allure the people to his ſtandard. But the nation was now fatigued with continual wars, many of his former adherents had been apprehended and puniſhed, and no hopes of ſucceſs remained againſt ſo great a force as was now deſtined to oppoſe him, Leſley and Holborne being ordered to advance againſt him with an army of four thouſand men. Strachan was ſent before with a body of cavalry, in order to check his progreſs. This general ſuddenly attacked Montroſe; the royaliſts were defeated; all of them either ſlain or taken priſoners; and Montroſe himſelf being ſoon after ſeized, was conducted to Edinburgh, where, notwithſtanding the king's commiſſion, he was condemned to death; which, after having been expoſed to the utmoſt ignominy, he ſuffered with the ſame intrepidity with which he had formerly braved it in the field. Charles, being deprived by this event of all hopes of prevailing by force, was under a neceſſity to ſign the terms which the Scotiſh committee had preſented to him. In conſequence of this agreement he immediately ſet ſail for Scotland, and arrived in the Firth of Cromarty. The parliament recalled Cromwell from Ireland, which by this time was almoſt reduced. That general, having conſtituted Ireton, his ſon-in-law, deputy-lieutenant, returned to England, according to the ſummons of the parliament. When returned to London, he took his ſeat in the houſe, and received the thanks of the commons for the ſignal ſervices he had done the commonwealth. They then deſired to know whether Fairfax would undertake the command of the troops deſtined for Scotland; and on his refuſal beſtowed it on Cromwell. Without delay he put his troops in motion, and entered Scotland with an army of ſixteen thouſand men. The command of the Scotiſh army was conferred on Leſley, an able officer, who laid a very proper plan for defence. He ſecured himſelf in a fortified camp between Edinburgh and Leith; and whatever could tend to the ſupport of the Engliſh army was carefully removed from the ſouthern countries.

Cromwell approached the Scotiſh camp, and attempted, by every expedient, to provoke Leſley to battle; but that general knew that the Engliſh army as much excelled the Scotch in diſcipline and experience, as it fell ſhort in point of numbers; and therefore prudently kept within his intrenchments. By ſkirmiſhes and petty rencounters he endeavoured to animate his ſoldiers, and was generally ſucceſsful in theſe enterprizes. His army became every day more numerous, and more dextrous, and expert in their exerciſe. Cromwell made another motion, in hopes of drawing the Scotiſh general from his entrenchments, but all his efforts proved ineffectual. After the two armies had remained ſeveral weeks in ſight of each other, Cromwell found himſelf obliged to retire, being quite deſtitute of proviſions. He therefore withdrew to Dunbar: Leſley followed him, and encamped on a hill oppoſite the town, aſſured himſelf of putting an end to the war, by the deſtruction of the whole Engliſh army. Cromwell was almoſt deprived of every reſource. He had even once entertained the thoughts of embarking all his foot and artillery, and of forcing his way at the head of his cavalry. But the folly of the Scotiſh clergy effectually ſaved him from that diſhonour. The diſputes which at that time agitated the two nations, being more of a religious than of a civil nature, the clergy in both kingdoms had acquired a conſiderable influence in all public deliberations; and the Scotiſh miniſters in great numbers now attended the camp. Theſe men relying ſo much on providence (which they firmly believed eſpouſed their cauſe), wholly neglected human means, and inceſſantly importuned their unfortunate general to attack the Engliſh, aſſuring him, that they had received from heaven the cleareſt revelation, that the Lord had delivered their enemies into their hands. In vain did the general remonſtrate againſt the imprudence of ſuch a meaſure; the private men being entirely guided by the clergy; Leſley, therefore, after taking every precaution, though ſtrongly apprehenſive of the fatal conſequence, was at length obliged to deſcend into the plain, and come to an engagement with the Engliſh army. Cromwell too in his turn declared, that he had received from heaven a revelation, that the Lord had delivered his enemies into his hands, and indeed it ſoon appeared, that his revelation, though doubtleſs as ill founded as that of the Scots, was attended with much better ſucceſs. The latter being raw and undiſciplined, were not able to ſuſtain the ſhock of ſuch hardy and experienced veterans as the Engliſh. Though double in number to the enemy, they were inſtantly routed with great ſlaughter, and purſued to a conſiderable diſtance. Three thouſand were ſlain on the ſpot, and about nine thouſand taken priſoners. The Engliſh general then took poſſeſſion of Leith and Edinburgh, but the caſtle did not ſurrender till the latter end of December. Humbled by their late defeat, the Scotiſh parliament began to relax in their ſeverity towards the king, his friends were ſuffered to approach him, and his coronation was performed with great ſolemnity at Scone. His ſituation, however, though ſomewhat amended, was far from being eaſy or agreeable. Of a gay diſpoſition, he could but ill digeſt the rigid auſterities to which he was confined by the clergy, or the ſtill more ſlaviſh ſubmiſſion in which he was held by Argyle and his party. Diſguſted at theſe and many other circumſtances, he determined to attempt the recovery of his liberty. General Middleton being proſcribed by the covenant, had retired with a party of royaliſts to the mountains, where he waited an opportunity of ſerving his maſter. This gentleman the king determined to join, and having found means to elope from Argyle, he fled directly towards the Highlands. Colonel Montgomery, with a troop of horſe, was ſent in purſuit of him. The king was not a little mortified at his diſappointment, in being obliged to return; but this attempt to eſcape had a good effect in his favour. The committee and Argyle were now alarmed with the apprehenſion, that the ſeverity with which they had treated him, might force him to join the cavaliers, and ſo involve the nation in a civil war. They therefore abated their rigour, and even admitted him to a ſmall ſhare in the adminiſtration. Charles finding that Argyle was an inſtrument indiſpenſibly requiſite for the attainment of his deſires, treated that nobleman with uncommon affability and eſteem, and even hinted a deſire of eſpouſing his daughter. Argyle, well acquainted with his majeſty's principles, kept at a diſtance; but his ſon, the lord Lorn, attached himſelf to the king, and faithfully executed his private commiſſions. Levies throughout the whole kingdom were now ſet on foot, and an army of eighteen thouſand men was ready to take the field before the beginning of June.

A. D. 1651.

Early in the ſpring the Scotiſh army was aſſembled under Hamilton and David Leſley, and encamped at Torwood in the neighbourhood of Stirling. The king himſelf was preſent in the army, and his generals determined to act with prudence and caution. The town of Stirling lay at his back, and the northern counties ſupplied him with proviſions. His front was ſecured by ſtrong intrenchments; and it was in vain that Cromwell uſed every expedient to tempt him to an engagement. After conſuming much time, the Engliſh general ſent Lambert over the Frith into Fife, in order to intercept the proviſions of the army. He was oppoſed by Holborne and Brown, who commanded a party of the Scots; but theſe were defeated with great ſlaughter. Cromwell alſo paſſed over with his whole army, and placing himſelf in the rear of the king, rendered it impoſſible for him to remain any longer in his preſent ſituation. Thus reduced to extremity, he came to a reſolution worthy a prince contending for empire. The way to England being perfectly clear, he determined immediately to repair thither; where he hoped that all his friends, and all thoſe who were diſſatisfied with the preſent form of adminiſtration, would flock to his ſtandard. He prevailed on the generals to agree to his propoſal; and with one conſent, the army, to the number of fourteen thouſand men, quitted their camp, and proceeded by long marches, towards England. This unexpected motion of the enemy alarmed Cromwell, who detached Lambert with a body of cavalry, to hang upon the rear of the royal army, and having left Monk with ſeven thouſand men to finiſh the reduction of Scotland, purſued the king with the utmoſt expedition. His army being greatly diminiſhed by deſertion and diſeaſe, his majeſty laid aſide his deſign of marching to London, and directed his rout to Worceſter, where he met with a kind reception from the magiſtrates, and the next day was ſolemnly proclaimed. In the mean time Cromwell, being reinforced, approached Worceſter with an army of forty thouſand men. This place he attacked with incredible fury, and meeting with little oppoſition, except from Hamilton and Middleton, broke in at once upon the royaliſts. The ſtreets of the city were covered with the carcaſes of the ſlain; Hamilton, a worthy nobleman, was mortally wounded, and the king compelled to flight. By the earl of Derby's advice, he repaired to Boſcobel, a lone ſeat on the borders of Staffordſhire, inhabited by one Panderell a farmer. This man poſſeſſed a greatneſs of ſoul in his humble ſtate, and though death was threatened againſt all who harboured the forlorn Charles, he retained the moſt unſhaken fidelity. He imparted the ſecret to his three brothers, actuated by the ſame noble ſentiments with himſelf; and having furniſhed the king with a peaſant's habit, they led him into a neighbouring wood, put an axe into his hand, and pretended to employ themſelves in cutting wood. During his ſtay at this poor cottage, he lived upon ſuch homely fare as the landlord could afford. One day, on the approach of a party of ſoldiers, he climbed up into an oak tree, where he ſheltered himſelf for the ſpace of twenty-four hours. This tree was afterwards called the Royal Oak, and for many years held by the royaliſts in great veneration. During this fugitive life, he was frequently expoſed to dangers no leſs imminent, and had recourſe to various methods of concealment, at laſt he embarked at Shoreham in Suſſex, and arrived ſafely at Feſcamp in Normandy, having aſſumed many diſguiſes, and paſſed through ſeveral difficulties.

The ambitious and aſpiring Cromwell, who was equally bold and ſucceſsful in his actions, could now no longer brook ſubjection to a republic depending pending on his influence, and ſupported by his victories. Such was his reputation and intereſt, that all the reſolutions of the lower houſe were directed by him as well as the army; and he was in effect chief of the republic. At this time the Engliſh parliament paſſed an act aboliſhing the royalty of Scotland, empowering it however to ſend a certain number of repreſentatives to the Britiſh parliament. All cauſes in both kingdoms were determined by a mixture of Engliſh and Scotiſh judges; juſtice was adminiſtered impartially, and peace and order were maintained by the prudence of general Monk, who commanded the forces in Scotland. The people being ſecured in their property, applied themſelves to the manual arts; and they enjoyed more plenty and ſatisfaction than ever was known to their anceſtors. Blake, a man of undaunted courage, was appointed admiral; and though he had hitherto been accuſtomed only to land ſervice, he ſoon raiſed the naval glory of the nation to a higher pitch than it had ever before attained. Prince Rupert being obliged to quit Kinſale with his fleet, ſteered to Portugal; thither he was purſued by Blake, who could hardly be prevented by the remonſtrances of his Portugueſe majeſty, from attacking him even in ſight of Liſbon. The prince eſcaping through favour of that monarch, directed his courſe to the Weſt Indies, where his brother prince Maurice was ſhipwrecked in a ſtorm. Rupert, after undergoing many hardſhips, and finding it impoſſible to do any effectual ſervice to the royal cauſe, returned to France, where he diſpoſed of the few ſhips which remained, together with all his prizes. All the ſettlements in America, except New England, which had been planted entirely by the Puritans, continued to acknowledge the royal authority, even after the eſtabliſhment of the commonwealth; and Sir George Ayſcue was diſpatched with a ſquadron in order to reduce them to ſubjection. Bermudas, Antigua, and Virginia, made little reſiſtance; Barbadoes, commanded by lord Willoughby of Parham, held out for a conſiderable time, but was at length obliged to follow the example of the other plantations. Jerſey, Guernſey, Scilly, and the Iſle of Man, were with equal eaſe, brought under obedience. Nor were the arms of the republic leſs ſucceſsful in Ireland and Scotland. Ireton, deputy lieutenant of the former kingdom, perſevered with great induſtry in ſubduing the revolted Iriſh, and defeated them in many engagements; which though in themſelves of little importance, entirely ruined their declining cauſe. All perſons who had any concern in the popiſh maſſacres were puniſhed without mercy; among whom was Sir Phelim O'Neal, who juſtly ſuffered on the gallows, for the many barbarities he had committed. After the reduction of Limeric, Ireton died in that city of the plague; whoſe death was much lamented by Cromwell, and the reſt of the republicans.

A. D. 1652. As ſoon as the parliament had leiſure to attend to their concerns in foreign countries, they were determined to chaſtiſe the Dutch. Accordingly they paſſed an act of navigation, prohibiting all nations to import any merchandize into England, but what was the produce of the country to which the ſhips belonged. The States General alarmed at theſe meaſures, ſent ambaſſadors to London, to ſolicit a repeal of the act of navigation; but the parliament, far from complying with their requeſt, demanded ſatisfaction for the maſſacre at Amboyna, the murder of Doriſlaus, the correſpondence, which during the civil war, the Dutch ambaſſadors had maintained with the late king: claiming alſo two millions of money for the loſſes they had ſuſtained by the Hollanders in the Eaſt Indies. The States foreſeeing the ſtorm, equipped a fleet of an hundred and fifty ſail; but were ſo imprudent as to command their miniſters at London to acquaint the council with that armament. Van Tromp, a brave and experienced admiral, was diſpatched by the States with a fleet of forty-five ſail, in order to ſecure the Dutch navigation from the Engliſh corſairs. He no ſooner obſerved the Engliſh admiral, than he endeavoured to retire, without ſtriking as uſual. Blake fired a blank ſhot in order to remind him of that cuſtomary compliment. Tromp taking no notice of theſe warnings, Blake fired a ball, and Tromp returned it with a broadſide. Notwithſtanding the great diſparity of number, Blake maintained the fight, with undaunted reſolution, for five hours, ſunk one ſhip of the enemy, and took another. According to the Engliſh hiſtorians, none of Blake's ſhips received any damage; but the Dutch alledge that there were ſix ſunk. The populace of London were highly incenſed, and would have aſſaulted the Dutch ambaſſadors, had they not been furniſhed with a guard, for the ſafety of their perſons. Van Tromp then ſailed towards the Downs, in order to engage rear admiral Ayſcue, who lay at anchor with part of the Engliſh fleet; but on receiving intelligence of Blake's being ſailed to the northward with forty ſhips, to deſtroy the herring buſſes on the coaſt of Shetland, he followed him with a very numerous armament. The two fleets came in ſight of each other near Newcaſtle, but a violent ſtorm ariſing juſt as they were ready to engage, ſcattered the Dutch fleet in ſuch a manner, that not above thirty ſail returned to Holland; though in a few weeks the reſt arrived in the Texel. On the ſixteenth day of Auguſt admiral de Ruyter, with four and thirty ſhips of war, and a large fleet of merchant-men under his command, fell in with Sir George Ayſcue off Plymouth, who though inferior in number to the enemy, engaged them valiantly until night put an end to the action. Van Galen before this time had defeated commodore Badily in the Mediterranean, though the victor loſt his life in the battle. Tromp, ſoon after, aſſiſted by de Ruyter, met near the Goodwin with Blake, whoſe fleet was inferior to theirs, though he was nevertheleſs determined to come to action. In this battle the Dutch had the advantage; Blake himſelf was wounded; two ſhips were taken, two burned, and one ſunk. Elated with this victory, he retired to the Downs, and hoiſted a broom at his main-top-maſt head, as a ſignal that he would ſweep the enemy clear off the Channel.

A. D. 1653. Great preparations now were making in England to retrieve this misfortune. A fleet of fourſcore ſail was equipped, under the command of Blake, aſſiſted by Deane, together with Monk, who had been recalled from Scotland for that purpoſe. While they lay off Portland, they eſpied the Dutch fleet of ſeventy-ſix ſail, having above three hundred merchant-men under their convoy. The Engliſh bore down to give battle. Three days was the engagement continued with the moſt invincible obſtinacy; and Blake, who was victor, gained not more honour than Van Tromp who was vanquiſhed. The Dutch admiral made an excellent retreat, and ſaved all the merchant-men except thirty. Eleven of his ſhips of war were taken or deſtroyed; two thouſand men were ſlain, and about fifteen hundred made priſoners. The Engliſh, though many of their ſhips were greatly damaged, had but one ſunk; but the number of their ſlain, and that of the enemy, were nearly equal.

The war had ſo much diſtreſſed the States, that they now applied to the parliament of England to appoint a place in which to treat of peace; but before any thing could be done in this buſineſs, a circumſtance happened, as extraordinary as any recorded in the annals of this kingdom. The parliament not acting agreeable to the wiſhes of the people, Cromwell held a conference with ſome of his officers, who preſented a petition to the houſe, demanding payment of their arrears, when the parliament cenſured them for the freedom of their addreſs: Cromwell, now finding matters ripe for the accompliſhment of his views, aſſembled a council of officers, for the profeſſed purpoſe of deliberating reſpecting the ſettlement of the nation. While they were in conference, colonel Ingoldſby entered, and informed Cromwell, that "the parliament had met, and were come to a reſolution not to diſſolve themſelves, but to ſupply the vacancies by new elections." Hereupon Cromwell took with him three hundred ſoldiers, and haſtening to the houſe, and poſting them at the different avenues, he addreſſed himſelf to his friend St. John, and told him, "he was come to do that, which to his great grief, the Lord had impoſed on him." After liſtening a conſiderable time to the debates, he aroſe and accuſed the members of tyranny, oppreſſion, and robbery of the public. Then ſtamping with his foot, which was the ſignal for the ſoldiers to enter, the place was ſoon crowded with them. He then addreſſed himſelf to the members, ſaying, "Get you gone: give place to honeſter men; you are no longer a parliament; I tell you, you are no longer a parliament, the Lord has done with you." Sir Harry Vane riſing to remonſtrate with him on this behaviour, Cromwell cried out with a loud voice, "O! Sir Harry Vane, Sir Harry Vane! the Lord deliver me from Sir Harry Vane!" Then ſeizing Martin by the cloak, he ſaid, "Thou art a whoremaſter." Another he called a drunkard, a third an adulterer, and a fourth an extortioner. "It is you, ſaid he, that have driven me to this. I have ſought the Lord night and day, that he would rather ſlay me, than put me on this work." Pointing to the mace, he cried, "Take away that bauble." Then cauſing the ſoldiers to clear the hall, he ordered the door to be locked, and putting the key in his pocket, he retired to Whitehall. Thus, by a ſingle effort of daring reſolution, was the whole power, civil and military, veſted in Cromwell, who now received congratulations from the fleet, the army, and from different bodies of people: but this politic man was too cautious either to be driven on by their exhortations, or ſeduced by their praiſe.

The moſt diſtinguiſhed feature in his character, was the art of managing all parties. Though he had aſſumed the ſupreme authority, "he thought proper to amuſe them with the appearance of a commonwealth. He firſt juſtified his conduct in diſſolving the parliament, by a declaration ſubſcribed by all the principal officers of the fleet and army. He then propoſed a parliament, conſiſting of one hundred and forty-four perſons, in whom, with their conſent, he would veſt the ſupreme power." He choſe his members from among thoſe in the middling and lower ranks of life, as the moſt likely to reſign, without murmuring, that buſineſs they might find themſelves unable to conduct. Theſe agents "aboliſhed the clergy, the tythes, the univerſities, the court of chancery, and the common law, in the room of which they intended to ſubſtitute the Moſaical inſtitution."

On the third of June, Van Tromp, with a hundred ſhips under his command, falling in with the Engliſh fleet, commanded by Monk, Dean, Penn, and Lawſon, a deſperate engagement enſued off the Flemiſh coaſt, which laſting till night obliged the parties to deſiſt. Admiral Dean was killed; but on the following day the Engliſh renewed the battle, and being joined by admiral Blake with eighteen ſhips, they obtained the victory, ſinking ſix of the enemy's beſt ſhips, blowing up two others, and taking eleven. A few days afterwards Van Tromp ſailed with a reſolution to revenge his late loſs, or loſe his life. Falling in with Monk a deſperate engagement enſued, in which a muſket ball pierced the Dutch admiral through the heart. This decided the fate of the day; and the Dutch fled to their harbours, after having ſuſtained conſiderable loſs. Heartily tired of the war, the ſtates of Holland now became earneſt in their ſolicitations for peace, which Cromwell at length granted, on the following conditions: "A defenſive league was concluded between the two republics: they engaged each of them to baniſh the enemies of the other: thoſe concerned in the maſſacre of Amboyna were to be ſeverely puniſhed: the honour of the flag was to be yielded to the Engliſh: eighty-five thouſand pounds were to be paid by the Dutch Eaſt India company, as an indemnification for the loſſes which the Engliſh company had ſuffered; and the iſland of Poleron in the Eaſt Indies, was to be ceded to the latter."

By this time Cromwell's parliamentary power had increaſed to ſuch a degree, that the members came to a reſolution to reſign that authority which they found it impoſſible to enforce; and therefore they repaired to Whitehall, where they delivered the inſtrument of government into the hands of Cromwell. In a council of field officers held at Whitehall, the writing of reſignation was produced, and another ſcheme of government propoſed by Lambert, for tempering the liberty of the commonwealth by veſting the ſupreme power in one perſon, who ſhould be ſtiled protector; and communicated the contents of an inſtrument already prepared of ſuch a plan of government. Several objections were made, but it was immediately voted, that Cromwell ſhould be declared protector. He was to enjoy his office during life; and on his death the council were to ſupply his place immediately.

Being thus raiſed to ſupreme dignity by the moſt violent and irregular means, Cromwell was, on the ſixteenth of December, inaugurated into the office of lord protector of the united realms of England, Scotland, and Ireland, with all the parade of royal pageantry. He ſet out from Whitehall to the court of chancery, preceded by the lords commiſſioners of the great ſeal of England, the judges and barons of the ſeveral benches in their robes, the council of the commonwealth, the lord-mayor and aldermen of London; the recorder, town-clerk, and ſword-bearer, with the cap of maintenance, and ſword, but not erected. Cromwell followed in his own coach, with his life-guard, attended by ſeveral gentlemen, bare-headed, and ſeveral of the chief officers of the army, with their hats on. In the court of chancery was placed a rich chair of ſtate, with carpets on the floor. The lords commiſſioners ranged themſelves on each ſide of the chair; round it ſat the judges and council of ſtate; the lord-mayor and aldermen on the right ſide of the court, and the chief officers of the army on the left, all bare headed. The company being properly ranged, major-general Lambert, after declaring the diſſolution of the parliament, and the exigencies of the times, deſired the lord-general, in the name of the army and the three nations, to accept of the protectorſhip. Cromwell, with ſeeming reluctance, giving his conſent, the inſtrument of government was read aloud; after which the form of an oath was adminiſtered to the protector, to preſerve inviolate the articles contained in the inſtrument, and in all other reſpects to govern the nations according to their laws, cuſtoms and ſtatutes. During the reading of this oath, Cromwell lifted up his eyes to heaven, with the appearance of great ſolemnity and devotion, and then publicly ſubſcribed it. This ceremony over, Lambert preſented him, on his knees, with a ſword in a ſcabbard, repreſenting the civil ſword; this he accepted, and put off his own, to intimate that he was no longer ruled by the military one. He was then invited by the lords commiſſioners of the great ſeal, the judges, and the officers of the army, to take poſſeſſion of the chair of ſtate, as lord protector of England, Scotland, and Ireland. Upon which he ſat down in it, with his head covered, while the court continued bare. The lords commiſſioners then delivered up the purſe and ſeals; and the lord-mayor the ſword; and theſe being delivered back, the court broke up, and returned in the following order to Whitehall: firſt the aldermen and members of the council; after them the judges; then the commiſſioners of the great ſeal, who were followed by the life guards and four ſerjeants at arms, carrying the maces belonging to the court of chancery, the council, and parliament. The lord-mayor went immediately before the protector, with the ſword, and the officers of the army were about his perſon. At Weſtminſter-hall gate they took coach, when the lord-mayor rode bare headed. At the banqueting-houſe, Whitehall, Lochier, Cromwell's chaplain, made an exhortation to the company, which being ended, the ſoldiers fired three times, and then took their leave.

A. D. 1654. Cromwell's adminiſtration was now much commended by having concluded a peace with the Dutch. Moſt of the powers in Europe ſent ambaſſadors to court his alliance; and an accident which happened about this time, gave a convincing proof of his firm reſolution to govern with ſpirit, and to maintain the dignity of the Engliſh nation. Don Pantaleon Sa, brother to the Portugueſe ambaſſador, and joined with him in the ſame commiſſion, reſented an affront which he imagined had been offered upon the New Exchange, by ordering his ſervants to his aſſiſtance, and after wounding ſeveral Engliſh gentlemen, he, by miſtake, fell upon a perſon named Greenaway, whom he took for the man who had given the offence, and having butchered him with many wounds, he, and all his accomplices, took ſhelter in the houſe of the Portugueſe ambaſſador, which they threatened to defend againſt all attempts to take them. But finding that the houſe was beſet by colonel Whalley, and a party of horſe, the ambaſſador ordered his ſervants to arm, and ſent to complain to Cromwell of a breach of the law of nations. The lord protector ſent him for anſwer, that juſtice muſt be done, and that blood muſt be ſatisfied with blood. All the foreign ambaſſadors, then at London, intereſted themſelves in this affair, but every remonſtrance made to Cromwell was ineffectual, and Don Pantaleon, to the admiration of the world, was tried, condemned, and publicly executed on Tower-hill. The ſituation of Portugal at this time was ſuch, that they could not reſent this tranſaction; and the ambaſſador ſoon after ſigned with the protector a treaty of peace and alliance, which was very advantageous to the Engliſh commerce. The parliament met on the third of September, according to writs iſſued by Cromwell for that purpoſe. He went in great ſtate and opened it with a ſpeech, in which he informed them of the ſteps he had taken for modelling the new government; aſſuring them of his upright intentions; recapitulated what he had done for the nation, told them he had convoked a free parliament, and that he did not pretend to be their maſter, but their fellow labourer. The parliament, having with great attention liſtened to his ſpeech, which laſted near three hours, and, by Cromwell's recommendation, chuſing Lenthall for their ſpeaker, immediately entered into a diſcuſſion of the inſtrument of government, and of that authority which Cromwell, under the title of protector, had aſſumed over the nation. They arraigned his new dignity with the greateſt freedom, and even his perſonal character and conduct did not eſcape without cenſure. The protector, enraged at this refractory ſpirit in the parliament, ſent for them to the painted chamber, and with an air of great authority, inveighed againſt their proceedings, telling them, that nothing could be more abſurd than for them to diſpute his title; ſince the ſame inſtrument of government, which made them a parliament, had inveſted him with the protectorſhip; that ſome points in the new conſtitution were ſuppoſed to be fundamentals, and were not, on any pretence, to be altered or diſputed; that among theſe were the government of the nation by one perſon and a parliament, their joint authority over the army and militia, the ſucceſſion of new parliaments, and liberty of conſcience; and that with regard to theſe particulars, there was reſerved to him a negative voice, to which in the other circumſtances of government he confeſſed himſelf in no wiſe entitled. When the members returned to the houſe, they found a guard at the door, which would not ſuffer any one to enter till he had ſigned a recognition, by which he promiſed to be faithful to the commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland; and that he would never conſent to a change in the government eſtabliſhed under a protector and parliament. Moſt of the members, after ſome heſitation, ſubmitted to this condition, but retained the ſame refractory ſpirit, which they had diſcovered in their firſt debates. The inſtrument of government was examined one article after another, with the moſt ſcrupulous accuracy. Very free topics were advanced with the general approbation of the houſe; and during the whole courſe of their tranſactions, they neither ſent up one law to the protector, nor took any notice of him. Several members engaged in a conſpiracy, formed chiefly by the cavaliers, a name at this time given to the royal party, to take arms in different parts of the kingdom. But Cromwell having received intelligence of this ſcheme from his ſpies, haſtened to the diſſolution of ſo dangerous an aſſembly, eleven days before the expiration of the time fixed by the act of government; and he gave them to underſtand, at parting, that he knew ſeveral of them were engaged in a plot againſt his power.

A. D. 1655. A plan was now concluded by the cavaliers for a general inſurrection in favour of Charles; but the protector's ſpies informing him what was in agitation, he cauſed ſome of the conſpirators to be thrown into priſon; the conſequence of which was, that moſt of the reſt remained quiet; but in the weſt of England, Penruddock, Grove, Jones, and other gentlemen, raiſed two hundred horſe, and entering Saliſbury during the aſſizes, took poſſeſſion of the gates and market-place, and proclaimed the king; but their friends not joining them, they left the city, and wandered through the country till their numbers were ſo leſſened, that they were ſuppreſſed by one troop of horſe. The leaders of the party being condemned and executed, and others tranſported, Cromwell began to attend to foreign affairs. The new republic was ſo much dreaded by the French king, that though his fleet ſailing to the relief of Dunkirk, had been attacked by the fleet of England, yet the French court, ſo far from reſenting the affront, ſent ambaſſadors to England, to ſolicit their friendſhip. Soon after Cromwell had entered on the protectorſhip, he diſpatched admiral Blake with a fleet to the Mediterranean, to chaſtize the inſolence of the Algerine corſairs, which had committed great depredations on the Engliſh trading veſſels: and admiral Penn ſailed to the Weſt Indies, with a fleet carrying five thouſand ſoldiers under the command of general Venables. The admiral, by his private orders, to be opened in a certain latitude, found that he was to attack St. Domingo, the capital of Hiſpaniola. On the approach of the Engliſh, the Spaniards fled to the woods; but when Venables had landed ſome of his forces, they returned, and made preparations to defend themſelves. The Engliſh had been greatly fatigued by a forced march immediately after landing, and the heat of the climate had ſuch an effect on them, that the Spaniards, after killing ſix hundred of their men, compelled them to retire to their ſhips. This miſfortune, ſo unfavourable in appearance, turned out highly advantageous to the Engliſh intereſt, and was productive of a very happy event; for our commanders ſailing immediately to Jamaica, that valuable iſland ſurrendered to them without the leaſt reſiſtance, on the ſeventeenth of May; and has been in our poſſeſſion from that period to the preſent time; yet "ſo little was thought of the importance of this conqueſt, that upon their return from the expedition, Penn and Venables were ſent to the Tower, for their failure in the principal object of their expedition." It appears, however, that they were ſoon reſtored to liberty.

A. D. 1656. Montague having joined Blake in the Mediterranean, they cruized off Cadiz, with the view to intercept the Spaniſh fleet from the Weſt Indies, but, being in want of water, they ſailed to the coaſt of Portugal for a ſupply. Captain Stayner, whom Blake had left on the ſtation, with ſeven ſhips, ſoon deſcried the galleons, and immediately gave chace. The Spaniſh admiral, and two of his captains, ran their veſſels aſhore; but two ſhips, richly laden, fell into the hands of the Engliſh, and two were ſet on fire. The treaſure was brought from Portſmouth in waggons, and carried in triumph through the city of London. A ſubſequent action with the Spaniards, was productive of great honour to this brave admiral and to his country. Having received intelligence, that ſixteen Spaniſh ſhips under the command of Don Diego Diagues, were at the Canaries, he ſailed thither, and finding them in the bay of Santa Cruz, attacked them with ſuch impetuous fury, that the Spaniards quitted their ſhips, to which Blake immediately ſet fire, and deſtroyed them with all their valuable contents. Blake died on his return to England, after he was within ſight of his native country; and Cromwell, to ſhew his reſpect to the memory of ſo gallant a commander, cauſed him to be buried in great pomp, at his own expence, in the chapel of Henry VII. It is recorded of Blake, that though he fought under Oliver, whom he deemed an uſurper, he was a zealous republican in principle; and that he would ſay to his ſeamen, "It is our duty to fight for our country, into whatever hands the government may fall." The duke of Holſtein having preſented the protector with ſix beautiful Frieſland horſes, he attempted to amuſe himſelf with driving them in Hyde Park, his ſecretary Thurloe being in the coach: but the horſes taking fright, threw his highneſs out of the box, and in his fall one of his pocket piſtols went off; notwithſtanding which, he received neither wound nor broken bones. On the ſeventeenth of September, a parliament ſummoned by Cromwell, met, the members of which were to be approved by his highneſs's council, before they ſhould have leave to ſit: and by this means near a hundred were excluded, who publiſhed a ſevere remonſtrance againſt this violence: and now the ſitting members proceeded according to the wiſhes of Oliver.

A. D. 1657. It was Cromwell's peculiar ſtudy to engage the affections of the people by an impartial adminiſtration of juſtice. The benches were filled with judges of incorruptible integrity, who gave their deciſions without reſpect of perſons, and he laid aſide his major-generals, who by this time had incurred the hatred and reſentment of the whole nation. By ſuch means he flattered himſelf that he had eſtabliſhed his authority on a firm foundation, and that in order to make it as laſting as it was extenſive, it wanted nothing but the conſent of a national aſſembly; he therefore convoked a parliament; but as he had no great confidence in the good will of the people, he employed every art to influence the electors, and to fill the houſe with his own dependents, by which he ſecured an undiſputed majority, and fully imagined he ſhould now be able to accompliſh all his views. The parliament being aſſembled, they voted a renunciation of all title in Charles Stuart, or any of his family; and this was the firſt act, dignified with the appearance of national conſent, which ever had that tendency. An act was alſo paſſed for the ſecuring his highneſs the lord protector's perſon, and the continuance of the nation in ſecurity and peace. This act was occaſioned by the diſcovery of two plots, which had been entered into, ſome time before, to depoſe Cromwell. This parliament likewiſe approved of the war with Spain, and granted large ſums of money for carrying it on; and after they had ſat ſome months, a formal motion was made by Pack, one of the city members, for inveſting the protector with the dignity of king. This motion occaſioned great diſorders, and threw the houſe into parties. The chief oppoſition proceeded from the major-generals, and ſuch officers as were attached to their intereſt. But Lambert, a man of great intereſts in the army, had entertained the ambitious views of ſucceeding Cromwell in the protectorſhip, which he foreſaw would be impoſſible if the monarchy ſhould be reſtored, as hereditary right would then likewiſe be eſtabliſhed; he therefore, with Deſborough, and other officers, openly declared, that if Cromwell accepted the crown, they would inſtantly reſign their commiſſions; yet notwithſtanding all their oppoſition, the motion was approved by a great majority; and a bill was brought in and paſſed for that purpoſe. But this refractory ſpirit in Lambert and the other officers, gave Cromwell much uneaſineſs.

The protector was now waited on by a committee of the houſe, beſeeching him to accept the crown; when he returned them the following ambiguous anſwer, hardly reducible to the rules of plain Engliſh, or common ſenſe. "I confeſs, for it behoves me to deal plainly with you, I muſt confeſs, I would ſay I hope I may be underſtood in this; for indeed I muſt be tender what I would ſay to ſuch an audience as this; I ſay I would be underſtood, that, in this argument, I do not make a parallel between men of a different mind, and a parliament which ſhall have their deſires. I know there is no compariſon; nor can it be urged upon me that my words have the leaſt colour that way, becauſe the parliament ſeems to me to give liberty to me to ſay any thing to you. As that is a tender of my humble reaſons and judgment, and opinion to them, and if I think they are ſuch, and will be ſuch to them, and are faithful ſervants, and will be ſo to the ſupreme authority and the legiſlative, whereſoever it is. If I ſay I ſhould not tell you knowing their minds to be ſo, I ſhould not be faithful if I ſhould not tell you ſo, to the end that you may report it to parliament." Hereupon a ſecond committee was appointed to reaſon with the protector, and to overcome thoſe ſcruples which he pretended againſt accepting ſo liberal an offer. The conference laſted for ſeveral days; which, as there is no doubt but that Cromwell was deſirous of obtaining the crown, could only be done with a view of bringing the army to approve of the deſign, which being found impoſſible, on the eighth of May the protector, with great ſeeming humility, told the parliament, that he could not undertake the government with the title of king. Thus they found themſelves obliged to retain the name of a commonwealth; but inſtead of the inſtrument of government, which had been the work of the general officers alone, an humble petition and advice was framed, and offered to the protector by the parliament. This was repreſented as the great baſis of the republican eſtabliſhment; by it the authority of the protector was in ſome particulars enlarged, and in others conſiderably diminiſhed. Cromwell having obtained this ſanction of his authority, reſolved to conſecrate his title by a new inauguration, which was performed the twenty-ſixth of June in Weſtminſter-hall, with all the pomp and magnificence of a coronation; after which the parliament adjourned itſelf to the twentieth of January. Cromwell now deprived Lambert of all his commiſſions, in lieu of which, as a bribe for his future peaceable deportment, he allowed him a penſion of two thouſand pounds a year. He next turned his thoughts towards the eſtabliſhment of his family. He ſent for Richard his eldeſt ſon out of the country, where he led a private life, to bring him acquainted with a court, and to initiate him into the knowledge of public affairs. Soon after his arrival, he prevailed on the univerſity of Oxford to elect him their chancellor, in which honour he was ſolemnly inſtalled at Whitehall. His ſecond ſon Henry he made lord-lieutenant of Ireland: and having two daughters unmarried, he matched one of them to the lord Falconbridge, and the other to Mr. Rich, grandſon and heir to his great friend the earl of Warwick. France ſent this year to demand auxiliary forces from England, to aſſiſt it in its war with the Spaniards; which requeſt was readily granted by the protector, and ſix thouſand foot were accordingly ſent, under the command of Sir John Reynolds. The arrival of theſe forces enabled the French to make themſelves maſters of Montmedi and St. Venant, two very important places in the Spaniſh Netherlands; and ſoon after of the ſtrong fort of Mardyke, which opened them an eaſy paſſage to the conqueſt of Dunkirk, an event that ſoon after happened. Charles, in his turn, entered into a treaty with the court of Spain, by which he was allowed to reſide privately at Bruſſels, with a penſion of ſix thouſand livres a month, and half as much for his brother the duke of Glouceſter. They alſo engaged to furniſh him with ſix thouſand men, as ſoon as he ſhould be poſſeſſed of a good port in England. About this time there was a plot laid for an inſurrection in England in favour of the king, and the marquis of Ormond came over to London to forward the deſign; but the protector having notice of it, publiſhed a proclamation for apprehending the conſpirators before they could form a body. The marquis narrowly eſcaped. Dr. Hewet, Sir Henry Slingſby, Mr. Mordaunt, and ſeveral others concerned in the plot, were ſeized, and the two former being tried by a high court of juſtice, were condemned and executed, according to their ſentence.

A. D. 1658. On the twentieth of January, the parliament was again aſſembled, conſiſting, as in the times of monarchy, of two houſes, the commons, and the other houſe. This parliament occaſioned Cromwell great uneaſineſs. In the firſt place, all the members who had been excluded the houſe of commons the laſt ſeſſions, were now admitted to their ſeats, in conſequence of a clauſe in the Humble Petition and Advice, "That the perſons who are legally choſen, by a free election of the people, to ſerve in parliament, may not be excluded from doing their duties, but by the conſent of the houſe whereof they are members." The next thing which proved prejudicial to his views, was the erecting this new aſſembly, diſtinguiſhed by the title of the Other Houſe. It conſiſted of ſixty members, among whom were five or ſix ancient peers, ſeveral gentlemen of fortune and diſtinction, and ſome officers, who had riſen from the meaneſt profeſſions. None of the ancient peers, however, would deign to accept of a ſeat which they were to ſhare with ſuch companions as were aſſigned them. By bringing ſo great a number of his friends and adherents into the other houſe, Cromwell loſt his majority among the national repreſentatives, and Sir Arthur Hazelrig, and ſome others, whom the protector had created lords, choſe rather to take their ſeats with the commons, in order by their preſence to ſtrengthen their own party, by which means an unconteſtable majority appeared againſt Cromwell, and the commons refuſed to acknowledge the authority of his other houſe. Even the legality of the humble petition and advice was queſtioned, as being voted by a parliament which lay under force, and which was deprived of a conſiderable number of its members by military violence.

Cromwell, apprehenſive of combinations between the parliament, and the malcontents of the army, was reſolved to allow no time for forming a conſpiracy againſt him; and accordingly, without conſulting any one, on the fourth of February he went to the houſe, and ſent for the commons into the Painted Chamber, where, after reproaching them with their factious ſpirit, and charging them with being privy to conſpiracies againſt his authority, he ſaid, "Since ſuch are your proceedings, I think it high time to put an end to your ſitting. I therefore declare this parliament diſſolved: and God be judge between me and you." "Amen," replied the members, with as great vehemence as the protector. But theſe diſtractions at home were not able to take off Cromwell's attention from foreign affairs. On the third of June, marſhal Turenne, who commanded the French army, undertook the ſiege of Dunkirk, which was but very ill provided for a defence. Don John of Auſtria, governor of the Spaniſh Netherlands, drew together all his troops, and amongſt the reſt the Britiſh and Iriſh under the duke of York, to relieve it. After the ſiege had continued about twelve days, intelligence came that Don John and the Spaniſh generals were coming to its relief. It was reſolved to attack them, and the Spaniards were totally defeated. The valour of the Engliſh on this occaſion has been juſtly celebrated. On the twenty-fifth of June, Dunkirk ſurrendered, and was, by agreement, delivered to Cromwell. He committed the government of it to Lockart, whoſe abilities were in great eſtimation.

The protector, however, reaped little ſatiſfaction from the ſucceſs of his arms abroad: the ſituation of his affairs at home, kept him in perpetual inquietude. His military enterprizes, and ſecret intelligence, had exhauſted his revenue, and involved him in a conſiderable debt. The royaliſts (as we have before hinted) having concerted meaſures for a general inſurrection, Ormond came over in order to carry it into execution. Lord Fairfax, Sir William Waller, and many of the heads of the Preſbyterians, had ſecretly entered into the engagement; and even the army was infected with a general ſpirit of diſcontent. The conſpiracy was cruſhed by Willis, who diſcovered the whole to the protector; upon which Ormond was obliged to fly, and thought himſelf happy in having eſcaped ſo vigilant an adminiſtration. Many of the conſpirators were thrown into priſon; and a high court of juſtice was erected for the trial of thoſe whoſe guilt was moſt apparent. Sir Henry Slingſby, and Dr. Hewet, were condemned and beheaded; Aſton, Storey, and Beſtley, were hanged in different ſtreets of the city; and Mordaunt, brother to the earl of Peterborough, narrowly eſcaped, the numbers for his condemnation and acquittal being equal. The republicans, though they regarded with horror the views and principles of the royaliſts continually, continually denounced vengeance againſt Cromwell, and entered into cabals to dethrone him. Sindercome had undertaken to murder him, and had often been prevented by the moſt unaccountable accidents, from executing his bloody purpoſe: but though his deſign was diſcovered, the protector could never find the bottom of his enterprize, nor detect any of his accomplices; and notwithſtanding the clear and full proof of his guilt, the jury was, with difficulty, brought to condemn him. When every thing was prepared for his execution, he was found dead in his bed from poiſon, which it is ſuppoſed he had taken. The protector might have better ſupported his fears and apprehenſions, had he enjoyed any domeſtic ſatisfaction; but Fleetwood, his ſon-in-law, offended at Cromwell's ambition, had eſtranged himſelf from him. Cromwell's eldeſt daughter, who was Fleetwood's wife, had adopted republican principles, and could not, with patience, behold power lodged in a ſingle perſon, though that perſon was even an indulgent father. His other daughters were as much prejudiced in favour of the royal cauſe. But above all, the ſickneſs of Mrs. Claypole, Cromwell's favourite daughter, a lady endowed with many virtues and amiable accompliſhments, depreſſed his mind. She had entertained a high regard for Dr. Hewet, lately executed; and being refuſed his pardon, had tenderly urged her father to repent of the crimes into which he had been betrayed by his fatal ambition; and her death, which followed ſoon after, rendered her late exhortations more forcible Cromwell now ſaw that his high elevation and grandeur could not enſure him that tranquillity which virtue and moderation can alone beſtow. Overwhelmed with the load of public affairs, and ſeeing nothing around him but treacherous friends, and enraged enemies, he found his power to depend on ſo delicate a poize of factions and intereſt, as the ſmalleſt event was able to deſtroy. Though he had, with ſuch ſignal intrepidity, braved death in the field, it was now his utmoſt care to avoid receiving it from the poniards of aſſaſſins; he never moved a ſtep without his guards; he wore armour under his clothes, and always carried a ſword and piſtol. He ſeldom ſlept above three nights together in the ſame chamber; and never let it be known before hand, what chamber he intended to chuſe; nor truſted himſelf in any one which was not provided with back doors, at which centinels were carefully placed. While in this ſituation of mind, he was ſeized with a ſlow fever, which changed into a tertian ague; but in the intervals of his fits he was able to walk abroad. At length the fever increaſed, and he began to conſider the near approach of death. He aſked Dr. Goodwin, one of his preachers, if the doctrine were true, that the elect could never fall, or ſuffer a final reprobation. The miniſter anſwered, "Nothing is more certain." "Then," ſaid Cromwell, "I am ſafe; for I am ſure that I was once in a ſtate of grace." His chaplains, by their prayers and revelations ſo buoyed up his hopes, that he began to believe his life out of danger; and with confidence ſaid to his phyſicians, "I tell you I ſhall not die of this diſtemper; I am well aſſured of my recovery. It is promiſed by the Lord, not only to my ſupplications, but to thoſe of men who hold a ſtricter commerce, and more intimate correſpondence with him. Ye may have ſkill in your profeſſion; but nature can do more than all the phyſicians in the world, and God is far above nature."

Very ſoon however theſe ſymptoms began to wear a more fatal aſpect; and the phyſicians declared, that he could not ſurvive the next fit. The council being alarmed, ſent a deputation to know his will, with regard to his ſucceſſor. They aſked him, whether he did not intend that Richard, his eldeſt ſon, ſhould ſucceed him in the protectorſhip; but his ſenſes being nearly gone, he could not expreſs his intentions. A ſimple affirmative only was, or ſeemed to be extorted from him. He died on the third of September, a day he had always regarded as auſpicious, and on which he had gained his two ſignal victories of Dunbar and Worceſter, aged fifty-nine years and four months. His death was followed by a violent tempeſt of thunder and lightening; both his partizans and enemies weakly drew concluſions from this event, which they interpreted according to their different prejudices. His remains were apparently interred in Weſtminſter-abbey, with more than regal magnificence; but ſome writers aſſert, that the body was wrapped in lead, and thrown into the Thames below London-bridge; and others with as little reaſon affirm poſitively, that it was ſecretly depoſited in Naſeby-field. By Elizabeth, daughter of Sir James Bouchier, he had two ſons and four daughters. Richard his ſucceſſor, married the eldeſt daughter of Richard Major, Eſq; and Henry married a daughter of Sir Francis Ruſſel, of Chippenham, in Cambridgeſhire. His daughters were Bridget, married to commiſſary-general Ireton, afterwards to lieutenant-general Fleetwood; Elizabeth, the wife of John Claypole, Eſq; Mary, married to lord viſcount Falconbridge; and Frances, wife to Mr. Rich, grandſon to the earl of Warwick; and afterwards to Sir John Ruſſel of Chippenham.

PRINCIPLES, CONDUCT, and CHARACTER of OLIVER CROMWELL.

This great ſtateſman and brave general was born at Huntingdon, of Welſh extraction, and the family name was originally Williams: but one of his anceſtors having married a ſiſter of the renowned Thomas Cromwell, earl of Eſſex, in the reign of Henry VIII. a ſon by that marriage took that name, and tranſmitted it to poſterity. Oliver, being the ſon of a ſecond brother, inherited but a ſmall eſtate. His father died when he was young; but his mother, whoſe name was Stuart, and by ſome authors ſuppoſed to be remotely allied to the royal family, lived till after he was protector. In his perſon he was of a robuſt frame of body, and of a manly aſpect, ſtrongly marked with good ſenſe, but with ſtriking lines of ſeverity. He ſtudied for ſome time at Sidney college in the univerſity of Cambridge, where he was admitted a fellow-commoner, and in which library there is now his portrait, reckoned the moſt ſtriking likeneſs now exiſting. Though he diſſipated part of his patrimony in gaming and drinking in this ſeminary of learning, yet while in college he was eſteemed a man of ſhining abilities. Being ſuddenly ſeized with a ſpirit of reformation, he married; behaved with great gravity; reſtored whatever ſums he had won by gaming; and entered with zeal into the principles and views of the puritanical party. His mother could never be perſuaded, that either his power or his perſon were in ſafety; and at every noiſe ſhe heard, exclaimed, that her ſon was murdered. By her frugality and induſtry ſhe raiſed and educated a numerous family upon a ſmall fortune. She had even been obliged to ſet up a brewery at Huntingdon: hence Cromwell has been ſtigmatized with the name of the Brewer; and Ludlow, by way of inſult, takes notice of the great acceſſion he would receive to his royal revenues upon his mother's death, who poſſeſſed a jointure of ſixty pounds a year upon his eſtate.

We may find the character of Cromwell drawn in quite oppoſite features by different hiſtorians, according to their various principles and prejudices. Cardinal Mazarine was wont to call him "a fortunate madman;" father Orleans ſtiles him "a judicious villain;" lord Clarendon, "a brave, wicked man." Abuſive epithets, or terms of reproach, are beneath the gravity of a thinking hiſtorian; and, when uſed, deſtroy, in an inſtant, both his impartiality and credit. It is certain, the memory of this extraordinary genius has been celebrated by the fineſt pens of his age. The verſes of Mr. Waller, Dryden, and Sprat, afterwards biſhop of Rocheſter, are well known. Tuckney, maſter of St. John's college, Dr. Wichcot, Horton, Minſhul, Seaman, and others, alſo wrote poems in his praiſe. "What can be more extraordinary," ſays Cowley, "than that a perſon of private birth and education, no fortune, no eminent qualities of body, nor ſhining talents of mind, ſhould have the courage to attempt, and the abilities to execute ſo great a deſign, as the ſubverting one of the moſt ancient and beſt eſtabliſhed monarchies in the world? That he ſhould have the boldneſs and power to put his prince and maſter to an open and infamous death? Should baniſh that numerous and ſtrongly allied family? Cover all theſe temerities under a ſeeming obedience to a parliament, in whoſe ſervice he pretended to be retained? Trample too upon that parliament, and ſcornfully expel them as ſoon as they gave him ground of diſſatisfaction? Overcome all his enemies by arms, and afterwrds all his friends by artifice? Serve all parties patiently for a while, and command them victoriouſly at laſt? Be feared and courted by all foreign princes? Call together parliaments with a ſtroke of his pen, and ſcatter them again with a word of his mouth? Reduce to ſubjection a warlike and diſcontented nation, by means of a mutinous army? Command a mutinous army by ſeditious and factious officers? Be humbly and daily petitioned, that he would be pleaſed, at the rate of millions a year, to be hired as maſter of thoſe who had hired him before to be their ſervant? Have the eſtates and lives of three nations as much at his diſpoſal, as was once the little inheritance of his father, and be as liberal and noble in the ſpending of them? And laſtly (for there is no end of enumerating every particular of his glory) with one word, bequeath all this power and ſplendor to his poſterity? Die poſſeſſed of peace at home, and triumph abroad? Be buried among kings? And leave a name behind him not to be extinguiſhed but with the whole world, which as it was too little for his praiſe, ſo might it have been for his conqueſts, if the ſhort line of his mortal life could have ſtretched out to the extent of his immortal deſigns." Hyperbolical as this character may appear, it is, in a great meaſure, founded in truth. It is aſtoniſhing that a man of ſuperficial knowledge, by the ſtrength of natural talents, ſhould conceive the moſt daring projects which were ever formed by the human mind. That he ſhould be as artful in exploring the purpoſes of others, as he was ſagacious in diſſembling his own deſigns; that he ſhould be ſo verſed in the knowledge of mankind, as to be able by the ſingle principle of an hypocritical enthuſiaſm, to render all factions ſubſervient to his ambitious views. Such was his courage and reſolution, that in the accompliſhment of his deſigns he overlooked all danger, and ſaw no difficulty; and, on being raiſed from a very private ſtation, to the power of the greateſt monarch, it is really amazing, that he could behave with a dignity ſuitable to that power, and ſupport, with all ſtrangers, that high idea with which they had been impreſſed by his great exploits and uncommon policy; eſpecially if we conſider he made no figure in the awful tragedy, till the breaking out of the civil war; and he was not leſs than forty-three years of age, when he firſt embraced the military profeſſion. Notwithſtanding the gravity of his manners, and his religious cant, upon many occaſions he could relax himſelf in trifling, jeſting, and making verſes among his intimate friends, without lowering himſelf in their eſteem; whereby he took the opportunity of diving into their weakneſſes; and would ſometimes induce them by an indulgence in wine, to open to him the moſt ſecret receſſes of their hearts. However, great regularity of manners was always maintained in his court; and notwithſtanding his fondneſs for ſportive frolics in private, he took care to give no offence to the moſt rigid and devout. He upheld ſome ſtate, but with little expence, and without oſtentatious ſplendor. Every thing was managed with great frugality, yet he was generous to thoſe who ſerved him. He knew how to find out and engage in his intereſt, every man poſſeſſed of thoſe talents which every particular employment demanded; and all his generals, admirals, judges, and ambaſſadors, were perſons who, in their ſeveral ſpheres, contributed to the honour of the nation, and his own ſecurity. He ſought every where for men of abilities, in order properly to employ them. He favoured learning, and was munificent to ſuch as excelled in ſcience: nor did he fail, in ſeveral reſpects, to conciliate the affections of his enemies to his perſon and government. It muſt, indeed, be confeſſed, Cromwell knew as well how to play the tyrant, as to act the ſaint. His edict againſt the epiſcopal clergy was to the laſt decree unjuſt and cruel. The cavaliers had hard meaſure from him, as they were, almoſt without exception, rendered ſubject to heavy taxes, and other inconveniences, upon account of the raſhneſs and imprudence of ſome of their party. He alſo, on particular occaſions, made uſe of packed juries, and diſplaced judges for refuſing to follow his directions. He committed men illegally to priſon; cauſed them to be tried before new created tribunals; and adjudged to death without the verdict of a jury: if to this we add the violation of the privileges of parliament, we muſt acknowledge his actions were, in many inſtances, arbitrary, illegal, and tyrannical. On the other hand, his enemies allow, that in private life, as a ſon, a huſband, a father, and a friend, he deſerves applauſe; and his government, though arbitrary, and ſupported by military force, was, in many inſtances, worthy of praiſe. In ſhort, he had many private and public virtues which were eclipſed by his ambition and hypocriſy.

OLIVER CROMWELL's ELDEST SON.

AS ſoon as the death of Cromwell was aſcertained, Richard, his eldeſt ſon, was proclaimed protector in London by the council, and by Monk in Scotland; and Henry, Richard's brother, who governed Ireland with popularity, undertook for the obedience of that kingdom. Both the army and fleet acknowledged his title. Upwards of ninety addreſſes from the counties and moſt conſiderable corporations, congratulated Richard on his acceſſion, in terms of dutiful allegiance; and the foreign miniſters were particularly attentive in paying him the uſual compliments. Thus Richard, a young man of no experience, accuſtomed to a retired life in the country, unacquainted with the officers of the army, and recommended by no military exploits, was tempted to accept of ſo rich an inheritance, though his want of ambition would never have prompted him to contend for this honour.

A. D. 1659. The parliament, which conſiſted of two houſes like the former, was now aſſembled. There were a great many republicans in the houſe of commons, who had long debates about the other houſe, and likewiſe about the humble petition and advice; and after great oppoſition, and many vehement diſputes, it was at laſt, with much difficulty, carried by the court party to confirm it. Before the meeting of this aſſembly, ſeveral cabals had been ſet on foot by diſcontented perſons, againſt the government of the new protector. His uncle Deſborough was a republican, and Fleetwood, his brother-in-law, a violent fanatic, and of conſequence both averſe to the government of a ſingle perſon. Lambert and Ludlow, with many other officers whom Oliver had deprived of their commiſſions, now came forth from their retreats, and joined the council againſt Richard. Some of theſe, pretending great friendſhip for him, adviſed him to call up to London as many officers as could be ſpared from the regiments quartered in different parts of the country, in caſe that if the parliament ſhould prove refractory, he might thereby be the better able to ſupport his authority.

The new protector, who did not poſſeſs much penetration, fell into the ſnare, and when theſe officers repaired to London, they eſtabliſhed their meetings at Fleetwood's apartments, which being in Wallingford-houſe, the party were known by the name of the Wallingford cabal. They now aſſumed the title of the great council of the army, and preſented a petition to the protector, wherein they demanded "That no member of the army ſhould be ſubject to the civil magiſtrate; and that the officers ſhould enjoy the privilege of chuſing their own general." Richard ſoon perceived that their deſign was to render themſelves independent of him, therefore, alarmed at their preſumption, he rejected their petition, and even threatened to diſmiſs them from his ſervice, ſhould they make ſuch extravagant propoſals for the future. But this ſeeming firmneſs in Richard had no effect on the Wallingford cabal, who now preſented a petition to the parliament, praying that Fleetwood might be appointed general of the army; but Richard gave an unfavourable anſwer, and commanded the officers immediately to return to their reſpective quarters. The council of officers now denied the authority of Richard, and came to the reſolution of eſtabliſhing a form of government in which he ſhould have no concern. They led their troops to Whitehall, and having ſtationed parties of men in all the avenues of that building, Deſborough, attended by a ſtrong guard, demanded an audience of the protector. In the name of all the officers, he inſiſted on an immediate diſſolution of the parliament. Richard refuſed to comply with their demands; but upon Deſborough threatening, that if entreaties were rejected, recourſe would be had to coercive means, the protector declared that the parliament ſhould be diſſolved. A diſſolution of parliament ſoon after taking place, it was generally conſidered that the protector was depoſed; at laſt he formally reſigned his authority in a few days after.

There was now intelligence of ſeveral conſpiracies, which were forming by the royaliſts, in conjunction with the Preſbyterians, in ſeveral parts of the kingdom; and in many counties a reſolution was taken to riſe in arms. Lord Willoughby of Parham, and Sir Horatio Townſhend, undertook to ſecure Lynn; general Maſſey engaged to ſeize Glouceſter; lord Newport, Littleton, and other gentlemen, conſpired to take poſſeſſion of Shrewſbury; Sir George Booth of Cheſter; Sir Thomas Middleton of North Wales; and Arundel, Pollard, Granville, and Trelawney, of Plymouth and Exeter. A day was appointed for all theſe enterprizes; and the king, attended by his brother the duke of York, had arrived ſecretly at Calais, with a reſolution of putting himſelf at the head of his loyal ſubjects, as ſoon as a favourable opportunity offered. This combination was, however, diſconcerted by the treachery of Sir Richard Willis, who, being in great confidence with the king and his little court, was intruſted by them with all their cabinet ſecrets. This man had been bribed by Oliver, and from that time had continually betrayed all the reſolves of Charles and his friends, and now ſent intelligence of this conſpiracy to Thurloe, the ſecretary of ſtate. The parliament, alarmed at their danger, cauſed all the horſes in and about London to be ſeized; the avenues of the city to be guarded; and ſeveral detachments of horſe and foot to be placed in the roads from the weſt and north-weſt parts of the kingdom. They had many officers whoſe fidelity they could more depend upon than that of Lambert; but there was no one in whoſe vigilance and capacity they repoſed ſuch confidence; he was therefore ſent about the beginning of Auguſt againſt Booth and his party, whoſe intent of taking Cheſter was the only part of the conſpiracy which had ſucceeded. The earl of Derby, lord Herbert of Cherbury, Mr. Lee, and colonel Morgan, took part in this enterprize. He was alſo joined by Sir William Middleton with ſome troops from North Wales, by which means his party became ſtrong enough to ſubdue all in that neighbourhood who had courage enough to oppoſe them. When Lambert left London, his army did not conſiſt of above fifteen hundred men; but on his march he was joined by three regiments, which the parliament had ordered from Dunkirk, and by colonel Zauchy with his own regiment of horſe, and a regiment of foot, amounting in all to about five thouſand. Booth, whoſe party did not conſiſt of half that number, having intelligence of Lambert's approach, thought to have got a day's march before him into Lancaſhire, where he hoped to increaſe it; and to gain time, he ſent a trumpeter, with two miniſters, to ſhew the reaſon for their raiſing an army, and deſired a treaty, to ſave the effuſion of blood. This propoſal Lambert conſented to, if they would firſt lay down their arms, and ſurrender to him the garriſons in their power.

No anſwer being given, an engagement enſued, in which the royaliſts were defeated. Booth and Middleton made their eſcape, many were taken priſoners, and Booth himſelf was ſoon after ſeized and committed to the Tower. This ſucceſs haſtened the ruin of the parliament, Lambert, conſcious of his ſtrength, and of their extreme weakneſs, was no leſs dangerous to them than Booth. A thouſand pounds, which they voted him as a reward for his ſervice, he employed in bribing the officers under his command, who all ſwore to be true to him. At his inſtigation they drew up a petition to the parliament, demanding that they would comply with the addreſs formerly preſented by the council of Wallingford-houſe; that they would eſtabliſh Fleetwood in his command, appoint Lambert major-general, Deſborough lieutenant-general of the horſe, and Monk, major-general of the foot; and that no officer ſhould be diſmiſſed from his command but by a court-martial. This petition being preſented was taken into conſideration by the houſe, who at laſt voted, "that to have other officers than thoſe appointed by parliament, would be uſeleſs, chargeable and dangerous to the commonwealth." At the ſame time, alarmed at the danger, they caſhiered Lambert, Deſborough, Berry, Clarke, Barrow, Kelſey, and Cobbet; revoked Fleetwood's commiſſion, and appointed commiſſioners to govern the army for a limited time. The army paid no reſpect to their acts or reſolutions. Lambert drew ſome troops together, in order to decide the controverſy. Moſs and Morley brought their regiments into Palace-yard, reſolute to oppoſe the violence of Lambert: but he had no intention of giving them ſo much trouble; he had an eaſier method of ſubduing them. He placed his ſoldiers in ſuch a manner as to ſecure all the avenues to Weſtminſter-hall; and when the ſpeaker arrived in his coach, he ordered the horſes to be turned, and with great politeneſs conducted him home. The other members were by the ſame ſtratagem prevented from meeting, and the two regiments in Palace-yard finding themſelves expoſed to the deriſion of the people, departed quietly to their quarters. Thus, on the thirteenth of Auguſt, five months after it had been reſtored, was the rump parliament again depoſed by the army, and the officers found themſelves again inveſted with ſupreme authority. Out of their own body they appointed a council of ten perſons, who were to take upon them the management of ſuch affairs as were moſt preſſing. They then declared Fleetwood their general, Lambert their lieutenant-general, and Deſborough commiſſary-general of the horſe. At laſt they elected a committee of twenty-three perſons, of whom ſeven were officers. Theſe being ſtiled a committee of ſafety, they pretended to inveſt with ſovereign authority.

The conduct of Monk was at this time ſo impenetrable, that it remained a doubt which party he would embrace. But he no ſooner heard of Lambert's proceedings in London, than he marched out of Scotland, with the beſt of his troops, firmly reſolved to reſtore the rump parliament. This meaſure rendered him ſuſpected of having formed ſome deep deſigns either in his own favour, or that of the king; but his profound ſecrecy and diſſimulation prevented any thing certain from tranſpiring. He wrote letters to Fleetwood and Lambert, wherein he complained of their violation of faith to the parliament, and declared his reſolution of endeavouring to reſtore them to their power, againſt all oppoſition whatſoever." Fleetwood and Lambert were aſtoniſhed at this reſolution. They immediately ordered colonel Talbot and Clarges, brother-in-law to Monk, to go into Scotland, and, if poſſible, prevail with the general to enter into a treaty, which might prevent the effuſion of blood. But Monk was indefatigable in carrying his deſigns into execution. All the officers in his army, of whom he entertained the leaſt ſuſpicion, he caſhiered. He drew together the ſeveral ſcattered regiments. He ſummoned an aſſembly ſomewhat reſembling a convention of eſtates in Scotland, and having communicated his intention of marching into England, he received from them a ſmall but ſeaſonable ſupply of money. Clarges and Talbot being arrived in Scotland, were well received by Monk; who, by their advice, and in order to gain time, conſented to a negociation, and ſent Wilkes, Cloberry, and Knight, three of his officers, to treat with the committee. They met Lambert at York, with a body of forces to oppoſe the progreſs of Monk. He told them he was ſufficiently authorized to treat with them; but upon their demanding the reſtoration of the parliament, he acknowledged he had no inſtructions on that head, and they proceeded to London, where the ſame demand being made to the committee, they immediately aſſented to it. On the fifteenth of November a treaty was ſigned, by which both ſides intended to act vigorouſly againſt Charles.

The enemy was now reduced to the greateſt extremity by the non-payment of taxes, and the nation in a ſtate of perfect anarchy. While Lambert was collecting his forces at Newcaſtle, Haſelrig and Morley entered Portſmouth, and declared for the parliament. A party, ſent to quell the inſurrection, were induced, by their commander, to embrace the ſame intereſt. The city apprentices roſe in a body, and inſiſted on a free parliament: and though they were ſuppreſſed by colonel Hewſon, a man who was once a cobler, but now enjoyed a conſiderable rank in the army, the city ſtill retained its oppoſition, and diſcovered marks of the higheſt diſſatisfaction. The magiſtrates even erected a kind of ſeparate government, and exerciſed the ſupreme authority within their walls. About the ſame time admiral Lawſon entered the river with his fleet, and declared for the parliament. Alarmed at theſe events, Haſelrig and Morley left Portſmouth, and haſtened towards London. The regiments quartered in the neighbourhood of that city, were perſuaded by their old officers, who had been diſmiſſed by the committee of ſafety, to eſpouſe, once more, the cauſe of the parliament. Deſborough's regiment, which had been ſent to Lambert, to aſſiſt his friends, no ſooner reached St. Albans, than that officer declared for the ſame aſſembly. Lenthall the ſpeaker, at the deſire of the officers, reſumed his former authority, and on the twenty-ſixth of December, aſſembled the parliament, which had, with ſo much contempt, and ignominy, been twice expelled. On their meeting they annulled the act againſt the payment of the exciſe and cuſtoms; they next choſe commiſſioners for aſſigning quarters to the ſoldiers; and without taking the leaſt notice of Lambert, they enjoined the forces under his command, to repair directly to the garriſons allotted for them. The ſituation of this general was now deſperate; his army rendered entirely uſeleſs to him, and what was ſtill worſe, the few troops that remained with him, thinking to make their court to thoſe in power, or perhaps to gratify ſome pique of their own, put their general under an arreſt, and ſent him to London, where he was committed a priſoner to the Tower.

A. D. 1660.

On the ſecond of January Monk entered England, having received a ſupply of thirty thouſand pounds from the Scots, and taken proper precautions for maintaining the peace of that kingdom. During his march he received information of the diſbanding of the army, and alſo that lord Fairfax, with ſome of the principal gentry in Yorkſhire, were in arms, demanding a free parliament. This was going a ſtep farther than Monk had yet propoſed. He was, however, received with open arms by the lord Fairfax and all his friends, who had taken poſſeſſion of the city of York. The rump parliament now became greater objects of deteſtation than the army had been before; and every ſtep which Monk advanced towards the capital, occaſioned ſome freſh declarations, or aſſociations of the counties for a free parliament. The rump now began to think they had made the breach between themſelves and the Wallingford officers, too irreconcileable. They began to apprehend that Monk had ſomething more in view than the reſtoring them, and would have been better pleaſed had he continued in Scotland. They, however, ſent him a letter, informing him, that they were re-aſſembled, and attributed the reſtitution of their authority wholly to his fidelity, care, and courage. This meſſage was ſo far from being pleaſing to the general, that he conſidered it as one of the moſt unfortunate events that could have attended him. He was under a thouſand perplexities how to act; for by the parliament's precipitate reſumption of their power, aſſiſted by a numerous army newly returned to their obedience, he deſpaired of being able to compaſs his deſigns, and thought it prudent not to continue any longer in arms, than a favourable opportunity ſhould offer for laying them down; for he had been perſuaded that they would not have thought themſelves ſafe till his arrival in London with the army, when he intended to reſtore all the other members with them, without paying the leaſt regard to their difference of opinions. He, however, continued his march, and in all the counties which he paſſed through, the chief people flocked to him with addreſſes, wherein they expreſſed their earneſt deſire, that he would do his utmoſt to reſtore the nation to peace and tranquillity, and to the enjoyment of thoſe liberties, of which they had been, for ſuch a number of years, ſo unhappily deprived. At Lancaſter he was met by a deputation from London with an addreſs, praying a reſtoration of the members who had been excluded in 1648. The preſbyterians ſeem to have had the principal ſhare in all theſe addreſſes, for the ſecluded members were moſtly of that perſuaſion. The parliament perceiving it was not in their power to prevent the progreſs of Monk, thought it moſt prudent to conſent to it, and accordingly on the twelfth of January an act was voted to juſtify Monk's march into England; and on the ſixteenth they voted a thouſand pounds a year to be ſettled on him. Scot and Robinſon, two of their members, were ſent under pretence of complimenting him on the road, but in reality as ſpies on his conduct. The city diſpatched four of their chief perſons to perform like compliments; and at the ſame time to confirm the general in his inclination to a free parliament. When Monk came to St. Albans, he ſent a letter to the parliament, wherein he deſired they would remove from London thoſe regiments, who, though they now profeſſed to return to their duty, had ſo lately offered violence to that aſſembly. The parliament thought proper to comply with this requeſt. Lambert was now in the Tower, and Fleetwood, with the other ſuperior officers, tamely obeyed the orders they received for leaving London; but the common men were more refractory; about four thouſand of them mutinied; one regiment in particular, which was quartered in Somerſet-houſe, refuſed to yield their place to the northern army, but they were obliged at laſt quietly to ſubmit for want of leaders.

On the fourth of February Monk entered London. The next day he was introduced to the houſe, and thanks were given him, in the name of the members, by Lenthall their ſpeaker, for the eminent ſervices he had done his country. Monk returned an anſwer in ſuch ambiguous terms, as ſtill kept every one in ſuſpence. But it was impoſſible for the nation to remain long in this doubtful ſituation; and the people, as well as parliament, were deſirous of bringing matters to ſome determined iſſue. During the late diſtractions, the payment of taxes had been interrupted; and though the parliament, as ſoon as they were reſtored, had given orders for all collections and impoſitions, yet ſo little authority did they poſſeſs in the nation, that the people obeyed their commands very ſlowly and with great reluctance. The common council of London abſolutely refuſed to ſubmit to an aſſeſſment required of them; and declared, that until a free and lawful parliament impoſed taxes, they never ſhould think it their duty to make any payment. This peremptory denial gave the parliament a fair pretence of making a trial of their own power, and the general's fidelity. Accordingly, on the ninth of February, Monk received orders to march into the city, to ſeize twelve perſons the moſt obnoxious to the parliament, to remove the poſts and chains from all the ſtreets, and to take down and deſtroy the portculliſes and gates of the city. Theſe orders Monk complied with in part only, and, after ſome ſecret conferences with the citizens, he began to throw off the maſk which he had ſo long worn. He ſent a letter to the parliament, acquainting them with what he had done, and begging they would mitigate the ſeverity of their order; which they refuſing to do, he made many public apologies to the city for his conduct in the affair, declaring it to have been entirely in compliance with the orders of the rump, whom he now found to be a ſet of mercileſs unrelenting tyrants. He then wrote a letter to the houſe, reproaching them with ſome new cabals they had formed with Vane and Lambert, and alſo with the encouragement given to a fanatical petition, preſented by Praiſe-god Barebone, wherein he deſired, that every individual of the kingdom ſhould be compelled to take the oath of abjuration. He then required them in the name of the citizens, ſoldiers, and whole commonwealth, to iſſue writs within a week for filling their houſe, and to fix the time for their own diſſolution and the aſſembling of a new parliament. He now declared his reſolution to the city, and deſired that they would join their endeavours with his for the happineſs and ſettlement of the commonwealth. The joy which this declaration occaſioned in the city, was teſtified by the ringing of bells, bonfires, and illuminations. The parliament foreſaw the approaching ſtorm, but reſolved to make one more effort for the recovery of their dominion. They diſpatched a committee to the general, to endeavour by every perſuaſion to bring him over to their intereſt; and even went ſo far as to offer him the ſupreme authority. But Monk refuſed to hear them except in the preſence of ſome of the ſecluded members. He then marched into the city, where he formed a new militia; this done he returned with his army to Weſtminſter, and purſued every proper meaſure for the ſettlement of the nation, ſtill concealing his real deſigns under the appearance of republican principles. On the twenty-firſt of February the ſecluded members attended him in a body to Whitehall; from whence, after receiving their promiſe to call a free parliament, and then diſſolve themſelves, he gave them a guard to the parliament-houſe, where they took their ſeats. The leaders of the independent and republican party, amazed at the ſudden appearance of the excluded members among them, retired from the houſe. The reſtored members then repealed all the orders by which they had been excluded. They gave Sir George Booth and all his party their liberty and eſtates. They renewed and enlarged the general's commiſſion. They fixed an aſſeſſment for the ſupport of the fleet and army. And having paſſed theſe votes for the preſent compoſure of the kingdom, they on the ſixteenth of March, diſſolved themſelves, and gave orders for the immediate aſſembling of a new parliament. In the mean time a council of ſtate was eſtabliſhed, compoſed of men of dignity and moderation. The militia of the kingdom was intruſted in ſuch hands as would promote order and ſettlement. Theſe, when joined with Monk's army, were eſteemed a ſufficient check on the diſperſed army, which was more numerous, and of whoſe inclinations there was ſtill great reaſon to be diffident. But before the new parliament met, Lambert eſcaped out of the Tower. This accident alarmed Monk, and the council of ſtate, who knew Lambert's great popularity in the army. Colonel Ingoldſby was immediately diſpatched after him, and overtook him at Daventry, while he had yet aſſembled but four troops of horſe; two of which deſerted him; and he, endeavouring to make his eſcape, was ſeized by Ingoldſby, and again committed to the Tower. Monk did not openly declare that he had adopted the king's intereſt; and Morrice, a near relation of his, was the only man with whom he intruſted the important ſecret. Sir John Grenville, being at this time ſent to Monk by Charles, applied to Morrice for admiſſion to the general, but received for anſwer, that the general deſired he would communicate his buſineſs to Morrice; this he refuſed to do, and Monk pleaſed with his ſecrecy, admitted him to his preſence. After hearing what he had to ſay, he opened to him his whole intentions, and commiſſioned him to aſſure the king of his attachment to his intereſt; as a preſent proof of which, he deſired he would inſtantly leave Spain, and retire to Holland, as he had received ſecret information, that Spain intended to retain him as a pledge for the recovery of Dunkirk and Jamaica. This intelligence was communicated to Charles but juſt in time; for he very narrowly eſcaped to Breda; and had he delayed his journey, even for a few hours, he had certainly been arreſted by the Spaniards under pretence of honour and reſpect.

On the twenty-fifth of April, the parliament aſſembled in two houſes, that of lords and that of commons. The commons choſe Sir Harbottle Grimſtone, for their ſpeaker. This gentleman, with many others, had gone great lengths in contributing to the ruin of the late king, but ſtopped when his death was under conſideration. On the firſt day of their meeting, the commons received a meſſage from the lords; and on the ſecond, Grimſtone, by order of the houſe, returned thanks to Monk for ſubduing all their, and the nations enemies without the effuſion of blood. They then adjourned till the firſt day of May. When the houſe re-aſſembled, the great dangers incurred during the former uſurpations, and the extreme caution of the general, kept every one in awe; and no one dared for ſome days to make any mention of the king. But Monk, finding by their bitter invectives againſt the memory of Cromwell, and execrations upon thoſe who had murdered their late ſovereign, that they were diſpoſed as he could wiſh, ordered Anneſley, preſident of the council, to acquaint them, that one Sir John Grenville, a ſervant of the king's, had been ſent to England by his majeſty, and was now at the door with a letter to the commons. He was immediately called in, and preſented the letter, together with a declaration, which he had received from the king. Without one moment's delay, or a contradictory vote, a committee was appointed to prepare an anſwer; and on the eighth of May both houſes attended, while the king was with great ſolemnity proclaimed in Palace-yard, at Whitehall, and at Temple-bar. As a convincing proof of their affection for his majeſty, the commons voted him a preſent of fifty thouſand pounds, ten thouſand pounds were at the ſame time given to the duke of York, and five thouſand to the duke of Glouceſter; and a committee of lords and commons was diſpatched to invite his majeſty to return and take poſſeſſion of his dominions. This ſubmiſſion of the king's ſubjects was ſoon ſucceeded by the reſpect of foreign powers. Spain invited him to return to the Low Countries and embark in ſome of their maritime towns, and France offered Calais for the ſame purpoſe. But Charles accepted a third invitation, which he received from the States-General, and going to Holland, where every mark of magnificent reſpect was ſhewn him, he embarked on board the Engliſh fleet, which lay ready to receive him, under the command of admiral Montague. He made his public entry into London on the twenty-ninth of May, which was alſo his birth-day; and aſcended the throne of his anceſtors, without making any conditions with the people. It may be proper here to obſerve of the deſcendants and relations of the protector, that Richard Cromwell died at Cheſhunt in Hertfordſhire, July 13, 1712, aged eighty-ſix. William Cromwell, Eſq. and great grandſon of the protector, died in Kirby-ſtreet, Hatton-garden, unmarried, on July 9, 1772, aged eighty-five. Mr. Thomas Cromwell, lately in the Eaſt Indies, and Mr. Thomas Cromwell, an attorney at Million Bank, late reſident of Budge-row, Watling-ſtreet, ſons of Mr. Thomas Cromwell, of Snow-hill, and the protector's great grandſons, were the laſt ſurvivors of his male line.

The induſtry and commerce of England were extremely increaſed during the peaceable part of Charles the Firſt's reign. The Engliſh poſſeſſed almoſt the ſole trade with Spain; twenty thouſand pieces of cloth were annually ſent to Turky; and the trade to Guinea and the Eaſt Indies became conſiderable. Commerce received ſome check from the civil wars; but ſoon recovered after the eſtabliſhment of the commonwealth. The war with the Dutch greatly promoted the trade of England; but that with Spain was equally prejudicial. The prevalence of the principles of liberty, which brought mankind more upon a level, engaged the country gentlemen to bind their ſons apprentices to merchants, and commerce has been ever ſince more honourable in England, than in any other kingdom in Europe. The excluſive companies, by which trade had been confined by royal charters, were never, during the commonwealth, expreſsly aboliſhed by any ordinance of parliament: but no regard being paid to the prerogative whence thoſe charters were derived, theſe monopolies were gradually invaded; and commerce increaſed with the increaſe of liberty. Money became more plentiful; and in 1650, intereſt was reduced to ſix per cent. From 1619 to 1638, there had been coined ſix million nine hundred thouſand and forty-two pounds, and from 1638 to 1657, the coinage amounted to ſeven million ſeven hundred and thirty-three thouſand five hundred and twenty-one pounds.

The Poſt-houſe was farmed at ten thouſand pounds a year in 1653, which was eſteemed a conſiderable ſum for the three kingdoms: but letters paid then only about half the preſent poſtage.

About the year 1660, chocolate, tea, and coffee were alſo introduced; and about the ſame time aſparagus, cauliflowers, artichokes, and a variety of ſallads, were introduced into England.

In this reign alſo the colony of New England was founded by the puritans, who fled thither from the rigorous perſecutions of Laud. For a like reaſon the catholics, who afterwards found themſelves expoſed to many hardſhips, went over in great numbers to America, and ſettled the colony of Maryland.

Previous to the civil wars, both learning and the fine arts were favoured at court, and a good taſte began to prevail in the nation. Charles I. loved pictures; was a judge of painting, and ſometimes handled the pencil himſelf. The pieces of foreign maſters were bought up at a vaſt price; and from the emulation between Charles I. and Philip IV. of Spain, the value of pictures doubled in Europe. Many eminent maſters ſettled in England, and were encouraged at court. Architecture alſo flouriſhed; and Inigo Jones was maſter of the king's buildings. Notwithſtanding the narrow revenue of Charles I. he lived in ſuch magnificence, that he poſſeſſed twenty-four palaces, all of them elegantly and compleatly furniſhed. Charles was, however, far from encouraging men of letters.

As civil wars, founded on principles of liberty, preſent noble and intereſting objects to the mind, they amply compenſate for that tranquillity of which they bereave the muſes. Hence the ſpeeches of the parliamentary orators are much ſuperior to what any former age had produced in England; and the force and compaſs of the Engliſh language, was then firſt put to trial. And hence this period abounds with the moſt admirable authors.

John Milton, who was born on the ninth of December, 1608, was diſtinguiſhed by being the moſt ſublime poet who wrote either in our own, or in any other language, Homer and Taſſo not excepted. His Paradiſe Loſt not only ſurpaſſed all the performances of his contemporaries, though it was wrote during a ſtate of blindneſs, danger, and old age, but is ſtill admired as an inimitable effort of the human mind. His L'Allegro and Il Penſeroſo, and alſo his Comus, are extremely beautiful, and his other poems abound with beauties. Moſt of his proſe works are in Latin, and are diſtinguiſhed by the energy and clearneſs of his arguments.

The other poets of theſe times are not entitled to the ſame praiſe; Waller, the firſt refiner of the Engliſh tongue, is indeed, diſtinguiſhed by his gaiety, wit, and ingenuity; but his performances abound with many faults, and contain but feeble beauties.

Cowley, whoſe works were more praiſed and admired during his life time; and more celebrated after his death, than thoſe of the great Milton, had little ear for harmony; and his verſes are only known to be ſuch by the rhyme which terminates them. His numbers are rugged and untuneable; however, great ingenuity and vigour of thought are ſometimes apparent.

Sir John Denham is chiefly diſtinguiſhed by his Cooper's hill, his principal performance, which has a loftineſs and vigour, ſuperior to that of any poet who wrote before him in rhyme: but he too is much inferior to the poets who ſucceeded him.

In reſpect to the proſe writers, none was more celebrated both abroad and at home than Hobbes. Clearneſs and propriety of ſtile are the chief excellencies of his writings: but being an enemy to religion, his politics are only fitted to promote tyranny, and his ethics to encourage licentiouſneſs.

Harvey, an admirable phyſician and anatomiſt, made a capital diſcovery in one of the moſt important branches of ſcience; and had the happineſs of eſtabliſhing his theory on the circulation of the blood, upon proofs the moſt ſolid and convincing.

Among the reſt, the works of Nevil, Sydney, and Harrington, are performances which excel even the ancient claſſics on policy; and in the character of Andrew Marvel, are allowed to be united, in an exalted degree, the patriot, the legiſlator, and the wit.

In the courſe of the reign of Charles I. and in the hiſtory of the commonwealth, we have ſpoke largely of the ſeveral religious ſects which at that time diſtinguiſhed themſelves; particularly the preſbyterians. About the beginning of this century, one Brown, a puritan miniſter, having had a quarrel with ſome of his brethren, left them, and the perſecution in England againſt theſe people being violent, Brown went over to Holland, where he formed a new ſect, ſince called independents, becauſe that each congregation refuſes to have any dependence either on biſhops or preſbyteries. But the quakers being enemies to war, made no figure in public tranſactions, and were therefore not mentioned: but being too conſiderable, and too ſingular a ſect to be omitted, we ſhall give an impartial account of them here, and ſhall be more particular as the generality of hiſtorians have ſtrangely miſrepreſented them.

George Fox was the founder of this ſect, who in the reign of king Charles I. preached with ſuch fervour againſt the vices of the times, that his hearers frequently burſt into tears, and trembled, whence they in deriſion were called quakers, but they, as a term of mutual love, ſtiled themſelves Friends. As to their religious ſentiments, they ſay, that reaſon is the gift of God to man, as a light and direction to him in this world; that the Old and New Teſtament contain a revelation of the will of God to man, through the influence of the Spirit of truth, which directed the penman in the writing of it, and that a ray of the ſame light or Spirit of truth, ſtill dwells within the true Chriſtian of every denomination, as a witneſs to his mind of theſe truths, and a guide into all eſſential truths; and that theſe three evidences of the ſupreme Being, right reaſon, eternal revelation, and the Spirit of truth, or the inward witneſs, cannot poſſibly, in the nature of things, be at all contradictory to each other, all ſpringing from one and the ſame unchangeable fountain, God himſelf. They do not deny the Trinity; but believe, that the Father, the Word, and Spirit are truly and properly one; but they are very tender of quitting ſcripture terms for thoſe of the ſchoolmen, judging, that a curious enquiry into this ſubject tends little to godlineſs and leſs to peace. They have no regular clergy, but permit ſuch as are approved of by the body for their piety, to adminiſter advice to the people without reſpect to ſex or circumſtances, whether acquainted with human literature or not, and that without any fee or reward whatſoever, but what ariſes from an honeſt conſcientious diſcharge of their duty: for they are perſuaded, that purity of heart, and humility of mind, are far more eſſential qualifications for that holy office, than the higheſt attainments in human literature, or the moſt extenſive acquaintance with arts and ſciences.

As to women's preaching, they believe it to be the practice of the primitive times, from the advice of the apoſtle, 1 Cor. xi. 5. where he ſays, "Every woman that prayeth or propheſieth with her head uncovered, diſhonoureth her head." In which epiſtle alſo the apoſtle gives directions to the women how to behave when they propheſied; and what he means by propheſying, he himſelf explains in the ſame epiſtle, where he ſaith, "He that propheſieth, ſpeaketh unto men to edification, and exhortation and comfort, and he that propheſieth, edifieth the church."

Contrary to the general opinion of Chriſtians, they believe neither baptiſm nor the Lord's-ſupper, to be of perpetual obligation; but that they were intended only for the infancy of the church, when the myſteries of truth lay concealed in figures and ſhadows, and obſerve, that it is ſufficient to them with reſpect to water baptiſm, that Jeſus never uſed it, and that it was no part of St. Paul's commiſſion. Hence they alledge, that truly feeling in themſelves, the very thing ſignified by outward water, bread and wine, they leave them off, as fulfilled in Chriſt, who is in them the hope of their glory: and henceforth they have but one Lord, one faith, one baptiſm, one bread, and but one cup of bleſſings; and that is the new wine of the kingdom of God, which is within.

They think thoſe words of Chriſt, "Swear not at all," amount to a prohibition of ſolemn, as well as profane ſwearing; and the government, accepting their ſolemn affirmation inſtead of an oath, they readily ſubmit to the ſame puniſhment that is due by law to perjury, in caſe of untruth.

They diſapprove of paying of tithes, and church rates, which they conſider as unſcriptural, and inconſiſtent with the goſpel diſpenſation, though this frequently expoſes them to very vexatious and expenſive proſecutions. However, when the miniſter or others ſeize for theſe dues, they make no oppoſition.

They are zealous advocates for liberty of conſcience in thoſe who differ ever ſo widely in opinion from themſelves, and are enemies to all perſecution for religion, agreeable to the fourteenth propoſition in Barclay's Apology, which affirms, that "the power of the civil magiſtrate doth not extend to matters purely religious, and pertaining to conſcience."

They object to war, as inconſiſtent with the nature and perfection of the Chriſtian religion, which moſt eminently conſiſts in peace, love, and the forgiveneſs of our enemies, believing that Chriſt, the bleſſed ſhepherd of his flock, will ever preſerve the diſciples of his peaceable and forgiving doctrine, and faithful followers of his meekneſs.

In order to prevent pride and extravagance, the quakers think it beſt to keep nearly to one plain, neat, and decent habit, in their apparel: thinking that a deſire after gaiety and new faſhions, leads to the neglect of what is more valuable, "the inward adorning of a meek and quiet ſpirit, which, in the ſight of God, is of great price." They alſo look upon mourning habits as no better than diſguiſed pride, frequently uſed where there is no real ſorrow: eſteeming the moſt certain token of reſpect towards their departed friends, is to love and cheriſh thoſe whom they loved, and by their whole deportment to demonſtrate, that they really revere their memory. For the like reaſons, they diſapprove of all coſtly furniture of houſes, luxurious tables, ſports, plays, and drinking healths; which laſt has an evident tendency to inebriety and animoſity.

They believe magiſtracy to be an ordinance of God, and that he that ruleth well is worthy of double honour, and deſerves to be much valued and eſteemed; and though they do not pull off their hats, or uſe forms of ſalutation, they treat their ſuperiors with a modeſt and awful diſtance, and all men with ſerioufneſs and gentleneſs. This, they ſay, is truly honouring of government and governors, other ceremonies being mere empty titles, ſervile cringing and unmeaning forms of ſalutation, which they deſpiſe.

As a proof that they love order and good government, they carefully practiſe it amongſt themſelves. Their monthly meetings in the country are often compoſed of ſeveral ſingle congregations, called particular meetings: theſe particular meetings ſend repreſentatives to the monthly meeting, who are to report the ſtate and exigencies of their meetings, and bring back inſtructions to their next preparative meeting, as it is called, from their preparing, collecting, and putting the affairs of each particular meeting in fit order to be laid before the next monthly meeting. In every particular meeting, two or more of the moſt elderly, ſenſible, and exemplary men, are generally appointed to overſee the flock, to admoniſh and reprove, on occaſion, who are therefore called elders. Before they enter upon buſineſs at the monthly meetings, they commonly ſit ſome time in ſolemn meditation, and ſometimes one or more of their miniſters have a ſeaſonalbe word of exhortation to the congregation. When worſhip is concluded, after the minutes of the laſt monthly meeting are conſidered, every particular meeting is called upon, to declare their particular exigencies, which are alſo duly conſidered. The general heads of the buſineſs of monthly meetings, are the poor, orderly walking, integrity to their profeſſion, births, marriages, burials, ſufferings, certificates, &c. &c.

They generally hold their quarterly meetings at the capital of the county: Theſe conſiſt of the repreſentatives from their ſeveral monthly meetings, who are to give an account of the ſtate of thoſe meetings; after which the exigencies of every monthly meeting are duly conſidered, and proper expedients provided. The yearly meeting is always held at London in Whitſun-week, for no other reaſon, than becauſe it is a well known and ſuitable time of the year for the brethren to come together from all parts. This meeting is compoſed of the country repreſentatives ſent from the quarterly meetings, city and country correſpondents and miniſters, with deputies from Ireland and Scotland. Here the reports of the repreſentatives ſhew the ſtate of the ſociety throughout the world, and proper meaſures are concerted for every emergency. This is eſteemed a moſt edifying time, becauſe it generally brings to the city their moſt eminent miniſters and elders from all parts. Their meeting is concluded with a printed epiſtle, ſetting forth the ſtate of the ſociety, with ſome ſeaſonable advice; the general paragraphs of which are, parents and maſters to excite their families to the diligent reading of the Holy ſcriptures; that they diligently attend the meetings for worſhip; that they wait upon the Lord in ſilence, in order to have a true reliſh and ſavour of the miniſtry of thoſe who are rightly concerned by the ſame ſpirit, to labour in word and doctrine amongſt them; that they maintain their Chriſtian teſtimony againſt tithes, and forced maintenance of miniſters; that they be careful not to defraud the king of his cuſtoms, duties, or exciſe, and to avoid dealing in goods ſuſpected to be run; that a ſpirit of love and humility may more and more diffuſe itſelf amonſt them, and influence the hearts of all; they are exhorted to peace, and mutual forgiveneſs, and right conduct towards others. Diſorderly walkers and backſliders are dealt with according to the nature of the caſe. If neither private admonition, nor the admonition of the particular meeting, has the deſired effect, to reclaim the offender, he is complained of to the monthly meeting, where again he is intreated in love to mend his ways. But if no ſufficient tokens of amendment appear in ſome months after, or that the offence be groſs, the particular meeting he belongs to, is uſually directed to draw up a teſtimony of denial againſt him, and preſent it to the next monthly meeting; which, when approved of, is generally ſigned by the clerk in behalf of the meeting. Theſe papers of denial are to be read in the meeting the defaulter belongs to, at the concluſion of their worſhip; and copies thereof diſperſed, as the occaſion may require, that the public may be ſatisfied, that the ſociety by no means approves of the conduct of ſuch unworthy men. The following is a copy of one againſt a perſon for defrauding his creditors: "Since this moral precept of our Lord, to do by others as we would be done unto, is ſuch a main part of Chriſtianity, as without the due obſervation thereof, all the moſt ſpecious ſhew of religion will avail us nothing: it becomes the indiſpenſible duty of Chriſtians, in all ages, as much as in them lies, to ſee that their aſſemblies are compoſed of ſuch men, whoſe upright carriage, in their outward dealings, demonſtrates, that they are ſincere diſciples of Jeſus Chriſt. And inaſmuch as we find, on due enquiry and examination, that M. N. has been diſregardful of this plain and principal law of our divine lawgiver, by not delivering up his effects amongſt his creditors in due time, to their great injury, and very great diſcontent, as the waſte of his ſubſtance was entirely owing to careleſſneſs and extravagancy; which conduct he perfectly knew was alſo quite contrary to the good inſtructions and wholeſome diſcipline, ſo piouſly and wiſely recommended and ſettled by our worthy elders now at reſt. We, therefore, from a juſt abhorrence of ſuch unrighteouſneſs, hereby declare, that henceforth we do not account him a member of our Chriſtian church, until he ſhew ſuch tokens of repentance, as ſhall bear due proportion to his offence, which we ſincerely hope."

From the monthly meeting to the quarterly meeting, there lies an appeal, and from this to the yearly meeting; for if a man be denied by a monthly meeting, either for diſorderly walking, or on civil caſes, or not ſubmitting matters in difference with another to arbitration; but will, without conſent of the meeting, go to law, or, if an award be made, and one of the parties will not abide by it, in ſuch like caſes the perſon who thinks himſelf aggrieved by the judgment of the ſubordinate meetings, has a right to appeal to the yearly meeting at London, where the caſe comes before a committee of twelve, which is always a changeable committee, and in which all the counties take their turn; the repreſentatives of that county, againſt whom an appeal lies, being excluded. If either party intimate a diſſatisfaction with what the committee has done, the caſe is again conſidered either before a large committee, or the whole meeting, whoſe judgment makes the final deciſion.

As ſoon as two perſons declare their intentions of marriage before a monthly meeting, theſe queſtions are put: "Are you clear of all others, and have you the conſent of your parents or friends concerned?" To which, if they cannot anſwer in the affirmative, an entire ſtop is put to their proceedings. And, however full in the affirmative their anſwer may be, their parents muſt either perſonally, or by a duly witneſſed certificate, confirm their anſwer. And the meeting alſo frequently appoints two men and two women, to make due enquiry concerning their clearneſs from all others, and make report thereof to the next monthly meeting, when, if no ſufficient reaſon appears to the contrary, they have conſent to proceed, by appointing a meeting for the ſolemnization of their marriage when they pleaſe; and two perſons are nominated to attend it, to ſee that good order be kept, and make report to the next monthly meeting of every particular.

The day of marriage being appointed, they uſually ſit in the moſt conſpicuous place of the meeting, with their relations and friends about them. After ſome time for ſolemn meditation on the important contract they are going to enter into with each other, and, perhaps, after a ſeaſonable exhortation and prayer by one or more of their miniſters, they ſtand up, and taking each other by the hand, in a ſolemn manner the man audibly declares to this purpoſe: "Friends, in the fear of the Lord, and in the preſence of this aſſembly, whom I deſire to be my witneſſes, I take this my friend, M. N. to be my wife, promiſing, through divine aſſiſtance, to be unto her a loving and faithful huſband, till death ſeparate us." Then the woman makes the like declaration. After which one audibly reads a certificate, ſetting forth the aforeſaid orderly proceedings of this couple at the monthly meetings, and the ſolemn words of the marriage contract; to which the new married people ſet their hands firſt, and then (as witneſſes) their near relations and friends, with as many of the congregation as pleaſe. The original belongs to the bride and bridegroom; but a true copy is to be regiſtered in the monthly meeting books. Parents name their own children; and, at London, they have a printed certificate, ſetting forth the names of the parents and child, with the time of its birth, which is ſigned by the midwife, and ſome of the company preſent; which certificate is filed in the proper meeting, and alſo a fair copy entered into the book of births. Their burials are alſo regiſtered with ſimilar exactneſs.

It is cuſtomary in conducting a funeral, except the inconvenience be too great, to convey the body to a meeting houſe, where probably ſome of their miniſters preach to the congregation. After which the corpſe, which is always laid in a plain coffin, is generally carried to the grave, by ſuch as come to pay their laſt office of love to their departed friend. At the ground, the corpſe being ſet down by the grave-ſide, in ſolemn ſilence they pauſe a while before they inter it, that the minds of the ſpectators may be the more deeply touched with a ſenſe of their approaching exit, and their future ſtate: ſometimes a miniſter takes this opportunity of repeating his exhortations, and giving the auditory ſome ſeaſonable advice.

On the twenty-ninth of May 1660, Charles II. aſcended the throne, in the thirtieth year of his age, amidſt an exceſs of joy that introduced an almoſt univerſal diſſoluteneſs of manners, which being encouraged by the example of the king and his courtiers, rapidly led from the fanaticiſm of former times, to the oppoſite extreme of licentiouſneſs and immorality. Being accuſtomed, during his exile, to live among his courtiers rather like a companion than a ſovereign prince, he retained the ſame open affability while on the throne; and appearing totally void of reſentment, from the natural careleſſneſs of his temper, he ſeemed to enſure pardon to his bitter enemies; and to allow thoſe who had moſt violently oppoſed him, to hope for favour. His firſt care was to ſelect a council, partly from the leaders of the Preſbyterian party, and partly from among the royaliſts. The earl of Mancheſter was appointed lord chamberlain; lord Say had the privy-ſeal; Anneſley was created earl of Angleſea; Aſhley Cowper, and Denzil Hollis, were advanced to the dignity of barons; general Monk was created earl of Albemarle, and admiral Montague, earl of Sandwich. Theſe were deemed leaders of the Preſbyterian party; and of the royaliſts, Sir Edward Nicholas, and Sir William Maurice, were appointed ſecretaries of ſtate; and Sir Edward Hyde, who was advanced to the dignity of the earldom of Clarendon, received the office of chancellor.

Charles had been reſtored by an aſſembly, which had been ſummoned by a writ, when the government was under the form of a commonwealth; and this ſummons ran in the name of the "Keepers of the liberties of England." After the arrival of Charles, it aſſumed the name of a convention; but the king going to the houſe, gave his aſſent to an act for changing the convention into a parliament. An act of indemnity and oblivion being depending, Charles went in perſon to the houſe of lords to haſten the paſſing it, agreeable to a declaration he had made at Breda. This bill received the royal aſſent on the twenty-ninth of Auguſt; but there were excepted out of it the judges of the late king, and others, who had been materially concerned in his death. Twenty-five of thoſe perſons were dead, whoſe eſtates were confiſcated; nineteen had made their eſcape (of whom Ludlow was one) who were afterwards attainted; ſeven were thought worthy of the king's mercy; and twenty-nine were tried in October, and condemned to die; but of theſe, nineteen, who had ſurrendered themſelves, were ſpared as to life, but reſerved for other puniſhments, as impriſonment, baniſhment, and confiſcation of eſtate; ſo that only ten were executed at this time, namely, major-general Harriſon Carew, Cook, Scot, Clement, Scrope, Jones, and Hugh Peters, at Charing-croſs, and Hacker and Axtel at Tyburn; all juſtifying what they had done to the laſt, and looking upon themſelves as martyrs. Some time after, Corbet, Okey, and Barkſtead, who had made their eſcape, were brought from Holland to England and executed. Sir Henry Vane was likewiſe tried, condemned, and beheaded on Tower-hill; but Lambert, who was condemned at the ſame time, was impriſoned for life in the iſland of Guernſey. When the above act of indemnity was paſſed, the king gave the royal aſſent to an act for a perpetual anniverſary thankſgiving, on the twenty-ninth of May; and ſoon afterwards the commons voted one million two hundred thouſand pounds for the ordinary expences of government. At this time died of the ſmall-pox, Henry, duke of Glouceſter, a young prince, of whoſe abilities and virtues the higheſt expectations had been formed. Immediately after the adjournment of parliament, the king iſſued a proclamation, commiſſioning a number of learned divines to review and alter the liturgy; and by the ſame proclamation, the biſhops were directed to exerciſe their ſpiritual juriſdiction, in the ſame manner as formerly uſed in the church of England: nine biſhops who were ſtill living, were reſtored; and Reynolds, Calamy, Baxter, Manton, Bates, and Bowles, all Preſbyterian miniſters of eminence, were offered biſhoprics and deaneries; but they had all ſpirit enough to refuſe the temptation except Reynolds, who was made biſhop of Norwich. In October, the princeſs dowager of Orange came to England, to congratulate her brother on his reſtoration; and in the following month arrived the queen-mother, who brought with her the princeſs Henrietta, her youngeſt daughter, who was married to the duke of Orleans by the king's conſent. In December the parliament was diſſolved, when the king made very grateful acknowledgments for their affectionate regard to his intereſt; and the chancellor made a ſpeech, recommending the ſettlement of the militia; hinting, that a conſpiracy had been formed for ſeizing Windſor, Whitehall, and the Tower of London; and he affirmed, that "Many diſbanded officers and republicans were concerned in this deſign; and that their intention was to raiſe an inſurrection in the weſt, with general Ludlow as their leader."

A. D. 1661.

At this time a Thomas Venner, an enthuſiaſt, and one of thoſe diſtinguiſhed by the name of fifth-monarchy-men, who expected the perſonal reign of Chriſt upon earth, being attended by about ſixty perſons of his own perſuaſion, ruſhed into the ſtreet, and fought deſperately with the city trained-bands; nor did they yield, till a party of horſe and foot were ſent againſt them, and ſeveral had been killed on both ſides. Venner, and ſixteen of his aſſociates, were apprehended, tried, and executed; declaring, that if they were deceived, they were deceived by the Lord.

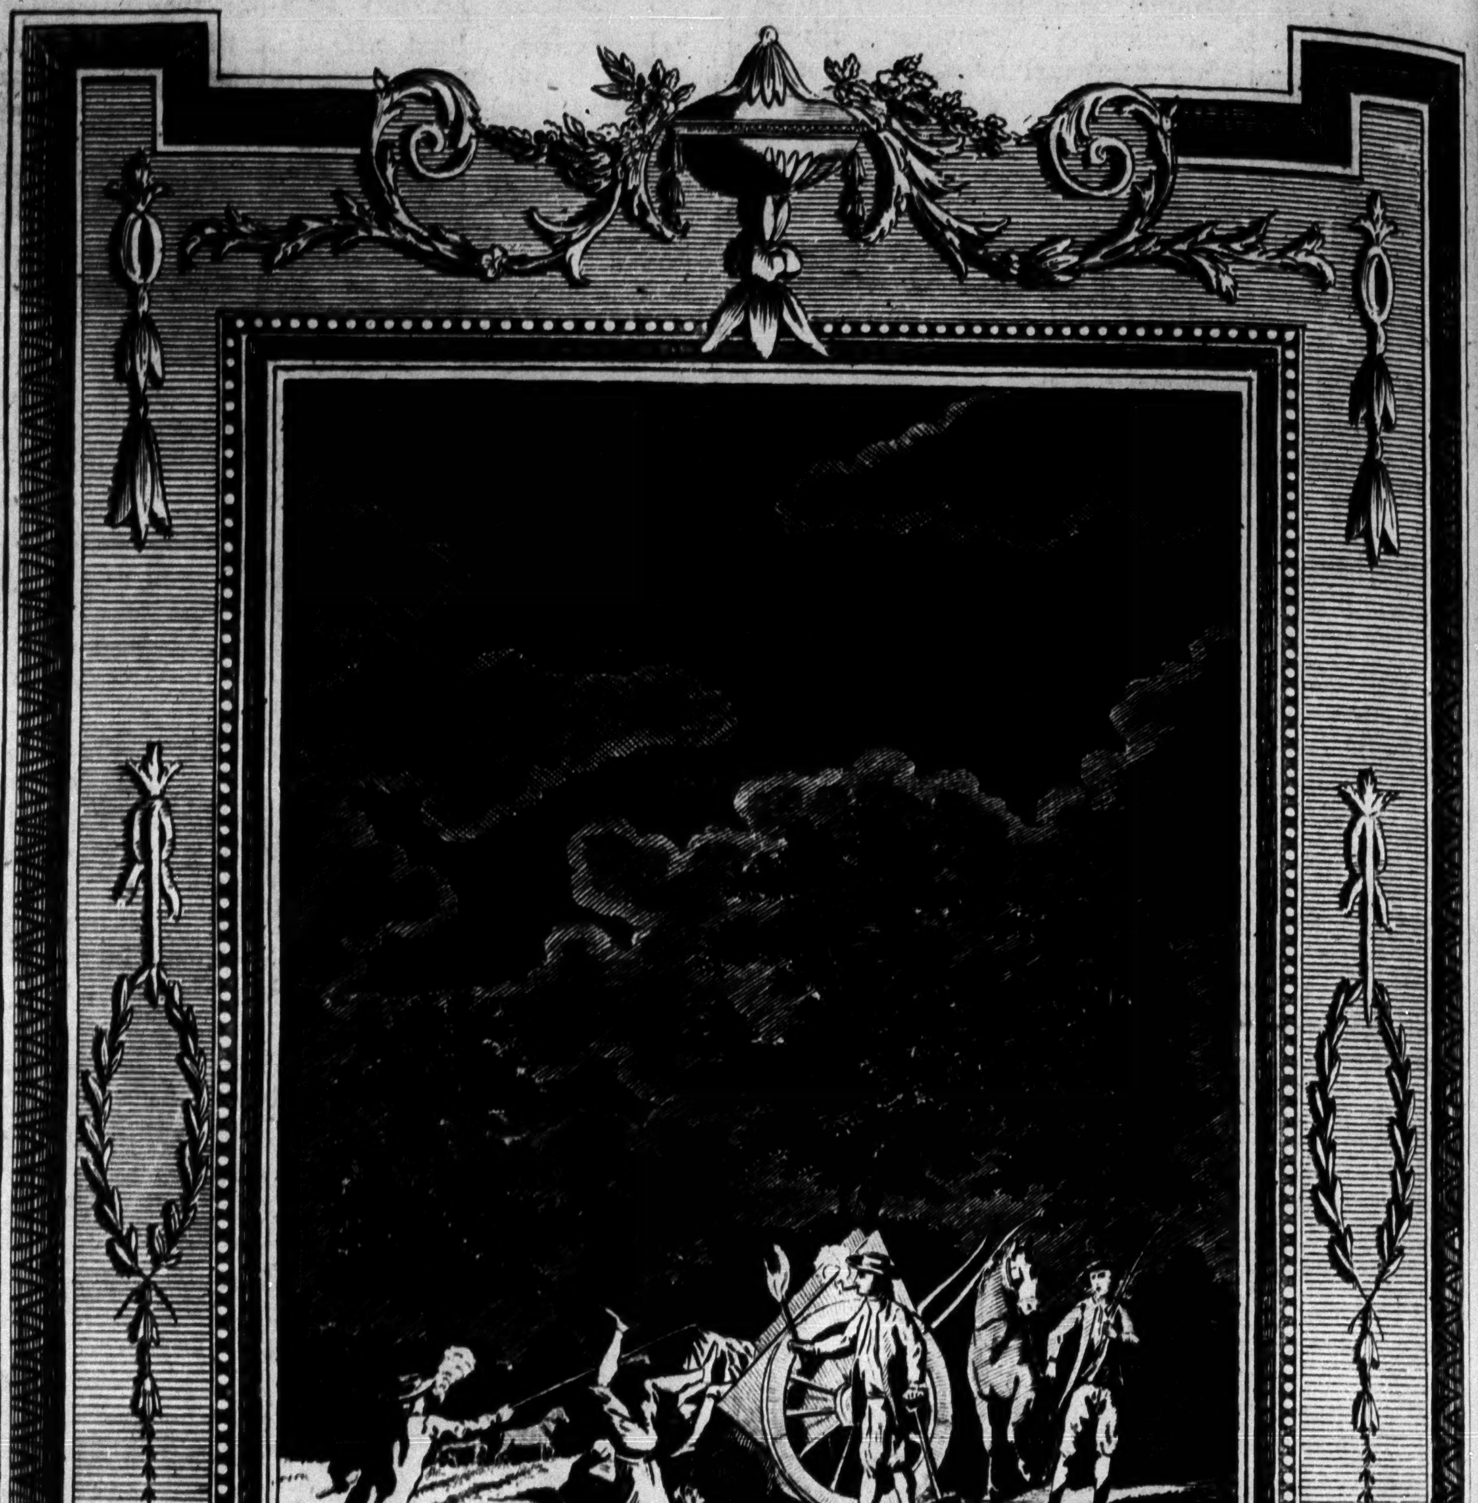
Charles now took the affairs of Scotland into conſideration, and orders were given to diſband the troops, and demoliſh the forts in that kingdom. Epiſcopacy was likewiſe reſtored in that kingdom; and the Scots parliament being devoted to the intereſt of the court, "Abrogated the ſolemn league and covenant, that idol of the majority of the Scots nation, and made ſeveral other acts in favour of the king, and againſt the Preſbyterians." On the twenty-third of April his majeſty was crowned with great magnificence, and on the meeting of parliament, he recommended two bills for confirming the act of indemnity: he likewiſe acquainted the houſe with his intention of marrying the Infanta of Portugal, the match having been already determined on by the advice of his council. Sir Edward Turner being choſen ſpeaker, the houſe paſſed an "Act for the ſecurity of the king's perſon and government;" by which it was conſtituted "High treaſon, to intend or deviſe his impriſonment or dethronement: to call him a papiſt, or to endeavour by ſpeech or writing, to deprive him of the affections of his ſubjects, was declared puniſhable, with excluſion from all offices, eccleſiaſtical, civil, or military."

This parliament annulled the act for excluding biſhops from ſitting in the houſe, and declared that the power of the militia was veſted in the king alone. They likewiſe empowered his majeſty to diſpoſe of all the land forces, and then both houſes were adjourned, after receiving the king's thanks for their zeal and loyalty. The cavaliers now made great complaints, that Charles had leſt them unprovided for, while the act of indemnity allowed the quiet poſſeſſion of all their wealth to thoſe who had proſecuted the royaliſts with the utmoſt rigour. To counteract the effects of theſe complaints, the miniſtry cauſed it to be reported, that plots and conſpiracies were formed againſt the king and government. This was done to inflame the public againſt the nonconformiſts, the alledged authors of the pretended conſpiracies. The king, the earl of Clarendon, and a majority of both houſe, were enemies to theſe diſſenters from the eſtabliſhed church, and deſirous to humble them by every means in their power. The parliament having aſſembled in November, petitioned the king to iſſue his proclamation, that all reduced officers and ſoldiers ſhould depart to the diſtance of twenty miles from London: and the prayer of this petition being complied with, a vote paſſed for granting twelve hundred thouſand pounds for the immediate uſe of his Majeſty.

A. D. 1662. On the firſt of March the king ſent for the commons to attend him at Whitehall, where he charged them with having been neglectful in the adjuſtment of the revenue: he hinted, that a republican party ſtill ſubſiſted; declared his warm attachment to the church of England; and gave his aſſent to an "Act for eſtabliſhing uniformity in public worſhip, and in the adminiſtration of the ſacrament." The marriage of Charles with Catherine, Infanta of Portugal, was celebrated on the twenty-firſt of May, in a moſt ſplendid manner. This was generally conſidered as a mere match of convenience, for the lady had not any perſonal charms to attract the notice of Charles; but ſhe poſſeſſed what he deemed a full equivalent, a fortune of three hundred thouſand pounds, excluſive of the fortreſs of Tangier in Africa, and Bombay in the Eaſt Indies. About this time Vane was indicted for aſſiſting Cromwell in obtaining the protectorſhip, after the death of the late king. He made an admirable defence, pleading, that he had only acted in obedience to an eſtabliſhed authority; and that if he was guilty the whole kingdom muſt be involved in his crime. He called to the recollection of the court, the violent perſecution he had ſuffered for his firſt oppoſition to Cromwell; and ſaid, that "Though it had been in his power to eſcape from his enemies at the reſtoration, he choſe rather to ſtay, and give teſtimony to the cauſe of liberty, which he had eſpouſed." His oratory, however, had no effect; he was ſentenced to death, according to the ſtrict letter of the law. When conducted to the ſcaffold, he began to addreſs the ſurrounding multitude, but his voice was drowned by the clangor of drums and trumpets; and though he was by nature of a timid diſpoſition, yet he ſubmitted to his fate with a fortitude, that did honour to thoſe ſentiments of liberty by which he had been inſpired. Lambert alſo was condemned, but reprieved. He was ſentenced to ſpend the remainder of his days in the iſland of Guernſey, where he lived in a degree of content that did honour to his good ſenſe and philoſophy; "forgetting his former ſchemes of ambition, as well as forgotten by the world." He ſurvived his condemnation ſix and thirty years. The clergy being obliged, by the act of uniformity, to ſubſcribe to the articles of the church, or reſign their livings, on St. Bartholomew's day no leſs than two thouſand miniſters, moſt of them of the Preſbyterian perſuaſion, actually reſigned their livings, and ſacrificed their intereſts to their religious principles.

A. D. 1663. Theſe miniſters preſented a petition to the king in council, praying an exemption from the penalties inſerted in that act. The king complied with their requeſt, but at the ſame time granted a ſimilar indulgence to the Roman catholics. The earl of Briſtol, who, during his exile, had embraced the Roman catholic religion, became now the declared opponent of the earl of Clarendon, whom he ridiculed in the higheſt degree, and did every thing in his power to render that miniſter obnoxious to the king; and there were others equally ready to traduce the earl; among the reſt, the ducheſs of Cleveland, the king's favourite miſtreſs, exerted all her influence to ruin Clarendon in the king's opinion, becauſe the earl had refuſed to gratify her ambition, or to flatter her vanity. Secretary Nicholas, the warm friend of Clarendon, was diſplaced, and his office filled by Sir Henry Bennet, who was generally deemed a Roman catholic. It is a ſtain on the reputation of Charles, that he was remarkably ungrateful to thoſe who had been moſt zealous in the ſervice of his father and himſelf, many of whom had been reduced to beggary by their attachment to the royal cauſe: there are, however, ſome exceptions in his favour; for he granted a few penſions to the family of Penderell, to Mrs. Land, and others, who had aſſiſted in preſerving him after the battle of Worceſter; ſtill, however, the majority of the royaliſts were much diſtreſſed, while their wretched circumſtances were rendered more diſagreeable, by obſerving, that almoſt all places of power and profit were in poſſeſſion of the oppoſite party. The revenue of Charles was not very conſiderable, and his extravagance kept him always poor; for notwithſtanding the frequent ſupplies that were voted him, his treaſury was ſtill empty, and his debts were continually increaſing, ſo that Charles at length ſold Dunkirk to the French for five millions of livres; a circumſtance ſeverely reflected on at the time, and which has entailed diſhonour on his memory. The earl of Clarendon had, in a conſiderable degree, loſt his ſovereign's eſteem and confidence; but Charles, in gratitude for the ſervices he had received from that nobleman, continued him in the chancellorſhip, and conferred upon him ſome ſlight favours; in conſequence of which the papiſts became apprehenſive that he would be reſtored to that reputation and power, of which he had been ſo lately deprived through their contrivances and intrigues. The earl of Briſtol impeached the chancellor of high treaſon; and the ill-founded and inconſiſtent accuſation alledged againſt him ſpecified, that he had endeavoured to fix the imputation of popery upon the king; promiſed to exert his influence in aboliſhing the penal laws againſt papiſts; vilified the ſacred character of his majeſty; adviſed the ſale of Dunkirk; ſcandalized the parliament; and embezzled the public treaſure. This accuſation the lords treated with the contempt it merited; and lord Briſtol was ſo ſenſible of the iniquity of his conduct in this affair, that for ſome time he was aſhamed to make a public appearance.

A. D. 1664. During the receſs, the parliament being now prorogued to the ſixteenth of March, the king and queen made a tour through the weſtern counties, and they were entertained with great pomp and magnificence by the univerſity of Oxford. In the king's abſence, the miniſtry diſcovered, that another conſpiracy had been projected, and that it was intended to ſurprize ſeveral towns in the north, and foment an univerſal rebellion.



The Manner of Burying the Dead at Holy Well Mount near London during the dreadful PLAGUE in the reign of CHARLES II. 1665. — By which upwards of One hundred Thousand Lives were swept away lion. This conſpiracy was ſet on foot by a number of obſcure fanatics and diſbanded ſoldiers, thirty of whom were condemned and executed. The idle project of theſe inſignificant people, furniſhed the king with a plea for demanding a repeal of the act for triennial parliaments. In a ſpeech to both houſes, his majeſty affirmed, that the government was expoſed to continual dangers, from the machinations of a number of diſaffected people; who claimed the right of aſſembling for the purpoſe of a new election, under the pretence that the parliament was diſſolved by virtue of the triennal act; and hence the houſes were induced to comply with the king's requiſition. They alſo paſſed a vote purporting, that the indignities offered to the Engliſh by the ſubjects of the United Provinces, had greatly interrupted the commerce of the kingdom, and an immediate war againſt the Dutch was now univerſally approved. Whereupon Downing, the Engliſh reſident in Holland, preſented a memorial to the States, particularizing the depredations the Hollanders had committed upon the Engliſh; and in the mean time Charles diſpatched a fleet of two and twenty ſail, under the command of Sir Robert Holmes, to the coaſt of Africa. The Admiral compelled the Dutch, who had oppoſed the attempts of the African company to eſtabliſh ſettlements on the coaſt of Guinea, to evacuate Cape Corſe, and took poſſeſſion of Cape Verde, and the iſland of Goree, together with three veſſels trading on that coaſt. A remonſtrance being ſent from Holland, complaining of the hoſtilities committed by the Engliſh, Charles pretended to be entirely ignorant of Holmes's enterprize; and in order to amuſe the States, he committed the admiral to the Tower, but in a ſhort time he was reſtored to freedom. Judging that the Engliſh court was not diſpoſed to yield to their applications for redreſs, the States ſent private orders to de Ruyter, to ſail to the coaſt of Guinea, and make repriſals upon the Engliſh. De Ruyter recovered all the places that had been lately ſeized by the enemy, except Cape Corſe; and, after ſeizing ſeveral Engliſh ſhips, directed his courſe towards the Weſt Indies, in the hope of being able to ſubdue Barbadoes; but this enterprize proved very unſucceſsful.

No ſupplies from the parliament being now received for proſecuting the war, the king by his own intereſt and credit, equipped a fleet; and by viſiting the dock-yards, and giving every poſſible encouragement to the workmen, the maritime power of England was ſoon in a very formidable ſtate. The city of London granted the king a loan of a hundred thouſand pounds, and the parliament, which aſſembled on the twenty-fourth of November, granted him a ſubſidy of two millions and a half, to be raiſed by quarterly payments. After this Charles publiſhed a declaration, enjoining his ſubjects to make repriſals upon all ſhips belonging to the States of Holland.

A. D. 1665. Beſides fireſhips and bomb-ketches, the Engliſh fleet was compoſed of one hundred and fourteen ſail, of which the duke of York was admiral, and prince Rupert, and the gallant earl of Sandwich had commiſſions under him. The Dutch armament, which was nearly of equal force, was under the command of Opdam, who received expreſs orders to give battle to the enemy. In the heat of the action, while Opdam, and the duke of York were engaged, the ſhip of the former blew up, and he, with all his crew periſhed. This circumſtance decided the fortune of the day; for the Dutch, whoſe ſpirits were depreſſed by the loſs of their commander, broke the line, and ſteered toward their own coaſt: their retreat being favoured by Van Tromp, ſon of the admiral of that name, who for ſome time ſuſtained the fight alone. In this engagement the Engliſh loſt only one ſhip, but the Dutch had nineteen ſunk and taken. During the whole action, the duke of York behaved with ſingular bravery and ſkill. In the heat of the action, the earl of Falmouth, lord Muſkerry, and Mr. Boyle, were killed by one ball, while they were ſtanding by the ſide of the duke, who was beſmeared with the blood and brains of thoſe gallant officers; but, notwithſtanding this, he ſtill kept his ſtation, and delivered his orders with his uſual calmneſs. The duke now became the object of univerſal admiration and eſteem; and as it was not expected that Charles would have iſſue by his queen, towards whom he had for ſome time behaved with the moſt perfect indifference, he was conſidered as the preſumptive heir to the throne. It having been reſolved by the king and council, that the duke ſhould not expoſe himſelf to the danger of a ſecond engagement, the command of the navy was given to the earl of Sandwich. Upon receiving information that a fleet of Dutch merchantmen were laying at anchor at Berghen, the king commanded Sandwich to ſail thither; but he diſpatched a part of his fleet for that ſervice, under the command of Sir Thomas Tiddeman, who attacked the enemy with remarkable bravery; but he was ſo reſolutely oppoſed, that he was obliged to retreat, after ſuſtaining conſiderable damage. Incenſed againſt the earl for having neglected to conduct this unſucceſsful expedition in perſon, the king revoked his commiſſion, and ſent him on an embaſſy to the court of Spain. At this time the plague raged for ſeveral weeks with great violence in London, where upwards of one hundred thouſand perſons fell ſacrifices to that dreadful malady. To avoid the contagion, the king reitred to Hampton-court, and proceeded from thence to Saliſbury; but finding that the infection had reached that city, he made Oxford his retreat.

An inſurrection againſt the States of the United Provinces, was now fomented by Barnard Van Galen, Biſhop of Munſter, in conſideration of a large ſubſidy from the Engliſh court. An army of twenty thouſand men being collected by this turbulent prelate, he made an incurſion into the province of Overyſſel, and reduced ſeveral places; but finding the ſubſidy from England was not regularly paid, and that the Dutch had received conſiderable reinforcements from the king of France, and the duke of Lunenburgh, he deemed it adviſeable to effect a compromiſe. The parliament which aſſembled at Oxford, allotted twelve hundred thouſand pounds to the ſupport of the war, and one hundred thouſand to the duke of York, as an acknowledgment for the eminent ſervices he had rendered the ſtate. A proclamation was now iſſued by his majeſty, commanding all nonjuring miniſters to remove, with their families, to the diſtance of twenty miles from their uſual places of reſidence. This command would have proved extremely afflicting to them, had not the munificence of their friends increaſed in proportion to the government's ſeverity.

A. D. 1666. War was now declared againſt France about the beginning of February, in conſequence of that power having eſpouſed the cauſe of the Dutch. Prince Rupert and the duke of Albemarle commanded the Engliſh fleet, as did de Ruyter and Van Tromp that of Holland. Notwithſtanding they were greatly inferior in point of ſtrength, the Engliſh bore down to give battle to the enemy, who upon their approach, cut their cables and made preparations for engaging. The battle was maintained with aſtoniſhing fury on both ſides; and both de Ruyter and Van Tromp were under the neceſſity of hoiſting their flags on board other ſhips, their own having ſuſtained ſuch injury, that it was momentarily expected they would ſink. One of the Dutch ſhips was blown up, and admiral Evertzen was killed by a cannon-ball. The van of the Engliſh, which was commanded by Sir William Berkeley, engaged the thickeſt of the enemy, and after an obſtinate reſiſtance, his ſhip was taken, and the gallant commander ſlain. Two of the Engliſh ſhips were loſt, notwithſtanding Albemarle exerted every poſſible endeavour to preſerve them; and, in ſhort, throughout the whole action, the duke diſplayed a degree of courage, perſeverance and activity, that were truly aſtoniſhing at his advanced period of life. Night coming on, the battle was ſuſpended, but on the following morning it was renewed with more impetuous fury. Tromp being in the moſt imminent danger, de Ruyter ſeaſonably came to his relief, and prevented his being taken by the enemy. During this action, the Dutch received a reinforcement of ſixteen ſhips; in conſequence of which Albemarle judged it prudent to retreat towards the coaſt of England, and he was followed by the triumphant enemy. On the third day, the duke ſent the diſabled ſhips a-head, remaining himſelf in the rear with eight and twenty ſhips, keeping ſuch a poſition as enabled him occaſionally to form a line a-ſtern, for the purpoſe of annoying the enemy. At two in the afernoon, Rupert's ſquadron coming within ſight of the duke, that commander, who was at that time within gun-ſhot of the enemy, bore up before the wind to form a junction with the reinforcement. In the morning of the fourth day the two fleets united, and bore down towards the enemy. A terrible battle enſued, which was maintained with aſtoniſhing vigour on both ſides, till the deciſion of victory was interrupted by a remarkably thick fog. The Engliſh firſt retreated into their harbours, and both parties erected a claim to conqueſt. Candour, however, muſt acknowledge, that the Dutch had a conſiderable advantage in this conteſt, though the Engliſh were not in any reſpect inferior to them either in point of bravery or ſkill. Ruyter having refitted his ſhips, that commander took his ſtation at the mouth of the Thames, in order that he might effect an eaſy junction with the French admiral, who was preparing to enter the channel. Albemarle and Rupert obſerving the motions of de Ruyter, they bore towards him, and an obſtinate battle enſued. Sir Thomas Allen, at the head of the white ſquadron, attacked the Dutch van, which he entirely defeated, after the three admirals who commanded it had been ſlain. Van Tromp and Sir Jeremy Smith, being engaged, the former, in the greateſt heat of the action, was ſuddenly ſeparated from de Ruyter and the main body of the fleet; but by what means this happened cannot be aſcertained. However, de Ruyter continued with uncommon reſolution and dexterity to fight the main body of the Engliſh till night interrupted the conteſt. Perceiving on the following day that the fleet commanded by Van Tromp was diſperſed, de Ruyter judged it prudent to retreat. The Engliſh hung for ſeveral hours upon the rear of the Dutch fleet, which, however, reached the ports of Holland; and this was entirely owing to the French admiral's courage and good conduct.

The Engliſh having now obtained the abſolute ſovereignty of the ocean, braved the Dutch in their own harbours. The duke of Albemarle diſpatched Holmes, with orders to avail himſelf of every opportunity of committing depredations upon the enemy; and he accordingly burnt in the river Ulye a hundred merchantmen, with two large men of war, under the convoy of which they were to ſail. After this enterprize, Holmes made a deſcent upon the iſland of Schelling, and ſet fire to the town of Brandaris, which was ſoon reduced to aſhes. On the ſecond of September, a moſt dreadful fire broke out at a baker's near London-bridge, about one in the morning, and the flames continued to rage with mercileſs fury for the ſpace of three days and three nights. This terrible conflagration proceeded from the bridge along the river to the Temple-church, and from the north-eaſt gate as far as Holborn-bridge, and it conſumed eighty-nine churches, Guildhall, the city gates, a great number of other public ſtructures, and thirteen thouſand two hundred dwelling houſes, and covered a track of ground meaſuring four hundred and thirty-ſix acres. The ſeaſon was remarkably dry when the fire happened, and an eaſt-wind blew with great violence, ſo that the progreſs of the flames could not be interrupted but by means of blowing up ſeveral houſes. Few believed this dreadful fire to have happened accidentally; and many circumſtances concurred to ſupport a contrary opinion. Some were of opinion, that the republicans were the authors of this terrible calamity: but the moſt univerſal idea was, that the city was fired by the papiſts; and they were accuſed of the crime, in the inſcription upon the monument, which was erected near London-bridge, in commemoration of the fire. James II. cauſed the inſcription to be expunged, but after the revolution it was reſtored. The city was rebuilt with all poſſible expedition, the new ſtreets were made wider than thoſe deſtroyed, whereby the metropolis was rendered not only handſomer than before, but much more healthy.

Neither the miſeries his ſubjects had experienced from this dreadful accident, nor the preceding calamity of the plague, could make any impreſſion on the mind of Charles, or divert him from the proſecution of the ruinous war in which he had engaged the nation. Accordingly, when the parliament reaſſembled, the king, in his ſpeech to both houſes, magnified the happy ſucceſs of his arms as if he had always been victorious; and concluded with aſſuring the commons, that the money granted for carrying on the war had proved deficient, and ſolicited a farther ſupply. The commons, who ſtill retained their liberal diſpoſitions, readily voted him one million eight hundred thouſand pounds. But at the ſame time the lower houſe, miſtruſting that the king was not ſo firmly attached to the proteſtant religion as they could wiſh, preſented an addreſs, praying that the laws againſt jeſuits and popiſh prieſts might be carried into execution. Charles, in return for the liberal ſupplies they had granted him, publiſhed a proclamation for baniſhing all popiſh prieſts and jeſuits out of the kingdom. But this proclamation, like thoſe of his father and grandfather on the ſame ſubject, was ſhamefully eluded by the connivance of the king and his courtiers. This conduct convinced the people, that the king had ſome ſecret attachment to popery, which he was either aſhamed or afraid to own. Whether theſe ſuſpicions had leſſened the king's popularity, is uncertain; but the commons were very dilatory in paſſing the money bill, which did not receive the royal aſſent till the cloſe of the year; notwithſtanding the king ſent ſeveral meſſages to the commons, requeſting them to finiſh that buſineſs with the utmoſt expedition.

A. D. 1667.

Though unaſſiſted, the Dutch defended themſelves with great vigour, and were every day improving in their military ſkill and preparations. Notwithſtanding their trade had ſuffered extremely, yet their extenſive credit enabled them to levy prodigious ſums: and while the Engliſh ſeamen loudly complained for want of pay, the Dutch mariners were regularly ſupplied with every thing. As two powerful kings now ſupported them, every place, from the extremity of Norway to the coaſt of Bayonne, was become hoſtile to the Engliſh. And Charles, neither fond of action, nor animated by any violent ambition, gladly ſought for means of reſtoring tranquillity to his people, who were heartily diſguſted with a war, which, joined with the plague and fire, had proved at once ſo fruitleſs and deſtructive. Charles therefore intimated to the States, his deſire of peace, upon reaſonable terms; and their anſwer was filled with the ſame amicable ſentiments. After ſome meſſages had paſſed between the belligerent powers, the conferences were opened at Breda, and the ſeveral parties concerned ſent thither their plenipotentiaries. The Engliſh propoſed that a ceſſation of hoſtilities ſhould immediately take place, and continue till the ſeveral points of diſpute ſhould be happily determined. But this offer was rejected by De Wit. That ſagacious and enterprizing miniſter had formed a deſign of ſtriking a blow, which he was perſuaded would have a greater effect in favour of his countrymen, than all the arguments that could be urged in the congreſs. De Wit, informed that Charles, depending on the ſucceſs of the conferences, and perſuaded that he had nothing to fear from the Dutch, had unmanned his fleet, and laid up all his large ſhips, ordered De Ruyter to ſail with a fleet of fifty men of war, in order to ſurprize the Engliſh while lulled in their dangerous ſecurity. De Ruyter executed his commiſſion with equal conduct and ſucceſs. On the eighth of June he entered the mouth of the Thames, and filled the capital with terror and confuſion. He then diſpatched his vice-admiral Van Ghent with ſome ſhips into the river Medway, who, by the favour of a freſh eaſterly wind, broke the chain which defended the entrance of that harbour, and burnt three large ſhips, called the Matthias, the Unity, and Charles the Fifth, all of them taken from the Dutch during the preſent war. He alſo ſeized the hull of the Royal Charles, and proceeding as far as Upnor caſtle, burnt the Royal Oak, the Loyal London, and the Great James, all capital ſhips. After this, falling down the Medway, he joined De Ruyter, who ſtill lay at the Nore. Nothing leſs was now expected in London, than that the enemy, in order to improve their ſucceſs, would ſail up the river Thames, and deſtroy all the merchant ſhips in that port, if not inſult the city itſelf. To prevent theſe misfortunes, thirteen ſhips were immediately ſunk at Woolwich, and four at Blackwall. Platforms of cannon were raiſed on the banks of the river, and every poſſible precaution taken to prevent the threatened aſſault. But De Ruyter, not chuſing to run too great riſks, weighed anchor, and ſailing to the weſtward, attempted to deſtroy the ſhips in the harbours of Portſmouth and Plymouth; at both which places he was repulſed with conſiderable loſs. The wind now changing to the weſtward, the Dutch admiral returned, and again entering the Thames, advanced as high as Tilbury fort, but ſoon found the Engliſh were now too well prepared for him to hope for any ſucceſs. He therefore ſtood immediately to ſea; but kept the coaſts of England in perpetual alarms, till he received intelligence that the peace was concluded. By this treaty Acadia was ceded to the French king, who agreed to reſtore St. Chriſtopher's, and ſome other iſlands he had taken in the Weſt Indies; while the two principal contracting parties retained the acquiſitions they had made during the hoſtilities. The colony of New York was the only advantage the Engliſh acquired from a war, in which the national character of bravery had ſhone with the greateſt luſtre, but where the miſconduct of the government had been equally ſtriking.

The king, as if born only for himſelf, being now freed from the troubles of the war, gave into every kind of licentiouſneſs, regardleſs of the ſufferings or cries of his people. His courtiers following his example, ſeemed to vie with each other in libertiniſm and debauchery. Irreligious wit, and obſcene raillery, triumphed in broad day; while decency, virtue, and morality, were obliged to hide their heads. One perſon only was left about the court, whoſe noble and virtuous qualities, added to his great authority, was ſtill a check upon the growing evil, and him they took care to remove. This was the great earl of Clarendon, lord high chancellor of England, the moſt diſcerning and upright magiſtrate; the moſt capable and faithful miniſter England had for a long time ſeen. The wide difference between the principles and practices of this great man, compared with thoſe of the ſovereign and his followers, ſoon brought him into diſgrace; but they did not dare to attack him openly, till they had poiſon'd the minds of the people by baſe inſinuations againſt him; the ſale of Dunkirk; the bad payment of the ſeamen; even the diſgrace at Chatham, and the ſhameful concluſion of the war, were, by their emiſſaries, imputed to the chancellor. Buckingham, a man of profligate morals, happy in his talent of ridicule, but expoſed in his own conduct to all the ridicule he threw on others, ſtill made the chancellor the object of his raillery, and gradually leſſened in the king that regard which he bore to his miniſter. When any difficulties aroſe, either for want of power or money, the blame was always caſt on him, whom it was believed had, at the reſtoration, checked all laviſh conceſſions to the king. But what perhaps touched Charles ſtill more was, his finding that Clarendon was an obſtacle to his pleaſure, as well as his ambition. Diſguſted with the perſon of the queen, and deſirous of having children, Charles had liſtened to propoſals for obtaining a divorce, on pretence either of her being pre-engaged to another, or of her having made a vow of chaſtity before her marriage. At the ſame time he was ſtimulated by his paſſion for Mrs. Stuart, daughter to a Scotch gentleman, a lady of great beauty, and whoſe virtue he had hitherto found impregnable: but Clarendon, fearful of the conſequences attending a diſputed title, and perhaps anxious for the ſucceſſion of his grand children, engaged the duke of Richmond to marry Mrs. Stuart, and by that means put a final period to the king's hopes. Charles was ſo highly offended at this action, that it is ſaid he never forgave the chancellor. Every thing being now ready for attacking the miniſter, and the parliament meeting on the tenth of October, the commons ſent up an impeachment againſt him to the houſe of lords, in which almoſt the only article that could admit of proof, was that of adviſing the ſale of Dunkirk; and even that meaſure, though the moſt exceptionable of all his counſels, was rather owing to a miſtake in judgment, than to any malignity of intention. It is, therefore, no wonder, that the peers, when the charge was preſented them, refuſed to commit him to cuſtody. This highly exaſperated the commons, and ſeveral conferences were held between the two houſes; but the lords perſevered, and the commons voted their conduct an obſtruction to public juſtice, and a precedent of evil and dangerous conſequences. Clarendon, perceiving that the popular torrent, united to the violence of power, ran with great impetuoſity againſt him, thought proper to retire into Normandy. The French, more judicious and more humane than his own countrymen, knew the worth of the perſon, and received him with open arms, and every mark of reſpect. He ſurvived his exile ſomething more than ſix years, and employed his leiſure hours in reducing into order the hiſtory of the civil wars, for which he had before collected materials; a performance that has done the greateſt honour to his memory. He died at Rouen in Normandy, leaving behind him the character of a nobleman of unblemiſhed virtue, an incorruptible judge, and an able miniſter, whoſe attachment and integrity were highly commendable.

As ſoon as Clarendon withdrew, the ſeals were given to Orlando Bridgeman, now created lord-keeper; and a bill paſſed both houſes for baniſhing the late chancellor. Southampton, lord-treaſurer, the only faithful counſellor now remaining, ſoon after paid the debt of nature. By the removal of Clarendon, and the death of Southampton, every obſtacle to the torrent of lewdneſs which ſoon after deluged the court, was removed. Sir Richard Clifford was made one of the commiſſioners of the treaſury; and Sir Henry Bennet, created lord Arlington, made ſecretary of ſtate; the former was a profeſſed, and the latter a concealed papiſt. Buckingham, famous at once for his humour and abandoned courſe of life; and Wilmot, earl of Rocheſter, a ſhining wit, and the moſt lewd and licentious poet of his age, were the king's principal favourites, and the miniſters of his pleaſures. With theſe, and his miſtreſſes, Charles ſpent the greateſt part of his time; nor were there any perſons but papiſts, or men of no religion, that had any credit at court. At the ſame time the Engliſh monarch was thus purſuing pleaſures that diſgraced his exalted ſtation, Lewis the Fourteenth was aſſiduouſly purſuing the extenſive deſign he had formed. Philip the Fourth of Spain was lately dead: and Lewis, when he married the Infanta of Spain, daughter to the deceaſed monarch, renounced all title to the ſucceſſion of any part of the Spaniſh monarchy. But Philip was no ſooner dead than he retracted his renunciation, and made the neceſſary preparations for recovering, by force of arms, what he called his natural rights to the Spaniſh Netherlands, and the Franche Compté. Alarmed at the rapid progreſs of the French, the States-general endeavoured to form an alliance with England and Sweden, in order to check the ambitious deſigns of Lewis. The plan of this confederacy, afterwards ſo famous under the name of the triple alliance, was purſued with the utmoſt diligence and ſecrecy. Charles, in liſtening to theſe overtures, and afterwards agreeing to the propoſed union, performed a very meritorious action, as it was productive of the happineſs of Europe in general, and of his own kingdom in particular. By this treaty Lewis retained the rights of Franche Comté, Aire, Cambray, and St. Omers.

A. D. 1668. In conſequence of ſuch proceedings, not only bounds were ſet to his ambition, but a barrier was alſo raiſed which ſeemed for ever impregnable. And though his own offer was made the foundation of the treaty, he had preſcribed ſo ſhort a time for the acceptance of that offer, that he ſtill expected, from the delays and reluctance of Spain, to find ſome opportunity of eluding it. The court of Madrid ſhewed equal diſpleaſure. To be obliged to give up any part of the Spaniſh provinces; to ſatisfy claims ſo apparently unjuſt; and even theſe claims urged with ſuch violence and haughtineſs, inſpired the higheſt diſguſt. Often did the Spaniſh miniſters threaten to abandon the Low Countries, rather than ſubmit to ſo cruel a mortification; and endeavoured by theſe menaces, to terrify the mediating powers into more vigorous meaſures for their ſupport. But the Engliſh miniſter Sir William Temple, and De Wit, were better acquainted with the real views and intereſts of Spain. They knew that ſhe muſt ſtill retain the Low Countries, as a bond of connection with the other powers of Europe, by whom alone, if her young monarch ſhould die without iſſue, her independence againſt the pretenſion of France could be ſupported. They therefore ſtill urged the terms of the triple league, and even threatened Spain with a war in caſe of refuſal. The plenipotentiaries of all the powers met at Aix-la-Chapelle. Temple was miniſter for England; Van Beringhen for Holland; and d'Hona for Sweden. At laſt Spain, preſſed on all hands, accepted of the alternative offered. But even in her compliance, ſhe exhibited ſtrong ſymptoms of ill-humour and diſcontent. It was apparent that the Hollanders, by entirely neglecting the honours of the Spaniſh monarchy, had been anxious only for their own ſecurity; and, provided they could remove the army of Lewis from their own frontiers, were very indifferent with regard to the progreſs he might make in other places. Convinced of this, the queen-regent of Spain reſolved ſtill to keep them in anxiety, which might, in time, prove the foundation of an union, than they were, at preſent, willing to enter into. Franche Comté, by a vigorous and well-concerted plan of the French king, had been conquered in fifteen days, during a rigorous ſeaſon, and in the depth of winter. The queen, therefore, determined to recover this province, and to abandon all the towns conquered in Flanders during the laſt campaign. By this means, Lewis was enabled to extend his garriſons into the heart of the Low Countries; ſo that only a very feeble barrier remained to the Spaniſh provinces. But notwithſtanding the advantages of his ſituation, the French monarch could entertain very little hopes of ever extending his conqueſt in that quarter, which lay the moſt expoſed to his ambition, and where his acquiſitions were of moſt importance. The triple league guaranteed the remaining provinces to Spain; and the emperor, together with other powers of Germany, whoſe intereſts ſeemed to be ſtrongly concerned, were invited to enter into the ſame confederacy. As Spain about this time, under the mediation of Charles, made peace, on equal terms, with Portugal, it might be expected ſhe would exert more vigour in oppoſition to her haughty and triumphant rival. The prodigious ſatisfaction expreſſed in England, on account of the meaſures now embraced by the court, promiſed a hearty concurrence in parliament of every ſcheme which could be propoſed in oppoſition to the grandeur of France; and thus all Europe ſeemed to repoſe with ſecurity, under the protection of that powerful confederacy, which had been ſo happily formed for her future proſperity and welfare.

The king became anxious to gain the preſbyterians, who were now extremely numerous, over to his intereſts; and at the ſame time to attach the papiſts more ſtrongly to him, by procuring a remiſſion of the ſevere reſtrictions they laboured under. A. D. 1669. To effect this, he propoſed to incorporate the preſbyterians with the church of England, and obtain a general toleration for all the other ſects of nonconformiſts. The lord keeper was accordingly directed to procure a conference between ſome of the moſt eminent of the epiſcopalian and preſbyterian miniſters; and to make them propoſals for a comprehenſion of ſuch diſſenters, as could be brought into communion with the church of England; and for procuring a toleration for the independents and other religious ſects. The epiſcopal divines ſhewed great compliance on this occaſion, and even made large conceſſions; and nothing remained to put the finiſhing ſtroke to an accommodation, but the point of re-ordination of the preſbyterian miniſters, which was at laſt adjuſted by the conſent of both parties. Affairs being in this ſituation, the lord chief juſtice Hales undertook to draw up a bill of comprehenſion, which the lord-keeper engaged to ſupport in parliament with all his intereſt. But the archbiſhop of Canterbury reſolved to oppoſe theſe meaſures; and for this purpoſe he wrote a circular letter to all the ſuffragan biſhops, enjoining them to make exact enquiry into the conventicles held in their dioceſes. Being thus provided with the neceſſary informations, he went to the king, and obtained from him a proclamation to put the laws againſt conventicles into execution, and particularly the act for reſtraining the nonconformiſts from inhabiting in corporations. But the king rendered this proclamation of no effect; for about two months after, he gave orders that the nonconformiſt miniſters ſhould be told from him, that he was deſirous to make them eaſy; and if they thought proper to petition him, they would be favourably received. A petition was accordingly drawn up, and preſented to his majeſty, who received it very graciouſly; and in his anſwer aſſured them, "That he would do his utmoſt to get them comprehended with the public eſtabliſhment." This ſeſſion a violent diſpute happened between the two houſes. Skinner, a rich merchant in London, having met with ſome injuries from the Eaſt India company, laid the affair before the houſe of lords, by whom he was relieved in coſts and damages to the amount of five thouſand pounds. The commons voted, that the lords, in taking cognizance of this buſineſs, originally, without any appeal from inferior courts, had acted in a manner contrary to the laws of the land, and tending to deprive the ſubject of the advantages of thoſe laws; and that Skinner, in proſecuting the ſuit, had infringed the privileges of the commons; for which offence they ordered him to be taken into the cuſtody of the ſerjeant at arms. The lords, in the conferences which enſued between the houſes, were tenacious of their right of judicature; and affirmed, that the method in which they had exerciſed it, was quite regular. This exaſperated the commons, who immediately voted, that, "Whoever ſhould be aiding or aſſiſting in putting in execution the order of ſentence of the houſe of lords, in the caſe of Skinner againſt the Eaſt India company, ſhall be deemed a betrayer of the rights and liberties of the commons of England, and an infringer of the privileges of the houſe of commons."

On that day the parliament, which had been prorogued to the nineteenth of October, met, and voted an addreſs of thanks to the king for his proclamation againſt conventicles. They then appointed a committee to make exact enquiries concerning the conduct of the nonconformiſts; and having received intelligence that ſeveral conventicles were held in the neighbourhood of the parliament, they publiſhed a declaration, importing, "That they would adhere to his majeſty for the ſupport of the government in church and ſtate, againſt all ſorts of adverſaries." The quarrel between the two houſes was now revived; and as the commons had voted only four hundred thouſand pounds, with which Charles was far from being ſatisfied, he thought proper, before they had carried their vote into a law, to prorogue them to the fourteenth of February. About this time died in France, queen Henrietta Maria, the king's mother; and in England, the famous George Monk, duke of Albemarle, the renowned author of the reſtoration.

A. D. 1670. The two houſes met according to adjournment on the 14th of February, and having reſumed the buſineſs of ſupply, granted the king an additional duty, during eight years, of twelve pounds on each ton of Spaniſh wine, and eight on each ton of French. They alſo paſſed an act, authorizing his majeſty to diſpoſe of his quit-rents and fee-farms, by which expedient his preſent neceſſities were ſupplied; but himſelf and ſucceſſors left in a more dependent ſituation than they before experienced.

Hitherto the king's conduct had been in ſome reſpects laudable, and in moſt excuſable; but we now come to a period, wherein his councils, being extremely wicked and pernicious, were naturally attended with ſuch evil conſequences, as had well nigh proved fatal both to prince and people. It was commonly obſerved, that a total alteration was made in the committee of the council appointed for foreign affairs, and that prince Rupert, the duke of Ormond, lord-keeper Bridgeman, and ſecretary Trevor, men of inviolable honour, were ſeldom at the council board; the king being wholly guided by the advice of Clifford, Aſhley, Buckingham, Arlington, and Lauderdale, a junto diſtinguiſhed by the appellation of "The Cabal;" a word formed by the initial letters of their names. Their pernicious councils, though from the firſt they were ſtrongly ſuſpected, appeared not in their full light till ſome time after. Such were the notions which they infuſed into the king and duke, and which theſe princes were but too apt to imbibe. They ſaid, that even this parliament, ſo remarkably attached to the crown, had already diſcovered ſymptoms of diſcontent; that they had been penurious in their temporary ſupplies, and kept the king's revenue in a very precarious ſituation; that his kinſman, the king of France, if properly applied to, would enter into ſuch engagements with him, as would raiſe him above all fear of a revolt; that a war with Holland, in conjunction with Lewis, would procure him every advantage that he could wiſh to enjoy, and furniſh him with a pretence for equipping a navy, and raiſing forces, with which he might retrieve the loſt power of the crown, and even extend his prerogative to abſolute monarchy. About this time arrived in England the ducheſs of Orleans, on a viſit to the king her brother. She landed at Dover in May; here being met by the king, ſhe was magnificently entertained for the ſpace of a fortnight. The ducheſs of Orleans was a lady of admirable addreſs, and had great influence over the mind of her brother. The French ambaſſador at London had already ſounded the king's inclinations, as well as thoſe of the cabal, and found them favourably diſpoſed towards forming an alliance with the king his maſter. The French king, knowing the diſpoſition of Charles, reſolved to bind him to his intereſt, by procuring him new pleaſures. For this purpoſe he had ſent over with the ducheſs of Orleans, Mademoiſelle de Querouailles, whom the king had no ſooner ſeen, than he was captivated with her charms. She accompanied him to London, where ſhe was created ducheſs of Portſmouth, and maintained her influence over him during the whole courſe of his life. The joy which Charles derived from his new alliance, was greatly damped by the death of his ſiſter, and ſtill more by thoſe unhappy circumſtances with which it was attended. After her return to Paris, ſhe was carried off by a ſudden illneſs, being ſeized with the diſtemper upon drinking a glaſs of ſuccory water. It was ſuppoſed that ſhe fell a ſacrifice to the jealouſy of her huſband, who was much chagrined at the gaiety of her diſpoſition, and the intimacy that ſubſiſted between her and Lewis XIV. Charles himſelf was fully perſuaded of his guilt; but as the miſfortune was irreparable, he thought proper to admit the exculpations of the French king, who affirmed, that the phyſicians, on opening her body, could diſcover no ground for the general rumour. So far was Charles from breaking with France upon this incident, that he took occaſion from it to diſpatch the duke of Buckingham to Paris, under pretext of condoling with the duke of Orleans, but in reality to finiſh the ſecret alliance. On the twenty-fourth of October the parliament meeting, the king addreſſed them in a ſhort ſpeech, and left the buſineſs to be explained by the lord-keeper. That miniſter repreſented the preſent exigencies of the ſtate, and the abſolute neceſſity of an immediate ſupply; the augmentation of the naval power of France; the remarkable decay of the Engliſh navy; and the ſeveral engagements into which the king had entered with the different ſtates of Chriſtendom. The commons, dazzled by the great alliance Charles had made for the honour and advantage of the nation, began to prepare bills for raiſing two millions five hundred thouſand pounds to ſatiſfy the king's demands; but before they could be paſſed, his majeſty adjourned the parliament. Sir William Temple, who reſided at the Hague as ambaſſador, was recalled to England, the king and cabal knowing he had too much integrity and love for his country, to be a tool to the miniſtry. In the winter, the prince of Orange arrived in England, and met with a warm and affectionate reception from the king his uncle.

A. D. 1671. A bill called the Coventry Act was now paſſed, by which the practice of maiming was conſidered as a capital crime. This law was occaſioned by an outrage committed upon a member of the lower houſe. A propoſal having been made for laying a tax upon the play-houſes, it was oppoſed by the courtiers, one of whom obſerved, that the players were the king's ſervants, and contributed to his diverſion. Sir John Coventry then aſked, whether his majeſty's pleaſure lay among the male or female players? This ſarcaſm was evidently levelled at Charles, who then maintained as concubines two actreſſes, Davis, and Nell Gwin. The duke of Monmouth, incenſed at the familiarity with which Coventry had uſed his majeſty, reſolved to make him a public example. For this purpoſe he engaged Sands, Obrien, and ſeveral officers of the guards to ſet upon him, as he ſhould return to his lodgings in the evening. He made a brave and obſtinate reſiſtance; and after wounding ſeveral of the aſſailants, was with great difficulty overpowered. They ſlit his noſe with a knife, in order, as they ſaid, to teach him for the future, to treat his majeſty with greater reſpect. The commons, exaſperated at the aſſault, immediately enacted the law above-mentioned, and added a clauſe, importing, that thoſe who had attacked Sir John Coventry, ſhould not be intitled to a pardon from the crown.

In the month of March the duke of York loſt his ducheſs, Anne Hyde, daughter of earl Clarendon, by whom he had Mary, afterwards princeſs of Orange, and Anne, who lived to ſway the ſceptre of England. The ducheſs, on her death-bed, openly profeſſed the Romiſh religion, and ended her life in that communion. Some have thought that ſhe had been perſuaded, contrary to her conſcience, to ſign a paper containing the grounds of her converſion. The death and converſion of his ducheſs, put an end to the diſguiſe which the duke of York had hitherto worn, and he now openly avowed his attachment to the church of Rome, which circumſtance tended ſtill farther to alarm and diſguſt the whole nation. The attention of the cabal was at this juncture employed in concerting meaſures for a war with Holland; and finding ſome pretence for commencing hoſtilities, they at laſt reſolved, that the captain of the veſſel employed in conveying lady Temple from Holland, ſhould demand an obedience to be paid to the Engliſh flag from the whole Dutch fleet, and on their refuſal, to fire upon them. This officer, after he had received lady Temple and her children on board his veſſel, ſailed through a ſquadron commanded by Van Ghent, and as they did not ſtrike their top-ſails, diſcharged a broad-ſide at them without heſitation. The Dutch admiral, aſtoniſhed at ſuch conduct, ſent an officer to remonſtrate with him concerning it. The captain replied, he had acted according to his orders. Van Ghent told him, that though the States-general had by treaty engaged to pay the compliment to the Britiſh flag, he could not expect that a large fleet, commanded by an admiral, would ſtrike their top-ſails to a ſingle veſſel, which was not even a ſhip of war, but a private boat for pleaſure or diſpatch. The captain departed without further diſpute, and no ſooner arrived in England than he was impriſoned, for not having ſufficiently aſſerted the honour of his ſovereign.

At this time lived an infamous deſperado, named Blood, whoſe daring enterprizes have tranſmitted his name to poſterity. This man was a diſbanded officer of the protector's, and had been concerned in a plot for exciting a rebellion in Ireland; for which he himſelf was attainted, and ſome of his confederates capitally puniſhed. While the duke of Ormond was viceroy of that kingdom, he had undertaken to ſurprize the caſtle of Dublin; but failing in this enterprize, determined to attempt the life of the duke. For this purpoſe he followed him into England; and one night, accompanied by eight of his confederates, he aſſaulted his coach in St. James's-ſtreet, and made himſelf maſter of his perſon. He then ſet him on horſeback behind one of the gang, in order to convey him to Tyburn, and put him to an ignominious death. He himſelf rode on, and actually fixed a rope to the gallows. The other accomplices had got as far as Berkley, now Devonſhire houſe; when the duke endeavouring to diſengage himſelf fell from the horſe, together with the ruffian to whom he had been faſtened, and while they lay ſtruggling on the ground together, Ormond's ſervants came to his aſſiſtance. Blood by this time had returned; but finding it impoſſible to accompliſh his deſign, ordered his confederates to fire at the duke, which done, they eſcaped through favour of the night. This reſolute villain laid a ſcheme for carrying off the regalia from the Tower, and had well-nigh ſucceeded in the attempt. He had bound and wounded Edwards, the keeper of the jewel office, and got out of the Tower with his prey, but was apprehended in the ſtreets with ſome of his accomplices. One of them was known to have been concerned in the attempt upon the duke of Ormond, and Blood was ſuppoſed to be the ring-leader. When queſtioned on the ſubject, he boldly acknowledged the fact, but refuſed to diſcover his confederates, declaring, that "The fear of death ſhould never induce him either to deny a crime, or to betray a friend." The king, prompted by curioſity to ſee and converſe with this extraordinary perſon, Blood was introduced to his majeſty, and confeſſed his having once entertained a deſign on his life, on account of his ſeverity towards the godly; but his ſpirit was ſo damped by the ſight of his majeſty, that he relented, and his reſolution failed. He obſerved, that he was ſenſible of the danger, to which, by his confeſſion, he had expoſed himſelf; but at the ſame time warned the king of the conſequences that might attend his execution, aſſuring his majeſty that his aſſociates had bound themſelves by the ſtricteſt oaths, to revenge the death of any of the confederacy. Charles, ſtruck with admiration, or awed by fear, not only pardoned the malefactor, but gratified him with an eſtate of five hundred pounds a year in Ireland, and diſtinguiſhed him by many marks of perſonal regard. At this period died the famous earl of Mancheſter, and lord Fairfax, who though they had been generals againſt the late king, were afterwards inſtrumental in reſtoring his ſon to the crown.

A. D. 1672. The French king, the elector of Cologne, and the biſhop of Munſter, agreed to inveſt the territories of the States General, while the combined fleets of England and France ſhould fall upon their ſhipping and interrupt their commerce. Charles having by his profuſion laviſhed away two millions five hundred thouſand pounds, granted by parliament; beſides ſeven hundred thouſand livres received by ſtipulation from the king of France; ſtill found himſelf in great neceſſity. He therefore gave the miniſtry to underſtand, that it would be impoſſible to begin the war without a farther ſupply of five hundred thouſand pounds; but as he could not think of obtaining it from parliament, propoſed to confer the office of treaſurer on him who ſhould deviſe the means of furniſhing the preſent demand. Shaftſbury dropped a hint to Clifford, which the latter immediately communicated to the king, who beſtowed on him the promiſed reward, together with a peerage. This device was the ſhutting up the exchequer, and retaining all the ſums which ſhould be paid into it. Such a deſperate meaſure ſpread a conſternation through the city, and was attended with the ruin of many. The bankers ſtopped payment: the merchants could anſwer no bills; diffidence and jealouſy every where prevailed, together with an interruption of commerce, by which the trading part of the nation were reduced to extreme indigence, and men were univerſally exaſperated at thoſe myſterious councils, from which the parliament and all men of honour were excluded, and which began with the deſtruction of public credit, and open violation of the moſt ſacred engagements both foreign and domeſtic. The next meaſure of the court was ſtrongly expreſſive of thoſe arbitrary deſigns, which the king and his miniſtry had adopted. A proclamation was publiſhed, ſuſpending the penal laws, which had been made againſt nonconformiſts, and granting to proteſtant diſſenters the public exerciſe of their religion; and to catholicks, the exerciſe of it in their own houſes. About the ſame time the act of navigation was ſuſpended, and a proclamation iſſued for impreſſing ſailors, puniſhing all thoſe who ſhould dare to arraign his majeſty's meaſures; martial law was alſo eſtabliſhed for the regulation of the army. Lord-keeper Bridgman was deprived of the ſeals, for refuſing to impreſs the declaration for ſuſpending the penal laws, and the chancellorſhip was veſted in the hands of the earl of Shaftſbury. Thus another member of the cabal received the reward of his iniquity. The direction of foreign affairs was perfectly conſiſtent with theſe domeſtic tranſactions. A perfidious attempt was made upon the Dutch Smyrna fleet before the declaration of war. Sir Robert Holmes who was ſent on this expedition, fell in with a ſquadron from the Mediterranean, under the command of admiral Sprague, and if re-inforced by this officer, he would doubtleſs have ſucceeded in his deſign; but being deſirous of engroſſing the honour and profit of the enterprize to himſelf, he concealed his orders and permitted Sprague to continue his voyage. When Holmes approached, he aſſumed a friendly appearance, and invited the Dutch admiral, Van Neſs, who conducted the convoy, to come on board; one of his chaplains ſent a like inſidious meſſage to the rear admiral. But theſe officers had been previouſly informed of the deſign of the Engliſh, and had already prepared for defence. Three times were they vigorouſly attacked by the Engliſh, and as often did they bravely repel the aſſailants. In the third, one of the Dutch ſhips was taken, together with three or four of their ſmalleſt merchantmen, but the reſt under favour of a thick fog, continued their courſe, and ſafely arrived in Holland. The States exclaimed againſt this piratical attempt with great virulence; the people of England condemned it as an infamous enterprize, and the king himſelf was aſhamed of having given his aſſent to ſuch proceedings.

Utter deſtruction now ſeemed hovering round the States General. Lewis, king of France, was at the head of an army, conſiſting of one hundred and eighty thouſand men, commanded by the ableſt officers in Europe; his ſubjects were enriched by commerce, and his finances managed with the greateſt œconomy, while the Dutch were diſtracted between two powerful factions. In this ſituation of affairs, the States conſented to honour the Engliſh flag in whatſoever manner Charles ſhould think proper, and appointed his nephew the prince of Orange captain general and admiral, though he had not yet reached the twenty-third year of his age. De Wit, a conſummate ſtateſman, who preſided in the council of the United Provinces, had made the neceſſary preparations for the threatened invaſion, and now reſolved to make a powerful effort by ſea, while the prince of Orange was employed in levying troops, and re-eſtabliſhing the diſcipline of the army. De Ruyter was ſent to ſea with a fleet of ninety ſail, beſides forty-five ſhips; Cornelius de Wit, acting on board, as deputy from the States. De Ruyter's intention was to have prevented the junction of the French and Engliſh fleets, but they were already joined and lay at anchor at Solebay, to the number of one hundred and thirty ſhips of the line. The duke of York commanded in chief, and the earl of Sandwich acted as admiral of the blue; mareſchal d'Etrées commanded the French ſquadron. The Engliſh fleet rode at anchor in ſuch diſorder, that the earl of Sandwich, a brave and experienced officer, apprized the duke of the danger; but the anſwer given him ſeemed to imply a ſuſpicion of his courage. On the approach of the enemy, every one flew to his poſt with the utmoſt precipitation, and many ſhips were obliged to cut their cables in order to prepare for the action. Sandwich commanded in the van, and though reſolved to conquer or to die, he yet behaved with ſo much prudence, that to him the ſafety of the whole fleet was viſibly owing. He hurried out of the bay, and by this wiſe meaſure, afforded time to the duke of York, who conducted the main body, and to mareſchal d'Etrées, admiral of the rear, to get out to open ſea. The earl ſuſtained a moſt furious attack from the enemy: he repulſed the ſhip of Van Ghent, after that admiral had been killed in the engagement; he ſunk another ſhip which attempted to board him, together with three fire ſhips which came full againſt him; and though his ſhip was ſhattered, and ſix hundred of his men ſlain, he continued to ply his artillery without intermiſſion, until another fire ſhip grappled him on the quarter. He might have eſcaped the danger; but he diſdained to ſurvive the diſgrace, which the duke's injurious expreſſion he imagined had caſt upon him; ſo that himſelf, and all his crew that remained were buried in the general ruin; and thus was deſtroyed one of the moſt gallant officers that ever England produced, by the inſolent reflection of a young admiral, who preſuming on his elevated ſtation, had treated him with indignity. Meanwhile de Ruyter was engaged in cloſe combat with the duke of York; and the fight was maintained for two hours with great obſtinacy on both ſides. The duke was obliged to ſhift his flag to another ſhip, and his own diviſion was in danger of being overpowered, when Sir Joſeph Jordan, who ſucceeded Sandwich, came to his aſſiſtance. The battle continued till night, when the Dutch ſheered off, but were not purſued by the enemy. It was generally ſuppoſed that mareſchal d'Etrées, as he entered not into any part of the action, had received private orders to keep aloof, that the two maritime powers might deſtroy each other.

The French king had invaded the territories of the States General, on the ſide of Germany, taking and deſtroying every thing before him, almoſt without oppoſition. In theſe circumſtances, the magiſtrates of Amſterdam obliged the burgeſſes to keep watch and ward; the other towns followed their example, and having opened all the ſluices, the whole province of Holland was laid under water. The French monarch perceiving a ſtop put to his conqueſts by the inundation of Holland, left the command of the army to the duke of Luxemburgh at Utrecht, and marched into Flanders, from whence he went to Paris, which he entered amid the acclamations of the populace. The paſſage of the Rhine, which he effected with much eaſe and expedition, was celebrated by the bards of France, as an exploit equal to that of Alexander in paſſing the Granicus, and the ſurname of "Great" beſtowed on him by his flattering ſubjects. Theſe alarming ſucceſſes induced the emperor and ſeveral other German princes to aſſiſt the Dutch, who were in imminent danger of being utterly deſtroyed. Of all their allies, there was none on whom they ſo much depended, as the Engliſh parliament; which the king was obliged to aſſemble on account of his neceſſities.

A. D. 1673. Charles, on the fourth of February, ventured to ſummon a parliament; and to this parliament, Britain, perhaps, owes the liberty it now enjoys. Charles opened the ſeſſion, by obſerving, in high terms, that he would not be contradicted in his reſolutions to maintain his grant of indulgence; and that inſtead of diminiſhing, he intended increaſing his army: a declaration which diſcovered, that he thought he had a right to make the laws depend upon his will, and to obtain his will by an army, to whoſe eſtabliſhment parliament had not conſented. But the houſe of commons, with a true Engliſh ſpirit remonſtrated, in an addreſs, that the diſpenſing power he had aſſerted in his declaration, did not belong to the crown. Charles gave an ambiguous anſwer, and in a ſecond addreſs, they inſiſted on one more explicit. In another, they preſſed him to diſmiſs the popiſh officers in his army; and in a fourth, to diſband the army itſelf, as ſoon as the peace ſhould be concluded. They paſſed the teſt act againſt popery, which ſtruck the ſtaff of lord high treaſurer from the hand of lord Clifford, and that of lord high admiral from the hand of the king's brother. Charles, now declining a conteſt with his parliament, relinquiſhed his pretenſions to a diſpenſing power, breaking with his own hands the ſeal affixed to the declaration of indulgence; and declared his inclination to give ſatisfaction to his people, and leave his new miniſters to their vengeance. To eſcape that vengeance, the cabal made the ſame ſudden turn with their maſter. Shafteſbury, the chancellor, ſaying aloud, "that the prince who forſook himſelf, deſerved to be forſaken." Then putting himſelf at the head of the oppoſition, he urged the revoking thoſe conſtitutional meaſures, which he himſelf had adviſed; and Buckingham prepared to follow his example. Arlington, who had been diſobliged, by Clifford's being appointed treaſurer, and who was married to a Dutch woman, privately paid his court to the prince of Orange, and joined the popular party in parliament. The furious Clifford, filled with indignation, retired into the country; and Lauderdale alone adhering to Charles, preſſed him, in vain, to march the Scotch army into England: but not being able to prevail, joined in the national complaints againſt the duke. The commons, however, to recompence the king for his conceſſions, granted him a ſupply, and paſſed an act of general pardon and indemnity, which ſcreened the above miniſters from all further enquiry. Charles ſtill reſolved to perſevere in his alliance with France, and in the Dutch war, and the money granted him by parliament enabled him to equip a fleet, the command of which he gave to prince Rupert, under whom commanded the earl of Oſſory, and Sir Edward Sprague, who being joined by a French fleet, commanded by d'Etrées, they ſet ſail towards the coaſt of Holland, and came to an engagement with the Dutch; in which the loſs fell chiefly on the French, whom the Engliſh, diffident of their intentions, took care to expoſe to all the fire of the enemy: but the event was not deciſive, and both ſides claimed the victory. In a week the Dutch were refitted, and again preſented themſelves to the combined fleets; upon which a new action enſued not more deciſive than the former. It was ſufficient glory to de Ruyter, that with a fleet much inferior, he could fight them without any great loſs, and prevent their making a deſcent on Zealand, which, had it taken place, would at this time have endangered the exiſtence of the Dutch commonwealth. A few weeks after prince Rupert was again refitted; and putting to ſea, the hoſtile fleets met at the mouth of the Texel, and fought the laſt battle, ſince which, during the courſe of a century, theſe neighbouring powers, (though ſince unhappily at variance) have not ſo far forgot their mutual intereſts, as to contend with each other. In this action, as in the former, de Ruyter, and under him Tromp, commanded the Dutch. De Ruyter was oppoſed to prince Rupert, Tromp to Sprague, and Brankert to d'Etrées. This laſt admiral, with all the French fleet, except rear admiral Martel, kept at a diſtance; and Brankert, inſtead of attacking them, bore down to the aſſiſtance of de Ruyter, who was engaged in a furious combat with Rupert. This prince diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his bravery; and having diſengaged himſelf from the numerous enemies with which his ſquadron was ſurrounded, and joining Sir John Chicheley, his rear admiral, who had been ſeparated from him, haſted to the relief of Sprague, who was hard preſſed by Tromp. The Royal Prince, in which Sprague firſt engaged, being diſabled, he hoiſted his flag on board the St. George; while Tromp was obliged to quit the Golden Lion, and go on board the Comet. The fight was then renewed with the utmoſt fury, by theſe brave rivals, and by the rear admirals their ſeconds. Oſſory, Sprague's rear admiral, was preparing to board Tromp, when he ſaw the St. George terribly ſhattered and diſabled. Sprague left her, in order to hoiſt his flag on board a third ſhip, and return to the charge: when a ſhot, which had paſſed through the St. George, ſunk the boat in which he was, and that brave admiral was drowned to the great regret even of Tromp himſelf, who generouſly beſtowed on him the praiſes due to his great merit. Prince Rupert found moſt of the ſhips in Sprague's ſquadron diſabled; yet renewing the engagement, it became very cloſe and bloody. He threw the enemy into diſorder; and to increaſe it, he ſent among them two fire ſhips; making a ſignal at the ſame time to the French to bear down; but ſeeing they neglected his ſignal, and that moſt of his ſhips were in no condition to keep at ſea, he provided for their ſafety, by making eaſy ſail towards the coaſt of England. In this battle, the victory was as doubtful as in all the other engagements. In the mean time, the prince of Orange, who was joined by the forces of the emperor, under Monteculi, had greater ſucceſs by land; took ſeveral places; and having cut off the communication between France and the United Provinces, obliged Lewis to recall his forces, and to abandon his conqueſts. The taking of Maeſtricht was the only advantage he obtained during this campaign. The Engliſh parliament, near the end of October, met at Weſtminſter, where the debates were carried on with great violence during nine days, when they were again prorogued: but before the uſher of the black rod could enter the houſe, the door was ſhut, and the following reſolutions were paſſed: that the alliance with France is a grievance: that the evil counſellors about the king are a grievance: that the duke of Lauderdale is a grievance, and unworthy his employment.

A. D. 1674. On the ſeventh of February, the king's neceſſities obliged him to aſſemble the parliament again; when they proceeded with ſtill greater ſpirit. They began with addreſſing the king for a general faſt, by which they ſufficiently intimated that the nation was in a very deplorable condition: and the commons paſſed a reſolution to grant no more ſupplies till the grievances they enumerated were actually redreſſed; and their liberties, properties, and religion fully ſecured. They took ſome ſteps towards eſtabliſhing a new and more rigorous teſt againſt popery; and, what chiefly alarmed the court, they made an attack on the members of the cabal, to whoſe pernicious counſels they juſtly imputed all the preſent grievances. Both houſes voted, by a great majority, to addreſs the king for the removal of the duke of Lauderdale from all his employments, and from his majeſty's preſence and councils for ever. Clifford was dead; Shaftſbury, as we have before obſerved, had made his peace with the country party, and was become their leader: Buckingham was endeavouring to imitate Shaftſbury, but very few were as yet acquainted with his intentions; and a motion was accordingly made for his impeachment. He deſired to be heard at the bar, but expreſſed himſelf in ſo confuſed and ambiguous a manner, that he gave very little ſatisfaction. He was therefore requeſted to anſwer preciſely to certain queries, which they propoſed to him. In theſe queries the following is remarkable: by whoſe advice was the army brought up to over-awe the debates of the houſe of commons? From this queſtion it is apparent that the lower houſe had carried their ſuſpicions to a very great length. As Buckingham's anſwers gave no ſatisfaction to the houſe, they voted an addreſs for his removal. Arlington was next examined; but he found means to clear up his conduct in ſo ſatisfactory a manner, that though an impeachment had been prepared againſt him, they thought proper to drop the proſecution. Charles finding it would be impoſſible to continue a war ſo diſagreeable to the parliament, and the nation in general, without the ſupplies which the former refuſed, began to liſten to terms propoſed by the States General for a ſeparate peace. In vain did the marquis de Rouvigny, the French ambaſſador, make him the moſt tempting offers to keep him firm to his engagements; in vain did he threaten him with the ſtoppage of the yearly ſtipend of one hundred thouſand pounds, which Lewis had been polite enough to give, and Charles mean enough to receive, for aſſiſting that ambitious prince in his projects for univerſal power. Promiſes and threats were equally unavailing: Charles choſe rather to reconcile himſelf to his parliament and his people, by agreeing to a peace they ſo greatly deſired, than to truſt to the ſupport of France. Six commiſſioners, of which the earl of Arlington was one, were appointed to confer with an equal number ſent by the States of Holland, and in fifteen days the treaty was concluded. It was a renewal of the treaty of Breda, with the following additions; that the Dutch ſhould pay the compliment of ſtriking their flag to that of the Engliſh, whether in large fleets or in a ſingle veſſel; and pay about three hundred thouſand pounds, towards defraying the expence of the king's armament. A regulation of trade was agreed to; all poſſeſſions were reſtored to the ſame condition as before the war; and the Engliſh planters in Surinam were allowed to remove at pleaſure. This peace, which was proclaimed on the fourth of February, was near bringing on an alliance offenſive and defenſive, between the States General and the Engliſh court, againſt the king of France. It was warmly ſolicited by moſt of the European powers. The two houſes of parliament ſupported theſe remonſtrances with all their power. Their hatred towards the French was ſo great, that they would gladly have relinquiſhed the enjoyments of the new peace for a time, to ſee their king armed againſt the common diſturber of the tranquillity of Europe; nor would they have thought any ſupplies too great, that tended to promote the welfare and happineſs of their country. Charles, however, diſregarded their remonſtrances; prompted equally by his hatred to the Dutch, and the hopes of ſtill receiving a powerful aſſiſtance from France, he refuſed to ſacrifice his ally to the reſentment of his enemies. Accordingly he remained the friend of Lewis, while his ſubjects more and more eſpouſed the intereſt of the ſtadtholder.

A further examination of grievances ſtill employed the parliament, who, in the courſe of their enquiries attacked the court with ſo much vigour, that Charles, apprehenſive of their going dangerous lengths, rendered their meaſures ineffectual by an immediate prorogation. And having thus freed himſelf from all foreign and domeſtic diſputes, he reſumed his former courſe of indolence and debauchery. In the courſe of this year, two famous men paid the debt of nature; John Milton, one of the greateſt poets the world ever ſaw, and the earl of Clarendon, who died at Rouen in Normandy, aged ſixty-ſeven.

A. D. 1675. Notwithſtanding the king was obliged to make a ſeparate peace, he ſtill kept up his connections with the French king; apologized for deſerting him, by repreſenting the difficulties under which he laboured: and Lewis, with great complaiſance, admitted the validity of his excuſes. As Charles was now at peace with all the world, and almoſt the only prince in Europe in that agreeable ſituation, he offered his mediation to the contending powers, but without effect; and in the mean time the war was carried on in Flanders and Alſace by the prince of Orange, aſſiſted by the emperor, againſt the forces of France, commanded by the prince of Condé and Turenne. About this time conſiderable alterations were made in the Engliſh miniſtry. Sir Joſeph Williamſon who had been plenipotentiary at the court of Cologne, was appointed ſecretary of ſtate in the room of the earl of Arlington, who became lord high chamberlain. Soon after which the moſt rancorous animoſity broke out between the chamberlain and the treaſurer Danby, each exerting his utmoſt power to accompliſh the ruin of the other. The duke of Buckingham loſt the dignity of chancellor of the univerſity of Cambridge, and was ſucceeded in that honourable ſtation by the duke of Monmouth, who had ſignalized himſelf in France, and who was now become the idol of the people. Lauderdale ſtill kept his poſts, by the moſt aſſiduous application to the king's paſſions, and devoted ſubſerviency to all his extravagant deſigns. He was, however, ſo greatly intimidated by the vote that had been paſſed againſt him in the houſe of commons, that he affected openly to renounce all the meaſures of the cabal. He profeſſed an uncommon zeal for the proteſtant religion; appeared conſtantly at church, was punctual in receiving the ſacrament, and adviſed the king to proſecute the catholics with the utmoſt rigour. But theſe arts were far from being ſufficient to appeaſe the reſentment of the commons, for at their meeting on the thirteenth of April, after a receſs of fourteen months, the firſt buſineſs they reſumed, was a bill to prevent the growth of popery; wherein it was declared, that the ſaying maſs ſhould be a ſufficient evidence to convict a perſon of being a popiſh prieſt, and puniſhments were ordered to be inflicted on all who attended the popiſh ſervice. This bill being finiſhed, they drew up an addreſs againſt the duke of Lauderdale, whoſe private converſation had been betrayed to them by doctor Burnet, once a creature of that nobleman. In this addreſs they charged the duke with having adviſed his majeſty to deprive his ſubjects of their rights and liberties; for ſaying in council, that his majeſty's edicts were equal to the laws: and with having procured acts of parliament in Scotland for eſtabliſhing a militia in that kingdom of twenty thouſand men, who were obliged to march into England and perform there any ſervices his majeſty ſhould think fit to command, and to obey ſuch orders as they ſhould from time to time receive from the privy council: by theſe general words they conceived this realm was liable to be invaded, on any pretence whatever; and therefore they begged his majeſty to remove the ſaid duke from his employments and preſence, as a perſon dangerous to the government. But Charles did not think proper to grant this requeſt, and gave ſome reaſons for his refuſal. Theſe not being ſatisfactory to the commons, they now reſolved to prepare a remonſtrance againſt the duke. In the mean time they ordered an enquiry to be made into the conduct of the lord treaſurer, the earl of Danby: but finding themſelves deficient in proofs againſt that miniſter, they thought proper to drop the proſecution. They, however, determined to intimate to the king, how little they depended upon his royal word; and in order to this, they drew up an addreſs, beſeeching his majeſty to recall the Engliſh forces in the French ſervice, and forbidding all the king's ſubjects, from engaging in the army of Lewis for the future. The king anſwered, he would take care to prevent any more of his ſubjects from engaging in the French troops; but that he could not recall thoſe already engaged without prejudice to his honour, and the peace of the kingdom. The commons finding nothing was to be expected from addreſſes, framed a bill, declaring it treaſon to levy money without the conſent of parliament; another for vacating the ſeats of thoſe, who had accepted of poſts or employments; and another for ſecuring the liberty of the ſubjects, and preventing their being tranſported to diſtant iſlands. Theſe and other bills were rendered abortive, by a diſpute which happened between the two houſes of parliament. Doctor Shirley being caſt in a law ſuit, before the chancellor, by Sir John Fagg, a member of the houſe of commons, preferred a petition of appeal before the houſe of peers. The lords received the appeal, and cited Fagg to appear before them. He complained to the lower houſe, who eſpouſed his cauſe; they not only maintained that no member of their houſe could be ſummoned before the peers, and for this claim they could plead precedent; but alſo aſſerted, that the upper houſe could receive no appeal from courts of equity; a pretenſion which greatly abridged the juriſdiction of the peers, and which was contrary to the practice which had prevailed during the preſent century. The commons ſent Shirley to priſon; the lords aſſerted their power; conferences were tried; but no accommodation enſued. Four lawyers were ſent to the Tower for tranſgreſſing the orders of the houſe, and pleading in this cauſe before the peers. The lords voted this arbitrary commitment, a breach of the great charter, and ſent orders to the lieutenant of the Tower to releaſe the priſoners. The lieutenant refuſed obedience. The lords applied to the king, deſiring him to puniſh the lieutenant for his contempt. Alarmed at theſe diſputes, and dreading the conſequences they might occaſion, the king came to the houſe of peers, and ſending for the commons, he reproached both houſes for carrying their differences to ſuch an indecent length, told them, he found there was no method of preſerving the peace of the kingdom, but by putting an end to the ſeſſion, and accordingly prorogued the parliament to the month of October. On the thirteenth, the king opened the fifteenth ſeſſion of this parliament, with a very ſhort ſpeech, in which, after recommending union and harmony to both houſes, and the intereſt of the church of England, he demanded a ſupply ſufficient for building a number of new ſhips, and liquidating the anticipation of his revenue. The commons abſolutely refuſed to grant any money for paying off the debts of the crown; but voted three hundred thouſand pounds for defraying the expence of building twenty ſhips of war; and appropriating the tonnage and poundage to the ſupport of the navy. Theſe votes being paſſed, they took into conſideration, the diſadvantages the nation lay under with regard to the trade of France; and it appeared that the ſilk and linen manufactures only, annually imported from France, amounted to above eight hundred thouſand pounds: and that the manufactures of wool and ſilk exported to France, did not amount to eighty-five thouſand pounds; while all the other commodities of the manufacture of England, exported to France, did not amount to ninety thouſand pounds. Whereas, the wines, brandies, and other commodities of the produce and manufacture of France imported hither, amounted to above three hundred thouſand pounds, excluſive of an incredible ſum paid for toys, point lace, &c. So that our imports exceeded our exports thither, at leaſt a million ſterling annually. The commons now thought it neceſſary to ſet a diſtinguiſhing mark on all ſuch of their members, who, preferring their own private intereſt to the public, had ſold themſelves as penſioners to the court; and were ready on any occaſion, to throw their votes into the ſcale of miniſterial influence. With this view, the houſe prepared a declaration or teſt for every member to take, by which they proteſted before God and that aſſembly, that they had not, either directly or indirectly, received any ſum, gratuity, place, or penſion; or the promiſe of any, from the court or any foreign miniſter, ſince the firſt of January, 1672, except what they then delivered in writing to the houſe; nor did they know of any ſuit, gift, grant or promiſe, but what they had declared in writing; nor given a vote in parliament for any reward or promiſe whatſoever. At the ſame time the duke of Buckingham propoſed in the houſe of peers, a bill for the eaſe of the proteſtant diſſenters: but this, and all the other bills were ſuſpended, by a revival of the diſpute between the two houſes with regard to the caſe of Shirley and Fagg. The commons were as reſolute as ever in ſupporting their prejudices. The earl of Shaftſbury, who ever ſince his defection from the court had acted the part of an incendiary between the king and the parliament, endeavoured to ſpirit up the houſe of peers, by a violent ſpeech, which had ſuch an effect on his auditors, that it was moved to addreſs his majeſty, to diſſolve the preſent parliament. The motion was, however, carried in the negative, though by only a majority of two votes. The king now prorogued the parliament for fifteen months, perceiving that no buſineſs could be done while the diviſions ſubſiſted between the two houſes.

A. D. 1670. During the laſt campaign, the ſucceſſes of the allies had been conſiderable, yet the Spaniards and Imperialiſts well knew that France was not ſufficiently humbled, nor willing to ſubmit to the terms they were deſirous of impoſing upon her. Accordingly no progreſs was made in the conferences at Nimeguen. The Spaniſh towns, ill fortified, and ſtill worſe defended, made but very feeble oppoſition to Lewis, who, by laying up magazines during the winter, was enabled to take the field early in the ſpring, before the neceſſary quantity of forage could be found in the open country. In the month of April he laid ſiege to Condé, and, after four days, took it by ſtorm. Having ſent the duke of Orleans to beſiege Bouchaine, a ſmall but important fortreſs, he poſted himſelf ſo advantageouſly with his main army, as to hinder the confederates from relieving the place, except by fighting with the greateſt diſadvantage. In ſpite of all the difficulties of the ſeaſon, and the want of proviſions, the prince of Orange came in ſight of the French army; but his induſtry ſerved no other purpoſe than to render him a ſpectator of the ſurrender of Bouchaine. Both armies ſtood in awe of each other, and were equally unwilling to hazard an action which might be attended with the moſt important conſequences. Lewis, though not deficient in perſonal courage, was very little enterprizing in the field; and being reſolved to reſt contented with the advantages he had acquired, he left the command of his army to marſhal Schomberg, and retired himſelf to Verſailles. He was no ſooner departed than the prince of Orange laid ſiege to Maeſtricht; but meeting with an obſtinate reſiſtance, he was obliged, on the approach of Schomberg, to raiſe the ſiege. Though the prince was incapable of yielding to adverſity, or bending under misfortunes, yet he began to foreſee, that by the negligence and errors of his allies, the war in Flanders muſt neceſſarily have a very unfortunate iſſue. On the Upper Rhine, Philipſburgh was taken by the Imperialiſts: in Pomerania, the Swedes were ſo unſucceſsful againſt the Danes and Brandenburgers, that they ſeemed to be loſing apace all thoſe poſſeſſions, which, by valour and good fortune they had acquired in Germany. Near the end of the campaign, the congreſs at Nimeguen was pretty full, and the plenipotentiaries of the emperor and Spain, at laſt appeared. The Dutch had threatened, if they delayed any longer, they would proceed to a ſeparate treaty with France. In the conferences and negociations, the diſpoſitions of the different parties became every day more apparent. The States-general, loaded with debts, and harraſſed with taxes, were deſirous of putting a period to a war, in which, beſides the inconveniences attending all leagues, the weakneſs of the Spaniards, the diviſions and delays of the Germans, prognoſticated nothing but diſgrace and misfortunes. Commerce languiſhed; and, what gave them ſtill greater anxiety, the trade of England, by reaſon of her neutrality, flouriſhed extremely, and they were apprehenſive, that advantages once loſt, would never be thoroughly regained. They had themſelves no farther motives for continuing the war, than to procure a good frontier to Flanders. Gratitude to their allies, however, ſtill induced them to try, whether another campaign might procure a peace, which muſt give general ſatisfaction. The prince of Orange, urged by motives of honour, ambition, and animoſity againſt France, endeavoured to keep the States ſteady to this reſolution. The Spaniards were diſtracted between the parties of the queen-regent and Don John, natural brother to their young ſovereign. Though unable of themſelves to defend Flanders, they were determined not to conclude a peace which would leave that country expoſed to every aſſault or inroad; and while they made the moſt magnificent promiſes to the States, their real truſt was in the protection of England. They ſaw that if England was once ſubdued by France, the Hollanders, expoſed to ſo terrible a power, muſt fall into dependence, and endeavour, by ſubmiſſion, to ward off that deſtruction, to which a war, in the very heart of the ſtate, muſt neceſſarily expoſe them. They were perſuaded that Lewis, ſenſible how much greater advantages he might reap from the alliance, than from the ſubjection of the republic, which muſt ſcatter the people, and depreſs, if not annihilate its commerce, would be contented with very moderate conditions, and turn his arms againſt his other neighbours. They therefore thought it impoſſible but the Engliſh parliament, foreſeeing theſe obvious conſequences, muſt, at laſt, force the king to take part in the affairs of the continent, in which their intereſts were ſo deeply concerned; they even truſted that Charles himſelf, from the approach of ſo great a danger, muſt open his eyes, and ſacrifice the favour of France, to the ſafety of his own kingdoms. Charles, however, found himſelf ſo entangled in ſuch oppoſite motives and engagements, that he was totally embarraſſed; he wanted patience to weigh and unravel the former, and reſolution to break the latter. On one hand he always regarded this alliance with France as a ſure reſource in caſe of any commotions among his own ſubjects; and whatever ſchemes he had formed for enlarging his authority, or altering the religion, it was from that nation alone he could expect aſſiſtance. He dreaded leſt the parliament ſhould treat him as they had formerly done his father: and after they had engaged him in a war on the continent, ſhould take advantage of his neceſſities, and make him purchaſe his ſupplies by ſacrificing his prerogatives, and abandoning his miniſters. On the other hand, the cries of his people and parliament, ſeconded by Danby, Arlington, and moſt of his miniſters, incited him, in order to correct the unequal balance of power in Europe, to take part with the allies.

A. D. 1677.

The parliament having met on the fifteenth of February, the king profeſſed his readineſs to give all poſſible ſecurity and ſupport to the proteſtant religion, and the liberties and properties of his ſubjects. He made the cuſtomary declaration of his neceſſities; and begged, and was granted, a ſupply for the navy. Their proceedings ſeemed likely to be interrupted by a declaration againſt the legality of their meeting. By a ſtatute of Edward III. it was enacted, that parliaments ſhould be ſummoned once a year, or oftener, as occaſion ſhould require. The laſt prorogation had been more than a year; and being therefore conſidered as illegal, it was ſuppoſed to be equal to a diſſolution. This objection had ſo much weight, that Shafteſbury, Wharton, Buckingham, and Saliſbury, zealouſly contended in the houſe of peers, that the parliament was illegal, and that in conſequence there could be no validity in its proceedings. In conſequence of this refractory behaviour, they were committed to the Tower during the pleaſure of the king. Buckingham, Saliſbury, and Wharton, making ſome conceſſions, they were reſtored to liberty; but Shafteſbury, being ambitious of popularity, had recourſe to the law for redreſs. Being condemned by the judges, he ſaw no probability of obtaining his freedom, but by making proper conceſſions: to which he at length ſubmitted, after being a year impriſoned. The commons were careful that the ſum of five hundred and eighty thouſand pounds, which they had lately granted, ſhould be applied to its proper purpoſe. In order to gratify the king, they voted a continuation of the additional exciſe for the ſpace of three years; and there was now every appearance of a perfect unanimity between the king and the parliament. In the ſpring, the king of France inveſted Valenciennes, which, in a few days, he ſubdued by aſſault. He then inveſted Cambray and St. Omers. The prince of Orange collected an army, and marched to the relief of the latter place, and the duke of Orleans and marſhal Luxemburgh were detached to oppoſe him. By an artful manœuvre of the marſhal, the prince was ſurprized and defeated; and both Cambray and St. Omers were in a ſhort time conquered. Theſe important events engroſſed the attention of parliament, who, alarmed at the rapid progreſs of the arms of France, preſented an addreſs to the king, repreſenting the danger that threatened the kingdom, and ſoliciting that he would purſue meaſures for the ſecurity of his own dominions, and the Spaniſh Netherlands. In his reply to this addreſs, Charles complained of their having infringed upon his prerogative, by inſiſting on his engaging in alliance with any power whatever; and he prorogued the parliament to the tenth of July.

Sir William Temple now prevailed upon the earl of Danby to propoſe a matrimonial alliance between the prince of Orange and the princeſs Mary, eldeſt daughter to the duke of York. By the expreſs order of the king, Mary and her ſiſter Anne, had been educated according to the principles of the proteſtant religion; and the proſpect of the match appeared to be perfectly agreeable to the princeſs. Upon the concluſion of the campaign, the prince obtained permiſſion to depart for England, and on his arrival he demanded Mary in marriage: but the duke of York, who was averſe to the propoſed alliance, treated him with great diſreſpect. But the king expreſſed himſelf deſirous of concluding terms of pacification previous to his conſenting to the marriage. The prince objected to this, declaring that he would not treat of peace till after the ſolemnization of the nuptials. The king finding him reſolute in his purpoſe, acceded thereto; and the marriage articles were immediately drawn, according to which it was ſtipulated, that the portion of the princeſs ſhould be forty thouſand pounds. The marriage was ſolemnized on the fourth of November; and on this occaſion there were great rejoicings among all ranks of people. Both Charles and the prince now directed their attention to the accompliſhment of the propoſed plan of pacification. It was agreed that the king of France ſhould reſtore all he had obtained from the emperor and the duke of Lorraine; that there ſhould be a mutual reſtitution between France and Holland; and that Spain ſhould be re-eſtabliſhed in the poſſeſſion of the Netherlands, formerly annexed to the ſovereignty of that kingdom. Charles undertook to prevail upon the French monarch to agree to theſe conditions; and the prince engaged to obtain the concurrence of the States-general. Having received the ſtrongeſt aſſurances from Charles that he would not abandon this plan, the prince, accompanied by his bride, embarked for Holland. M. de Duras, afterwards earl of Feverſham, made a notification of the above agreement to the king of France; who, though averſe to the terms of accommodation, received the intelligence with apparent indifference. He obſerved, however, that England had power to command a peace; but that he conſidered it extremely ſevere upon him to be compelled to ſurrender thoſe poſſeſſions in Flanders, in fortifying which he had expended large ſums; he hoped, therefore, that a few towns would not create a diſagreement between the king of England and himſelf; and he concluded with ſaying, he would inſtruct his ambaſſadors at London to treat on the ſubject. The king now ſet on foot a negociation of a very different nature, in which, notwithſtanding all the remonſtrances of parliament, he engaged not to declare in favour of the allies. Two hundred thouſand pounds a year, during the continuance of the war, were demanded by the Engliſh ambaſſadors at Paris; but, in lieu thereof, Charles conſented to accept of two millions of livres, at the inſtigation of the French miniſter at London.

A. D. 1678. In January the parliament met again, when the king informed them that he had concluded an alliance with the Dutch; and at the ſame time obſerved, that unleſs an army of thirty thouſand men was maintained, and ninety ſhips of war were kept in commiſſion, the nation could not be deemed to be in a ſtate of ſecurity. After mentioning the marriage of his niece with the prince of Orange, he requeſted a ſupply proportioned to the exigencies of government. But the parliament, not ſatisfied with the conduct of Charles, petitioned, that he would not engage in any treaty with France, till that kingdom ſhould be reduced to a ſituation equal to that in which ſhe was when the peace of the Pyrenees was concluded; informing him, that when he ſhould be pleaſed to communicate to them the nature of his alliances, they would enable him to ſupport hoſtilities with vigour, or to conclude peace on honourable and advantageous terms. In the interim, the king of France reduced Ghent and Ypres, which ſo alarmed the ſtates of Holland, that they determined to conclude a ſeparate peace. Availing himſelf of the advantages he had gained over England, Lewis inſiſted upon terms very different from thoſe which, as the ground of a pacification, he had before accepted.

The king ſent his chancellor to requeſt the advice of the two houſes of parliament, as to the meaſures that would be moſt eligible for him to purſue. The commons ſtrongly recommended him to declare war againſt France, and voted that the alliance with Holland had no conſiderable tendency towards the national ſafety. They afterwards requeſted, that he would pay more than his cuſtomary attention to their addreſſes, and that he would remove the duke of Lauderdale from his councils. The king pretended to be aſtoniſhed at this procedure of parliament, and refuſed at that time to give any anſwer to their requeſt. At the ſame time, orders were iſſued for collecting an army of thirty thouſand men; and the recruiters were ſo ſucceſsful, that the troops were raiſed in ſix weeks. The duke of Monmouth, with an army of three thouſand men, was ſent to Oſtend; ſome regiments in the ſervice of France were recalled; a powerful fleet was equipped with all poſſible expedition; and every neceſſary meaſure was taken for commencing hoſtilities againſt France. Through the agency of their ambaſſadors at the court of England, the States-general averred, that if Charles would immediately declare war againſt France, they would violate their treaty with, and act vigorouſly againſt that power. Charles replied, that ſince the States had declared themſelves ready to comply with the conditions preſcribed by the court of France, and Lewis had propoſed to purchaſe a peace, he conceived that he ſhould be juſtifiable in accepting the gratuity. He even requeſted Sir William Temple to treat with the French ambaſſador on this ſubject; but he declined taking any part in a negociation of ſo ſcandalous a nature. Other perſons, however, were ſoon found, who engaged in this buſineſs without reluctance, and the ſum was agreed on. After this, the French miniſter informed his majeſty, the money would not be paid but on the condition of his binding himſelf in a ſecret article, that the forces in his three kingdoms ſhould not exceed eight thouſand men. Hereupon the king exclaimed, "Cod's fiſh! does my brother of France think to ſerve me thus? Are all his promiſes to make me abſolute maſter of my ſubjects come to this? Or does he think it a thing to be done with eight thouſand men?" Charles could have been at this time umpire of the kings of Europe if his ambition reached ſo far, or that he had formed any ideas of importance, the execution of which he could have performed with facility.

In May the parliament met, and Charles acquainted the houſes, that the French king had offered a truce till the twenty-ſecond of July, and ſaid it would be highly imprudent to diſband the troops till after the expiration of that term; but the commons voted, that all the troops levied ſince September ſhould be diſcharged. In June the king told his parliament, that France, Spain, and Holland, were on the point of concluding a peace, and therefore it would be neceſſary to keep a powerful fleet at ſea. He begged an augmentation of three hundred thouſand pounds to his revenue, fifty thouſand pounds of which to be annually appropriated to the ſupport of the fleet and artillery: he likewiſe deſired the houſe to conſider, that his honour was engaged for the payment of the fortune of the princeſs of Orange, the half of which was due, and had been demanded by the prince. The commons refuſed to comply with the king's requeſt for the increaſe of his revenue, but granted ſix thouſand pounds for paying what was due to the army, that it might be diſbanded, as there was no proſpect of its being advantageouſly employed againſt France. On the fifteenth of July an act was paſſed, decreeing, that in future the dead ſhould be buried in woollen; a law wiſely intended for the benefit of that manufacture. This being done, the parliament was prorogued. By this time all differences were accommodated between France and Spain, and throughout Europe there was every appearance of a general peace.

At this time a very extraordinary affair engaged the attention of the whole kingdom. One Kirby, at the inſtigation of Dr. Iſrael Tongue, a clergyman of London, on the twelfth of Auguſt, approaching his majeſty in St. James's-park, ſaid to him, "Sir, keep within your company; your enemies have a deſign upon your life." The king deſired Kirby to bring Tongue to him at eight o'clock that evening. He was accordingly introduced to his majeſty, with a bundle of papers relating to this conſpiracy, and referred to lord treaſurer Danby. He ſaid, that the papers were thruſt under his door without his knowledge: but imagined, that it was done by a perſon who had often entertained him with ſtories of the like nature. The improbability of the ſtory induced his majeſty to look upon the whole as a fiction, and he requeſted that it might be kept a ſecret, in fear of the conſequences it might produce among his ſubjects. In order to clear the jeſuits from all ſuſpicion of being concerned in this affair, the duke of York inſiſted on a proper enquiry being made before the privy-council. Kirby and Tongue were now ſent for, the latter of whom declared, that he received his intelligence from one Titus Oates, who had been bred a clergyman of the church of England, had afterwards embraced the catholic religion, lived ſome time in the Engliſh ſeminary at St. Omers, had been ſent from thence on an errand to Spain, had finally abjured the Romiſh faith, and lately arrived in his native country. The ſubſtance of Oates's evidence, as delivered before the council, was, "That he had been employed by ſeveral jeſuits to carry letters to father Suima, an Iriſh jeſuit at Madrid; that in the courſe of his journey thither, he had broke open letters, and diſcovered a deſign of exciting a rebellion in Scotland; that he ſaw ſeveral Engliſh ſtudents at Valladolid, who were obliged by the jeſuits of the college to renounce their allegiance to the king of Great Britain; that one of them, in a ſermon to the ſtudents, preſumed to affirm, that Charles Stuart was not a lawful king, nor the ſon of Charles the Firſt, but of a black Scotchman; that upon his return to England, where he made farther diſcoveries, he was ſent to St. Omers, with other letters to the ſame purport as the former; that in April he came over from St. Omers with ſeveral jeſuits, to aſſiſt at the grand conſult which was held by about fifty jeſuits at the White-Horſe tavern in the Strand, where they ſigned an agreement to kill the king; that in June following he became privy to the treaty with Wakeman, the queen's phyſician, to poiſon, and Grove and Pickering to ſhoot his majeſty; that he heard a jeſuit aſſert in a ſermon, "that proteſtant and other heretical princes were, ipſo facto, depoſed; and that it was as lawful to deſtroy them as Oliver Cromwell, or any other uſurper." This affair appeared of ſuch importance to the council, that they re-examined Tongue and Oates, and employed the latter to ſeize the perſons and papers of the ſuppoſed conſpirators; the council likewiſe ſat twice a week to obtain all the evidence poſſible. In conſequence of Oates's depoſition, Sir George Wakeman, Edward Coleman, ſecretary to the duke of York, with eight prieſts and jeſuits, were taken into cuſtody, which induced the public in general to believe, that the catholics were the contrivers of the plot; and in this belief they were confirmed by a circumſtance that happened but a few days afterwards, and which is very curious in all its particulars. Sir Edmundbury Godfrey, a juſtice of the peace, who had taken Oates's depoſition, having been miſſing for a few days, was found murdered in a ditch between Pancras and Hampſtead. The coroner's jury ſat on the body, and gave in a verdict of "Wilful murder by perſons unknown." The king immediately offered a reward of five hundred pounds, with a free pardon, to any one who would diſcover the murderers. In the mean time the houſe of peers informed the commons of what they had learnt reſpecting the plot, and both houſes ſat till night on ſeveral days to examine evidence. Oates they recommended to the king; aſſigned him a guard for the protection of his perſon; and accommodated him with a penſion of twelve hundred pounds. Immediately a bill was brought into the houſe of commons, to expel all popiſh recuſants from the kingdom; and after Oates had been examined ſeveral hours before both houſes, they voted, "That the lords and commons are of opinion that there hath been, and ſtill is, a damnable and helliſh plot, contrived and carried on by popiſh recuſants, for aſſaſſinating and murdering the king, for ſubverting the government, and rooting out and deſtroying the proteſtant religion." Many perſons againſt whom Oates had ſworn, were now apprehended by order of the houſe of commons; and among the reſt, the lords Powis, Stafford, Arundel of Wardour, Petre, and Bellaſis, were committed to the Tower, on a charge of high treaſon. William Bedloe being examined to prove the exiſtence of the plot, ſwore, that two jeſuits, named Walſh and le Phaire, who, he ſaid, were concerned in the murder of Godfrey, had told him the names of the nobleman who had taken up arms, and of preparations that were making in Flanders and Spain. He averred, that all the catholics of diſtinction were apprized of the plot, and ready to concur in carrying it into execution; and that "himſelf being well acquainted with all the public and private roads in England and Wales, was appointed to carry inſtructions and intelligence from one army to the other."

Seeing the depoſitions of Oates were in ſome degree confirmed, the public diſſatisfaction aroſe to ſuch a height, that the king was under a neceſſity of iſſuing a proclamation, directing that popiſh recuſants ſhould not go to a greater diſtance than five miles from their own houſes: at the ſame time another proclamation was publiſhed, "Offering a reward to any one who ſhould diſcover or apprehend a Romiſh prieſt or jeſuit;" and the king gave his aſſent to the bill for diſqualifying papiſts from ſitting in parliament. Coleman, the duke of York's ſecretary, having been executed on the evidence of Oates and Bedloe, the other parties were ſoon afterwards brought to trial. In December, two prieſts, named Ireland and Pickering, with Grove, a lay-brother, Whitebread, provincial of the jeſuits, with Fenwick, a member of the ſame ſociety, were brought to trial at the Old Bailey, when the two latter were diſmiſſed for the preſent in defect of evidence, and the others tried, convicted, and hanged, drawn and quartered.

A. D. 1679.

One Miles Prance, a catholic, having been taken into cuſtody on ſuſpicion of having been concerned in the murder of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey, was carried before the committee of the houſe of lords, to whom he made the moſt ſolemn declaration of his innocence; but Bedloe affirming that he was one of the men he ſaw in Somerſet-gardens with the dead body, he was immediately conveyed to Newgate, and confined in the condemned hole. Being carried before the earl of Shafteſbury, he diſcovered ſome particulars, and promiſed to make a more full confeſſion, if he could be aſſured of obtaining a free pardon. What he aſked being promiſed to him, he was examined before the king and council, and acknowledged that Godfrey was murdered in Somerſet-houſe by the procurement of two Iriſh prieſts, named Gerard and Kelly, Robert Green, cuſhion-keeper to the queen's chapel, and other perſons. The following confeſſion was afterwards made by Prance to Dr. Lloyd, reſpecting the manner in which the murder was committed. He ſaid that Hill, Gerard, Kelly, himſelf, and ſome others, reſolved to murder Sir Edmundbury Godfrey, as a bitter perſecutor of the catholics, and an enemy to the queen's ſervants. That on the 12th of October, about nine in the evening, as he was returning home by the water-gate of Somerſet-houſe, Kelly and Berry, another of the accomplices, feigned a quarrel; and Hill, after much importunity, prevailed on Godfrey, as being a juſtice of the peace, to interpoſe his authority; but he no ſooner entered the gate, than Gerard, throwing a handkerchief about his neck, twiſted it tight, and with the aſſiſtance of the other parties, immediately ſtrangled him. He farther affirmed, that they conveyed the body to the houſe of Dr. Godden, where it lay two nights, and was then removed to another apartment, where it was ſeen by Bedloe. At length they determined to convey it into the fields, with the rings on the fingers, and the money in the pockets, and to thruſt the ſword through it, that it might be ſuppoſed he had murdered himſelf. They accordingly carried the body in a ſedan towards Soho-fields, where Hill waited with a horſe, upon which it was mounted before him, and that they left it in a ditch near Primroſe-hill. A trial followed this depoſition, and Green, Hill, and Berry, were convicted, though ſeveral of the witneſſes materially contradicted each other; and it remains to this day a doubt, whether the parties were guilty of the crime for which they ſuffered. The duke of York now retired to Bruſſels with the princeſs, in conſequence of a written order which he received from the king.

The parliament having met, the king was earneſtly deſirous that Sir Thomas Meers might be elected ſpeaker; but the houſe re-choſe Seymour, whom the king refuſed to approve, and commanded that the commons ſhould make a new choice. This produced a violent conteſt: the commons inſiſted that the king's approbation was matter of mere form; and the king maintaining, that, as he had the power of rejecting, he was not obliged to aſſign any reaſon for ſo doing. At length the affair was compromiſed by the election of Mr. Gregory, a gentleman of the law, to whom the king made no objection. Articles of impeachment were now prepared againſt lord Danby; and Tongue, Oates, Bedloe, and Everard (a new witneſs) were ſummoned to the bar of the houſe, to give evidence reſpecting the plot. A vote paſſed, "That an horrible conſpiracy had been contrived and carried on for aſſaſſinating the king, deſtroying the proteſtant religion, and ſubverting the government." In this vote the peers concurred with the commons, and a day was appointed for public faſting and humiliation. Charles was urgent with the houſe of lords in favour of the earl of Danby, who, he alledged, had voted in obedience to the orders he had received; but he promiſed that he would remove him from his preſence, and deprive him of all his employments, in order to give their lordſhips ſatisfaction: but the oppoſition againſt Danby was very violent, notwithſtanding the royal interpoſition in his favour. Lord Shafteſbury reviled the adminiſtration in the moſt pointed terms, affirming, among other things, that, "In England popery would firſt enter, to pave the way for ſlavery; but in Scotland ſlavery had entered, and popery would follow." After much debate a bill was paſſed, to oblige Danby to ſurrender within a certain day, on pain of being proceeded againſt by an act of attainder. The earl was committed priſoner to the Tower, on his ſurrender to the uſher of the black-rod. Affairs being thus critically ſituated, the king aſked the opinion of Sir William Temple, who adviſed him to admit into his council the leading men in the oppoſition: whereupon the earl of Eſſex was created lord-treaſurer in the room of Danby; lord Sunderland was made ſecretary of ſtate; lord Halifax was ſworn of the privy-council; and theſe noblemen, with Sir William Temple, were conſulted on all buſineſs of importance. Shafteſbury, though preſident of the council, adhered to what was called the country party, as the king did not honour him with his confidence. The people in general were greatly elevated, in the hope and expectation that this change of men would naturally induce a change of meaſures; but the commons did not ſee things in ſo flattering a light; and notwithſtanding the late alteration in the miniſtry, they paſſed an unanimous vote, that "The duke of York, being a catholic, and the preſumptive heir to the crown, was the chief encouragement to the deſigns and plots of the papiſts againſt the king, and the proteſtant religion."

It was now generally ſuppoſed that a bill would be framed for excluding the duke of York from the ſucceſſion; and the king, in order to prevent ſuch a meaſure, made ſome propoſitions to parliament, importing, that "The death of a king, if his ſucceſſor was a catholic, ſhould not diſſolve the parliament; that during the whole courſe of his reign, he ſhould not be allowed to confer eccleſiaſtical benefices, or ſpiritual offices, upon any but pious and learned proteſtants; that no members of the privy-council, or judges, ſhould be appointed or diſplaced, but by the authority of parliament; that all juſtices of the peace ſhould be proteſtants; and that with regard to the militia, no lieutenant of a county ſhould be deprived of his office, but by order of parliament." The commons, diſſatisfied with this offer, proceeded with a bill to prevent the danger that might ariſe from popery, as well in the reign of Charles, as of his ſucceſſor. They likewiſe ordered in a bill, for vacating the ſeats of ſuch members as ſhould accept of any employment under the crown. Another bill was introduced, importing, that "James, duke of York, Albany, and Ulſter, ſhould be incapable of inheriting the crowns of England, Scotland, and Ireland: that upon the death or reſignation of the king, the ſovereignty of theſe kingdoms ſhould devolve to the perſon next in ſucceſſion to the duke; that all acts of royalty exerciſed by him ſhould be not only void, but deemed treaſonable; that if he entered any of theſe dominons, he ſhould be deemed guilty of high treaſon; and that all who ſupported his title, ſhould be puniſhed as rebels and traitors." A majority of ſeventy-nine voices was in favour of this important bill, which immediately paſſed the houſe of commons. The houſe then proceeded to an enquiry as to the members who received penſions from the court, eighteen of whom were diſcovered. The ſtanding army and the guards were voted to be illegal; and that great bulwark of Engliſh freedom, the Habeas Corpus Act, was now brought in, whereby it was enacted, that the judges, under ſevere penalties, ſhould grant writs, at the requiſition of priſoners, authorizing the gaolers to produce them in court, and certify the cauſe of their impriſonment. The king learning that the commons intended to draw up a remonſtrance reſpecting the redreſs of grievances, he prorogued the parliament from the twenty-ſeventh of May to the fourteenth of Auguſt. This parliament was afterwards diſſolved, and writs iſſued for the election of new members, without the advice of council.

By the evidence of Oates, Dugdale, Prance, and Bedloe, the jeſuits, Whitebread, the provincial, Harcourt, Gavan, and Turner, were convicted; but ſentence was poſtponed till after the trial of Langhorn the lawyer, whom the ſame witneſſes had accuſed as a principal agent in the conſpiracy. Langhorn repreſented them as miſcreant informers, who had received pardon and gratuities for betraying their fellow-ſubjects; urging, therefore, that no credit ought to be given to their teſtimony. However, ſentence of death was pronounced againſt Langhorn, as well as the above-mentioned jeſuits; and to the laſt moment of their lives, they all ſolemnly declared themſelves to be innocent of the charges alledged againſt them. Whitebread in particular, renounced the maxim believed by many of the jeſuits, that it was lawful to depoſe and aſſaſſinate princes. On the eighteenth of June, Sir George Wakeman, the queen's phyſician, was brought for trial before chief juſtice Scroggs. On his firſt examination, Oates had declared that he knew nothing but from common report againſt Sir George; but he now depoſed that he had ſeen a letter written by him to Aſhby the jeſuit, adviſing him to uſe a milk diet and the waters at Bath, and intimating his approbation of the conſpiracy againſt the king and government. In his defence, Wakeman remarked on the inconſiſtency of the informer's allegations; and by the evidence of one of his own domeſtics, and an apothecary at Bath, he proved that he did not write, but dictate the letter to Aſhby, and pointed out the abſurdity of preſcribing together a milk diet and the uſe of the Bath waters: the evidence of Bedloe alſo being delivered with prevarication and inconſiſtency, Wakeman was acquitted, as were two Benedictine monks tried at the ſame time on ſimilar accuſations. On the trial of the above perſons, the chief juſtice conducted himſelf with a degree of moderation that reflected great honour upon his character; the witneſſes accuſed him of partiality, finding that their own credit was entirely ruined.

About the cloſe of Auguſt, Charles was attacked by an intermitting fever, and fell ſick at Windſor. His life being thought in danger, all ranks of men were ſeized with amazement, which was increaſed by the apprehenſions they entertained of his ſucceſſor. It was feared, that the malcontents would immediately kindle a civil war; and either their ſucceſs, their failure, or even the balance and conteſt of parties, ſeemed events equally fatal. Eſſex, Halifax, and Sunderland perſuaded the ducheſs of Portſmouth to propoſe to the king to ſend for his brother. The duke haſtened over; but finding the king out of danger, offered inſtantly to return. The duke of Monmouth, in an unguarded tranſport, reproached the king with concealing from him the invitation he had given. Charles ordered him into baniſhment. Monmouth, in haughty terms, refuſed obedience. But the next day the two dukes agreed, that in order to prevent civil diſcord, both ſhould retire abroad. Monmouth fixed his reſidence in Holland, where he profeſſed his attachment to the prince of Orange. The duke of York returned to Bruſſels; and in a few months after came to England, and then moved his court into Scotland.

At this time what has been called the Meal-Tub-Plot, was contrived between one Dangerfield, and a woman named Collier. Dangerfield intimated, that a plan was in agitation to depoſe the king, and introduce a new form of government, and upon this information he was ſupplied with money, in order to encourage him to detect the conſpirators. Having concealed ſome papers of a ſeditious nature in the houſe of colonel Manſell, he conducted ſome officers of the cuſtoms to the dwelling, where he pretended that they would diſcover a large quantity of ſmuggled goods. Upon the houſe being ſearched, the ſeditious papers treacherouſly concealed there were found; and upon the matter being inveſtigated in the council it was concluded, that they were forged by Dangerfield, who was ordered into cuſtody; and the houſe of his female accomplice, who practiſed midwifery for a livelihood, being ſearched, the written particulars of the whole conſpiracy were found concealed in a meal-tub. Upon his examination, Dangerfield acknowledged the forgery, aſſerting, at the ſame time, that the plot was contrived by the earl of Caſtlemain, the counteſs of Powis, and the five lords confined in the Tower. The earl and the counteſs were committed to the Tower. The information and the confeſſion were utterly diſbelieved by the people in general; but the king countenanced the impoſture. He was now repeatedly urged by the earls of Halifax and Eſſex, to aſſemble the parliament; but as he refuſed to yield to their ſolicitations, Eſſex reſigned his treaſurer's ſtaff, which was given to Laurence Hyde, who, with Sunderland and Godolphin, obtained a diſtinguiſhed place in the king's favour. Lord Ruſſel relinquiſhed his place at the council-board; Sir William Temple retired into the country; and ſome expreſſions uſed by Shafteſbury, being interpreted as inſults to the king, he was diſmiſſed the council, where he was ſucceeded by the earl of Radnor. Shafteſbury, exaſperated by his removal, prevailed upon the duke of Monmouth to return to England without the king's permiſſion; and accompanying him on a tour through many parts of the kingdom, procured addreſſes from his friends and dependents, demanding a parliament to be immediately convened; and ſuch a ſpirit of diſcontent did he excite againſt the government, that an inſurrection was naturally dreaded.

A. D. 1680.

In January the ſeſſion of the new parliament opened, when the king repreſenting to them that the ſtate of national affairs indiſpenſibly required an intermiſſion, prorogued them to the fifteenth of April. His majeſty then informed the council, that he had commanded the duke of York to return to court; obſerving, that he conceived his preſence to be neceſſary at a juncture when matters were under conſideration, in which his intereſt was materially concerned. In February the prince arrived in England, and the king received him in the moſt affectionate manner. The court-party now retorted upon their antagoniſts, by preſenting addreſſes to the king, wherein they expreſſed their abhorrence of the licentious proceedings of thoſe perſons who had preſumed to demand a parliament. Shafteſbury, who was conſidered as the leader of the country-party, determined to exert his utmoſt endeavours to effect the deſtruction of the duke of York, and for this purpoſe he ſtrenuouſly ſupported the pretenſions of the duke of Monmouth. He purſued every poſſible meaſure to acquire popularity, and cauſed a report to be circulated, purporting, that a marriage had been actually ſolemnized between the king and Mrs. Waters, the duke of Monmouth's mother. Hereupon the king diſavowed in council, his having been either married or contracted to any but queen Catharine. The earl of Caſtlemain and Collier the midwife, were put on their trial, on the charge of having been concerned in the meal-tub plot; but there being no evidence adduced to criminate them, they were acquitted; and the grand jury rejected the bill of indictment againſt the counteſs of Powis. Bedloe, the informer, died in Auguſt; but a ſhort time previous to his deceaſe, he declared that the queen and the duke of York were the principals in the deſign of introducing the popiſh religion, and that the evidence he had advanced againſt the jeſuits, was, in every particular, ſtrictly authentic. The oppoſition exerted every effort to increaſe their popularity; and in this they were ſo daring, that the king, alarmed at their preſumption, inſiſted, that his brother ſhould retire to Scotland, and there remain till the popular tumults ſhould ſubſide. His majeſty having aſſured the duke, that he would never abandon his intereſts, he, though reluctantly, acquieſced in the royal command. When the parliament met, Charles informed them, that he had concluded an alliance with the court of Spain; and pledged his word, that he was heartily inclined to co-operate with them in all reaſonable meaſures for ſecuring the proteſtant religion againſt the innovations of popery; he exhorted them to purſue the enquiry into the conſpiracy; requeſted a ſubſidy for the ſupport of Tangier: and repreſented a ſtrict union between the parliament and himſelf, as the moſt certain means of promoting the public welfare. The commons now preſented an addreſs to his majeſty, requeſting him to remove Sir George Jefferies, recorder of London, and firſt judge of Cheſter, from all public employments. The lords Ruſſel and Capel enumerated the grievances of the nation, and were ſeconded by a great number of members, ſome of whom ſpoke of the duke of York in terms of great ſeverity. The houſe at length renewed the votes paſſed againſt him in a former parliament; and lord Ruſſel moved for the appointment of a committee, to prepare a bill for excluding the duke of York from the ſucceſſion. This bill produced violent debates among the commons. Thoſe who ſpoke in favour of it were lord Ruſſel, Sir William Jones, Sir Francis Winnington, Sir Henry Capel, Sir William Poulteney, colonel Titus, Treby, Hampden, and Montague; and it was oppoſed by Sir Leoline Jenkins, ſecretary of ſtate; Sir John Erneley, chancellor of the exchequer; Sir William Temple, Hyde, and Seymour. It was contended by the former party, that the king, lords and commons, were inveſted with power to introduce alterations in any part of the Engliſh conſtitution; that the lineal ſucceſſion of the throne had been legally ſet aſide; that the expedient had been adopted when it had become indiſpenſibly neceſſary, in conſequence of the duke's zealous attachment to the popiſh religion, the intimacy of his connections with catholic princes, and his arbitrary diſpoſition, whereby the revival of popery, the perſecution of the proteſtants, and numberleſs other dreadful calamities were to be apprehended. It was argued by the other party, that the right of ſucceſſion had never been aboliſhed but by abſolute tyranny, or ſucceſsful uſurpation; that unleſs the nation unanimouſly concurred in deſiring a change, violent convulſions in the ſtate muſt enſue; that a legiſlature which deviates from the fundamental rules of the conſtitution, ſubverts the principles of authority on which even itſelf is founded; and that ſince it was known, that the king would not tamely relinquiſh his right of ſucceſſion, it would be impolitic and dangerous to drive him to extremity. The bill, however, paſſed the commons by a conſiderable majority: but it had a very different reception in the upper houſe, where the whole bench of biſhops, except three, declared againſt it as a dangerous innovation; and, after a warm debate, which was continued till eleven o'clock at night, it was rejected by a majority of thirty-three. This ſpirited conduct of the lords, increaſed the diſguſt of the commons, who, when the king ſent them a meſſage, requeſting that they would uſe diſpatch in the enquiry relating to the conſpiracy, and proceed to the trial of the lords confined in the Tower, replied, that the delay was wholly occaſioned by the pernicious councils of thoſe perſons, who had perſuaded his majeſty to diſſolve the late, and prorogue the preſent parliament. After this they preſented a remonſtrance to the king, wherein it was inſinuated, that his majeſty was himſelf concerned in the conſpiracy for ruining the cauſe of the proteſtants; and curſory remarks added on the great danger to which this partiality to the papiſts expoſed the nation.

At this time the impeachment of the catholic lords in the tower was revived; and it was determined to make lord viſcount Stafford the firſt victim. The clamour and outrage of the populace during the trial were very violent. The priſoner, ancient, infirm, and of a narrow capacity, made a better defence than was expected either by his friends or his enemies. He repreſented that during a courſe of forty years, from the very commencement of the civil wars, he had maintained his loyalty. With a ſimplicity more perſuaſive than the greateſt oratory, he made proteſtations of his innocence, and frequently expreſſed his ſurpriſe at the abſurdities, contradictions, and audacity of his accuſers; yet, notwithſtanding the ſtrength of the evidence produced in his defence, he was convicted of treaſon, upon the depoſitions of thoſe hirelings of a deſperate party, Dugdale, Oates, and Tuberville. Hearing the verdict pronounced, he exclaimed, "God's holy name be praiſed." Being brought to the ſcaffold on the twenty-ninth of December, in the moſt ſolemn manner he declared himſelf to be entirely innocent; and there was ſomething ſo pathetic in the reſignation of this unfortunate nobleman, that the populace exclaimed, "We believe you, my lord! God bleſs you, my lord!" Even the executioner was not proof againſt a ſympathizing ſorrow: he performed his office with manifeſt heſitation and reluctance; and he was obſerved to tremble when he held up the head, crying, "This is the head of a traitor." Not a ſign of aſſent was expreſſed among the numerous ſpectators. Thus died the earl of Stafford on the twenty-ninth of December; and this was the laſt blood ſhed on account of a popiſh plot, which, whether founded in reality, or imagination, cannot be aſcertained.

A. D. 1681.

Charles, averſe to the bill of excluſion, requeſted of the commons that they would take under ſerious conſideration, more eligible methods for the ſecurity of the proteſtant religion, and alſo the ſtate of the nation. Previous to this a bill had paſſed both houſes, for exempting proteſtant nonconformiſts from the penalties impoſed by an act in the reign of queen Elizabeth: but when the king came to the houſe of lords to give the royal aſſent, the bill had been concealed by the clerk of the crown, in conſequence of his majeſty's orders. The commons now reſolved that the act of excluſion was the only ſufficient ſecurity for the king's life, the proteſtant religion, and the ſafety of the government; that till the act was paſſed, they could not, without endangering the king's life, and the eſtabliſhed religion, grant any further ſupplies; which meaſure, under the preſent circumſtances, would be to betray the confidence repoſed in them by their conſtituents; that all thoſe who had adviſed his majeſty to reſiſt the bill of excluſion, had given pernicious council, and were enemies to their king and country. A vote was alſo paſſed, purporting, that whoever ſhould lend money, or promote loans to his majeſty, upon the cuſtoms, exciſe, or any other taxes, or accept or purchaſe tallies, or anticipations upon any of his majeſty's revenues, ſhould be liable to proſecution, as an enemy to parliament. Having heard that the king had determined, rather than his brother ſhould ſuſtain any injury, to prorogue the parliament, the houſe of commons voted, that whoever ſhould adviſe his majeſty to prorogue the parliament, ſhould be deemed a traitor to the crown of England, and a dependent upon, and a promoter of the intereſts of the court of France. Exaſperated by theſe proceedings, Charles diſſolved the aſſembly, and at the ſame time convoked a new parliament to meet at Oxford on the twenty-firſt of March.

On the meeting of the parliament at Oxford, the members appeared in arms, and were attended by their friends and partizans, as if an immediate rupture had been expected. A number of horſemen ſurrounded the repreſentatives for London, wearing ribbons inſcribed, "No popery, no ſlavery!" Charles complained of the proceedings of the laſt houſe of commons, and ſaid, that as he did not mean "to exerciſe arbitrary power over others, ſo he would not ſuffer it to be exerciſed over himſelf." He expreſſed his wiſhes, that moderation would be ſubſtituted in the room of thoſe animoſities which had formerly prevailed, and that the coolneſs of deliberation would mark their conduct. He ſaid, he was anxious, that all reaſonable fears reſpecting the poſſibility of a papiſt ſucceeding to the throne might be obviated, and declared his readineſs to agree to any ſcheme for veſting in proteſtant hands, the power of governing, during the life of any king profeſſing popery. The commons having re-elected their former ſpeaker, gave orders that their votes ſhould be daily printed, that the public might be informed of their proceedings; after which they took the king's ſpeech into conſideration, and deliberated on the expedients which his majeſty had offered in lieu of the bill of excluſion. It was propoſed, that the duke ſhould be baniſhed during life, to the diſtance of five hundred miles from any part of the Britiſh dominions; that the government ſhould be veſted in a regent; that this office ſhould be conferred upon the princeſs of Orange; and in caſe of her death, devolve to her ſiſter Anne: that ſhould the duke of York have a ſon, educated in the proteſtant religion, the ſaid regent ſhould act during his minority: that though the kingdom ſhould be governed in the name of James II. no man ſhould take arms for him, or by virtue of his commiſſion, on pain of capital puniſhment; and that thoſe ſhould incur the ſame penalty, who ſhould affirm that the ſimple title of king takes away all defects mentioned in this act, or in any degree eludes the obligation of it: that all officers civil and military, ſhould bind themſelves by oath to the obſervance of this ſtatute: that acts of the ſame nature ſhould paſs in the parliaments of Scotland and Ireland; that if the duke of York ſhould enter either of the three kingdoms, he ſhould be excluded, ipſo facto, and the ſovereignty devolve on the regent; that all papiſts of any conſideration ſhould be baniſhed by name, and their children educated in the proteſtant religion. Theſe propoſals were rejected by the commons, by whom the bill of excluſion was reſumed; and an order had been made for its being read a ſecond time, when the king unexpectedly diſſolved the parliament, and went to Windſor whence he haſtened to London, where he publiſhed a proclamation, containing his reaſons for diſſolving both the laſt and preceding parliaments.

The king received addreſſes from every part of the kingdom, expreſſive of loyalty, and applauſe of his conduct in diſſolving the parliament. Thus flattered, Charles became more arbitrary in his proceedings. He looked on the earl of Shafteſbury as his greateſt enemy, and cauſed him to be ſent to the Tower on a charge of high treaſon: ſeveral other perſons who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves againſt the meaſures of the court, were likewiſe impriſoned. Titus Oates was diſcharged from his lodgings at Whitehall, by an order of council, and endeavours were uſed to make the whole popiſh plot a matter of ridicule. A bill of indictment againſt Shafteſbury was preferred to the grand jury of London, but it was thrown out, as the witneſſes examined were perſons of the moſt infamous characters, and ſwore to circumſtances altogether improbable. A draught of an aſſociation was found among the earl's papers, but it was not of his writing; nor could it be proved that he had communicated it to any perſon, or even ſignified his approbation of it. On the bill being thrown out by the grand jury, bonfires were made, and there were the greateſt rejoicings throughout the city. The court-party obtained a conſiderable ſhare of influence in Scotland. In July, the duke of York, as king's commiſſioner, aſſembled the parliament of that kingdom; and an act was paſſed, purporting, that the crown of Scotland had, according to the fundamental laws of the monarchy, regularly deſcended to the heir of blood, and that the eſtabliſhed mode of ſucceſſion could not admit of any alteration whatever. An act was alſo paſſed for impoſing a teſt-oath upon all perſons holding public employments, whereby they were to acknowledge the ſupremacy of the king, renounce the covenant, and eſpouſe the doctrine of paſſive obedience. The oath being tendered to the earl of Argyle, he ſaid he would adhere to it as far as it was conſiſtent with itſelf, and the ſafety of the proteſtant religion; declaring at the ſame time, that he did not mean to bind himſelf up from endeavouring, by ſuch means as were conſiſtent with his loyalty, and the dictates of his conſcience, to effect ſuch alterations as ſhould promiſe to be advantageous to the church or ſtate. In conſequence of this declaration, he was committed to priſon, and being brought to trial, was convicted of perjury, and ſentenced to ſuffer death. An order being given for execution to be ſuſpended till the king's further pleaſure ſhould be known, the earl effected an eſcape, and took refuge under the protection of the States General. The adherents of the duke pretended, that he entertained no deſign againſt the life of Argyle, but was only deſirous of ſuppreſſing that extenſive hereditary juriſdiction by which he maintained a dangerous authority in the Highlands. The king having conquered all oppoſition, the duke repaired to London, and obtained ſo great an influence over his brother, that he had actually under his direction the government of England, Scotland, and Ireland.

A. D. 1682. The duke made another voyage to Scotland in the beginning of the year, and the veſſel in which he embarked, ſtriking on a ſand bank in the paſſage, was loſt. The duke ſaved himſelf in the long boat, with a few perſons, whom he named for admittance. On this occaſion it is recorded to his eternal infamy, that he ſaved ſome obſcure prieſts, and a number of favourite dogs, while many perſons of diſtinction were left to periſh. Diſguſted by the teſt-oath, the impoſition of which was the cauſe of very ſevere oppreſſion, the people of Scotland reſolved to retire to ſome other country, where they might enjoy that liberty of conſcience which was denied them at home. In purſuance of this deſign, they diſpatched agents to London to treat with the proprietor of Carolina, on the ſubject of their ſettling in that colony. The duke being apprized of their intention, found means to conciliate the affections of the nobility and clergy; and the latter wrote to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, highly extolling the equity and mildneſs of the duke's adminiſtration in general, and in particular commending the pious zeal with which he endeavoured to promote the intereſt of the church. The king having eſtabliſhed himſelf in the poſſeſſion of abſolute power, reſolved to humble the preſbyterians, and had recourſe to the moſt unjuſtifiable meaſures for the accompliſhment of his deſign. The animoſity that had long prevailed between the two parties, was increaſed to a violent and rancorous hatred, the king declared himſelf the head of a faction. The independency of the city of London was ſtill preſerved; and the ſheriff had ſufficient influence over the grand jury, to protect the preſbyterians reſident in the metropolis from oppreſſion. Charles contrived to attach to his intereſt Sir John Moor, the lord mayor of London; and nominated two perſons for ſheriffs, who, he was conſcious, would prove ſubſervient to the meaſures of adminiſtration; and a citizen of equal pliancy was found to ſucceed Moor, upon the expiration of his mayoralty. So alarmed was the earl of Shafteſbury by theſe circumſtances, that in order to provide for his perſonal ſafety, he precipitately retreated to Holland, and ſurvived only a few days after his arrival in the dominions of the States General.

A. D. 1683. The king apprehended a formidable oppoſition at the approaching election, and that his meaſures would be annually conteſted in London, and all the other corporations under the influence of the preſbytery; he therefore ſuggeſted means for eſtabliſhing deſpotic ſway over all the corporations of the kingdom. The firſt meaſure he adopted for this purpoſe, was the iſſuing a writ of Quo warranto againſt the city of London, which preſcribed an enquiry into the validity of the city charter, which he pretended had, in two inſtances, been forfeited. The firſt was, their having impoſed a toll for defraying the expence of rebuilding their markets; the other, their having in a late addreſs, reflected on the king and government. The cauſe being brought to trial in the court of King's Bench, the council in behalf of the city proved, that all corporations were inveſted with the privilege of eſtabliſhing bye-laws; that the people had an unalienable right to petition the ſovereign; that the addreſs contained no reflection upon the king, though it conveyed a cenſure againſt thoſe evil counſellors who had adviſed him to prorogue the parliament; and likewiſe inſiſted, that if the magiſtrates were guilty of the facts alledged againſt them, they were liable to puniſhment as individuals, but that their delinquency could not be underſtood by the court, as a ground for annihilating the corporation. Cogent as theſe arguments were in favour of the city, the judges who were entirely under the influence of the miniſtry, decreed, that the privileges of the city were forfeited, and that the charter was now entirely at the diſpoſal of the king: but it was determined, that this judgment ſhould not be entered upon record, till his majeſty's pleaſure ſhould be known. A common council being ſummoned, the majority agreed quietly to ſubmit to the ſentence, before it ſhould be recorded; and an addreſs being preſented expreſſive of their acquieſcence, his majeſty propoſed to reſtore the charter on the following conditions: That no mayor, or other officer of the corporation, ſhould exerciſe his authority, until his election ſhould be confirmed under the king's ſign manual; that if his majeſty ſhould not approve of their choice of a mayor and ſheriffs, a new election ſhould take place; and provided the ſecond choice ſhould prove diſagreeable to the king, he ſhould have the power of appointing perſons to ſupply the vacant places; that the mayor and court of aldermen ſhould be empowered to diſplace any alderman, with the approbation of the king; that ſhould any alderman be deemed unqualified by the court of aldermen, the ward ſhould proceed to elect another officer in his room; and in caſe of the ſecond not meeting the approbation of the court, a third ſhould be choſen by the court itſelf; and that the juſtices of the peace in London, ſhould act by virtue only of the king's commiſſion. Theſe rigorous terms being reported to the common council, they were accepted, there being a majority of eighteen voices in their favour. The fate of the city of London proved exceedingly alarming to many other corporations, who, ſurrendering up their charters to the king, were under the neceſſity of paying for their redemption a very enormous price.

Previous to his departure for Holland, the earl of Shafteſbury had engaged the duke of Monmouth, and the lords Ruſſel and Grey, to take up arms in order to oppoſe the ſucceſſion of the duke of York, upon the demiſe of king Charles, and with theſe noblemen the earls of Eſſex and Saliſbury afterwards aſſociated themſelves. The remaining leaders of the conſpirators were, the duke of Monmouth, the earl of Eſſex, the lords Ruſſel and Howard, Algernon Sidney, and John Hampden, grandſon to the patriot of that name. Theſe perſons held a correſpondence with Argyle and the mal-contents in Scotland, who perſevered in the reſolution of fomenting an inſurrection; but it ſhould be obſerved, that though engaged in one cauſe, they were actuated by different motives. Sidney entertained republican principles; the view of Howard was to gratify his own ambition: Eſſex was deſirous of introducing a republican government; Ruſſel and Hampden were for excluding the duke of York, and redreſſing all public grievances; and the duke of Monmouth aſpired to the poſſeſſion of the ſceptre of England. A ſecond ſubordinate conſpiracy was formed by colonel Rumſey, lieutenant colonel Walcot, and others, who propoſed to aſſaſſinate the king on his return from Newmarket. A farm on the Newmarket road, called the Rye-houſe, was in the poſſeſſion of one of the conſpirators named Rumbald; and hence the conſpiracy was denominated the "Rye-houſe plot." It was agreed, that by overturning a cart in the highway, adjacent to Rumbald's farm, the king's coach would be ſtopped, and that his majeſty ſhould be ſhot by ſome of the conſpirators concealed behind the hedges; and it was further reſolved, that while Rumſey ſhould be employed in making preparations for the murder, the king's guards guards ſhould be attacked by a company of forty horſemen, under the command of Walcot. While the conſpirators were engaged in the above deliberations, the palace in which the king reſided at Newmarket took fire; in conſequence of which, his majeſty ſet out for London before the time appointed for his departure; and by that means, the plan conſtructed for his deſtruction was entirely fruſtrated. Keiling, who had been engaged in the conſpiracy, apprehending a proſecution, on account of his having arreſted the lord mayor, diſcovered the particulars of the plot to the miniſtry, under the expectation of obtaining a pardon. Upon learning that Keiling had betrayed them, colonel Rumſey, and Weſt, a lawyer, ſurrendered themſelves as evidences for the crown, in the hope of preſerving their own lives. Warrants being iſſued for apprehending the conſpirators, the duke of Monmouth abſconded; Grey was arreſted, but he eſcaped from the meſſenger, who had him in cuſtody; Ruſſel was taken and committed to priſon, and many others were alſo ſecured; but Howard obtained a pardon by infamouſly betraying his friends, the earl of Eſſex, Sidney, and Hampden, who were apprehended in conſequence of his information. By the evidence of Rumſey and Weſt, Walcot, Hone, and Rouſe, were tried and convicted. They met their fate with compoſure and reſignation, acknowledging the juſtice of their ſentence. The ſame evidences were produced againſt lord Ruſſel, whom, however, it was evident, that they accuſed with great reluctance. Lord Howard depoſed, that Ruſſel was concerned in the deſign of creating an inſurrection; but all the witneſſes concurred in giving teſtimony, that he was in no manner engaged in, or privy to, the plan concerted for deſtroying the king. Lord Ruſſel was highly eſteemed by the people in general, and his virtues and many amiable qualities, extorted veneration even from his enemies. He had a ſpirit too high, to permit him to diſavow having been concerned in the conſpiracy: but the laws againſt treaſon were ſtrained to produce his conviction. After ſentence had been pronounced upon him, very powerful intereſt was made in his behalf. His ancient father, the earl of Bedford, offered the ducheſs of Portſmouth an hundred thouſand pounds, on condition of her procuring a pardon. The unhappy culprit's wife, daughter of the earl of Southampton, threw herſelf at the feet of the king, and in the moſt pathetic manner, pleaded in behalf of her huſband, urging the merits of her father in behalf of her condemned conſort. But Charles dreaded the popularity Ruſſel had acquired, and the independent principles he entertained. Remembering that he had refuſed to acknowledge that they had authority to remit the barbarous part of the ſentence pronounced againſt lord Stafford, and that he oppoſed him vigorouſly in the late parliament, he was now inexorable.

Accordingly ſentence was pronounced againſt Ruſſel; he was to ſuffer on the gallows; but the king commanded that he ſhould be beheaded, ſaying, "My lord Ruſſel ſhall find that I am poſſeſſed of that prerogative which he thought fit to deny me in the caſe of lord Stafford." Lord Cavendiſh, who had long lived in terms of the moſt intimate friendſhip with Ruſſel, propoſed to favour his eſcape, by changing apparel with him, and ſubmitting to all the conſequences of remaining in priſon in his room; and the duke of Monmouth ſent him a meſſage, declaring, that he would willingly ſurrender himſelf, if there was the leaſt reaſon to imagine that meaſure would operate towards ſaving his life. Theſe generous propoſals Ruſſel nobly declined, obſerving with the fortitude that peculiarly marked his character, that he foreſaw, and was fully prepared to meet his fate. At his laſt interview with his lady, ſo careful was ſhe not to interrupt the tranquillity he maintained, though the period of his diſſolution was ſo nearly approaching, that ſhe reſolutely contended with the keen anguiſh that wrung her heart, and ſo far ſucceeded, as not to ſhed a tear. Having parted with his lady, he exclaimed, "Now the bitterneſs of death is paſſed;" and from that moment he betrayed no ſymptom of diſcompoſure. Immediately before being conducted to the place of execution, he wound up his watch, ſaying, while his countenance indicated the moſt perfect tranquillity of mind, "I have now done with time, and muſt henceforth think only of eternity." In order to render the triumph of the court more conſpicuous, the noble priſoner was conveyed through the city, and the ſcaffold erected in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields. He was brought from the Tower to the place of execution in a coach, being attended by Tillotſon and Burnet, with whom he joined in fervent prayer. As he paſſed through the ſtreets, the populace lamented the fate of a man, for whoſe virtues they entertained the higheſt veneration. Having aſcended the ſcaffold, he preſented to the ſheriffs a paper, expreſſive of his abhorrence of popery, and aſſerting, that he was entirely innocent of any deſign againſt the life of the king. Having fervently prayed, that the Almighty would preſerve his majeſty and the proteſtant religion, he laid his neck upon the block, and ſubmitted to the fatal ſtroke with unſhaken fortitude.

This trial was immediately ſucceeded by that of Algernon Sidney. The only evidence who appeared in ſupport of the proſecution was lord Howard; but ſome manuſcripts on the ſubject of government, found among his papers, were produced in court, and theſe were affirmed to be as ſubſtantial evidence as that of living witneſſes. The papers were written in defence of liberty, maintaining the original contract upon which government was founded, and from which all power was derived; the lawfulneſs of reſiſting all tyrannical and oppreſſive meaſures; and the maxim of preferring a republican to a monarchical government. No proof was adduced of the papers having been actually written by the priſoner, or that he had expoſed them to any perſon whatever; nor did they contain a ſingle circumſtance of a treaſonable nature. Lord Ruſſel's fate had been determined in two days, but Sidney prolonged his trial three weeks. When Withers, one of the judges, gave him the lie, he diſregarded it as an injury done only to himſelf; but Jeffries interrupting him, while he was urging a plea, he cried out, "Then I appeal to God and the world; I am not heard;" and refuſed to defend himſelf any longer. When ſentence was paſſed he made this pathetic exclamation: "Then, O God! O God! I beſeech thee ſanctify theſe ſufferings to me, and impute not my blood to my country, nor to this city, through which I am to be carried to death. Let no inquiſition be made for it: but if any ſhall be made, and the ſhedding of innocent blood muſt be revenged, let the weight of it fall on thoſe who maliciouſly perſecute me for righteouſneſs ſake." Jeffries, ſtarting from his ſeat, exclaimed, that the priſoner's reaſon was affected; but Sidney calmly ſtretched out his arm, and deſired him to feel if his pulſe did not beat at its ordinary rate. This great man went to his death on the ſeventeenth of December. He walked with a firm ſtep; aſked no friend to attend him; and only borrowed two of his brother's footmen to walk behind him. When he had aſcended the ſcaffold, being aſked, if he had any thing to ſay to the people, he cried, "I have made my peace with God, and have nothing to ſay to man." Then after a moment's pauſe added, "I am ready to die, and will give you no farther trouble." Theſe were the only words he uttered in public: but he left his laſt thoughts behind him, in writing, with his friends; wherein were laid down thoſe great and generous principles of political ſociety, which were afterwards made the foundation of the revolution. Great pains were taken to ſuppreſs them.

Hampden's life was probably ſaved by the unpopularity which Sidney's trial brought upon government. Howard being the only witneſs againſt him, he was tried for a miſdemeanor; but was fined in the exorbitant ſum of forty thouſand pounds. Sir Thomas Armſtrong, who had made his eſcape, had been out-lawed, but was ſeized abroad, and brought to England before the expiration allowed by law for a ſurrender. Jeffries refuſed a trial to Armſtrong. He deſired that his counſel might be heard upon the plea of his right to a trial. This requeſt was refuſed; and on his ſaying, that he only aſked the common benefit of the law, he was anſwered by Jeffries, "You ſhall have that indeed, the full benefit of the law; for by the grace of God, you ſhall be executed on Friday next."

There was a correſpondence maintained between the duke of Monmouth and Argyle, through whoſe means the duke hoped to be joined by the covenanters in Scotland. Argyle who was then reſident in Holland, engaged to ſupply the covenanters with arms, provided that Monmouth would furniſh him with eight thouſand pounds. Bailie, of Jerviſwood, to whoſe management this buſineſs was in a great meaſure intruſted, being apprehended among ſeveral perſons concerned in the late conſpiracy, the miniſtry, as they could not find evidence ſufficient to convict him, inſiſted that he ſhould exculpate himſelf upon oath, of all ſuſpicion of having been engaged in the Rye-houſe plot. He remonſtrated againſt this procedure as tyrannical and inhuman, and refuſed to anſwer interrogatories upon oath; in conſequence of which he was committed to priſon, and fined in a penalty of ſix thouſand pounds. Thinking the puniſhment inflicted on Bailie not ſufficiently ſevere, the duke of York directed the miniſtry to ſearch for effectual evidence againſt him; and they had recourſe to the moſt iniquitous means for gratifying the enmity of the duke. The earl of Tarras, who had himſelf been impriſoned on account of the conſpiracy, and Murray, of Philiphaugh, were prevailed upon by threats and promiſes, to depoſe upon oath, that Bailie had tampered with them, evidently with a deſign of exciting an inſurrection. On the falſe evidence of theſe proſtitute witneſſes, the unhappy man was convicted of treaſon. Being already reduced to the brink of the grave by illneſs, which was increaſed by ſevere treatment, the inhuman judge, apprehending that death would diſappoint the duke of his revenge, ordered Bailie to be executed immediately after ſentence had been pronounced againſt him; and in his laſt moments, he denied having harboured any deſign injurious to the king's ſafety. The king now exerted every effort in his power to ingratiate the eſteem of his ſubjects; and conſcious that the ſuſpicion of his attachment to the popiſh religion was the principal cauſe of his unpopularity, he formed the reſolution of propoſing a matrimonial alliance between his niece, the princeſs Anne, and prince George, ſon of the king of Denmark, which accordingly took place.

At this time the duke of York had ſo greatly increaſed his power and reputation, that he was become terrible even to the miniſtry; and the earl of Halifax determined to leſſen his influence, by oppoſing to it that of the duke of Monmouth. Having diſcovered the retreat where Monmouth had taken refuge, he prevailed upon him to write twice to the king in a ſtyle of humiliation; and theſe addreſſes having revived his majeſty's paternal affection, he permitted Monmouth to return to court, and endeavoured to effect a reconciliation between him and the duke of York. The king alſo convened an extraordinary council, purpoſely to acquaint the members of Monmouth's ſincere repentance; and a paper declaratory of the reconciliation was printed in the London Gazette. But finding that he had incurred diſgrace by his confeſſion, Monmouth, immediately after he had obtained a pardon, under the uſual formalities, denied that he had made any conceſſions whatever. This duplicity of conduct ſo incenſed the king, that he baniſhed the duke from court, and ſoon after commanded him to leave the kingdom. Retiring to Holland, Monmouth experienced a cordial reception from the prince of Orange, and he ſometime afterwards held a correſpondence by letter with the king his father: but this circumſtance was concealed from the duke of York with great care.

A.D. 1684.

Tranquil as the king ſeemed to be in appearance, he was far from being ſo in reality. Whether he found himſelf ſtraitened for want of money, or dreaded the conſequences of his preſent unpopular meaſures, it is hard to determine.

Be that as it may, it is affirmed by ſome writers, that he was meditating a change of government, and had reſolved to ſend the duke of York beyond ſea; to recall Monmouth; to convoke a parliament; to diſcard his unpopular miniſters, and to throw himſelf entirely on the good will and affection of his ſubjects. If he really entertained this laudable deſign, death anticipated it's execution; he was ſeized with a ſudden fit, which reſembled an apoplexy, after which he languiſhed a few days, and he expired on the ſixth day of February, in the fifty-fifth year of his age and twenty-fifth of his reign. During his illneſs, he received the ſacrament according to the rites of the Romiſh church, and died in that communion. Two papers written with his own hand, in defence of the catholic religion, were found in his cloſet, and the duke imprudently cauſed them to be publiſhed; which tended to ſtigmatize the memory of his brother, and to convince the world of his own ſuperſtition and bigotry.

Charles had no legitimate offspring, but he had a great many children by ſeveral of his concubines. By Mrs. Lucy Walters, he had James, duke of Monmouth; by Mrs. Killigrew, created viſcounteſs Shannon, Charlotte-Jemima-Henrietta-Maria; by Mrs. Catharine Peg, Charles Fitz-Charles, earl of Plymouth; by Mrs. Barbara Villiers, created lady Nonſuch, counteſs of Southampton, and ducheſs of Cleveland, Charles Fitz-Roy, duke of Southampton, Henry Fitz-Roy, duke of Grafton, George Fitz-Roy, duke of Northumberland, and three daughters; by Mrs. Eleanor Gwyn, Charles Beauclerk, duke of St. Albans, and James Beauclerk; by Louiſa de Querouaille (a native of France) ducheſs of Portſmouth, Charles Lenox, duke of Richmond; by Mrs. Mary Davis, Mary Tudor, married to Francis lord Radcliffe, earl of Derwentwater.

Commerce and manufuctures flouriſhed more in this reign, than in any other period of the Engliſh monarchy: the arts and ſciences were cultivated with good ſucceſs. In the firſt year, a few philoſophers procured a patent; and having enlarged their number, were called the Royal Society. This inſtitution began to ſoften the manners, by improving the underſtandings of men, though without receiving any bounty from the ſovereign. There aroſe alſo ſome individuals of ſuperior genius, who drew on themſelves, and on their native country, the attention of all Europe. Beſides Wilkins, Wren, Wallis, Barrow, and Ward, all eminent mathematicians; Hook, an accurate obſerver by microſcopes; and Sydenham, the reſtorer of the true practice of phyſic, there flouriſhed. During this period, we find a Boyle and a Newton, men, who had with cautious, and therefore the moſt ſecure ſteps, purſued the only path that leads to true philoſophy. The air-pump, invented by Otto Guerick, was improved by Boyle, who made many new and curious experiments on the air, as well as on other bodies. His chemiſtry is much admired by all who are acquainted with that art; and his hydroſtatics contain a mixture of reaſoning and invention, with many important experiments. In Newton this iſland may boaſt of having produced the moſt penetrating genius that aroſe for the ornament and inſtruction of mankind. Cautious of admitting no principles but ſuch as were founded on experiments; but reſolute to adopt every principle of that kind, however new or unuſual; from modeſty, ignorant of his ſuperiority above the reſt of mankind; and thence leſs careful of adapting his reaſons to common apprehenſions; more anxious to merit than acquire fame, he was for theſe cauſes long unknown to the world: but his reputation at laſt broke out with a luſtre, which ſcarce any writer, during his own life time, had ever before acquired.

Stillingfleet, Patrick, Tenniſon, Tillotſon, and Lloyd, were ſhining lights in divinity. The Belles Lettres were making daily advances to perfection. Dryden filled the chief ſeat in poetry; but his writings are juſtly cenſurable for that vein of licentiouſneſs which runs through the whole. The depravity of the public taſte, and the preſſing neceſſities of the writer, may indeed be pleaded in excuſe for theſe faults. His Ode on St. Cecilia's day, ſtands unrivalled in the Engliſh language. Wicherley in his comedies, and Otway in his tragedies, have both great merit. The latter, however, received ſo little encouragement, that he died almoſt in want of the common neceſſaries of life. The love of literature in this period inſpired the breaſts even of the higheſt perſonages. The court itſelf became emulous of the bays. The duke of Buckingham's rehearſal ſtill ſtands diſtinguiſhed in the rank of comic ſatire. The earl of Rocheſter, vicious as his ideas were, poſſeſſed ſo ſtrange a power of pleaſing, that while we condemn his morals, we cannot help being delighted with the muſic of his numbers. The earls of Dorſet, Roſcommon, and Mulgrave, wrote with eaſe and ſpirit, and with that pleaſing negligence peculiar to the gentleman. The marquis of Halifax is juſtly diſtinguiſhed for his refined genius, and had he not been a principal perſon in the ſtate, he would have claimed the firſt rank in literature; but his aſſiduous application to buſineſs ſpoiled his literature.

Sir William Temple is almoſt the only author who kept himſelf unpolluted by that inundation of vice and licentiouſneſs which deluged the nation. The ſtile of this writer, though extremely negligent, and even mixed with foreign idioms, is very agreeable and intereſting. That mixture of vanity which appears in his works, is rather an advantage than a fault: for by that means we enter into the character of the author, full of honour and humanity, and believe ourſelves engaged in converſation with a companion, rather than in the peruſal of a volume.

The Hudibras of Butler abounds with more ſtrokes of genuine wit, than any other compoſition; and it is ſurpriſing how much erudition Butler has introduced with ſo good a grace, into a work of pleaſantry and humour. The advantage which the royal cauſe received from this poem was prodigious. The king was highly pleaſed with its merit, carried it frequently in his pocket, and could even repeat a great part of it; yet he ſuffered the ingenious author, who was alſo a man of probity and virtue, to live in obſcurity and die in want. Such the liberality—ſuch the gratitude of the Stuart family!

Character, Principles, &c. of Charles the Second.

The character of this king has been elaborately delineated by four cotemporary writers, the duke of Buckingham, the marquis of Halifax, biſhop Burnet, and Dr. Wellwood, by each of whom he is drawn in colours moſt expreſſive of their particular principles and prejudices. The duke has certainly diſcovered want of candour, in comparing Charles, with reſpect to his deceit and cruelty, to the Roman emperor Tiberius; and the other three are partial in the oppoſite extreme, by palliating his vices, exaggerating his good qualities, and aſcribing to him virtues which were never his.

In his perſon Charles was tall and ſwarthy, having a countenance marked with ſtrong, harſh lineaments; and in his manners, gay, ſprightly, polite, and affable. He was eaſy of acceſs, and an agreeable companion. His love of raillery, which was always tempered with good breeding, was never offenſive; and his propenſity to ſatire was ſo checked by diſcretion, that his friends were under no apprehenſion of becoming the objects of it. He was fond of laying aſide the formalities of ſtate, and of playing the merry, and at times, the profligate debauchee; or, as Churchill obſerves, with juſt poignancy,

" Another Charles ſucceeded; in the ſchool
" Of Trowel he had learn'd to play the fool;
" And like pert pupils with dull tutors ſent,
" To ſhame their country on the continent,
" From love of England by long abſence wean'd,
" From every court he every folly glean'd;
" And was, ſo cloſe do evil habits cling,
" 'Till crown'd a beggar, and when crown'd no king."

As a king, Charles had not a ſingle quality worthy of imitation. Ambitious of power, yet deſtitute of reſolution and perſeverance; deſirous of popularity, yet without the addreſs neceſſary to conciliate the affections of his ſubjects; ſufficiently penetrating, yet diſqualified, by an exceſſive love of eaſe and luxurious pleaſure, his ruling paſſions, from elaborate diſquiſitions of government, and a ſerious inveſtigation of the maxims of policy. Wholly addicted to ſenſual gratifications, or unprofitable diverſions, he would ſacrifice to them the intereſt and glory of his kingdoms, which might ſink or ſwim, ſo that he could but gratify his darling inclinations. Hence, in his public meaſures, he acted either from the influence of caprice, the impulſe of neceſſity, or the ſuggeſtions of mercenary and wicked miniſters. Though he embraced the popiſh religion abroad, in hopes of having the aid of the catholic princes towards his reſtoration, yet he was quite indifferent to all religions; and it was equal to him whether popery or proteſtantiſm were the eſtabliſhed religion, ſo that he might have an indulgence for his beloved pleaſures. Though he himſelf made a trifling progreſs in mechanics and chemiſtry, yet he was ſo beſet by miſtreſſes and craving courtiers, that he had neither money nor attention for literary merit. He brought with him to England the eaſy manners of the French, with the faſhions of that court, without its politeneſs; inſtead of which reigned wanton revelry, riot, and profaneneſs. He was a cold and uncomplaiſant huſband, and had no real regard for any one beſides his children, his brother, and his miſtreſſes. He married merely for convenience ſake, nor could the queen, who was a princeſs of virtue, either by the graces of her perſon or diſpoſition, render herſelf agreeable to the king. He was incapable of friendſhip; and never attached himſelf to any of his courtiers, miniſters, or companions with a ſincere affection. He judged of them, and of all his ſubjects, from his own heart; and believed all mankind falſe, perfidious, and intereſted. Hence, when his ſervants and moſt intimate friends were attacked by the popular party, he made no difficulty in giving them up, and of ſigning the warrant for their execution. With all his appearance of good nature, he was often cruel, frequently unjuſt; and when compliant, not from principle, but becauſe his attention was diverted from examining into the merit of cauſes. The treatment of the duke of Argyle, the proſecution and execution of many innocent ſufferers, particularly of the great Ruſſel, and of the noble patriot Sidney, who ſaved his life; his ordering Gordon of Earlſtone to be put to the torture when under ſentence of death, evince that he had no regard to juſtice, nor any of the generous, tender feelings of humanity. His treatment of the Scots, though he had ſworn to obſerve the covenant, and of the nonconformiſts in England, notwithſtanding his declaration at Breda, ſhew that he was deſtitute of all ſenſe of honour. He was not only negligent of the intereſt of the nation, careleſs of its glory, laviſh of its treaſures, and jealous of its liberties, but a gay and polite tyrant, who, while he ſeemed in ſport, deprived his ſubjects of their moſt invaluable privileges, and endeavoured to render them a nation of ſlaves. Placed as he was in the higheſt ſphere of life, for which he was altogether unqualified, he drew upon himſelf the contempt, not only of neighbouring potentates, but alſo of his own ſubjects. His character is thus delineated by the author of Privilege, a poem:

" To realms long panting for the ſweets of reſt
" The ſun invited flew: the changing realm
" Caught at a ſtroke the vices of the helm;
" In pleaſures round the giddy ſubjects rove,
" A land of licence, ridicule, and love;
" A dupe to folly, and to whims a ſlave,
" Calm he receiv'd the joke he freely gave.
" His ſcoff religion, glory was his hate,
" Careleſs of right, and thoughtleſs of the ſtate.
" Foes were regarded, but his friends unknown,
" Thoſe very friends who rais'd him to the throne."

A. D. 1685. UNOPPOSED, or in the leaſt moleſted, James now aſcended the throne of England. In order to allay all ferments in the minds of his ſubjects, he thought it moſt prudent to aſſemble the privy council, and to harangue them with a flattering ſpeech, filled with promiſes which he never intended to perform. Accordingly when the council aſſembled, he told them, after beſtowing ſome praiſes on the memory of his predeceſſor, that it was his determined reſolution to maintain the eſtabliſhed government both in church and ſtate: that, though he had been reported to have imbibed very arbitrary principles, he well knew that the laws of England were abundantly ſufficient to render him as great a monarch as he could wiſh; and he was determined never to depart from them. He added, that as he had many times ventured his life in the defence of the nation, he would ſtill go as far as any man in ſupport of its juſt rights and privileges; and that he would exert his utmoſt power and abilities to maintain the balance of power in Europe, and to free the nation from that ſtate of dependence, or rather vaſſalage, in which it had for ſome time been held by its ambitious neighbours. A ſpeech, filled with ſuch noble ſentiments, was received with general applauſe both of the privy council and the nation in general. Addreſſes came from all quarters, full of duty, and many of them conceived in terms of the moſt ſervile adulation. Every one haſtened to pay his duty to the new monarch; and James had reaſon to think, that, notwithſtanding the violent efforts made by the country party for his excluſion, no monarch in Europe ſat firmer on his throne than himſelf. But the thinking part of the nation were not to be impoſed upon by ſpecious aſſurances. It was indeed a kind of infatuation to ſuppoſe, that he really entertained the ſentiments he profeſſed. They had known him, while duke of York, to be a bigot to the Romiſh religion, and a zealous oppoſer of the reformation: they had been often witneſſes that his diſpoſition was mercileſs and cruel; and that he totally diſregarded the liberties of the people, and the eſtabliſhed form of government. They knew he was the principal adviſer and promoter of all the unpopular and arbitrary meaſures purſued by his brother during the latter part of his reign, and that he himſelf was the ſworn friend of Lewis the Fourteenth, whoſe ambition all Europe dreaded; and, like that monarch, a ſworn enemy to all whom the Romiſh church ſtiled heretics. It was not therefore reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that he would entirely alter his ſentiments when he came to the throne. James was ſenſible, penetrating and enterprizing; but he was devoid of judgment, and withal headſtrong, violent, and arbitrary.

The people's ſuſpicions were ſoon verified: for the very firſt Sunday after his acceſſion, he went publicly to hear maſs, with all the enſigns of royalty, which the laws of the kingdom had declared to be criminal. The duke of Norfolk, who carried the ſword of ſtate, ſtopped at the door of the chapel: the king paſſing him, ſaid, " My lord, your father would have gone farther." The duke anſwered, " Your majeſty's father would not have gone ſo far." About the ſame time, James ſent Caryl to Rome, in order to make ſubmiſſions to the pope, and to pave the way for a re-admiſſion of England into the boſom of the catholic church. Innocent the Eleventh, who then filled the papal chair, very prudently adviſed the king not to be too precipitate in his meaſures, nor raſhly attempt what repeated experience might convince him was abſolutely impracticable. The Spaniſh ambaſſador Ronquillo, knowing the tranquillity of England abſolutely neceſſary for the ſupport of Spain, uſed the freedom of making the ſame remonſtrances. He obſerved how buſy the prieſts appeared at court, and adviſed the king not to liſten with too great facility to their dangerous councils. "Is it not cuſtomary in Spain," replied James, "for the king to conſult his confeſſor?" "Yes," returned the ambaſſador, "And it is for that reaſon our affairs ſucceed ſo ill." However, notwithſtanding the king's prejudices, the principal offices of the crown ſtill continued in the poſſeſſion of proteſtants; nor did he as yet think proper to ſhew much partiality to thoſe of his own communion: but his reſentment againſt the witneſſes for the popiſh plot, he did not think proper to conceal. Titus Oates was tried for perjury on two indictments; one for ſwearing that he was preſent at a conſultation of jeſuits in London, on the twenty-fourth of April, 1679; another for ſwearing that father Ireland was in London between the eighth of Auguſt and the beginning of September in the ſame year. Being fully convicted, he was ſentenced to be fined a thouſand marks on each indictment; to be whipped on two different days from Aldgate to Newgate, and from Newgate to Tyburn; to be impriſoned during life, and to ſtand on the pillory five times every year. He made ſolemn appeals to heaven, and the ſtrongeſt proteſtations of the veracity of his teſtimony: though the whipping was ſo cruel, that he ſwooned away ſeveral times, and it was evidently the deſign of the court to put him to death by that puniſhment, he was, however, enabled, by the care of his friends, to recover; and he lived till William mounted the Engliſh throne, when he was not only releaſed from his confinement, but received a penſion of one hundred pounds a year.

On the twenty-third of April, the coronation of James was performed; when the crown, not being properly fitted to his head, tottered. Henry Sidney, keeper of the robes, kept it from falling off, ſaying with pleaſantry, "This is not the firſt time our family has ſupported the crown." This circumſtance was remarked and much talked of. James, whatever diſlike he had to an Engliſh parliament, found it neceſſary to ſummon one. On the nineteenth of May the king opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, in which, after ſolemnly repeating the promiſe he had made before the privy-council of governing according to the laws, and of preſerving the proteſtant religion, he plainly told them, he expected they would ſettle his revenue during his life, as they had done that of his brother. "I might," ſaid he, "uſe many arguments to inforce this demand; the benefit of trade; the ſupport of the navy; the neceſſities of the crown; and the well-being of the government itſelf, which I muſt not ſuffer to be precarious. But I am confident that your own conſideration, and your ſenſe of what is juſt and reaſonable, will ſufficiently ſuggeſt to you whatever on this occaſion might be enlarged upon. There is, indeed, one popular argument, which may be urged againſt complying with my demand. Men may think, that by feeding me from time to time with ſupplies, as they ſee convenient, they will better ſecure frequent meetings of parliament: but as this is the firſt time I have ſpoken to you from the throne, I muſt plainly tell you, that ſuch an expedient would be very improper to employ with me: and that the beſt way to engage me to meet you often, is always to uſe me well." The meaning of this ſpeech was very evident; and had the country party formed the majority in the lower houſe, his demands would certainly have been rejected. But they were now too weak to ſtem the torrent of power; they wiſely therefore ſubmitted to the times, and voted the king all he deſired. This gave James the higheſt ſatisfaction, and he began to hope for a peaceful and happy reign.

But this interval of tranquillity did not laſt long: the earl of Argyle, who had been obliged to fly from Scotland during the late reign, on an accuſation of having been concerned in a ſcheme formed by the duke of Monmouth for exciting a rebellion in that kingdom, flattered himſelf that the time was now come, when he might ſucceſsfully ſtir up his countrymen againſt James, whom he conſidered as the ſole author of his diſgrace and miſfortunes. He imparted his deſign to Monmouth, who was then an exile alſo in Holland; and that prince immediately conſented to the project. They hired a few ſhips of the Dutch, and got together about two or three hundred of the Engliſh exiles in Flanders, men of deſperate fortunes, and who had no means of retrieving their affairs but by a change of government at home. This was the whole force the duke and earl had to depend upon, except their hopes of being joined by a formidable number of the whig party, in caſe they could effect a ſucceſsful landing either in England or Scotland. The earl of Argyle, at the head of a ſmall company, but with arms ſufficient for five thouſand men, ſailed from Holland in the beginning of May, and made a deſcent on the coaſt of Scotland. But he ſoon found himſelf deceived in the hope he had entertained of being joined by a great number of his friends. He was, indeed, fortunate enough to collect about two thouſand men, chiefly belonging to his own clan in the Highlands. But the government having received advice of his intended enterprize, were prepared for his reception. A conſiderable body of troops were ſent againſt him ſoon after his landing; while he, by the help of his ſhips, tranſported his men from place to place, till two or three of the king's ſhips arrived in thoſe parts, when he was compelled to quit the ſea-coaſts and march into the country, where he was inceſſantly purſued by the royal army. His followers, perceiving that oppoſition was in vain, abandoned their maſter, and he himſelf was ſoon after ſeized and conveyed to Edinburgh, where he was publicly executed. Rumbald, the contriver of the Rye-houſe plot, and ſome others who had fled from juſtice, and returned with Argyle, were alſo taken and executed. The earl's father had on a ſimilar occaſion ſuffered the ſame fate.

Monmouth was equally unfortunate in his attempt. He ſailed from the Texel on the twenty-fourth of May; and after being detained for nineteen days by contrary winds, landed at Lime in Dorſetſhire, with about eighty followers, but with arms for a much greater number. Some of his officers diſperſed themſelves about the country in order to prevail on the people to join them; in which they ſo far ſucceeded, that the duke's little party was increaſed to two thouſand men, moſtly from the adjacent counties. On his firſt landing he publiſhed a manifeſto, in which he explained the cauſe of his landing in England, the recovery of his natural rights, aſſerting the validity of the late king's marriage with his mother, and to free the nation from the deſpotiſm of the duke of York, whom he accuſed as the author of the dreadful conflagration, by which the greater part of the city of London was laid in aſhes; of the late popiſh plot for taking away the life of the king; for ſubverting the proteſtant religion; of the murder of the earl of Eſſex in the Tower, and of having poiſoned the king his brother. At the ſame time he repreſented that his very religion incapacitated him from ſwaying the ſceptre of England, which could never hope for peace or ſafety while a papiſt and a tyrant ſat upon the throne. This declaration produced very little effect in the duke's favour; few perſons of any diſtinction joined his ſtandard, ſo that his army conſiſted chiefly of a rude and undiſciplined rabble. With theſe, however, he marched from Lyme to Taunton, where he took upon him the title of king. Here he met with ſome reinforcements, by which means his army amounted to about ſix thouſand men: but inſtead of marching directly to Briſtol, the taking of which place would have been of infinite ſervice to his cauſe, he waſted his time in the ridiculous pageantry of his proclamation; while the king employed himſelf in making preparations to oppoſe him. Six regiments of Britiſh troops were called over from Holland: the army was conſiderably augmented; and regular forces, to the number of three thouſand men, were diſpatched under the command of Feverſham and Churchill, in order to check the progreſs of the rebels. Monmouth now perceived, that he muſt either conquer or periſh. He therefore ſet forward to meet the king's forces, and hoped to find them unprepared for an attack. But when he came within ſight of the royaliſts, he found them drawn up in excellent order at Sedgley-moor, near Bridgewater. The battle began early the next morning, when Monmouth's horſe fled at the firſt charge, which circumſtance was imputed either to the inexperience, cowardice, or treachery of their commander, lord Gray. The foot was not ſo eaſily ſubdued: they maintained their ground with amazing courage for ſome time; but being expoſed to a moſt terrible fire from the enemy's artillery, they at length gave way, after which a moſt dreadful ſlaughter enſued among them; three hundred were killed on the ſpot, one thouſand in the purſuit, and as many made priſoners. Monmouth had fled about twenty miles from the field of battle, when his horſe ſunk under him. He was then obliged to purſue his way on foot. Coming to a little cottage, he changed cloaths with the peaſant who occupied it. In this diſguiſe he continued his flight, till unable to walk any farther, he laid himſelf down in a ditch thick covered with fern. But a party of the king's forces paſſing by the cottage the next day, knew the duke's cloaths which the countryman had on. They immediately obliged the poor man to tell them which road the duke had taken; and after a ſtrict ſearch they found him in his hiding place, from whence they conducted him to London, where he was lodged in the Tower. He now wrote to the king, humbly imploring his pardon, and giving him the moſt ſolemn aſſurances, if he would graciouſly pleaſe to overlook his former errors, that he would endeavour by his future conduct to render himſelf worthy of ſo great a favour. James, finding ſuch ſymptoms of depreſſion and deſpondency in the unhappy priſoner, admitted him to his preſence, in hopes of extorting a diſcovery of his accomplices: but Monmouth would not purchaſe life at the price of ſo much infamy. He, therefore, reſigned himſelf to his fate with a ſpirit becoming his rank and character. On the fifteenth of July he was brought to the ſcaffold, attended by the tears of the multitude. He warned the executioner not to fall into the error which he had committed in beheading Ruſſel, where he was obliged to redouble the blow. But this precaution had not the deſired effect, for it ſo intimidated the man, that he could ſtrike only a feeble blow on the neck of Monmouth, who raiſed his head from the block, and looked him in the face, as if reproaching him for his failure, he again laid down his head, and the executioner ſtruck him twice but without effect. Throwing away the axe, he declared himſelf incapable of finiſhing the bloody office. The ſheriff, however, obliged him to renew the attempt, and at two blows more the head was ſevered from the body. Thus fell James, duke of Monmouth, whoſe character in many reſpects, was truly amiable; he was brave, generous, and ſincere; but too open to flattery, and too warmly addicted to pleaſure; he was the darling of the people, the conſequence of which, added to the allurements of ambition, had engaged him in an enterprize for which he was, of all men, the leaſt qualified; and which proved fatal to him in the end.

The ſucceſs now obtained over Monmouth was proſecuted with the moſt unrelenting cruelty. Feverſham hanged above twenty priſoners; and Jefferies, the lord chief juſtice, was ſent into the weſt, to try the unhappy perſons, who had been concerned in the late raſh, and ill-concerted rebellion. Colonel Kirke, a ſoldier of fortune, who had long ſerved at Tangiers, and, from his intercourſe with the Moors, had contracted a diſpoſition more inhuman than any known in Europe, attended him with a body of troops to keep the people in awe. The bare recital of the barbarities committed by theſe two fiends, in human ſhape, muſt fill every reader with horror. They hanged up numbers of perſons in the moſt inſulting manner, and many without any form of trial. Kirke cauſed thirty of theſe poor wretches to be executed at one time, in the ſight of himſelf and his officers, while they ſat at dinner. By way of experiment, he ordered one man to be hung up three ſeveral times, queſtioning him at every interval, whether he repented of his crime; but the man obſtinately aſſerting, that notwithſtanding all that had paſſed, he would willingly engage in the ſame cauſe, Kirke ordered him to be hung in chains. One ſtory told of him is memorable for the treachery, as well as the barbarity which attended it. A young maid pleaded ſo ſtrongly for the life of her brother, or, as ſome ſay, her father, and flung herſelf at Kirke's feet, armed with all the charms which beauty and innocence, bathed in tears, could beſtow upon her, that the tyrant was inflamed with deſire, though not ſoftened into either love or clemency. He promiſed to grant her requeſt, provided ſhe, in return, would be equally compliant to him. The maid yielded to the conditions; but after paſſing the night with him, the wanton ſavage ſhewed her next morning, from the window, her brother, the darling object for whom ſhe had ſacrificed her virtue, hung on a gibbet, which he had ſecretly ordered to be there erected for his execution. Rage, deſpair, and indignation took at once poſſeſſion of her mind, and deprived her for ever of her ſenſes. All the inhabitants of the country, innocent as well as guilty, were expoſed to the ravages of this barbarian. The ſoldiers were ſuffered to live at free quarters; and his own regiment, inſtructed by his example, and encouraged by his exhortations, diſtinguiſhed themſelves in a more particular manner, by their outrages. By way of pleaſantry, he uſed to call them his "lambs," an appellation long remembered in the weſt of England with horror. The unjuſt judge Jefferies, who had already given ſpecimens of his character, in many trials where he had preſided, now ſet out with the moſt ſavage joy, to a whole harveſt of death and deſtruction. He began at Dorcheſter; where thirty rebels being arraigned, he exhorted them to ſave him, by a free confeſſion, the trouble of trying them; and when twenty were found guilty, he ordered them, as an additional puniſhment for their diſobedience, to be led immediately to execution. Terrified by this example, moſt of the other priſoners pleaded guilty; and no leſs than two hundred and ninety-two received ſentence of death at Dorcheſter, and eighty of them were executed. The next ſtage of this inhuman cruelty was Exeter. Two hundred and forty-three were there tried, and many of them condemned and put to death. From Exeter he paſſed to Taunton and Wells, carrying terror and aſtoniſhment with him. The juries were ſo intimidated with his menaces, that they gave their verdicts with ſo much precipitation, that many innocent perſons were involved with the guilty. So that upon the whole, beſides thoſe butchered by the military commanders, two hundred and fifty-one were computed to have fallen by the hand of proſtituted juſtice. The whole country was ſtrewed with the heads and limbs of the ſufferers. Almoſt every village beheld the carcaſe of ſome wretched inhabitant; and all the rigours of cruelty were fully diſplayed without the leaſt mixture of clemency. The moſt remarkable trial was that of the lady Liſle, widow of one of the regicides, but herſelf a royaliſt, and now very old. She was indicted for harbouring a preſbyterian miniſter, one of Monmouth's party; though not one of the parties mentioned in the proclamation. The jury thrice refuſed to find a verdict againſt her, and were as often ſent back with reproaches by the inhuman Jefferies; ſo that they were at laſt obliged to bring her in guilty. Theſe inſtances of ſeverity ſo recommended the lord chief juſtice, that he was ſoon after rewarded with the office of lord high chancellor. Beſides theſe inſtances of ſavage cruelty inflicted on the weſtern rebels, a great many more were exerciſed in London, and different parts of the kingdom, on the proteſtant party; under pretence, either of their having been concerned in the Rye-houſe plot, or of favouring Monmouth's attempt. Theſe meaſures were equally influenced by revenge, and the favourite deſign of eſtabliſhing popery in theſe kingdoms. This ſcheme had been long ſince formed by James while duke of York; but never openly attempted till now, when being freed from Monmouth's rebellion, the king thought himſelf capable of carrying it ſpeedily into execution. He accordingly began in Ireland, where he diſſolved the privy-council, appointed a new one, and took care that the majority of the members ſhould be papiſts. The proteſtants in that kingdom were every where diſarmed, while means were found to keep on foot a ſtanding army of catholics. Colonel Talbot, afterwards earl of Tyrconnel, by caſhiering ſuch officers and ſoldiers as he thought proper, and filling their places with others, ſoon modelled the army to the purpoſes it was intended to ſerve. Paſſive obedience and non-reſiſtance were inculcated as articles in the Engliſh creed; while the foreign ſtates were vying with each other in courting the favour of a monarch who confeſſedly held the balance of Europe in his hands.

The king now perſuaded he had no longer any occaſion for diſguiſing his ſentiments or ſuffering any reſtraint in his actions, began to diſcover his deſigns in a manner too plain to be miſtaken. He opened the ſeſſion of parliament on the ninth of November, with a ſpeech, in which, after congratulating them on the happy ſuppreſſion of the late rebellion, he obſerved, that the great reinforcements the rebels had received before they were quelled, had been entirely owing to the want of a regular force to diſperſe them at the firſt breaking out of the inſurrection. He added, that the houſe muſt be very ſenſible, that the militia was very inſufficient for the defence of the kingdom in ſuch exigencies, and therefore plainly told them, that he was determined to ſupport the regular troops he had raiſed, amounting to fifteen thouſand men, and demanded a ſupply for their maintenance. At the ſame time, he deſired the parliament not to take exception at his having admitted ſome catholic officers into the army, and diſpenſed with the teſt act in their favour "They are, continued he, well known, and have ſerved me faithfully during the late commotions: and I will deal plainly with you, that having received the benefit of their ſervices at a time of ſo much danger, I will neither expoſe them to diſgrace, nor myſelf to the want of them." This complaiſant, this ſubmiſſive parliament, ſtill remembered, that there was ſuch a thing as liberty entailed on the people of this happy land; and that they were the ſworn conſervators of that ineſtimable treaſure in the behalf of the people. They would have gone any decent lengths rather than come to a rupture with the king, or incur his diſpleaſure: but this open declaration on his part to govern without the laws, and even to act repugnant to them, rouſed them from their lethargy; and ſome who had been the warmeſt oppoſers of the excluſion bill, began to be alarmed at the large ſtrides the king had made towards eſtabliſhing arbitrary power. The motion for an addreſs of thanks to the king for his ſpeech, met with great oppoſition in the houſe of lords; and though it paſſed by a ſmall majority, the houſe reſolved to take the ſpeech into farther conſideration. But it was different in the houſe of commons; for when lord Middleton, ſecretary of ſtate, made a motion for thanking the king for his ſpeech from the throne, ſeveral of the members refuſed it; and a motion being made for an addreſs to the king againſt employing popiſh officers in the army, contrary to the known laws of the land, it was carried in the affirmative, and the addreſs was accordingly preſented; at which his majeſty was highly offended. But before the addreſs was preſented, the commons voted him a ſupply of ſeven hundred thouſand pounds. James, however, ſent them a ſharp reprimand, for the liberty they had taken in their addreſs; and abſolutely told them that he was fixed in his reſolution both with regard to keeping up a ſtanding army and employing catholic officers. Terrified by this haughty meſſage, the commons conſented to indemnify the officers already employed; and to paſs a new act for qualifying a certain number whom the king ſhould name. But ſo imperious was the king's temper; ſo lofty the idea he had entertained of his own authority, ſo violent the ſchemes ſuggeſted by his own bigotry and that of his prieſts, that without any delay or waiting for any farther provocation, he immediately prorogued the parliament, by which he loſt the ſupplies voted by the commons. He continued the parliament, by four more prorogations, a year and a half longer; but having, in vain, tried every experiment, to break the obſtinacy of the leading members, that aſſembly was accordingly diſſolved.

A. D. 1686.

Almoſt all places, civil and military, were now in poſſeſſion of the catholics; ſo that the proteſtants had little to hope, and almoſt every thing to fear; they even dreaded a renewal of the ancient maſſacres, and many perſons came to England, where they inſpired their fellow-ſubjects with dreadful ideas of the expected outrages. James, impetuous and haſty, in violation of a ſtatute, erected a new eccleſiaſtical commiſſion court, compoſed of ſeven members, ſecular as well as clerical; among the former were lord chancellor Jefferies, and the earls of Rocheſter and Sunderland. Upon which he directed a circular letter to be ſent to the biſhops, to enjoin them to direct the inferior clergy not to preach on controverted points; but this order was little regarded; the divines of the church of England continued to exert their talents to the utmoſt advantage; and Tillotſon, Stillingfleet, Tenniſon, Patrick, Sharp, and others, were greatly diſtinguiſhed by their zealous defence of the proteſtant cauſe. The diſguſt of the public was increaſed by the king's encamping camping an army of fifteen thouſand men, under the command of the earl of Feverſham, on Hounſlow-heath; and a chapel was erected in the camp, where maſs was publicly ſaid daily; a plain indication of the king's intention of making converts to his faith. Sunderland ſacrificed his religion to his intereſt, though he would not publicly abjure the doctrine of popery. The earl of Rocheſter agreed to hold a conference with ſome of the Romiſh clergy, but he declared himſelf diſſatisfied with their arguments, and refuſed to change his religion. He was deprived of the office of treaſurer, which was put in commiſſion; but he was gratified with a conſiderable penſion. The privy-ſeal was now taken from Clarendon, and delivered to lord Arundel. At this time the king meanly condeſcended to aſk Kirke to become a papiſt, when the latter told him he was pre-engaged, having promiſed the emperor of Morocco, that "he would turn Muſſulman, if ever he changed his religion."

A. D. 1687. The king now pretended to become the friend of toleration, and the determined enemy of all kind of perſecution, though there is not the leaſt doubt but that his view was to eſtabliſh popery on the ruins of the proteſtant religion. He aſſumed the power of publiſhing a declaration of general indulgence, and of ſuſpending all thoſe penal ſtatutes, which required conformity in public worſhip. This afforded a temporary ſatisfaction to the diſſenters, who thought themſelves happy in an opportunity of worſhipping God according to the dictates of their own hearts, though they had diſcernment enough to ſee that this happineſs would be but of ſhort continuance. James to make himſelf appear as ridiculous abroad as he already did at home, ſent the earl of Caſtlemain to Rome, as his ambaſſador extraordinary, "to make his ſubmiſſion to the pope, and to reconcile his three kingdoms to the holy ſee, from which they had unhappily fallen by hereſy." But the pope, who had more ſenſe than James, ſeeing the impracticability of his undertaking, and having alſo a quarrel with the French king, who was in cloſe friendſhip with the king of England, received the ambaſſador with the moſt mortifying indifference. Whenever he was to have an audience, the pope was ſeized with a fit of coughing, ſo that the earl's ſpeech was interrupted, and he was obliged to retire; and this happened ſo frequently, that Caſtlemain ſaw the contempt with which he was treated, and threatened to return; in anſwer to which the pope only ſent him word, that "ſince he was diſpoſed to go, he would adviſe him to ſet out early in the morning, and reſt at noon, becauſe it was dangerous travelling in that country in the heat of the day." The only proof of complaiſance from his holineſs the king received, was that of ſending a nuncio into England, in return for the embaſſy; to whom the king, ſo little regard did he pay to the laws, gave a ſolemn and public reception at Windſor. The nuncio reſided publicly in London, during the remainder of this reign; and the popiſh clergy appeared in the habits of their reſpective orders at court.

James having granted the Roman Catholics a large ſhare in the adminiſtration of civil affairs, now formed a deſign of introducing them into the church. A Benedictine monk, named Allen Francis, was recommended, by the royal mandate, to the univerſity of Cambridge, to be admitted to the degree of maſter of arts, without taking the oaths: but the univerſity refuſing to admit him, the vice-chancellor was deprived of his office, by the eccleſiaſtical commiſſioners: but this had not the deſired effect; for the univerſity choſe a perſon to the office, of principles totally different from the party nominated by the king. This attempt to impoſe a papiſt on the people of Cambridge failing, the next was made on Oxford, where the preſidentſhip of Magdalen-college being vacant, the king ſent his mandate to the vice-preſident and fellows, in favour of Anthony Farmer, a man of ill-fame, who had promiſed to declare himſelf a catholic. The fellows of the college petitioned the king to revoke the mandate; but before an anſwer was received, the day arrived on which, by their ſtatutes, they were bound to proceed to election; whereupon they made choice of Dr. Hough, a man of great learning and unblemiſhed integrity. The king was incenſed by the above inſtance of diſobedience to his command, and the vice-preſident and fellows of the college were ſummoned to appear in the eccleſiaſtical court; but they proved, by the moſt inconteſtible evidence, that Farmer was in no reſpect qualified to ſupply the office then vacant.

After this a mandate was iſſued in favour of Parker, lately advanced to the ſee of Oxford, who was of a character not leſs abandoned than the other: but the fellows of the college abſolutely refuſed to comply with this injunction. Exaſperated by their refractory behaviour, the king repaired to Oxford, and ſummoning the fellows to appear in his preſence, he reproached them with great virulence for their preſumption and arrogance, and inſiſted that they ſhould elect the biſhop of Oxford, threatening them that they ſhould feel the effects of his moſt violent diſpleaſure, in caſe of their perſevering to oppoſe his command. His menaces and requiſitions being equally diſregarded by the collegians, the king returned to London, heartily aſhamed of having engaged in an expedition which had been productive only of contempt to himſelf. In revenge the eccleſiaſtical commiſſioners expelled the preſident, and all the fellows of the college, except two, who complied with his majeſty's demand. Parker was eſtabliſhed in poſſeſſion of the office, and papiſts only were admitted into the college. This illegal and outrageous meaſure was alone ſufficient to convince the people of the arbitrary views of the king.

A. D. 1688. One Stuart, who was the intimate friend of the penſionary Fagel, was employed by James to write to that counſellor, repreſenting that the mutual intereſt of England and the prince of Orange rendered an abolition of the teſt and penal laws neceſſary. By the direction of the prince, Fagel wrote in reply, ſignifying that the prince and princeſs would readily agree to indulge the catholics with liberty of conſcience; that they ardently wiſhed the proteſtant diſſenters to be allowed the free exerciſe of their religion; but that they could not ſuppoſe themſelves juſtifiable in conſenting to the abolition of the teſt and penal laws, which had been enacted expreſsly for the purpoſe of protecting the proteſtant religion from innovation, by diſqualifying catholics from ſitting in parliament, and holding any public offices.

There being now a proclamation, announcing the pregnancy of the queen, and appointing a day of ſolemn thankſgiving on the occaſion, the concern experienced by the Roman catholics in conſequence of Fagel's reply was partly diſſipated. The miniſterial emiſſaries employed themſelves ſo induſtriouſly, that congratulatory addreſſes were preſented to James from all parts of the kingdom, on occaſion of the pregnancy of his conſort. The king appeared to be greatly elated by the hope of having male iſſue: and ſetting the prince of Orange at defiance, he diſclaimed the correſpondence between Fagel and Stuart: permitting the Algerine pirates to make captures of the ſhipping belonging to Holland, recalled the ſix regiments in the ſervice of the States General, augmented his naval force, and from his whole conduct ſeemed deſirous of engaging in a war with Holland. And to manifeſt his contempt for the mal-contents, the king publiſhed a declaration, granting liberty of conſcience to his ſubjects; and to this was ſubjoined an order, that the biſhops ſhould cauſe it to be read in all the churches within their reſpective dioceſes. Hereupon the prelates repaired to the palace at Lambeth, to conſult the primate on the ſubject of the king's command. The matter having been ſeriouſly deliberated, it was unanimouſly reſolved, that the clergy could not conſiſtent with their duty towards God and their country, and the dictates of their conſciences, comply with the king's order reſpecting the declaration. They, in conſequence, in a petition to his majeſty, repreſented, that though they were extremely deſirous of affording every legal ſatisfaction to the proteſtant deſſenters, yet, as the declaration of indulgence was founded on an authority formerly pronounced illegal by parliament, they could not, without a breach of prudence, and a violation of honour and conſcience, conſent to become acceſſaries in diſtributing it through the kingdom; and therefore they implored his majeſty, to relieve them from the neceſſity of publicly reading the declaration. Hereupon the biſhops were ſummoned before the council, who reſolved to proceed againſt them with the utmoſt rigour. Being aſked, if they acknowledged the petition, the archbiſhop of Canterbury ſaid, it was written with his own hand; and the other prelates confeſſed that they had ſigned it. The chancellor aſking them if they would give bail to appear in the court of King's Bench, to anſwer ſuch accuſations as might be exhibited againſt them, they refuſed, urging, that their quality, as peers of the realm, the intereſts of the church, and the oath by which they were bound, to oppoſe all innovations upon the eſtabliſhed religion, ſecured them from the neceſſity of compliance. Hereupon the chancellor ſaid, that unleſs they would retract their aſſertions, and withdraw their petition, he would commit them to the Tower. They declared, in reply, that they were ready to go wherever his majeſty ſhould pleaſe; but that ſince they had acted in ſtrict obedience to the laws of the land, they were not to be terrified by threats, which could affect only the guilty. Upon this James ordered the attorney-general to proſecute the biſhops, for writing and publiſhing a ſeditious libel againſt the government; and an order was made for their commitment to the Tower, whither it was determined that they ſhould be conveyed by water, on account of the alarm and tumult that prevailed in the city. Being informed of the deſtination of the reverend prelates, immenſe multitudes of the people repaired to the banks of the Thames, and as the venerable men paſſed, the populace fell on their knees, and many of them even ran into the water, fervently praying heaven to protect them from injury, and exhorting them to ſuffer nobly in defence of their religion. The pious and ſubmiſſive deportment of the biſhops, increaſed the veneration of the people, whom they conjured to fear God, and honour the king.

The birth of a prince was announced on the tenth of June, to the extreme joy of the papiſts; but the proteſtants did not believe the child, who received the name of James, to be the iſſue of the queen. The matter has been the ſubject of much controverſy; but the queſtion ſtill remains involved in uncertainty, which indeed is not much to be regretted, ſince it is but a matter of mere curioſity; for admitting the legitimacy of the child, it muſt be acknowledged, that a prince educated in, and profeſſing the Roman catholic religion, could not be eligible to the ſovereignty of this country. The ſeven biſhops, who had been diſcharged from the Tower on their own recognizances, were tried at the bar of the King's Bench, for a libel againſt the king, as their petition was denominated. Wright and Allibone, two of the judges, delivered their opinion that it was a libel; while Holloway and Powel, the other two, declared it was not. The jury were ſeveral hours in deliberating on the verdict, but at length they acquitted them. The verdict of "not guilty," was no ſooner heard, than Weſtminſter-hall reſounded with the loudeſt acclamations, and a general joy ſpread throughout the cities of London and Weſtminſter, and thence through every part of the kingdom, at this defeat of the machinations of a tyrant. When the news reached the camp at Hounſlow-heath, the ſoldiers made loud rejoicings even in the hearing of the king, who was at dinner in lord Feverſham's tent. James inſtantly ſent an officer to enquire the cauſe of the exultation, who on his return told him, that it was nothing but the ſoldiers rejoicing on the acquittal of the biſhops; to which the king ſaid, "Call you that nothing! but ſo much the worſe for them." This, added to ſome other mortifications, induced the king to doubt the fidelity of his ſoldiers, which he determined to put to the proof, and this proof was productive of ſtill greater mortification. Beginning with lord Litchfield's regiment, he ordered them to take their arms; and commanded ſuch officers and ſoldiers as would not contribute to the repeal of the penal laws and teſt, to lay them down; which they all did, except two captains, and a few popiſh ſoldiers; at which he was ſo aſtoniſhed, that he ſtood ſpeechleſs for a while, and then bade them take up their arms again, adding, with a ſullen air, that he would not hereafter do them the honour to aſk their advice. This only ſerved to increaſe that contempt which the army had already conceived for the king; nor was the fleet better diſpoſed to ſecond James's views than the army. Vice admiral Strickland attempting to have maſs ſaid on board his ſhip, it occaſioned ſuch diſturbance among the ſailors, that they attempted to throw the prieſts overboard, and were with ſome difficulty reſtrained.

The nation ſoon became ſenſible, that the king was fully determined to ſubvert the conſtitution both in church and ſtate; and all perſons, whether whigs or tories ſeemed in earneſt to think of ſome method of preſerving their religion and liberties from utter deſtruction; for the birth of the prince of Wales, (whether real or pretended) threatened a continuation of popery and arbitrary power, even after the death of the king. The eyes of the public, therefore, were naturally turned towards Holland, and meaſures were taken, both by the clergy and laity, for inviting over the prince of Orange, to head the majority of the nation againſt the king. Admiral Hubert, who was beloved by the ſeamen, reſigned his commiſſion, and retired to the Hague, where he aſſured the prince of a general diſſaffection in the navy. This was confirmed by admiral Ruſſel, who paſſed frequently between England and Holland, and ſerved to keep up a conſtant correſpondence between the prince and the Engliſh proteſtants. Henry Sidney, brother to Algernon, went over to the Hague, under pretext of going to Spa for his health, and had frequent conferences with the ſtadtholder. Zuyleſtien, who had been ſent over to congratulate the king on the birth of his ſon, brought back to the prince a formal invitation from moſt of the great men in England. The biſhop of London, the duke of Norfolk, the marquis of Halifax, the earls of Dorſet, Devonſhire, Nottingham, and Danby; the lords Lovelace, Delamere, Paulet, Eland, with many gentlemen of great intereſt, and a great number of ſubſtantial citizens, joined in application to the prince, engaging with their lives and fortunes, to ſupport him in his endeavours to recover their civil and religious liberties. Lord Mordaunt, who lived at the Hague, did every thing in his power to advance this great deſign. Lord Wharton, who was an old man, forgetting his age and infirmities, paid a viſit to the prince on this occaſion; and the earl of Shrewſbury, who was a man of great popularity, gave up the command of his regiment, and mortgaged his eſtate for forty thouſand pounds, which with the additional tender of his perſonal ſervices, he offered to the prince of Orange.

The prince thus encouraged and ſupported, could not heſitate how to proceed. He began his operations when the people were ſo much incenſed by the impriſonment of the biſhops; and he ſhewed equal prudence and policy in conducting his preparations: under various pretences he took care to fit out a large fleet, and to levy a number of additional troops. But ſuch preparations could not be long kept ſecret; the French ambaſſador acquainted his maſter of what was paſſing, and he gave James timely notice of his danger, and, as it is aſſerted, offered him thirty thouſand men, which he was weak enough to refuſe. In the interim James commiſſioned his ambaſſador in Holland, to preſent a memorial to the States, to demand the deſtination of the extraordinary armament they had lately fitted out. The anſwer was, "that they only imitated the king of England, who had lately equipped a powerful fleet, and aſſembled a numerous army, without explaining his intentions;" and they deſired to know the nature of the alliance which had been formed with France by the king of England. In conſequence of this anſwer James ordered his fleet to be manned and prepared for ſea; gave directions for raiſing recruits for the army, and ordered ſeveral regiments from Ireland. He likewiſe appointed lord Feverſham general of the land forces, and entruſted the command of the navy to the earl of Dartmouth. Having received intelligence from the Hague, that there were great numbers of Engliſh ſubjects at that place, waiting to embark in the expedition with the prince of Orange, James and his council were ſo alarmed with the news, that the king immediately demanded the advice and aſſiſtance of the biſhops of Wincheſter, Chicheſter, Rocheſter, Peterborough, Ely, Bath and Wells. The prelates having conferred with the archbiſhop of Canterbury, they all waited on the king, and delivered the reſult of their deliberations in ten articles of advice, to the following purport: "They counſelled his majeſty to put the government of the different counties into the hands of perſons diſtinguiſhed by their birth, and qualified by the laws of the land; to aboliſh the eccleſiaſtical court; to recall all the diſpenſations, by virtue of which diſqualified perſons had been admitted into civil and eccleſiaſtical employment; to revoke all the licences, by which catholics were permitted to open public ſchools; to deſiſt from all pretenſions to a diſpenſing power; to refer it entirely to the deciſion of parliament; to forbid the four apoſtolic vicars to continue invading the eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction, which belonged to the Engliſh church; to fill up the vacant biſhoprics with men of learning and piety; to reſtore the charters which had been taken from corporations; to aſſemble a free parliament; and conſent that the biſhops ſhould offer ſuch reaſons as might reconcile his majeſty to the church of England."

James now alarmed at his ſituation, gave his aſſent to all theſe propoſals, and appeared thankful for the advice given him; ſo that all his ſchemes for the eſtabliſhment of popery, ſeemed to be at once fruſtrated. In dread of the fury of the people, orders were given for ſhutting up the popiſh chapels, and many prieſts made a precipitate retreat in order to ſecure their perſons.

In the mean time the prince of Orange applied himſelf, with the greateſt aſſiduity, to complete his armament; and as ſoon as every thing was finiſhed, he publiſhed a manifeſto, explaining the true motives for his expedition. Copies of this declaration were ſent over to England, and carefully diſperſed through every part of the nation. He ſolemnly diſclaimed all thoughts of conqueſt, or of giving his father-in-law any diſturbance in the enjoyment of his ſovereignty; declaring that his ſole intention was nothing more than that of maintaining the proteſtant religion, the laws and liberties of theſe kingdoms; which had been ſo openly violated; and the procuring a free and general parliament, which might at once ſettle all the rights of the ſubject, and the prerogatives of the crown, on a firm and a permanent baſis. He added, that he had undertaken this neceſſary and difficult taſk at the invitation of many lords both eccleſiaſtical and civil, and by numbers of gentlemen and other ſubjects of all ranks. The prince's meaſures were ſo well concerted, that in three days, above four hundred tranſports were hired, with artillery, arms, ſtores, horſes, and above fourteen thouſand land forces. The Engliſh nobility and gentry in Holland embarked with William, together with count Naſſau, the count de Solmes, M. Bentinck, and other perſons of rank. The van was led by admiral Hubert, and the rear conducted by Evertſen. The prince commanded in the center, carrying a flag with Engliſh colours, and the arms of the republic of Holland, ſurrounded with this motto, "The proteſtant religion, and the liberties of England;" and under it, Je maintien drai: that is, "I will maintain." Before the fleet had ſailed many leagues, the wind ſhifted to the weſt, and blew a hurricane, which continued two days and nights, and diſperſed the ſhips, ſo that it was a week before they could meet at their appointed rendezvous. They had ſuſtained very little damage; but with a view to lull James to ſecurity, orders were given to fill the Dutch Gazettes with exaggerated accounts of their loſs, and declarations that the expedition muſt be poſtponed till the ſpring. In the mean time the damage ſuſtained by the ſcattered fleet was ſo inconſiderable, that the prince, putting to ſea on the firſt of November, entered the channel on the third, the Engliſh fleet under lord Dartmouth lying ſtill, and letting the Dutch fleet paſs by. The prince landed with his whole army on the fifth, at Torbay, without oppoſition; and the troops were diſembarked at the village of Broxholme. The Dutch army marched immediately to Exeter, and there the prince's declaration was publiſhed. But the whole country had been ſo terrified at the dreadful executions which followed Monmouth's rebellion, that no perſons of any conſequence for ſeveral days joined the prince. The biſhop of Exeter fled with the utmoſt precipitation to London, and carried to court the firſt intelligence of this invaſion. The king was ſo pleaſed with this inſtance of zeal, that he rewarded the prelate with the archbiſhopric of York, which had long been kept vacant, with an intention of beſtowing it on ſome catholic. The firſt perſon who joined the prince was major Barrington, who was ſoon followed by the gentry of the counties of Devon and Somerſet. Sir Edward Seymore made propoſals for an aſſociation, which every one ſigned. By degrees, the earl of Abingdon, Mr. Ruſſel, ſon to the earl of Bedford, Meſſrs. Wharton, Godfrey, and Howe, came to Exeter: the whole kingdom was in commotion. Lord Delamere took arms in Cheſhire: the earl of Danby ſeized York; the earl of Bath, governor of Plymouth, declared for the prince: and the earl of Devonſhire made a like declaration in Derby. The nobility and gentry of Nottingham embraced the ſame cauſe; and every day diſcovered ſome effect of that univerſal combination, into which the kingdom had entered againſt the meaſures of James. Even thoſe who did not take the field againſt him, were able to embarraſs and confound his councils. A petition for a free parliament was ſigned by twenty-four biſhops and peers of the greateſt diſtinction, and preſented to the king; who returned for anſwer, that there was nothing he more earneſtly deſired than a free parliament, and that the moment the prince of Orange had quitted the kingdom, he would grant their requeſt with the greateſt diſpatch; but could not think of ſummoning that aſſembly, while an enemy continued in the heart of the kingdom, and could command ſo many members to be returned. But the moſt alarming ſymptom was, the diſaffection which, from the general ſpirit of the people, not from any particular reaſon, had crept into the army. The officers all ſeemed to prefer the intereſt of their country and of their religion, before thoſe principles which are eſteemed the moſt ſacred ties by men of that profeſſion. Lord Colcheſter, ſon to the earl of Rivers, was the firſt officer who deſerted to the prince; but he was followed only by a few of his troops. Lord Loveleſs made a like effort, but was intercepted by the militia under the duke of Beaufort, and taken priſoner. Lord Cornbury, ſon to the earl of Clarendon, was more ſucceſsful: he attempted to carry over three regiments of cavalry, and actually brought a very conſiderable part of them to the prince's quarters. Several officers of diſtinction informed Feverſham their general, that they could not, in conſcience, fight againſt the prince of Orange. Lord Churchill, afterwards the famous duke of Marlborough, carried with him the duke of Grafton, natural ſon to the late king, colonel Berkley, and ſome troops of dragoons. This conduct was a ſignal ſacrifice of every duty in private life to his country's proſperity.

The king received this fatal news on his arrival at Saliſbury, the head-quarters of his army. There remained none about his perſon in whom he could confide. The whole army had diſcovered ſymptoms of diſcontent, whence he concluded it to be full of treachery; and being deſerted by thoſe whom he had moſt favoured and obliged, he no longer expected that others would hazard their lives in his ſervice. Diſtracted and perplexed at theſe alarming circumſtances, he ſuddenly took the reſolution of returning to London; a meaſure which could have no other tendency than that of betraying his fears, and provoking farther miſchief.

The firſt ſtage of his majeſty's retreat towards London was Andover; there prince George, together with the young duke of Ormond; Sir George Huet, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction, deſerted him in the night, and retired to the camp of the prince of Orange. As ſoon as the news reached London, the princeſs of Denmark, pretending to dread the king's diſpleaſure, withdrew herſelf, in company with the biſhop of London and lady Churchill. She fled to Nottingham, where the earl of Dorſet received her with the greateſt reſpect; and the gentry of the county ſoon formed a troop for her ſafety.

Thus forſaken and diſtreſſed, the king was no ways prepared for this aſtoniſhing event. He burſt into tears, when the firſt intelligence was conveyed to him. In this incident, he doubtleſs foreſaw the total expiration of his royal authority. But the nearer and more intimate concern of a parent ſeized his heart, when he found himſelf utterly abandoned by a virtuous child, whom he had always regarded with the moſt tender affection. "God help me," cried he, in the extremity of his agony, "my own children have forſaken me!" But ſo great were the prejudices which then prevailed, that this wretched father, who had been deſerted by his favourite child, was believed, on her diſappearance, to have put her to death; a rumour that might have produced the moſt fatal conſequences, had not the truth been immediately diſcovered: for the populace, and even the king's guards themſelves, ſeemed determined to revenge the death of the princeſs, by a general maſſacre of the prieſts and catholics. The prince of Orange advanced with his army to Sherborn, and thence to Saliſbury, which he entered in triumph, the king's forces having ſome days before retired to Reading. Surrounded with diſtreſs, and having no truſty friend, the king aſſembled all the proteſtant peers in town, and deſired their advice. He particularly addreſſed himſelf to the earl of Bedford in the following manner: "My lord, you are a good man; have great influence; and can do me ſignal ſervice." "Alas!" replied the earl, "I am a feeble old man, very incapable of performing any conſiderable ſervice; but I had a ſon," added he, with a ſigh, "who, if now alive, could ſerve your majeſty in a more effectual manner;" alluding to the lord Ruſſel, who, towards the end of the late reign, had fallen a ſacrifice to the vengeance of the king, then duke of York. James was ſo thunderſtruck with this anſwer, that he remained, for ſome time, ſpeechleſs; but having recovered his ſpirits, it was propoſed to call a free parliament, and to ſend commiſſioners to treat with the prince. This the king readily complied with, and the lord chancellor was directed to iſſue the neceſſary writs for that purpoſe. The catholics were removed from the poſts and offices they held about the court; Sir Edward Hales, a perſon of that communion, and conſtable of the Tower, was removed from his poſt, and ſucceeded by Sir Bevel Skelton. Father Peters, the king's confeſſor, ſeeing the ſtorm riſe to ſuch an alarming height, wiſely conſulted his own ſafety by eſcaping into France. The marquis of Halifax, the earl of Northampton, and the lord Godolphin, were ſent to treat with the prince, who delivered to them a paper containing certain propoſals. The chief articles were, that a free parliament ſhould be called; that all papiſts ſhould be diſarmed, and deprived of all the offices they enjoyed; that all proclamations againſt himſelf ſhould be recalled; that the command of the Tower ſhould be put into the hands of the lord mayor; that if the king ſhould think proper to reſide in London during the ſeſſion of parliament, the prince ſhould alſo reſide near the ſame place, with an equal number of guards; or, that the king and himſelf ſhould reſide at an equal diſtance from London; that both armies ſhould be removed thirty miles from the city; that no new forces ſhould be brought into the kingdom; that Tilbury-fort ſhould be put into the hands of the city magiſtrates; that till the parliament met, part of the revenue ſhould be appropriated to the maintenance of the prince's army; and, in order to prevent an invaſion from abroad, Portſmouth ſhould be committed to the care of ſome perſon, equally agreeable to the king and the prince. When theſe propoſals were preſented to James, he affected to think them as moderate, or even more ſo, than he could have expected in the preſent poſture of affairs; but, in all probability, his real ſentiments were otherwiſe. Finding himſelf attacked and purſued by one of his ſons-in-law, abandoned by the other, deſerted by his own daughters and boſom friends, and hated by his ſubjects, he conſidered his fortune as deſperate. The queen, obſerving the fury of the people, and knowing how much ſhe was the object of general abhorrence, was ſtruck with the deepeſt terror, and began to apprehend a parliamentary impeachment, from which, ſhe was told, the queens of England were not exempt. The popiſh courtiers, and particularly the prieſts, were deſirous of carrying the king with them, whoſe preſence they knew would be ſome reſource and protection to them in a foreign country, and whoſe reſtoration, if it ever happened, would again reinſtate them in power and authority. The general defection of the proteſtants, induced the king to conſider the catholics as the only ſubjects on whoſe counſel he could rely; while the fatal cataſtrophe of his father afforded them a plauſible reaſon for making him apprehenſive of a ſimilar fate. Prudence gave way to danger, and ſelf-preſervation became the principal object of regard. In the mean time the news which arrived from all quarters helped to continue the panic into which the king was fallen, and which his enemies endeavoured to improve to their own advantage. Colonel Capel, deputy-governor of Hull, made himſelf maſter of that important fortreſs, and threw lord Langdale, the governor, into priſon, together with lord Montgomery, both of them catholics. The town of Newcaſtle received the lord Lumley, and declared for a free parliament. The duke of Norfolk, lord-lieutenant of the county of that name, engaged the ſhire in the ſame meaſures. The prince's declaration was read at Oxford by the duke of Ormond, and was received with great applauſe by that loyal univerſity, who, at the ſame time, made an offer of their plate to the prince. Every day ſome perſon of quality or diſtinction, and, among the reſt, the duke of Somerſet, went over to the enemy. A very violent declaration was diſperſed in the prince's name, but not with his participation; in which every one was commanded to ſeize and puniſh all papiſts, who pretended to carry arms, or exerciſe any acts of authority contrary to law.

On the twelfth of December, while the prince was marching leiſurely to London, the king diſappeared in the night-time, accompanied by Sir Edward Hales, a new convert, and haſtened to a ſhip which waited for him at the mouth of the river. The king's diſappearance was productive of conſternation and confuſion, as all government ſeemed to be ſuſpended. The citizens of London, however, reſolved to adhere to the prince of Orange, and ſent a deputation to him, with an addreſs craving his protection, and intreating him to honour the city with his preſence. By this temporary diſſolution of government, the populace were abſolute maſters, and plundered, burned, and demoliſhed all the Romiſh chapels. Jefferies the chancellor, who had diſguiſed himſelf in order to facilitate his eſcape, was ſeized by the mob, and treated with ſuch ſeverity that he died in a little time afterwards. While every one imagined that the king had actually fled to the continent, news arrived that he had been ſeized by the populace at Feverſham, while he was making his eſcape in diſguiſe; that he had been very ill treated till he was known; but the gentry had then interpoſed and ſecured him from inſult, though they would by no means conſent to his leaving the kingdom. This intelligence threw all parties into confuſion. The prince ſent orders to the king, commanding him to approach no nearer than Rocheſter; but the meſſage arrived too late. He had already returned to London, where the populace, touched with compaſſion for his unhappy fate, and influenced by their own levity, had received him with acclamations of joy. But while James reſided at Whitehall, little regard was ſhewed him by the nobility or any perſon of diſtinction. He himſelf diſcovered not the leaſt ſign of ſpirit, nor any intention of reſuming the reins of government, which he had relinquiſhed. Nothing therefore remained for the ruling powers, but to conſult the moſt proper means of diſpoſing of his perſon; and after ſome deliberation it was reſolved to puſh him into that meaſure, which of himſelf he ſeemed willing to embrace. The king having ſent lord Feverſham on a meſſage to the prince, deſiring a conference for ſettling the affairs of the nation, that nobleman was arreſted under pretext of his wanting a paſſport; the Dutch guards were ordered to take poſſeſſion of Whitehall, where the king then reſided, and to turn out the Engliſh; and Halifax, Shrewſbury, and Delamere, were ſent by the prince at midnight to acquaint the king, that it would be proper for him to retire to Ham-houſe near Richmond. He begged permiſſion, which he eaſily obtained, to withdraw to Rocheſter, a town near the ſea-coaſt. Accordingly the next day he ſet out for that place, accompanied by the earls of Ayleſbury, Litchfield, Arran, and Dumbarton, and attended by a detachment of Dutch guards. He lingered a few days at Rocheſter, and ſeemed to wiſh that he might be invited to keep poſſeſſion of the throne; but finding that the whole nation concurred in abandoning him to his own councils, he yielded to his melancholy fate; and being preſſed by private letters from his queen, privately embarked in a frigate he had beſpoke, and arrived at Ambleteuſe in Picardy, from whence he repaired to St. Germains, and was well received by Lewis.

THE INTERREGNUM

During JAMES's ABDICATION.

A. D. 1689. JAMES, when he abdicated the throne by quitting his kingdom, left a paper behind him, containing his reaſons for withdrawing a ſecond time; wherein he obſerved, that it would be ſtrange if the world ſhould blame his conduct, after the prince of Orange had made the earl of Feverſham priſoner, whom he had ſent to procure a friendly conference, and commanding his own guards to take poſſeſſion of Whitehall after eleven at night, without acquainting him with it, and even ſending him an order, after he was in bed, commanding him to leave the palace. After ſuch conduct, he had very little to hope from a perſon who had invaded his kingdom, and called the legitimacy of his ſon in queſtion. At the ſame time he appealed to all that knew him, and even to the prince himſelf, if they could believe him guilty of ſo unnatural a villainy. He added, that being born free, he was deſirous of preſerving his independence, and for that reaſon had again withdrawn himſelf, though not for ever; for whenever the nation ſhould be convinced that they had been abuſed and impoſed upon by the ſpecious pretences of religion and property, he would be ready to aſſiſt them, and break the chains forged by ambitious men. In the mean time the prince of Orange had arrived at Windſor, to ſettle the affairs of the nation with the lords, by whom he was expected. Notwithſtanding the prince of Orange had expelled from his throne and kingdom a powerful prince, once ſupported by a formidable fleet, and a numerous army; ſtill the more difficult taſk remained, that of obtaining for himſelf the crown, which his father-in-law had abdicated. To this end he reſolved to leave the lords, who had aſſumed the power of government, to their own guidance and direction. About ninety peers and biſhops drew up an addreſs, wherein they deſired the prince that he would be pleaſed to take the adminiſtration into his hands; manage the revenue; ſettle the affairs of Ireland; and purſue ſuch other meaſures as ſhould appear expedient for the public weal, till the eſtates of the kingdom ſhould be convened. In a ſecond addreſs, they ſolicited the prince to iſſue letters to the cities, counties, and boroughs, directing to elect members to repreſent them in parliament, within the ſpace of ten days from the date of thoſe letters. The lords alſo publiſhed an order, commanding all papiſts to depart ten miles from the city of London, and to remove above five miles from their places of reſidence in the country. In conſequence of a ſummons to meet the prince of Orange at St. James's, the members who had ſerved in parliament in the reign of Charles II. the lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council of London, aſſembled there on the twenty-ſixth of September, and adjourning to the houſe of commons, they, after the example of the lords, addreſſed prince William, requeſting that he would appoint the convention to be held on the twenty-ſecond day of January, and in the mean time take upon himſelf the adminiſtration of government. Thus was the prince ſupported by all the legal authority which could poſſibly be obtained at this juncture. The fleet obeyed his commands. The army allowed him to new model them, without murmur or oppoſition. The city ſupplied him with a loan of two hundred thouſand pounds: in a word, his adminiſtration was ſubmitted to, as if he had ſucceeded in the moſt regular manner to the vacant throne; and throughout England, Scotland, and Ireland, a profound tranquillity prevailed.

The convention being aſſembled on the twenty-ſecond of January, the lords choſe the marquis of Halifax their ſpeaker, and the commons Mr. Powle. A letter from the prince, addreſſed to both houſes, was read, purporting, that now he had complied with their deſires in re-eſtabliſhing the peace and public ſafety of the nation, it became their duty to exert their utmoſt efforts to ſecure their religion, laws, and liberties, upon a firm baſis; that the ſtate of affairs in Ireland required their immediate attention, as a delay might prove injurious to their foreign connections; and that he was perſuaded they were heartily diſpoſed to aſſiſt the Dutch, who had expreſſed ſuch ardour for the preſervation of the conſtitution of England. Hereupon they jointly preſented an addreſs to the prince, acknowledging, that, under the Almighty, the nation was indebted to him for deliverance; and that they entirely approved of his adminiſtration, which they requeſted he would continue. They then appointed a day of general thankſgiving for their happy deliverance, and ordered that a prayer ſhould be read for the prince of Orange in particular. After this, the following memorable vote paſſed in the houſe of commons, "That king James II. having endeavoured to ſubvert the conſtitution of the kingdom, by breaking the original contract between king and people; and by the advice of the jeſuits and other wicked perſons, having violated the fundamental laws, and withdrawn himſelf out of the kingdom, hath abdicated the government, and that the throne is thereby become vacant." But this vote was warmly oppoſed by the lords, among whom was a ſtrong party in favour of a regency, at the head of which was the earl of Nottingham. After a very ſpirited debate, the queſtion was carried for inſerting the word deſerted in the room of abdicated, and to expunge the clauſe reſpecting the throne having become vacant. But at a conference held between the two houſes, the lords relinquiſhed their amendments, and concurred in the vote of the commons. In the whole courſe of theſe tranſactions, the behaviour of prince William was highly meritorious, and diſcovered great moderation and magnanimity. He entered into no intrigues with the leaders of parties, but kept a profound ſilence. At length he thought proper to expreſs, though in a private manner, his ſentiments. He called together Halifax, Danby, Shrewſbury, and ſome others; when he obſerved, that having been invited over to reſtore liberty, he had engaged in this enterprize, and, at laſt, effected his purpoſe: that it belonged to the parliament, now choſen with freedom, to concert meaſures for the public ſettlement, and he pretended not to interpoſe in their determinations; that he had heard of ſeveral ſchemes propoſed for eſtabliſhing the government, ſome having inſiſted on a regent; others were for beſtowing the crown on the princeſs. It was their concern alone to chuſe that plan of adminiſtration, which was moſt agreeable or advantageous; that if they reſolved in favour of a regent, he had no objection; he only thought it incumbent on him to inform them, that he was determined not to be that regent, nor even engage in any ſcheme which he well knew would be attended with inſuperable difficulties: that no man could have a deeper and juſter ſenſe of the merits of the princeſs than himſelf; but he would rather remain a private perſon, than enjoy a crown, which muſt depend on the will or the life of another; and that they muſt remember, if they were inclined to purſue either of theſe plans of ſettlement, that it would be totally out of his power to aſſiſt them in carrying it into execution. The princeſs Mary ſeconded theſe reaſons and views of her huſband, who, among the many virtues ſhe poſſeſſed, was a very ſenſible and obedient wife. All conſiderations, therefore, were neglected, when ſhe conceived they came in competition with what ſhe thought her duty to the prince. When Danby and other friends wrote her an account of their proceedings, ſhe expreſſed the greateſt diſpleaſure; and tranſmitted their letters to her huſband, as a ſacrifice to conjugal fidelity. The princeſs Anne alſo concurred with her in ſentiment; and being promiſed an ample revenue, was contented to be poſtponed in her ſucceſſion to the crown. This unanimity and acquieſcence with the determination of the prince, put an end to the ſchemes formed by different parties; and the convention paſſed a bill, by which they ſettled the crown on the prince and princeſs of Orange; the ſole adminiſtration to remain in the prince. The princeſs of Denmark was to ſucceed to the prince and princeſs of Orange; her poſterity to that of the princeſs Mary; but before thoſe of the prince by any other wife.

James II. had fourteen children by his two wives, Anne Hyde, daughter to the earl of Clarendon, and Maria d'Eſte, daughter to the duke of Modena, out of which three only ſurvived him; namely, Mary, his eldeſt daughter, born the thirtieth of April, 1662, and married to William Henry of Naſſau, prince of Orange, afterwards king of England; Anne, his ſecond daughter (both by his firſt wife) born the ſixth of February 1664, and married to George, prince of Denmark, afterwards queen of England. James Francis Edward, commonly known by the name of the Chevalier de St. George, which ſon was by his ſecond wife, reſided at Rome, where he died in the year 1766, aged ſeventy eight.

The reader has already been informed of the great luminaries which ſhone forth in the orbit of literature, even amidſt the bigotry and licentiouſneſs which ſeemed to threaten the nation with inevitable deſtruction: but it might be thought a capital overſight, were we to omit the name of Locke, who inveſtigated the human mind, improved the powers of reaſoning, by diſtinguiſhing truth from error, removed the clouds of ſophiſtry, and the idle diſtinctions in logic and metaphyſics. He explained alſo the nature and foundation of government by unanſwerable arguments; and in a ſmall treatiſe on toleration, this great Chriſtian-philoſopher vindicated the rights of religious liberty with more exactneſs and preciſion, than any author in this or any other country ever yet diſplayed.

About one million two hundred thouſand pounds was the ordinary revenue of Charles II. That of James II. was raiſed by the parliament to about one million eight hundred and fifty thouſand pounds; and his income as duke of York being added, made the whole amount to two millions a year. The national debt at the revolution amounted to one million fifty-four thouſand, nine hundred and twenty-five pounds. The increaſe of coinage during theſe two reigns was ten millions two hundred and ſixty-one thouſand pounds ſterling.

The Engliſh colonies acquired conſiderable ſtrength and ſecurity by the recovery or conqueſt of New York and the Jerſeys; and the ſettlement of Pennſylvania and Carolina, during the reign of Charles II. without any aſſiſtance from the crown, extended the Engliſh empire in America. The proſecution of the diſſenters peopled the colonies. According to Dr. Davenant, the ſhipping increaſed more than double during the two preceding reigns.

Various manufactures were in this period eſtabliſhed in iron, braſs, paper, ſilk, and hats. The duke of Buckingham introduced from Venice the manufacture of glaſs and cryſtal; and prince Rupert, an encourager of uſeful arts, is ſaid to have been the inventor of etching. One Brewer brought from the Low Countries the art of dying woollen cloth. In 1677, the old law for burning heretics was repealed, on account of the continual dread the nation was under of popery being again introduced.

CHARACTER, PRINCIPLES, &c. of JAMES the SECOND.

James II. was of an active, violent, and vindictive temper. Obſtinacy and bigotry were the ruling motives of his actions; nay, ſuch a thorough bigot to popery was James, that he would ſtick at nothing to have it eſtabliſhed; to which end he laboured to extend the regal prerogative, and to eſtabliſh a deſpotic government. Some good qualities, it muſt be acknowledged, he poſſeſſed; being remarkable for his frugality of public money, his induſtry, his application to naval affairs, and his encouragement of trade; but we cannot ſay much in praiſe of, or join in ſentiment with thoſe who have extolled his ſincerity; for his whole reign was a continued violation of his reiterated promiſes of preſerving inviolate the liberties and religion of his people. Theſe, in his lofty idea of regal authority, had no right to liberty, but what might be dependent on his ſovereign will and pleaſure. Upon this fallacious prejudice he acted, in defiance of the fundamental laws and conſtitution of the realm; burſt in ſunder all thoſe ties which unite ſubjects to their ſovereign. He confined all power, encouragement, and favour to the catholics; and ſacrificed every conſideration of juſtice and prudence to a falſe zeal. This hurried him into meaſures which rendered his government intolerable to a free and generous people; and made it neceſſary for them not to ſubmit any longer to the yoke of an arbitrary tyrant, guided ſolely by the violent councils of a popiſh jeſuitical faction, and blindly adopting their ſlaviſh ſuperſtition. He alſo proſecuted his deſign with ſuch vehemence, as excited the fears of his free-born ſubjects, and made them unite in defence of every thing moſt dear and valuable. The reſult was to them a glorious revolution; to him diſgrace and juſt depoſition. We ſay a juſt and legal depoſition. If, indeed, the people were created only for the advantage and the pleaſure of kings; if they have a divine right to be tyrants, and ſubjects are appointed by heaven to be ſlaves, James had reaſon to complain; and we may add, his people had reaſon to rejoice, that a favourable opportunity occurred for ſtripping him of the power of rendering millions unhappy at his pleaſure. But, on the other hand, if people have a right to the poſſeſſion of their own property, till they part with it by their own conſent, or by that of their repreſentatives; if they have a right to the bleſſings of civil and religious liberty, and kings were only appointed for the purpoſe of defending them; the people of England had a right from nature, from reaſon, and the calls of duty, to expel a weak, obſtinate prince, who made it his buſineſs to deſtroy what he was bound to defend. By ſuch conduct he was rendered wholly incapable of diſcharging the important truſt of government; and hence a free people may learn, how dangerous it is to allow any prince to fill the throne of theſe kingdoms, who is in the leaſt infected with the Romiſh ſuperſtition.

and ſuſpecting, hating and hated by each other, was full of difficulties. To truſt his ſervice to the tories alone, many of whom ſeemed averſe to his title, appeared dangerous. To truſt it to the whigs alone, was to declare himſelf the head of a party; and to give countenance to a ſuſpicion, that he intended to govern by thoſe who had chiefly raiſed him to the government. The fear of appearing ungrateful prevailed; he threw almoſt all the power into the hands of the whigs, lord Nottingham being almoſt the only one of the tories who was brought into adminiſtration. He and lord Shrewſbury were appointed ſecretaries of ſtate. The archbiſhop of Canterbury was put upon the liſt of the privy-council, leſs from attention to him than to his order. The privy-ſeal was reſtored to Halifax, and lord Danby was placed at the head of the council-board, arrangements which pleaſed neither whigs nor tories. Danby, who wiſhed for his old ſtaff of lord-treaſurer, thought his ſervices ill requited; and to make him reparation, he was created marquis of Caermarthen. In order to make room for ſuch perſons as had real merit in promoting the revolution, the treaſury, the admiralty, and even the chancery were put into commiſſion. Burnet, who had been proſcribed by the late king, was made a biſhop; Sir Patience Ward was choſen one of the repreſentatives in parliament for London; and Pilkington, lord-mayor of that city; in which one had been pilloried, and the other fined one hundred thouſand pounds for an offence againſt the duke of York. Military preferments were beſtowed on lord Churchill, but they were not ſuited to his ambition; and no notice was taken of his lady, who continued as uſual in the family of the princeſs Anne. But though Nottingham, Shrewſbury, Halifax and Danby, appeared oſtenſible miniſters, the king, in ſecret, but his real confidence in Mr. Sidney, and in Bentinck, a native of Holland, the firſt of whom was created lord Sidney, and the laſt lord Portland. But what gave univerſal ſatisfaction, was the nomination of the judges. Each privy-counſellor was directed to bring in a liſt of twelve; and the judges were ſelected from theſe liſts.

The new council made it now their firſt care to convert the convention into a parliament, that the new ſettlement might be ſtrengthened by a legal ſanction, which was ſuppoſed to be wanting, as the aſſembly had not been convoked by the king's writ of ſummons. The experiment of a new election being thought too hazardous, it was reſolved in council that the king ſhould, by virtue of his own authority, change the convention into a parliament, by going to the houſe of peers with the uſual ſtate of a ſovereign, and pronouncing a ſpeech from the throne to both houſes. This expedient was accordingly practiſed. The king aſſured them, that he ſhould take the utmoſt care to retain their good opinion of his integrity; that Holland was in ſuch a ſituation as required their immediate aid; that the poſture of affairs at home, likewiſe demanded their ſerious attention; that a good ſettlement was equally neceſſary for the eſtabliſhment of domeſtic peace, and the ſupport of the proteſtant intereſt abroad; that the affairs of Ireland were too critically ſituated to admit of the leaſt delay in their deliberations; he therefore begged they would be ſpeedy and effectual in concerting ſuch meaſures as ſhould be judged indiſpenſibly neceſſary for the good of the nation. The commons, on their return to their own houſe, paſſed a vote of thanks to his majeſty, and made an order that his ſpeech ſhould be taken into conſideration.

The ceremony of the coronation was performed by the biſhop of London, the coronation oath being previouſly altered and explained. He officiated at the king's deſire in the room of the metropolitan, who was a malcontent; and the next day the commons in a body waited on the king and queen at Whitehall with an addreſs of congratulation. William, in order to conciliate the eſteem of his new ſubjects, ſignified, in a ſolemn meſſage to the houſe of commons, his readineſs to acquieſce in any meaſure they ſhould think proper to take for a new regulation, or total ſuppreſſion of the hearth-money; and this tax was afterwards aboliſhed. We muſt here obſerve, that previous to their coronation on the thirteenth of February, the prince and princeſs of Orange being ſeated on two large chairs in the Banqueting-houſe, both houſes of the convention waited on them in a body, when the clerk of the crown read, in the names of the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and the commons aſſembled at Weſtminſter, the following "declaration of their rights:"

THE MEMORABLE BILL OF RIGHTS,

Being the FOUNDATION and STANDARD of ENGLISH LIBERTY.

I. That the pretended power of ſuſpending laws, or the execution of laws, by royal authority, without the conſent of parliament, is illegal.

II. That the pretended power of diſpenſing with laws, or the execution of laws, by regal authority, as it hath been aſſumed, or exerciſed of late, is illegal.

III. That the commiſſion for erecting the late court of commiſſioners for eccleſiaſtical cauſes, and all other commiſſions and courts of like nature, are illegal and pernicious.

IV. That levying money for the uſe of the crown by pretence of prerogative, without grant of parliament for a longer time, or in any other manner than the ſame is or ſhall be granted, is illegal.

V. That it is the right of the ſubject to petition the king; and all commitments and proſecutions for ſuch petitioning, are illegal.

VI. That the raiſing or keeping a ſtanding army within the kingdom, in time of peace, unleſs it be with the conſent of parliament, is contrary to law.

VII. That the ſubjects, who are proteſtants, may keep arms for their defence, ſuitable to their condition, and as allowed by law.

VIII. That all elections of members of parliament ought to be free.

IX. That the freedom of ſpeech, or debates in parliament, ought not to be impeached or queſtioned in any court or place out of parliament.

X. That exceſſive bail ought not to be required, nor exceſſive fines impoſed, nor cruel nor unuſual puniſhments inflicted.

XI. That jurors ought to be duly impannelled and returned; and jurors who paſs upon men in trials of high treaſon, ought to be freeholders.

XII. That all grants of fines and forfeitures of particular perſons, before conviction, are illegal and void.

XIII. And that, for the redreſs of all grievances, and for the amending, ſtrengthening, and preſerving of the laws, parliaments ought frequently to be held.

And they do claim, demand, and inſiſt upon, all and ſingular the premiſes, as their undoubted rights and liberties: and no declarations, judgments, doings, or proceedings, to the prejudice of the people, in any of the ſaid premiſes, ought, on any account, to be drawn hereafter into conſequence or example.

Theſe articles being enumerated, the declaration concluded in the following manner: "Having therefore an entire confidence, that his ſaid highneſs neſs the prince of Orange, will perfect a deliverance ſo far advanced by him, and ſtill preſerve them from a violation of their rights, which they have here aſſerted, and from all other attempts upon their religion, rights, and liberties, the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and commons aſſembled at Weſtminſter, do reſolve, that William and Mary, prince and princeſs of Orange, be declared king and queen of England, France, and Ireland, and all the dominions thereunto belonging; to hold the crown and royal dignity of the ſaid kingdoms and dominions to them the ſaid prince and princeſs during their lives, and the life of the ſurvivor of them; and that the ſole and full exerciſe of the royal power be only in, and executed by the ſaid prince of Orange, in the names of the ſaid prince and princeſs during their joint lives; and after their deceaſe, the ſaid crown and royal dignity of the ſaid kingdoms to be to the iſſue of the body of the ſaid princeſs; and in default of ſuch iſſue, to the princeſs Anne of Denmark, and the heirs of her body; and in default of ſuch iſſue, to the heirs of the body of the ſaid prince of Orange."

When this declaration was read, the marquis of Halifax, as ſpeaker of the upper houſe, made a ſolemn tender of the crown to their highneſſes, in the name of the peers and commons of England; and the offer was accepted by their highneſſes in the moſt obliging manner.
